US Efforts To End European Banks' Ties To Iran May Be Succeeding. The Christian Science Monitor (9/22, Rice-Oxley, 58K) reports, "American attempts to persuade Europe to think again about financial involvement in Iran may be starting to bear fruit, according to European banking officials. Whether such 'back-door sanctions' will work is far less apparent, experts say." The Monitor says Washington is "troubled by a lack of speedy progress in the UN toward imposing economic sanctions," and has therefore "stepped up efforts this month to persuade allies to shun Iran's financial system, claiming that Iran may tap banks to illicitly finance terror operations or the purchase of materials for nuclear weapons." European allies have "long taken a softer line toward Iran than the US, and [have] essayed a soft-power approach to its nuclear program, persisting with negotiations." European firms, "particularly German and French, rack up billions of euros' worth of exports each year, with a considerable presence in the oil, automotive, retail, and telecommunication sectors." Analysts believe the EU's "experience" heading up the border force in Lebanon "is unlikely to change its geopolitical strategy in the region," even as "some European bankers are growing wary of the risk of doing business in Iran."

WSJournal Says Bush Appears To Have Been "Lassoed By The UN." The Wall Street Journal (9/22, 2.03M) in an editorial writes "that UN diplomacy has come to serve as a deterrent not against Iran but against any American effort to do anything about Iran's rush to acquire the bomb." And "the 'cowboy' American President looks increasingly like the one who's been lassoed by the U.N., not vice versa." The Journal states, "The conclusion is hard to resist that the U.N. effort is really about persuading America that it can 'live with' an Iranian bomb, just as it lives with a Pakistani bomb, because the costs of economic sanctions or military strikes are supposedly prohibitive. But a glimpse of what the world will look like if Iran succeeds was provided on Tuesday by Gamal Mubarak, the son of Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak. Cairo's heir apparent floated a proposal for Egypt to develop its own nuclear programs, clearly a signal that the largest Sunni Arab country will go nuclear itself to prevent Shiite Iran from dominating the region. And where Egypt goes, Saudi Arabia and Turkey cannot be far behind. Is the international system really prepared to live with five, maybe six, nuclear powers in the Middle East?"

DOJ_NMG_0067123

Chavez, Ahmadinejad Attacks Seen As Symptomatic Of Global Animus Toward US. In an analysis of the reaction to attacks on President Bush by the leaders of Iran and Venezuela, ABC World News (9/21, story 4, 2:40, Muir) reported, "The words drew gasps and giggles at the UN but political analysts say what's more telling is what they didn't draw." Fareed Zakaria, editor Newsweek International: "Not one other country stood up for us. Unfortunately, this is the climate we live in. It's not a place we should be in the world." Muir: "Most foreign policy experts agree the bluster is less important than strategic issues, especially when it comes to the Iranian President." Richard Holbrooke, former US Ambassador to the UN: "He scored a minor PR victory. The real issue is what to do with the strategic issue posed to the United States by Iran."

The Los Angeles Times (9/22, Richter, 918K) runs a similar story, titled "Anti-Americanism Is Providing a Glue," in which it reports, "The outpouring of anti-American rhetoric at the United Nations this week is demonstrating how anger at the United States is uniting the developing world in a way not seen since the 1980s, U.S. officials and analysts say." The Times states, "There is little doubt of the deepening unpopularity of the United States, even among longtime allies. Though the U.S. government has doubled its spending on public diplomacy, a poll this year by the Pew Charitable Trusts showed wide dissatisfaction with a central pillar of U.S. foreign policy, the 'war against terrorism.'" But Lee Feinstein, a member of the Council on Foreign Relations and a former senior State Department official under Clinton "said that even though the withering denunciations by Chavez and Ahmadinejad drew applause this week, overall, members of the United Nations were much more united behind American-style views of democracy and economics than they had ever been." Feinstein said, "The tragedy is, the Bush administration hasn't been able to take advantage of that fact."

In a second article, the Los Angeles Times (9/22, Farley, 918K) says Chavez "acknowledged that it might seem odd for a developing country to send charity to one of the world's wealthiest nations." Yet "the public relations value of tweaking his nemesis, President Bush? Priceless."

And the Miami Herald (9/22, Bachelet, 310K) notes that while "Chavez's visit last year passed largely unnoticed, Mount Olivet was teeming with US media on Thursday, prepped by Chávez's now infamous U.N. reference to Bush as 'the devil.'" While Chavez touted his efforts to deliver discounted heating oil for U.S. poor and elderly residents, "State Department spokesman Eric Watnik pointed out that the U.S. government handed out 'hundreds of millions of dollars to a much larger group of Americans' through federal programs."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/21) reported, "Chavez says his problems are not with the American people but with President Bush." Chavez (via translator): "I had a good relationship with Clinton. Never disrespected us. Now with this guy you can't even talk because he walks throwing stones. The Texan that walks shooting from the waist with a machine gun." Chavez added, "In two years when the elections come to the U.S. I hope that the president be a serious man, it doesn't matter if he comes from the right, I'll be the first person to raise my hand in order to re-establish a serious relationship of respect between governments and between people."

Eugene Robinson in his column in the Washington Post (9/22, A17, 748K) praises Chavez for being "crazy like a fox. Can anyone name the last president of Venezuela, or remember when a speech by any president of Venezuela made such news?" But Robinson warns Iran is a more serious threat to the US and says "When I travel outside the country, I'm struck by the decline in America's moral standing in the world. The Iraq war is the main reason, but not the only one. For all its talk about public diplomacy and spreading the U.S. gospel throughout the world, the Bush administration does an appallingly lousy job of it." The US "policy of not even talking to governments we don't like has proved counterproductive -- pushing Syria closer to Iran, for example, and needlessly prolonging the Israel-Hezbollah war, to no one's benefit except perhaps Ahmadinejad's. Our arrogance has turned us into the neighborhood bully and made our adversaries look like more sympathetic figures than they really are."

Some Democrats Defend Bush From Attacks; Harkin Defends Chavez. Rep. Charles Rangel on CNN's The Situation Room (9/21, Blitzer) was shown saying, "You don't come into my country, you don't come into my congressional district and you don't condemn my President. If there is any criticism of President Bush, it should be restricted to Americans, whether they voted for him or not."

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi on CNN's The Situation Room (9/21, Blitzer) was shown saying, "The manner in which he characterized the President, he demeaned himself and he demeaned Venezuela. He demeaned Venezuela. I think that he, Hugo Chavez, fancies himself a modern day Simon Bolivar but all he is an everyday thug."

The Washington Times (9/22, Pisik, 88K) described it as a "stiff rebuke" from Rangel and notes Rep. Chaka Fattah said, 'His personal attacks and ridicule directed at the president of the United States are unacceptable.'" But Sen.

DOJ_NMG_0067124

Tom Harkin "defended Mr. Chavez in an interview with Radio Iowa." While "the remarks were 'incendiary,' Mr. Harkin said, 'I can understand the frustration, and the anger of certain people around the world because of George Bush's policies.'"

The Wall Street Journal (9/22, 2.03M) editorializes, "Ms. Pelosi's and Mr. Rangel's remarks were politically shrewd if nothing else. Even smarter would be for the two of them to follow up by having a word with their Massachusetts delegation. Only last November, Congressmen William Delahunt and Ed Markey spoke of their 'debt' to Venezuela after arranging to buy 12 million gallons of Venezuelan home heating oil at a 40% discount for the Bay State. Mr. Delahunt has called the dictator his 'excellent friend,' and yesterday the Boston Globe quoted him as blaming the dictator's outburst on 'what low esteem the United States is held, not just in the Islamic world, but all over.'"

LATimes Opposes Chavez Bid For UN Security Council Seat. The Los Angeles Times (9/22, 918K) editorializes, "If Latin America doesn't have a consensus choice for the U.N. seat by Oct. 16, it will come down to a secret ballot by the General Assembly. In case of deadlock, which seems probable, a third country may well emerge as the winner. Uruguay and the Dominican Republic are considered the two most likely candidates, and either would be better than Venezuela. Chavez might seem like a laugh riot today, but after two years of gridlock and shenanigans on the Security Council, the joke would wear pretty thin."

Chavez' Regional Agenda Raises Concerns. Mary Anastasia O'Grady in her column in the Wall Street Journal (9/22, 2.03M) writes that while some are focused on the dangers of a link between Venezuela and Iran "there is an equally pressing threat from Venezuela right in the U.S. backyard. The battleground is Bolivia, which Mr. Chávez badly wants to control so he can seize that country's natural-gas reserves and become the sole energy supplier in the Southern Cone. In doing so, he hopes to seriously damage the Brazilian economy and crush Brazil's geopolitical ambitions as the leader in South America. In its place he wants to plant the flag of Venezuelan hegemony. If he gets away with it, Argentine and Chilean sovereignty would also be diminished and continental stability lost."

Violence Erupts In Gaza. The Washington Post (9/22, A14, Wilson, 748K) reports, "Israeli forces killed at least five Palestinians on Thursday in the Gaza Strip, while gunmen there fired rockets into Israel during the day. The spate of violence ended a few weeks of relative calm between Palestinian gunmen and Israeli forces that began after Israeli tanks and troops withdrew from a volatile area east of Gaza City early this month." Four rockets hit southern Israel, destroying some property but causing no injuries. "The Palestinians were killed in two separate incidents at far ends of the strip." Internal Palestinian disputes have "sharpened" recently, "and rocket fire into Israel appears to be on the rise again."

Rice Convenes Expanded Talks On North Korea. The Washington Post (9/22, A13, Kessler, 748K) reports, "With North Korea refusing to return to the six-nation disarmament talks," Secretary Rice "on Thursday convened a meeting of a new group of nations that will focus on Northeast Asian security concerns." Pyongyang "declined an invitation" to join the Five-Plus-Five, "and China and Russia did not send representatives." The Post notes, "Few issues have proven as vexing as the impasse over North Korea's nuclear ambitions. In some ways, the gathering is the diplomatic equivalent of throwing spaghetti against the wall -- an effort to try something just to see what sticks." Because there is "little prospect of restarting the six-party talks, the United States has decided to try to broaden the circle, bringing in nations such as New Zealand, Canada and Indonesia." The Post identifies "a broader subtext to the gathering. The Bush administration wants China to do more to bring North Korea back to the table, and Hill pointedly noted that several ministers present said China should do more." While the Administration "has prepared a new package of sanctions," it is asking "other countries to sanction North Korea first, before it announces its own sanctions, so it will not look like the heavy."

The Washington Times (9/22, Kralev, 88K) adds China and Russia, "key nations in six-party talks on North Korea's nuclear weapons, skipped an expanded session yesterday, in which countries from the Philippines to Canada sought to address Pyongyang's refusal to negotiate." Rice's meeting "was an attempt to involve Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Indonesia and the Philippines in an expanded forum on regional security." Anonymous international sources "confirmed that many of those present expressed disappointment with Beijing. They also said that the Chinese had made a conscious decision not to attend, questioning" Assistant Secretary of State Chris Hill's "suggestion that the reason had to do with scheduling." Hill "played down the absence of both China and Russia, saying that their foreign ministers had met with Miss Rice several times this week and 'we kind of know where they are on these issues.'"

The AP (9/22) adds Pyongyang "stayed away from a gathering of diplomats from the United States and seven other nations Thursday that focused on the specter of a nuclear North Korea." Hill is quoted saying, "They don't like to talk to people." Moscow and Beijing "also skipped the meeting, although they are members of the international coalition that reached a breakthrough disarmament bargain with Pyongyang a year ago. That agreement has never taken effect and North Korea is boycotting further talks in protest of what it calls unfair U.S. financial sanctions."

DOJ_NMG_0067125

Separate AP (9/22) reporting notes Ambassador Alexander Vershbow told South Korean media that Hill "could visit Pyongyang if North Korea ends its boycott of international nuclear talks." Pyongyang "has in the past invited" Hill, "who expressed willingness to make such a trip last year after the communist nation agreed at the arms talks to abandon its nuclear program in exchange for security guarantees and aid. The North immediately threw cold water on the deal and demanded a nuclear reactor for power generation — and the trip was put off." Vershbow "also said that Hill 'is prepared to enter into bilateral talks in a constructive spirit if North Korea is committed to return to the six-party talks,' according to" Embassy Seoul.

Indonesia Executes Three Christians Tied To Sectarian Killings. The New York Times (9/22, Bonner, 1.21M) reports, "In the early morning hours on Friday, an Indonesian firing squad executed three Christian men who had been convicted in connection with the violence that has wracked the province of Central Sulawesi. The government ignored a last-minute appeal from the European Union to declare a moratorium on the death penalty." The Times adds that "no evidence directly linked any of the condemned to killings," and the EU "appeal did not specifically mention the case of the Christians" but "was aimed at halting all executions." Indonesian President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono "is considered a leading contender for the Nobel Peace Prize because of his work in bringing about an end to the separatist war in the western province of Aceh, and European diplomats said that this could hurt his chances, given the strong anti-death penalty sentiments among European governments." The Times also notes, "The executions of the three men had become entangled with the case of the Bali bombers. In this overwhelmingly Muslim country, the government considers that the risk of political protests would be too great if it executed the Bali bombers and not the Christians."

The Washington Times/AP (9/22, Firdaus) adds, "The case against them has heightened tensions in the world's most populous Muslim nation and raised questions about the role religion played in punishing those behind the violence" in Central Suawesi. "Human rights workers say the men's 2001 trial was a sham, and that while it was possible the men took part in some of the violence, they almost certainly were not the masterminds."

Thai Generals May Have Acted To Prevent Their Sidelining By Thaksin. In extensive reporting, the Wall Street Journal (9/22, A4, Hookway, 2.03M) notes Thai Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin was "up against a tight deadline" when he overthrew the government Tuesday – "a fast-approaching military shuffle that could have promoted Mr. Thaksin's supporters into key posts and strengthened the billionaire businessman's grip on power." Thaksin "was preparing a strike to regain the upper hand, people familiar with the situation say. Mr. Thaksin planned to replace Thailand's senior commanders -- including [Sondhi] -- with new generals friendly to his government before a parliamentary election then scheduled for October." The Journal says that plan "at least partially drove the army's decision to stage this week's coup, people familiar with the events say." Thaksin's overthrow "has left" Sondhi "with the task of restoring a credible government in one of Southeast Asia's linchpin economies and a key ally of the U.S."

Coup Leaders Crack Down On Media, Opposition. The New York Times (9/22, Fuller, 1.21M) reports Sondhi yesterday "sought to strengthen the grip of his junta, banning political gatherings and 'activities' and summoning Thai media executives to army headquarters to warn them against publishing 'expressions of public opinion' — possibly a reference to opinion polls but perhaps also including commentaries. The junta also summoned Mr. Thaksin's closest political allies." The Times says "many questions remain about how the military will carry out its stated intention to return democracy to Thailand, which before a political crisis erupted in January was a sort of beacon of democracy for its neighbors." In the meantime, it remains unclear "what will happen to Mr. Thaksin and his fortune of more than $2 billion. The Thai news media speculated on Thursday that to appear more legitimate, the junta might open investigations against Mr. Thaksin. Showing financial malfeasance could justify the coup in the eyes of disapproving foreign governments."

The AP (9/22, Tang) says Sondhi's allies "tightened their grip Thursday, restricting political activities, assuming legislative powers and detaining some allies of the deposed prime minister." Coup leaders said they were "banning all meetings by political parties and the creation of new parties," and "also imposed media restrictions, including stationing soldiers at television and radio stations, and ordering the information ministry to stop the distribution of information 'deemed harmful' to its agenda." The crackdown "seemed likely to increase criticism from Western nations and human rights groups, which described" the coup "as a setback to democracy" nationally and regionally. The Washington Times/AP (9/22, Tang) runs a version of the AP report.

Thais Said To Accept, If Not Endorse, Coup. USA Today (9/22, Wiseman, Chitrada, 2.27M) says that, one year ago, millions of "rural Thais surged to the polls 19 months ago to re-elect Thaksin's party, Thais Love Thais, in a landslide. They saw Thaksin as a can-do leader who cared about Thailand's poor." Now, "Thaksin's rural supporters have remained mostly silent in the face of a coup that has been endorsed by Thailand's revered king. Many, in fact, appear to support the military takeover, if only because it ended a standoff between Thaksin and his opponents that had paralyzed the government all year." One "survey of 2,019 people for the Bangkok Post newspaper, published Thursday, found support for the coup ran higher outside the capital (86.4% approval) than inside (81.6%). Those findings were odd because Bangkok has been the center of anti-Thaksin sentiment and rural Thailand has been his stronghold."

DOJ_NMG_0067126

Somali Islamic Forces Direct Youth Fighters Into "Rehabilitation" Camps. In a lengthy piece, the Los Angeles Times (9/22, Sanders, 918K) details Somali "boot camps for Islam" that "aim to wean former warlord militiamen off drugs, instill religious values and train them to join Muslim forces." Somalia has seen nearly "3,000 former warlord militiamen sent to Islamist-run 'rehabilitation camps' on the outskirts of the nation's capital. It's an ambitious resocialization program designed to wean the young fighters off drugs, instill religious values and, eventually, reverse loyalties so they can be integrated into the Muslim fundamentalist forces." Administration officials have voiced "concern that increasingly Islamist Somalia could end up with a Taliban-style government and serve as a terrorist training area. Amid allegations that Islamists are using military advisors from Pakistan and Afghanistan to train soldiers, officials recently began permitting journalists to visit the camps. But they denied access to weapons stockpiles and insisted on selecting the militiamen to be interviewed, and carefully monitored what they said."

Cuban Spy Said To Have "Caused Serious Damage" To US Security. The Washington Times (9/22, Gertz, Scarborough, 88K) "Inside The Ring" column reports Ana Montes, "a Cuban spy working inside the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA), caused serious damage to U.S. national security by revealing U.S. electronic intelligence-gathering secrets and also by providing a feedback mechanism for communist disinformation from the Castro regime." The damage caused "is outlined in a classified assessment completed several months ago by the office of the National Counterintelligence Executive," and was disclosed this week in a new book by the newspaper's Bill Gertz.

Paulson Launches New Strategic Dialogue With China. The Financial Times (9/22, Guha) reports Hank Paulson US Treasury secretary has engaged in a new strategic dialogue with Chinese leaders and "will urge Hu Jintao, China's president, to allow the renminbi to appreciate more rapidly when the two meet on Friday in Beijing." In an interview "Paulson said he would compliment Mr Hu on reforms under way and 'encourage him to move forward even more quickly.'" Paulson "would also thank Mr Hu for putting his authority behind the new dialogue, which the US believes will help it produce results." He "said that while the dialogue would have a 'bilateral focus' it would invariably touch on 'global issues,' including global economic imbalances." Asked about the response in the US to the "new dialogue" Paulson said he "would contact senior congressmen on his return to explain why the dialogue with China was in the US national interest. 'Members of Congress are my clients,' he said. 'I need to engage with key people up there.'"

USA Today (9/22, Lynch, 2.27M) reports, "Paulson says China's agreement to participate in a new 'Strategic Economic Dialogue' will place the 'most important economic relationship in the world' on a solid long-term footing." But a "combination of stubborn commercial disputes and an increasingly protectionist Congress shadow his bid for a radically different Sino-American commercial relationship." Yet Paulson's "already demonstrated unusual speed in winning President Bush's approval to launch the new set of talks. One key: Paulson lined up backing from top White House aides and Cabinet colleagues before approaching the president this summer, says White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten, another former Goldman Sachs executive." Bolten said, "This was his brainchild. … He has the full confidence of the president, and other Cabinet members know that. The president is sufficiently interested in it that I think Hank (Paulson) will be able to attract the kind of time and attention he's envisioned. … This will turn out to be a substantial initiative."

Hungarian Leader Rejects Calls For Resignation. The Washington Post (9/22, A10, Whitlock, 748K) reports, "With protesters massed outside the gates of the stately Hungarian parliament for a fourth straight day, Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany sat in his wood-paneled office inside and tried to explain why he had admitted on tape that his party had done a 'boneheaded' job of running the country and that he had lied to voters to win reelection." He "repeated that he would not resign despite the sometimes violent protests that have rattled Budapest since local news outlets on Sunday broadcast excerpts of a leaked tape recording of his comments, made to a closed meeting of Socialist supporters shortly after he won reelection in April." But "there are few signs that the political pressure building against Gyurcsany…will end anytime soon."

Kozlin's Assassination Said To Showcase Threat Of Russian Organized Crime. In a 2,400-word piece its front page this morning, the Wall Street Journal (9/22, A1, Chazan, 2.03M) reports on the "high-stakes crusade to clamp down on Russia's murky and criminalized banking system, a project that lay at the heart of President Vladimir Putin's ambition to modernize Russia's economy." Bank regulator Andrei Kozlov "spearheaded the campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0067127

Last week, his ambitions were cut short by an assassin's bullet." The Journal calls Kozlov "one of the most senior Russian officials to be murdered since the end of communist rule, and his death stunned the country's elite. Contract-style killings of businessmen were commonplace in the early 1990s, when capitalism was in its infancy here, but most thought they had become a thing of the past." The murder "exposed the fragility of Mr. Putin's claims to have ushered in a new era of stability. It also showed that despite the gradual removal of political challenges to Kremlin power, crime and corruption still menace the authority of the state."

Activist Argues Against Use Of DDT To Combat Malaria. Dr. Jessie Stone, founder and director of Soft Power Health, a nonprofit organization in Uganda, in an op-ed in the New York Times (9/22, 1.21M) warns that while the WHO, the White House and Congress have endorsed using DDT to combat the spread of malaria in Africa, "DDT is not the magic bullet that will eradicate malaria. We need to refocus resources and attention on something most Africans do not have: basic malaria education, and prevention with insecticide-treated bed nets. A mosquito net costs $6.50 and can last up to five years. … We do not have to reinvent the wheel here. We just have to help educate people — even those with the best intentions."

Uruguayan Firm Seen As Model For New Global Economy. Thomas Friedman in his column in the New York Times (9/22, 1.21M) uses the success of TCS Iberoamerica, a joint outsourcing venture in Uruguay, as an example of "how any entrepreneur -- with the right imagination, Internet bandwidth and a small amount of capital -- can assemble a global company by matching workers and customers from anywhere to do anything for anyone. Maybe the most important rule in today's increasingly flat world is this: Whatever can be done, will be done -- because so many people now have access to the tools of innovation and connectivity. The only question is: Will it be done by you or to you?"

Pope Praised In Confrontation With Muslims. Daniel Henninger in his column in the Wall Street Journal (9/22, 2.03M) praises Pope Benedict XVI for raising the issue of Muslim radicalism writing "The pope has a Muslim problem alright. It is the hammering that Christian communities have been taking for years and are getting now in Islamic countries all over the world, but especially in the Middle East." Henninger concludes, "The Vatican doesn't want oil. Hegemony is long gone from its vocabulary. The Vatican's only brief is a modus vivendi, a global reality Islam must eventually acknowledge. The governments of Egypt, Iraq and Saudi Arabia should open the dialogue Benedict XVI is seeking. In March, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak met with Benedict at the Vatican. He would be the obvious choice to take the lead. More than these Arab governments realize, their future could use the support of the pope's famous divisions."

Charles Krauthammer in his column in the Washington Post (9/22, A17, 748K) writes, "The pope gives offense and the Mujaheddin al-Shura Council in Iraq declares that it 'will break up the cross, spill the liquor and impose the 'jizya' [head] tax; then the only thing acceptable is conversion or the sword.' This to protest the accusation that Islam might be spread by the sword. As I said. No sense of irony."

NYTimes Urges Blair To Step Down. The New York Times (9/22, 1.21M) in an editorial praises British Prime Minister Tony Blair's record but declares "It is time for Mr. Blair to move on, preferably before the end of this year." It is also time for Gordon Brown "to recognize that the job he has wanted so badly for so long is not merely a reward for tight-lipped endurance. Mr. Brown needs to start talking about the domestic and foreign policies he would work for if the Labor Party chose him as the next prime minister. But so long as Mr. Blair talks about staying on for almost another year, Mr. Brown…is constrained from doing so. That is reason enough for Mr. Blair, already a lame duck, to speed his departure."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Bush Bows To Senators On Detainees."
"Spinach Scare's Larger Warning."
"A Can-Do Painter's Creation."
"Prescription For Price Cuts."
"Mountjoy Campaign Misstated Navy Duty."
"Tribune Co. To Explore Sale Or Breakup Of Firm."

USA Today:
"What Do Jeff Gordon, Martina Navratilova, Bob Knight And Mariano Rivera Have In Common? The Soul Of A Champion.."
"Deal On Suspects Closes GOP Rift."
"Savings, Shakeup Seen In $4 Drug Plan."

New York Times:
"Republicans Reach Deal On Detainee Bill."
"Strained, Army Looks To Guard For More Relief."
"U.S. Urges H.I.V. Tests For Adults And Teenagers."
"New York English Scores Drop Sharply In 6th Grade."
"Pickers Are Few, And Growers Blame Congress."
"Children Of Rich Learn Class, Minus The Struggle."

Washington Post:
"White House, Senators Near Pact On Interrogation Rules."

DOJ_NMG_0067128

"U.S. Recommends Routine Testing For The AIDS Virus."
"Wal-Mart Sets $4 Price For Many Generic Drugs."
"The Super-Rich Get Richer: Forbes 400 Are All Billionaires."
"Across Latin America, Mandarin Is In The Air."
"Students Rebel Against Turnitin."

Washington Times:
"Bush Ready To Ok Border Barrier."
"Rangel Rebukes Chavez On Bush."
"Pakistan Official Defends Truce."
"GOP Compromises On Terror Detainees."
"Wal-Mart to offer Discount On Drugs."
"Ex-Pan Am Workers Finally Will Get Paid."
"Fans Want Angelos Out."

Detroit Free Press:
"Detroit Tries To Avert Crippling Student Loss."
"French Union Vary Of Alliance."
"Downtown Entertainers A New Idea."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Detainee Deal Gets Go-Ahead."
"Who Is This man?"
"Wal-Mart Will Chop Prices Of Generic Drugs."
"Developer Abandons City Beltline Project."
"CDC Urges Routine Testing For HIV."

Houston Chronicle:
"Officer Slain During Traffic Stop."
"Routine Testing For HIV Urged."
"Branson Pledges Billions To New Fuels."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Detainee Debate Solved; Detainee Debate Analysis; Iraq-Sectarian Violence; UN Anti-American Speeches; HIV Testing; Wal-Mart-Prescription Drugs; Philanthropy; Wealthiest Americans; Space Shuttle; Immigration Debate; Polar Bears.
CBS: Detainee Debate Concluded; Wal-Mart-Prescription Drugs; E. Coli Outbreak; HIV Testing; Branson-Global Warming; Evangelicals-Liberal Vs Conservatives Politics; Carlos Opinion Illegal Immigration; Oldest Childs Skull Found; Wealthiest Americans; Day Dreaming OF Flying.
NBC: Wal-Mart-Prescription Drugs; HIV Testing; Detainee Debate Concluded; Afghanistan Violence; Cancer Treatment Controversy; Space Shuttle; A Day Of Summits; Stock Market; CEO Spokesmen.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Meets with the President of Pakistan, Oval Office; holds joint press availability with President of Pakistan, East Room; participates in photo opportunity with the 2006 National Spelling Bee Champion, Oval Office.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — Arrives at Pennsylvania Air National Guard base, Coraopolis, Pa.; speaks at a luncheon for Santorum Victory Committee, Private residence, Venetia, Pa.; arrives at Greater Rochester International Airport. Rochester, N.Y.; speaks at a reception for Rep. Randy Kuhl. Rochester Riverside Convention Center.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on pending nominations. Location: Room 419, Dirksen.

US House: 9:30 a.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Technical and Tactical Intelligence Subcommittee. Closed hearing on the Natiopnal Geospatial Intelligence Agency acquisition strategy. Location: Room H-405, Capitol.

10 a.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Full Committee. Hearing on whether the District of Columbia needs its own crime lab. FBI Lab Director Joseph DiZinno, D.C. Police Chief Charles Ramsey; D.C. Deputy Mayor Edward Reiskin, D.C. resident Valencia Mohammed. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

Other: PAKISTANI PRESIDENT MUSHARRAF _ Highlights: 8:45 a.m. Meets with President Bush. Oval Office. 10:05 a.m. Holds a news conference with President Bush. White House. 1:30 p.m. Speaks to students, faculty and staff at George Washington University. Marvin Center Theater, 800 21st St. NW.

GENETIC TESTING-ETHICS _ Johns Hopkins University's Genetics and Public Policy Center holds the National Genetic Policy Summit. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. Plenary, with Francis Collins, Director, National Human Genome Research Institute; Barry Straube, Director, Office of Clinical Standards and Quality, and Chief Medical Officer, Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. 10:15 a.m. Direct-to-Consumer Genetic Testing, with Rick Borchelt and Gail Javitt, Genetics and Public Policy Center; Robert Nussbaum, Chief of Medical Genetics, University of California, San Francisco; Howard Coleman, CEO, Genelex Corp. Peter Lurie, Public Citizen. Location: Fairmont Hotel, 2401 M St. NW.

FAMILY-VOTERS _ The Family Research Council, Focus on the Family Action, American Family Association Action, others, hold the first ``Washington Briefing: Values Voter Summit 2006." Highlights: 7:15 a.m. FRC Breakfast for Pastors with Rev. Jerry Falwell. 9:10 a.m. Rep. Mike Pence. 9:35 a.m. Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney. 11:20 a.m. Sen. Sam Brownback. 11:30 a.m. Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee. 2:35 p.m. White House Press Secretary Tony Snow. 3 p.m. Sen. George Allen. 4:25 p.m. Attorney General Gonzales. Location: Omni Shoreham Hotel, 2500 Calvert St. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0067129

SUPPORT THE TROOPS _ Military family members and supporters from around the country attend 2nd annual Support the Troops weekend. Highlights: 9 a.m. Capitol Hill visits to encourage members of Congress to support America's efforts in Iraq, Afghanistan, elsewhere. (Time is approximate). 7 p.m. Greet wounded soldiers and their families, arriving Walter Reed Army Medical Center, main gate, 7200 Georgia Ave., NW.

ELECTION REFORM _ 8:30 a.m. The AEI-Brookings Election Reform Project holds a conference on the status of election reform efforts, with Rep. Rush Holt giving the keynote address at 8:30 a.m. Location: 12th floor, AEI, 1150 17th St. NW.

HOUSE DEMOCRATS _ 9 a.m. House Democrats hold a forum with economic experts and citizens discussing the impact of the economy on the economic security of families. Location: Room HC-5, Capitol.

PENTAGON-IRAQ _ 9 a.m. Army Maj. Gen. James Thurman, commander of the Multi-National Division-Baghdad, will brief live from Iraq , to provide an update on ongoing security operations in that country. Location: DOD Briefing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

RUMSFELD _ 11 a.m. Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld holds a Pentagon Town Hall meeting for Pentagon employees. He will be joined by Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. Peter Pace. Location: Pentagon Auditorium, Room BH650, Pentagon.

ANTIWAR VOTERS _ 11:30 a.m. CODEPINK launches www.givepeaceaVOTE.org. Pink slips, peace signs, and anti-war voters, including Yoko Ono, Jackson Browne, Susan Sarandon, Kate Hudson, Samuel L. Jackson, Howard Zinn, Alice Walker, Anne Lamott, Michael Franti, will participate. Location: Outside Hart Senate Building.

CELLULOSIC ETHANOL _ 12 p.m. The Environmental and Energy Study Institute holds a briefing on cellulosic ethanol technologies. Location: Room 1302, Longworth.

ELECTION _ 12 p.m. The Cato Institute holds a briefing on electoral competition and American politics, with Michael McDonald of Brookings Institution and John Samples of Cato. Location: Room B-338, Rayburn.

BIOTECHNOLOGY-COSTS _ 12:15 p.m. The Alliance for Health Reform and the journal Health Affairs holds a briefing on biotechnology costs, with James Robinson of the University of California-Berkeley; Sean Tunis, Health Technology Center; Jim Greenwood, President of BIO, a biotechnology trade association; and M. Carolina Hinestrosa of the National Breast Cancer Coalition. Location: Columbus Club, Union Station.

WORKING POOR _ 12:30 p.m. The New America Foundation holds a program the living wage and the working poor, with Robert Strauss of Carnegie Mellon University, others. Location: 7th floor, 1630 Connecticut Ave. NW.

ASTRONAUT-SPACE STATION _ 12:49 p.m. The First female space tourist Anousheh Ansari, currently aboard the International Space Station and a George Washington University alumna, speaks GW students from space. Location: 3rd floor amphitheater, Marvin Center, 800 21st St. NW.

FLU PANDEMIC-FAUCI _ 1:30 p.m. Dr. Anthony Fauci, director of NIH's National Institute of Allergy and Inefectious Diseases, delivers a lecture on the threat of pandemic influenza, titled, ``Biodefense and Pandemic Influenza: The Research and Public Health Interface. Location: Pryzbyla Center Great Room, Catholic University of America, 620 Michigan Ave. N.E.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Friday, September 22, 2006 8:05 AM
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Friday, September 22, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips060922.pdf; dojclips060922.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Bush, GOP Rebels Agree On Detainee Bill (AP) 4
White House, Senators Near Pact On Interrogation Rules (WP) 6
Deal On Suspects Closes GOP Rift (USAT) 7
Accord Is Reached On Framework For Detainee Bill (WSJ) 8
GOP Compromises On Terror Detainees (WT) 9
Bush Bows To Senators On Detainees (LAT) 10
Republicans Reach Deal On Detainee Bill (NYT) 13
White House In Deal On CIA Prisons (FT) 14
Bush, Senators Reach Agreement On Detainee Interrogation Legislation (MCT) 15
A Bad Bargain (NYT) 16
The Abuse Can Continue (WP) 17
Gonzales Revisits Deportation Remarks (WP) 18
State Asks Court To Dismiss Suit Over Phone Company Records (AP) 19
Bush Administration Asks Appeals Court To Quickly Dismiss Eavesdropping Case (FINDLAW/AP) 20
Claim 9/11 Terrorists Were Identified Is Rejected (NYT) 20
FBI Says Its Agents Did Not Visit Puerto Rican Independence Activist (AP) 21
Inside The Ring (WT) 22
Britain Makes Modest Relaxation In Carry-on Rules (USAT) 23
Woman Sentenced To Death For Role In Jordan Hotel Bombings (WP/AP) 24
Inside The Beltway (WT) 25
The Trials Of The Century (NYT) 26

Homeland Response:

Chief Defends Terror Arrests (MH) 27
Deal Is Reached On Plants And Terrorism (NYT) 28
ID Program Will Cost States $11 Billion, Report Says (WP) 28
Ex-Pan Am Workers Finally Will Get Paid (WT/AP) 29
An Agreement Is Formalized On Rebuilding At Ground Zero (NYT) 30
Pact May Mean Rebuilding Delay At Ground Zero (WSJ) 31

War News:

Bush To Meet Presidents Of Pakistan And Afghanistan (CHIT) 32
Bush To Press Afghan, Pakistani Leaders On Terror Issues (MCT) 33
Pakistan Official Defends Truce (WT) 34
Congress Stalls On Minimum Wage, Tribunals And Other Key Issues (WSJ) 35
Taliban's Gains Forestall U.S. Troop Reductions In Afghanistan (WP) 36
Pakistani Leader Says Armitage Made Bomb Threat (USAT/AP) 37
$70B OK'd For Iraq And Afghan War Funds (AP-Y) 38
House-Senate Panel Approves Defense Budget (WSJ) 39
GOP Leaders Work Out Deal On Defense Spending (LAT) 40
Democrats: War Forces Army To Cut Back On Base Operations (MCT) 41
Casey: Iraq War Becoming Internal Fight (AP-Y) 42
U.N. Expert: Iraq Torture May Be Worse (AP) 43
Antiwar Push Starts Near White House; 34 Arrested (WP) 44
Army Meets Recruiting Goal (AP) 44
Strained, Army Looks To Guard For More Relief (NYT) 45

DOJ:

Office Of U.S. Attorney 'stressed' (SEAPI) 48

Corporate Scandals:

H-P's Hurd Likely To Testify Before House Panel (WSJ) 49
Focus Turns To The Chief Of H.P.; Stock Falls (NYT) 50
Hewlett-Packard Receives SEC Request For Information (Update2) (BLOOM) 52
Plot Thickens In HP's News-leak Probe (USAT) 54
HP Stock Falters In Spying Scandal (WP) 55
Hewlett-Packard, Wilson Sonsini Part Ways In Calif. Probe (LAW) 57

Brosnahan: Don't Blame HP Chair, She's Not A Lawyer (LAW) 57
HP's Dunn Toasted At Gala Dinner (CNET) 58
Senators Press Probe Of Gemstar Ex-CEO (LAT/BLOOM) ... 59
Cablevision Gave Backdated Grant To Dead Official (WSJ) . 60
SEC Tightens Hedge Fund Scrutiny (FT) 62

Criminal Law:

Fitzgerald Given Way Out Of Libby CIA Leak Case (MSNBC) 63
Judge Rules For Cheney Aide (NYT/AP) 64
Limits Used In Terror Cases Are Imposed On A Mob Figure (NYT) 64
Defense: Reputed Mobster Used Santeria Ritual (NEWSDAY) 65
Attorneys Deny Allegations Client Plotted To Kill Judge (LAW) 66
FBI Raid Targets County Job Files (CHIT) 67
FBI Raids Cook County Office (CHIST) 68
FBI Raids Cook County HR Office (WMAQ-TV) 69
FBI Agents Raid Cook County Office (WP/AP) 70
Ex-N.O. Prosecutor Gets Life In Federal Civil Rights Rape Case (AP) 70
Former Orange Beach Mayor's Wife Pleads To Obstruction Count (AP) 70
Another Gamble For Online Betting (WSJ) 71
Feds Charge WTC Painter In $1 Million Ripoff From Sept. 11 Fund (NEWSDAY) 72
Prosecutors Say Map-stealing Collector Motivated By Resentment (AP) 72
Credit Card Companies Pledge Help In Fighting Child Pornography (NYT) 73
Data Retention Bill Expected Next Week (CNET) 74

Civil Law:

Federal Officials Scrutinizing Company Payments To Doctors (NYT) 75
Pediatrix Finalizes $25.1M Settlement (AP-YBIZ) 76
IRS To Pay Former Workers Whose Jobs Were Outsourced (WP) 76

Civil Rights:

Chastang Appointment To Be Reviewed By Department Of Justice (MR) 77
Chronicle, Job-fair Firm Called Biased Against Noncitizens (SFC) 78
Library's Ban On Prayer Service Upheld On Appeal (SFC) 78

Antitrust:

Samsung Exec Guilty Of Price-Fixing (AP) 79
Samsung US Executive Gets 8 Months For Price-fixing (SJBIZ) 80
Samsung Executive Agrees To Jail Term For Chip Conspiracy (AFP-Y) 80
Wright Deal Tweaked To Address Antitrust Concerns (DMN) 81
NYSE-Euronext: One, But Two (WSJ) 82

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Interior Official Says She Will Not Try To Recoup Lease Money (NYT) 83
At E. Coli Hunt's End, A Safety Standards Gap (WP) 84
Top E.P.A. Official Rejects Recommendations On Soot (NYT) 86
EPA Cuts Soot Level Allowable Daily In Air (WP) 87
Confirmation Likely For Parks Nominee (AP) 88

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Judge Suspends Jail Time For BALCO Journalists, Pending Appeal (CCT) 89
Reporters Get Jail In Steroids Inquiry, But Ruling Is Stayed (NYT/AP) 90
San Francisco Reporters Sentenced To Jail In Bonds Steroids Case (CCT) 90
Judge: BALCO Reporters Face Prison If They Lose Appeals (SFC) 91
Jailing The Messenger (LAT) 92
Contempt On Steroids In S.F. (DENP) 93
Outcome For Chronicle Reporters Means We All Lose (ESPN) 94
NFL, Union Meet To Discuss Drug Tests (NYT/AP) 95
Goodell, Upshaw Discuss Drug Testing Program (WP) 96
Ex-city Worker Admits Heroin Dealing (CHIT) 96
Feds Break Up Alleged Coke Ring (BOSH) 97
Huge Coke Bust (DI) 98
Worker On New Las Vegas FBI Office Nabbed On Old Murder Warrant (AP) 99
Judge In Nightclub Fire Case Upbraids Prosecution Over Leak (NYT) 99

Immigration:

U.S. Prosecutors Indict 15 In Alleged Commercial Driver's License Conspiracy For Unqualified Immigrants (FINDLAW/AP) 100
House Bills Make Illegal U.S. Entry Tougher (LAT) 101
House Passes 3 Bills On Border Security (USAT) 101
House Passes Border Security Bills (AP) 102
Bush Ready To OK Border Barrier (WT) 103
Immigration Ugliness (WP) 104

DOJ_NMG_0067133

U.S. Project To Secure Borders Will Begin In Arizona Desert (NYT) 105
U.S. To Closely Watch Boeing's Border Plan (WP) 106
Pickers Are Few, And Growers Blame Congress (NYT) 107
Illegal Workers Supplant U.S. Ones, Report Says (NYT) 109

Tax:

I.R.S. Inquiry Into Sermon Is Challenged By Church (NYT) .. 109
IRS Probe Of Cal Church Could Reverberate In Political Season (AP) 110
All Saints Episcopal Church Won't Comply With IRS Probe (LAT) 111

Congress-Administration:

Rare Judicial Impeachment Hearing Ends With Little Action Taken (LAW) 113
Tony Snow (CSM) 115
Presidential Ratings Rise With New Message Man (WT) 116
Probe Finds Jackson Urged Favoritism In HUD Contracts (WP) 116
HUD Chief's Remarks Aside, Study Finds No Favoritism (NYT) 118
Don't Let Him Near The Checkbook (WP) 119
Payment To Lewis Aide Is Cleared (LAT) 120
The President, Up Close And Personal (WP) 120
Census Data On Some Of 1,100 Missing Laptops (USAT) .. 121
1,100 Laptops Missing From Commerce Dept. (WP) 121
Commerce Department Has Lost 1,137 Laptops Since 2001 (WSJ/AP) 122
Capitol Police Revise Details On Intruder (WP) 123
Pro-marriage Bill Seeks $4 Million Budget Add (WT) 124
U.S. Recommends Routine Testing For The AIDS Virus (WP) 125
U.S. Urges H.I.V. Tests For Adults And Teenagers (NYT) 126
CDC Recommends AIDS Tests For Most People (USAT) ... 128
Report Recommends Change In Medicare (NYT/AP) 129
Medicare Drug Costs Debated (AP) 129
Luring Customers From Medicare (NYT) 130
White House Willing To Deal To Get GSE Bill, Paulson Says (WSJ) 133
GOP Games At The FDA (WSJ) 133
Back On Track In Space (NYT) 134

Other News:

Bush Talks Taxes In Tampa (SPT) 135
President's Visit Pads GOP's War Chests (TT) 136
President Pitches Crist To Party Faithful (MH) 137
Bush Leads New Offensive Featuring Economy And Linking Democrats To High Taxes (NYT) 139
In Florida, Bush Touts Tax Cuts (WP) 140
Bush Flexes Campaign Muscles (AP) 141
Bush Campaigns On Tax Cuts (LAT) 142
Democratic Win Means More Taxes, Bush Warns (WT) 143
Bush: Best Way To Protect Nation Is To `stay On The Offense' (MERCN) 144
8 Year Old Meets President, Invites Him To Party For Hurricane Victims (BRAH) 145
Valrico Boy Gets Presidential Award (SPT) 145
Welcome To My Site! (LRWF) 146
President Visits Bucs, Throws With QB (FWNS) 146
'Republicans Will Make History' (WSJ) 147
'Democrats Offer A New Direction' (WSJ) 148
Good News For Republicans? (WP) 149
Americans Upbeat About Economic Forecast (LAT) 151
Drug Imports From Canada Set To Be Eased (AP) 152
Savings, Shakeup Seen In $4 Drug Plan (USAT) 153
Wal-Mart Cuts Prices For Many Generic Drugs To $4 (WSJ) 154
Wal-Mart Sets $4 Price For Many Generic Drugs (WP) 156
Wal-Mart To Offer Discount On Drugs (WT) 157
Relief For Some But Maybe Not Many In Wal-Mart Plan For $4 Generic Drugs (NYT) 158
'We're OK,' Despite Drop In Factory Activity (USAT) 160
Philadelphia Fed Posts Sharp Drop In Output Gauge (WSJ) 160
Investors Finally Break From Calm; Dow Drops 79.96 (WSJ) 161
Signs Of Slowing Economy Slam Stocks (USAT/BLOOM) .. 162
Americans Remain Sour On Situation In Iraq (WSJ) 163
Subtle Shift (WSJ) 163
Democrat Optimistic In Washington (WT) 166
Black Republicans Run Racially Tinged Ad (AP) 167
Black Democrats Pledge Backing To Steele (WT) 168
Cardin, Steele Issue Challenges For Debates (WT) 169
Top Republican Aids Lieberman Fundraiser (AP) 170
Volatile Mix: Campaigning And Religions (NYT) 170
Kerry Urges Democrats To Fight Back (AP) 172
Clear-Cut Race Shifting Into Texas-Size Free-for-All (NYT). 172
Kinky Friedman Defends 1980 Racial Slur (AP) 174
LETTERS (WSJ) 175
Innovator Devises Way Around Electoral College (NYT) 176
States Spin Their Spare Stuff Into Gold (USAT) 178
The Super-Rich Get Richer: Forbes 400 Are All Billionaires (WP) 179
In Embracing Islam, Ex-Catholic Seeks To Strengthen Cultural Ties (WP) 180

DOJ_NMG_0067134

Emotional Wounds Require Focus, Too (USAT) 182
Insurance Horror Stories (NYT) 183
Cars As Global Warming's Causes (LAT) 184
Mr. Ehrlich's Paper Chase (WP) 184
Iran Open To A Break In Nuclear Program (WP) 185
Iran Won't Be Forced Into Talks Over Nuclear Plans, Leader Says (WSJ) 186
Iranian President In Spotlight (MCT) 186
Iran Leader Uses U.N. To Improve Image (AP) 188
Iran's Leader Skirts Issue Of Disbanding Hezbollah (NYT) .. 189
Bill Clinton: U.S. Should Talk To Iran (AP) 190
US Cautions Europe On Iran Investment (CSM) 190
U.N. Charades (WSJ) 192
Anti-Americanism Is Providing A Glue (LAT) 193
Chavez To Double Energy Subsidies To Needy In U.S. (LAT) 194
Chávez Courts U.S. Poor, Offers To Expand Heating Oil Program (MH) 195
Why The Firebrands Get Heard (WP) 196
Rangel Rebukes Chavez On Bush (WT) 197
Shocked! By Chavez (WSJ) 198
No Hugo Award For Security Council (LAT) 199
In Chávez's Crosshairs (WSJ) 199
Five Palestinians Killed In Gaza; Rockets Fired Into Israel (WP) 201
With N. Korea Talks Stalled, U.S. Tries New Approach (WP) 201
Russia, China Stay Away From N. Korea Session (WT) 202
North Korea Avoids Meeting Of 8 Nations (AP) 203
U.S. Sets Conditions For N. Korea Visit (AP) 204
Despite Plea, Indonesia Executes 3 Christians (NYT) 204
Three Christians Executed In Fatal Attack On Muslims (WT/AP) 205
Was Thai Coup Pre-Emptive? (WSJ) 206
Thai Junta Imposes Curbs On News Media (NYT) 208
Thai Coup Leaders Tighten Controls (AP) 209
Military Rulers Limit Politicians And Press (WT/AP) 211
From King Down, Thais Accept Coup (USAT) 211
In Somalia, A Boot Camp For Islam (LAT) 213
Paulson To Press Hu On Flexible Currency (FT) 215
Treasury Secretary Banks On His Long Relationship With China (USAT) 215
Hungarian Leader Defends Comments: 'I Did Not Lie' (WP) 217
Blood Money Murdered Regulator In Russia Made Plenty Of Enemies (WSJ) 219
Net Gains (NYT) 222
Anyone, Anything, Anywhere (NYT) 223
Hosni Mubarak Should Call Benedict XVI (WSJ) 224
Tolerance: A Two-Way Street (WP) 225
Finished But Not Gone (NYT) 226

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush, GOP Rebels Agree On Detainee Bill (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

The AP, September 21, 2006

The White House and rebellious Senate Republicans announced agreement Thursday on rules for the interrogation and trial of suspects in the war on terror. President Bush urged Congress to put it into law before adjourning for the midterm elections.

"I'm pleased to say that this agreement preserves the single most potent tool we have in protecting America and foiling terrorist attacks," the president said, shortly after administration officials and key lawmakers announced agreement following a week of high-profile intraparty disagreement.

Sen. John McCain of Arizona, one of three GOP lawmakers who told Bush he couldn't have the legislation the way he initially asked for it, said, "The agreement that we've entered into gives the president the tools he needs to continue to fight the war on terror and bring these evil people to justice."

"There's no doubt that the integrity and letter and spirit of the Geneva Conventions have been preserved," McCain said, referring to the international treaties covering the treatment of prisoners in wartime.

The central sticking point had been a demand from McCain, Sen. John Warner of Virginia and Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina that there be no attempt to redefine U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions.

DOJ_NMG_0067135

The agreement contains key concessions by the White House, including dropping a provision that would have interpreted Geneva Convention obligations and another allowing a defendant to be convicted on evidence he never sees if it is classified. The legislation, however, makes clear the president has the authority to enforce the treaty.

CIA Director Michael Hayden has said the agency needed to be confident that its interrogation program for high-value terror suspects is legal.

"Much remains in the legislative process," he said in a written statement to the agency personnel. But "if this language becomes law, the Congress will have given us the clarity and the support that we need to move forward with a detention and interrogation program that allows us to continue to defend the homeland, attack al-Qaida and protect American and allied lives."

Added Stephen Hadley, the president's national security adviser, on CIA interrogations: "The good news is the program will go forward."

Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., who opposed such a measure, indicated he was not satisfied with the piece on classified information: "We're going to look at it closely. And we have some recommendations with respect to classified information."

Hadley said the bar would be "very high" and that classified information would not be automatically shared with terrorists.

"Our view is we think it's a good approach because the likelihood of that occurring would be very remote," Hadley said.

Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said he wouldn't consider the agreement sealed until Bush signed on.

That happened within an hour, when the president stepped before microphones in Orlando, Fla., where he was campaigning for Republican candidates in the fall.

The agreement "clears the way to do what the American people expect us to do — to capture terrorists, to detain terrorists, to question terrorists and then to try them," he said.

The accord was sealed in a 90-minute session in the office of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, who had earlier in the day told Warner, McCain and Graham it was time to close the deal. The four lawmakers were joined by Hadley, as well as other administration officials, for the final session.

If it survives scrutiny, the accord would fulfill a Republican political and legislative imperative — pre-election party unity on an issue related to the war on terror, and possible enactment of one of Bush's top remaining priorities of the year.

The evident compromise came less than a week after Bush emphatically warned lawmakers at a news conference he would shut down the interrogation of terror suspects unless legislation was sent to his desk. "Time's running out," he said.

The White House shifted its tone from combative to compromising within 48 hours, though, and officials began talking of a need for an agreement that all sides would be comfortable with.

Whatever the outcome, the controversy has handed critics of the president's conduct of the war on terror election-year ammunition.

Bush's former secretary of state, Colin Powell, dismayed the administration when he sided with Warner, McCain and Graham. He said Bush's plan, which would have formally changed the U.S. view of the Geneva Conventions on rules of warfare, would cause the world "to doubt the moral basis" of the fight against terror and "put our own troops at risk."

The handling of suspects is one of two administration priorities relating to the war on terror.

The other involves the president's request for legislation to explicitly allow wiretapping without a court warrant on international calls and e-mails between suspected terrorists in the United States and abroad. One official said Republicans had narrowed their differences with the White House over that issue, as well, and hoped for an agreement soon.

Republican leaders have said they intend to adjourn Congress by the end of the month to give lawmakers time to campaign for re-election.

The Supreme Court ruled in June that Bush's plan for trying terrorism suspects before military tribunals violated the Geneva Conventions and U.S. law.

The court, in a 5-3 ruling, found that Congress had not given Bush the authority to create the special type of military trial and that the president did not provide a valid reason for the new system. The justices also said the proposed trials did not provide for minimum legal protections under international law.

DOJ_NMG_0067136

About 450 terrorism suspects, most of them captured in Afghanistan and none of them in the U.S., are being held by military authorities at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Ten have been charged with crimes.

White House, Senators Near Pact On Interrogation Rules (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith And Charles Babington, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

President Would Have a Voice in How Detainees Are Questioned

The White House and dissident Senate Republicans reached a tentative accord yesterday on legislation that President Bush said would provide for continued tough interrogations of terrorism suspects by the CIA at secret detention sites.

The accord, which includes a plan for future military trials of alleged terrorists, also spells out rules for the use of classified evidence as well as information obtained through coercion of some detainees.

While the deal is subject to further discussion with House Republican leaders, it resolved the most contentious issues in the Bush administration's high-profile drive to gain congressional backing for its detainee policies before Congress adjourns next week. It also could help settle an intraparty fracas that worried GOP leaders in the run-up to the November elections.

Both sides declared that they had achieved their aims. Bush hailed the accord in a brief televised appearance from Orlando. He said the deal preserved "the CIA program to question the world's most dangerous terrorists and to get their secrets." CIA Director Michael V. Hayden told the agency in a statement that "if this language becomes law, the Congress will have given us the clarity and the support that we need to move forward with a detention and interrogation program."

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a prisoner during the Vietnam War who led the Senate rebellion against the administration's proposals, said, "The agreement that we've entered into gives the president the tools that he needs to continue to fight the war on terror and bring these evil people to justice." But he added: "There is no doubt that the integrity and letter and spirit of the Geneva Conventions have been preserved."

On the key issue of detainee treatment that had caused the impasse between the White House and the dissident Republicans, the two sides agreed on a list of specified crimes that would provoke prosecution of CIA interrogators and others. They also agreed that past violations of the Geneva Conventions, an international treaty barring degrading and humiliating treatment of detainees, would not result in criminal or civil legal action.

The White House, for its part, yielded in its demand to adopt, with congressional approval, a restricted definition of its obligations under Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions. That article requires humane treatment of detainees and bars "violence to life and person," such as death and mutilation, as well as cruel treatment and "outrages upon personal dignity."

The compromise language gives the president a dominant -- but not exclusive -- role in deciding which interrogation methods are permitted by that provision of the treaty. It also prohibits detainees from using the Geneva Conventions to challenge their imprisonment or seek civil damages for mistreatment, as the administration sought.

Subsidiary legal disputes will probably be hammered out in coming days, Sen. Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said at a crowded news conference outside his office.

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), a key McCain ally, said that "we struck a great balance" by agreeing that in future military trials, known as "commissions," classified materials must be provided to defendants in summary or redacted form. The administration had sought the right to use such evidence without disclosing it to defendants in any form, but Graham said the legislation would instead let defendants "confront the evidence."

The administration envisions using the new rules in military trials that may involve some of the 14 key terrorism suspects whom Bush this month ordered transferred from secret CIA prisons to the detention facility in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Yesterday's final marathon talks occurred in Vice President Cheney's little-known office on the second floor of the Dirksen Senate Office Building. McCain, Graham and Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.), plus Hadley and Steven G. Bradbury, acting head of the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel, met almost continuously from 9:30 a.m. to 2 p.m., the sources said, and then moved to Frist's office around 3 p.m. to announce their breakthrough.

DOJ_NMG_0067137

The White House has pressed for the legislation partly to obtain immunity from prosecution for government officials, including CIA interrogators, for past acts that degraded and humiliated detainees. Its impetus was a Supreme Court ruling in June, in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld , that declared some aspects of the administration's past interrogation and trial policies illegal.

Officials' anxieties were provoked by a 10-year-old U.S. law, the War Crimes Act, that makes violations of the Geneva Conventions' prohibitions on degrading and humiliating detainees, as well as actions that amount to "outrages upon personal dignity," subject to felony prosecution. Senior military officials have told Congress those prohibitions were violated.

The agreement coalesced around two crucial issues: the GOP senators' insistence that Bush not be allowed to reinterpret the meaning of the Geneva Conventions, and the White House's insistence that CIA agents not be subject to prosecution for aggressive interrogation techniques -- tactics that did not constitute torture but were more aggressive than "simple assault."

The biggest hurdle, Senate sources said, was convincing administration officials that lawmakers would never accept language that allowed Bush to appear to be reinterpreting the Geneva Conventions. Once that was settled, they said, the White House poured most of its energy into defining "cruel or inhuman treatment" that would constitute a crime under the War Crimes Act. The administration wanted the term to describe techniques resulting in "severe" physical or mental pain, but the senators insisted on the word "serious."

Negotiations then turned to the amount of time that a detainee's suffering must last before the treatment amounts to a war crime. Administration officials preferred designating "prolonged" mental or physical symptoms, while the senators wanted something milder. They settled on "serious and non-transitory mental harm, which need not be prolonged."

These definitions appear in a section of the legislation that specifically lists "grave breaches" of the Geneva Conventions that might bring criminal penalties.

For lesser offenses barred by the Geneva Conventions -- those lying between cruelty and minor abuse, putting them at the heart of the intraparty dispute -- the draft legislation would give the president explicit authority to interpret "the meaning and application" of the relevant provisions in Common Article 3. It also requires that such interpretations be considered as "authoritative" as other U.S. regulations.

But the language also requires that such interpretations be published, rather than described in secret to a restricted number of lawmakers. That provision was demanded by the dissident lawmakers, who resented the administration's past efforts to curtail the number of members who were told of its policies. The provision also affirms that Congress and the judiciary can play their customary roles in reviewing the interpretations, a statement that Senate sources say the White House vigorously resisted.

A senior administration official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said in an interview that Bush essentially got what he asked for in a different formulation that allows both sides to maintain that their concerns were addressed. "We kind of take the scenic route, but we get there," the official said.

Democrats sounded a cautious note about the Republican accord, calling attention to the past Republican division rather than taking a position on the compromise.

Staff writer Peter Baker contributed to this report.

Deal On Suspects Closes GOP Rift (USAT)

By David Jackson And Kathy Kiely

USA Today, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush and Senate Republicans reached a deal Thursday on rules for secret CIA interrogations and military trials for terrorism suspects, defusing a fight over national security that divided the GOP less than seven weeks before Election Day.

Bush said the new proposal preserves a CIA interrogation program that he called the “most potent tool we have in protecting America and foiling terrorist attacks.” If approved next week by the House and Senate, it would pave the way for trials of 9/11 and other “high value” terrorism suspects being held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Senate Republicans who opposed Bush's original proposal said new language preserves U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions, which require humane treatment for prisoners of war, and defines for the CIA what is not acceptable.

DOJ_NMG_0067138

"We're going to do it in a way that won't come back to haunt us if our troops fall into enemy hands in the next war," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C.

At issue are how CIA agents can get information from terrorism suspects without violating prisoner-treatment rules under the Geneva Conventions and how evidence gathered from those interrogations can be used at trial.

Graham, Senate Armed Services Chairman John Warner of Virginia and Sen. John McCain of Arizona, the key GOP dissidents, said the compromise upholds the Geneva Conventions as they wanted. Bush national security adviser Stephen Hadley said the CIA got the guidelines it needs to continue interrogations, as Bush sought. The president also wanted to allow secret evidence in trials of terrorism suspects, but the deal limits its use, as the senators had insisted.

At least one key Republican, House Armed Services Chairman Duncan Hunter of California, expressed reservations about the restrictions on secret evidence. He said he fears the government won't be able to convict terrorism suspects without it.

Hadley reached the agreement after day-long negotiations with Warner, McCain, Graham and other Republicans. Bush's military trial plan was a response to a decision by the Supreme Court in June that struck down an earlier version.

The deal comes as campaigns heat up for the Nov. 7 elections to decide control of Congress. Bush and GOP candidates are stressing their party's handling of national security and wanted to get the dispute behind them.

"It's good news for the Republicans to have that issue, at least for a while, off the political radar screen," said Sherry Bebitch Jeffe, a political scientist at the University of Southern California.

Democrats appeared likely to back the compromise. "It is time to make the tough and smart decisions to give the American people the real security they deserve," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada.

Accord Is Reached On Framework For Detainee Bill (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck And David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Ending weeks of division, the White House and Senate Republicans agreed on a framework for legislation defining the tribunal structure and rules of evidence for trying enemy combatants in the war on terror.

The compromise must still be reviewed by House leaders and final details were sketchy. But if the pact holds, it removes a major obstacle for the administration and all but assures that Congress can complete action on an emotional issue that has engaged all three branches of the government.

Going into the fall elections, the compromise also is crucial for Republicans, who have been embarrassed by the party split just when they had wanted to present a united front against Democrats on national-security issues. Even now, the White House faces resistance to a second legislative request, authorizing warrantless surveillance of communications in and out of the U.S. And privately, Republicans admit that completing the second measure before lawmakers go home for the elections will be difficult.

The Supreme Court set the stage in June when it struck down the tribunal system set up by the administration, saying that defendants were being denied fundamental rights and that the system violated both the Uniform Code of Military Justice and the Geneva Conventions. The White House turned to Congress seeking specific authority for the alternative legal system it says it needs to try enemy combatants. But lawmakers were clearly troubled by what changes they should permit, especially in regard to Geneva Convention protections of prisoners and coerced testimony.

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner (R., Va.) played a central role in challenging the White House, but the fight inevitably focused on resistance mounted by Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.), a former prisoner of war in Vietnam. The Geneva Conventions have huge importance for Mr. McCain, and though some observers said it may have hurt his ambitions to seek the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, he stood against Mr. Bush with Mr. Warner and Sen. Lindsey Graham (R., S.C), a third member of the Armed Services panel and an experienced military attorney.

Yesterday, after a meeting to finalize the compromise, the three senators appeared in a show of Republican unity with National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) and others. "There's no doubt that the integrity and letter and spirit of the Geneva Convention have been preserved," Mr. McCain said. He brushed off any talk about who prevailed politically in the showdown. "We're all winners because we've been able to come to an agreement through a process of negotiations and consensus."

DOJ_NMG_0067139

President Bush said the compromise met his test: that the Central Intelligence Agency would be able to continue its covert interrogation program targeted at high-level terrorist detainees. "I'm pleased to say that this agreement preserves the single most potent tool we have in protecting America and foiling terrorist attacks..." he said.

Under the compromise, Congress would rewrite a portion of the War Crimes Act to specify what actions by interrogators amount to a felony war crime. Torture and causing serious bodily injury are among the actions on the list, in line with what the negotiators said is required under U.S. treaty obligations. The definitions would apply retroactively to 1997, to protect U.S. officials from what Mr. Graham said was a vague earlier law. "You don't want to trivialize war crimes. They should be a serious violation of law," Mr. Graham said.

The president, meanwhile, would get the authority to set policies regarding interrogation techniques that fall short of being classified as war crimes. That provision already is drawing criticism from the American Civil Liberties Union, which said it would give the president "unilateral authority to declare certain torture and abuse legal and sound."

On the uses of coerced and classified evidence, the compromise took much the same approach as the legislation proposed by Sens. Warner, McCain and Graham. In the military trials of terror suspects, coerced evidence could be used if a judge decides it is reliable, illuminates the facts and is in the best interest of justice, Mr. Graham said.

Defendants wouldn't automatically be able to see classified evidence, but they would be able to rebut anything shared with the jury. Mr. Graham said that was critical to protect U.S. troops in future wars from possible unfair jurisdiction abroad. But treatment of classified evidence may yet be a sticking point with the House, where leaders have emphasized the need to fight terrorism.

"You're playing trial lawyer with this thing and you have American lives you have to think about," said House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.).

Write to Sarah Lueck at sarah.lueck@wsj.com1 and David Rogers at david.rogers@wsj.com2

GOP Compromises On Terror Detainees (WT)

By Charles Hurt And Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

Dissident Senate Republicans and the White House reached a deal yesterday on legislation for how to handle the terror suspects held at Guantanamo Bay, allowing them to turn their attention to differences they might have with Democrats.

"The agreement that we've entered into gives the president the tools that he needs to continue to fight the war on terror and bring these evil people to justice," said Sen. John McCain of Arizona, who was among the Republicans who objected to the original White House proposals because they wanted the detainees granted broader civil rights, especially in terms of guaranteeing a fair trial.

"I also believe that it's consistent with the standards under the detainee treatment act, and there is no doubt that the integrity and letter and spirit of the Geneva Conventions have been preserved," said Mr. McCain, a veteran who was held prisoner and tortured in northern Vietnam.

Mr. McCain announced his support for the deal at a Capitol press conference accompanied by fellow Republican defectors Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and John W. Warner of Virginia.

President Bush said his only concern about the legislation was whether CIA interrogators could operate with enough freedom to glean information "to protect the American people."

"I'm pleased to say that this agreement preserves the single most potent tool we have in protecting America and foiling terrorist attacks, and that is the CIA program to question the world's most dangerous terrorists and to get their secrets," he said during a campaign stop in Florida.

"The measure also creates military commissions that will bring these ruthless killers to justice," he said. "In short, the agreement clears the way to do what the American people expect us to do: to capture terrorists, to detain terrorists, to question terrorists, and then to try them."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said the final deal must still be shared with Senate and House Republicans as well as Senate Democratic leaders. But he hopes to have the bill on the Senate floor early next week for a vote before Congress recesses at the end of this month for the November elections.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, praised the deal for allowing the administration's CIA interrogation program to go forward and quickly shifted the focus from Republican opposition to Democratic opposition.

"The Democrats have a choice," he said. "They can either work with Republicans to preserve this crucial program or move to shut it down and continue to oppose every responsible effort to provide President Bush with the tools he needs to keep America safe."

Democrats late yesterday remained silent on the deal, telling reporters that they would not comment until after studying the deal more closely.

But Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said Democrats are united behind bringing terrorists to justice "in a manner consistent with our laws, our values and our national security."

"Hopefully, today's press conference means that President Bush and the congressional Republican leadership have changed course and listened to numerous national security experts such as General Colin Powell," he added.

Under the deal, Republicans said, defendants in the terror trials could see any information given to a jury but classified material could be redacted.

House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter, California Republican, was critical of this White House concession.

"Classified information, we feel, should still be allowed to be used for a conviction," he said, arguing that the Senate deal leaves the U.S. military two choices -- either declassify the information or dismiss the case if no other evidence can be found.

Under the deal, hearsay evidence and coerced testimony can be used in some circumstances. The deal also prohibits "grave breaches" of the Geneva Conventions, described as acts such as torture, rape, or cruel and inhuman treatment. Mr. Bush can define anything short of "grave breaches."

Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, called the compromise "a big win in the continuing war on terror."

"The president was very clear that any legislation on terrorist detainees must ensure that our intelligence-gathering interrogation program can continue," he said. "As the president said, this valuable program has saved innocent American lives and is preventing future terrorist attacks. The legislation we will soon consider on the Senate floor meets the president's criteria."

Bush Bows To Senators On Detainees (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes And Richard Simon, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

The White House agrees to new rules banning the most controversial CIA tactics but allowing a secret interrogation program to continue.

WASHINGTON — President Bush acceded to dissident Senate Republicans on Thursday, agreeing to new rules for interrogating and prosecuting suspected terrorists that leave intact international treaty protections against torture.

In a major concession to Arizona Sen. John McCain and other Republicans, the administration dropped its efforts to have Congress redefine U.S. obligations under the Geneva Convention. The compromise bill in effect bans the most controversial CIA interrogation tactics, including water boarding, a form of simulated drowning, said those involved in the negotiations.

At the same time, the agreement gives Bush the legal protections he said were needed to preserve a secret CIA interrogation program. The compromise bill would allow Bush the latitude to employ interrogation tactics which go beyond legal limits set for the U.S. military.

Both McCain and Bush hailed the agreement, saying their most important priorities had been met.

"There is no doubt that the integrity and letter and spirit of the Geneva Conventions have been preserved," McCain said after hours of closed-door, often tense negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0067141

Bush, campaigning for GOP candidates in Florida, said the agreement would achieve his goal of preserving a critical CIA interrogation program that "will help us crack the terror network and to save American lives."

But many human rights advocates involved in the debate expressed satisfaction that the White House had been forced to drop its demands that Congress redefine U.S. treaty obligations.

"The administration did not achieve its goal of having the Geneva Convention redefined," said Elisa Massimino, the Washington director of Human Rights First. "The agreement makes clear that the president can't downgrade the humane treatment standards of the Geneva Conventions, and that Congress is unwilling to do that."

While at least a partial setback for Bush, the deal heads off a politically embarrassing intra-party showdown in an election year and also paves the way for trials of terrorism suspects held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The compromise followed weeks of wrenching debate in which Bush's proposal was criticized by leading members of his own party, including McCain and former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) said the legislation would permit aggressive interrogation techniques that will "get us good information" but would "put boundaries around conduct that would not represent American values."

The compromise sets the stage for expected Senate approval next week of legislation authorizing military tribunals to try the suspects at Guantanamo Bay. The House also is expected to take up the bill. The interrogation provisions are part of the military tribunal measure.

Senate GOP leaders and the White House also were moving toward a compromise Thursday on legislation authorizing the president's warrantless domestic surveillance, a sign of the heightened anxiety among Republicans over the need to complete work on national security legislation before recessing next week.

The compromise came together after Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) — worried about time running out — called administration officials and the dissident GOP senators together.

The tribunal legislation was necessitated by a Supreme Court ruling in June that struck down the administration's earlier rules for detaining and prosecuting accused terrorists. Among those who are expected to be put on trial, once the legislation becomes law, are self-proclaimed Sept. 11 planner Khalid Shaikh Mohammed and 13 other suspected leaders of Al Qaeda who are now at the U.S. detention facility in Guantanamo Bay.

At issue was the meaning of Common Article 3, a provision of the Geneva Convention of 1949. The provision bans torture and cruel treatment and is considered a minimum level of protection for those taken prisoner in armed conflicts. But the Bush administration considers parts of Common Article 3 too vague, including its prohibition on "outrages upon personal dignity."

McCain, a former POW, along with Graham and Republican Sen. John Warner of Virginia, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, had resisted the administration's efforts to redefine U.S. obligations under the Geneva Convention. They contended it would lead other nations to reinterpret their treaty obligations and put captured Americans at risk.

The compromise lists nine violations of Common Article 3 that are considered war crimes. It bans cruel and inhuman treatment, as McCain wanted. But it does not classify "degrading" treatment as a war crime, a concession by the Senate Republicans to Bush.

Under Thursday's deal, the administration dropped its opposition to making the infliction of "serious mental pain or suffering" a war crime. The compromise also bans shorter-term "non-transitory" suffering.

A Senate staffer involved in negotiations said that would ban the most outrageous of CIA methods, including water boarding — a tactic in which detainees are made to feel as if they're drowning — and mock executions.

"That was designed so that water boarding will never again be allowed," said the staffer. "Everyone was nodding their heads. This was out on the table. Sen. McCain said: 'We are not going to be water-boarding people. We are not going to be firing guns next to their heads. We will not be threatening them with death.' "

Although the bill allows the president to issue interpretations of the Geneva Convention, it also requires that any such executive interpretation be published in the Federal Register. Regulations and orders published in the Federal Register may be reviewed — and overridden — by Congress. Human rights organizations said they could accept that compromise because it would keep the administration's actions public, and thus subject to review.

DOJ_NMG_0067142

"The important part of the compromise is that Congress and the judiciary will retain their oversight role," said Tom Malinowski, the Washington advocacy director for Human Rights Watch. "The administration will say what it says, but it is no more binding than any regulation and subject to judicial review."

In a statement, the CIA director, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, said he was happy with the compromise.

"If this language becomes law, the Congress will have given us the clarity and the support that we need to move forward with a detention and interrogation program that allows us to continue to defend the homeland, attack Al Qaeda and protect American and Allied lives," Hayden said.

Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-El Cajon), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, expressed concern that the Senate compromise would allow suspects to gain access to classified evidence.

"There's still work to do on this bill," he said, but added, "We're very close."

Graham said the compromise would shield methods and sources of intelligence from being disclosed but would not allow a suspect to be convicted without seeing the evidence.

"It boils down to: If it goes to the jury, it goes to the defendant," said the Senate staffer.

Originally the Bush administration wanted to be able to use classified information and keep it secret from the defendant. But Hadley said the administration was satisfied with the compromise because it prohibited defendants from using the legal process of discovery or other mechanisms to get access to classified information.

A final sticking point between the Republican senators and the administration was the use of coerced evidence. For trials of suspects captured in the future, the compromise excluded evidence that was gathered by torture and methods that violated prohibitions on cruel treatment.

For detainees now in custody, including the 14 suspected terrorists recently transferred to Guantanamo, it will be up to military judges to decide what coerced evidence can be used.

McCain, a possible 2008 presidential candidate, refused to say who came out ahead in the fight over detainees.

"In this business, people say, 'Who's the winners and who's the losers?' There's none," he said. "We're all winners because we've been able to come to an agreement through a process of negotiation and consensus."

richard.simon@latimes.com

julian.barnes@latimes.com

Times staff writer Richard B. Schmitt in Washington contributed to this report.

*

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

The new rules

Highlights of the agreement between the White House and Senate Republicans dealing with the treatment of terrorist suspects:

• Requires that a defendant being tried by military commission have access to any evidence given to a jury.

• Drops a section of the administration's previous proposal that stated an existing ban on cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment satisfies the nation's obligations under the Geneva Convention.

• Prohibits "grave breaches" of the Geneva Convention. Defines grave breaches as acts such as torture, rape, biological experiments, and cruel and inhuman treatment.

• Notes the president has the authority to interpret "the meaning and application" of the Geneva Convention.

• Allows hearsay evidence.

• Allows coerced testimony if the statement was acquired before a 2005 ban on cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment and a judge finds it to be reliable. Bans coerced statements taken after the 2005 ban went into effect if constitutional definitions of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment were violated.

• Bars individuals from protesting violations of Geneva Convention standards in court.

Source: Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0067143

Republicans Reach Deal On Detainee Bill (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 21 — The Bush administration and Congressional Republicans reached agreement Thursday on legislation governing the treatment and interrogation of terror suspects after weeks of debate that divided Republicans heading into the midterm elections.

Under the deal, President Bush dropped his demand that Congress redefine the nation's obligations under the Geneva Conventions, handing a victory to a group of Republicans, including Senator John McCain of Arizona, whose opposition had created a showdown over a fundamental aspect of the rules for battling terrorism.

The administration's original stance had run into fierce resistance from former and current military lawyers and Mr. Bush's former secretary of state, Colin L. Powell, a former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They argued, as did Mr. McCain and the other two senators leading the resistance, that any redefinition would invite other nations to alter their obligations and endanger American troops captured abroad.

"There is no doubt that the integrity and the letter and the spirit of the Geneva Conventions have been preserved," said Mr. McCain, who was tortured during more than five years as a prisoner in North Vietnam.

Members of Congress and administration officials announced the deal after emerging from a tense and intricate all-day meeting in Vice President Dick Cheney's office in a Senate building, saying they would try to push it through in the five days Congress is scheduled to meet before lawmakers leave to campaign.

The White House moved quickly to assert that it had not surrendered. Administration officials characterized the negotiations as cooperative and the result as a victory for all sides.

"The agreement clears the way to do what the American people expect us to do: to capture terrorists, to detain terrorists, to question terrorists, and then to try them," Mr. Bush said in Orlando, Fla., where he was attending fund-raisers for several Republican candidates.

The dispute revolved around how to define the rules governing the interrogations of terror suspects and providing legal protection to C.I.A. officers conducting interrogations. Under the deal, Congress would seek to codify the limits by outlining in the War Crimes Act, a domestic law, several "grave breaches" of the relevant provision of the Geneva Conventions, known as Common Article 3. The deal would eliminate a legislative provision in the original White House proposal saying that compliance with the Detainee Treatment Act, which Congress passed last year and which bans "cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment," would by itself satisfy the obligations of the United States under the conventions.

"Everybody agreed we ought to try and do it in a way that did not involve modifying or amending our international obligations," said Stephen J. Hadley, the president's national security adviser. "That was the objective we all came to here in the last week. The goal was whether we could find language mutually agreed between the Senate and the White House that would achieve those objectives."

Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president, said: "We proposed a more direct approach to bringing clarification. This one is more of the scenic route, but it gets us there."

The agreement says the executive branch is responsible for upholding the nations' commitment to the Geneva Conventions, leaving it to the president to establish through executive rule any violations for the handling of terror suspects that fall short of a "grave breach." Significantly, Senate aides said, those rules would have to be published in the Federal Register.

The agreement provides several pages describing "grave breaches" that would not be allowed, starting with torture and including other forms of assault and mental stress. But it does not lay out specific interrogation techniques that would be prohibited.

The adjustment to the War Crimes Act, "will put the C.I.A. on notice of what they can and can't do," said Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, who, along with Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, joined Mr. McCain in leading resistance to the White House approach. "It would take off the table things that are not within American values."

Asked about one of the most controversial interrogation techniques, a simulated drowning known as water-boarding, Mr. Graham said, "It is a technique that we need to let the world know we are no longer engaging in."

DOJ_NMG_0067144

Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the C.I.A. director, issued a statement to employees, saying, "If this language becomes law, the Congress will have given us the clarity and the support that we need to move forward with a detention and interrogation program that allows us to continue to defend the homeland, attack Al Qaeda and protect American and allied lives."

The senators were careful not to characterize winners and losers. "This was a give-and-take," Mr. Graham said.

The senators agreed to a White House proposal to make the standard on interrogation treatment retroactive to 1997, so C.I.A. and military personnel could not be prosecuted for past treatment under standards the administration considers vague.

Senators Graham McCain and Warner said the agreement met the three goals they set from the beginning: to preserve the Geneva Conventions, to allow the C.I.A. to continue interrogations and to set up a program that would pass court review.

On another point of contention, the use of classified evidence in prosecutions of terror suspects, the senators won agreement that suspects would be allowed to see any evidence the jury sees, which the senators say is in keeping with 200 years of American judicial tradition. But the agreement includes procedures that would strip the evidence of the most sensitive details that lawmakers have worried could be used to plan more attacks.

The agreement would not allow any evidence obtained by techniques that violate the Detainee Treatment Act, and would not allow hearsay evidence that the defense successfully argues is not reliable or probative.

The Supreme Court had thrown the issue to Congress in June, when it struck down the tribunals the president established shortly after the terror attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, saying they violated constitutional and international law.

After weeks of standoff over proposed legislation, the two sides had begun to negotiate in earnest in the last few days, after Mr. Hadley said on the Sunday morning news programs that he believed they could reach consensus without modifying international agreements.

Thursday morning, Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, who has supported the president's approach, told Mr. Warner that with just a week left before the Senate is to adjourn, they needed a deal by evening.

Mr. Frist said he would send the bill to the floor. In the House, Representative Duncan Hunter of California, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said he had some concerns about the use of classified evidence, but added, "I think we're very close."

Democrats have put their trust in Senators Graham, McCain and Warner to push back against the White House, and Thursday they signaled that they intended to continue cooperating. "Five years after Sept. 11, it is time to make the tough and smart decisions to give the American people the real security they deserve," said the Democratic leader, Harry Reid of Nevada.

Still, Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the senior Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, said he would press to change a provision in the proposal that would deny detainees a right to challenge their captivity in court.

White House In Deal On CIA Prisons (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, September 22, 2006

The White House on Thursday ended the impasse over its interrogation and detention policies when it agreed to compromise with a group of influential Republican senators, and said it would not seek to amend the terms of the Geneva Conventions.

President George W. Bush hailed the deal as meeting his goal of allowing the tougher interrogation of terrorist suspects at secret prisons run by the Central Intelligence Agency, and prosecution of them using a new form of military tribunals.

"I'm pleased to say that this agreement preserves the most potent tool we have in protecting America and foiling terrorist attacks, and that is the CIA programme to question the world's most dangerous terrorists and to get their secrets."

However, the compromise, struck on Thursday after six hours of intense negotiations, marks a second moral victory for Senator John McCain, who last year took on the White House over the Detainee Treatment Act, which prohibits cruel or inhumane treatment of prisoners, and Senator Lindsey Graham and Senator John Warner.

"The agreement that we've entered into gives the president the tools he needs to continue to fight the war on terror and bring these evil people to justice," said Mr McCain, who has made interrogations a signature issue and who has earned credibility on the issue after his years of being tortured in Vietnam. “There’s no doubt that the integrity and letter and spirit of the Geneva Conventions have been preserved.”

DOJ_NMG_0067145

The battle had threatened to undermine both the Republican effort to show unity on national security issues and make that a cornerstone of party re-election efforts.

White House negotiators had also faced heavy criticism that they were undermining the Geneva Conventions, governing the rights of wartime detainees, by their insistence that they wanted to clarify the terms of Article 3. Although the new language was not made public, it did not now include changes to the convention, officials said.

The compromise language will be introduced as an amendment next week, when the bill could be brought to the Senate floor. Mr Bush on Thursday urged Congress to send him legislation before it wraps up business next week.

If the bill passes, it will also allow the creation of controversial military tribunals.

“The agreement clears the way to do what the American people expect us to do, to capture terrorists, to detain terrorists, to question terrorists, and then to try them,” said Mr Bush.

Bush, Senators Reach Agreement On Detainee Interrogation Legislation (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON - The White House and dissident Republican senators reached an agreement Thursday that would allow the CIA's controversial terrorist interrogation program to continue and trials of suspected Islamic terrorists to begin but preserve the Geneva Conventions' prohibitions against mistreating wartime prisoners.

President Bush began asking Congress for new authority to question and try suspected terrorists after the Supreme Court ruled 5-3 in June that his plan for special military tribunals violated both U.S. law and the Geneva Conventions.

If it's approved by the full Senate and the House of Representatives before the end of next week, when Congress is set to recess, Thursday's agreement also could end a weeks-long intra-party rift and unite Republicans around their core national security message as they head into crucial midterm elections.

Final passage of the compromise is likely, but hurdles remain. Most Democrats and Republicans didn't yet know the terms of the agreement Thursday, and House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., said he had some concerns about detainees gaining too much access to classified information. The White House and CIA voiced no such concerns, however.

President Bush, speaking from a Republican fund-raiser in Orlando, Fla., said the accord "preserves the . . . most potent tool we have in protecting America and foiling terrorist attacks, and that is the CIA program to question the world's most dangerous terrorists and to get their secrets."

CIA Director Michael Hayden told his staff in a memo that the agreement would give his operatives "the clarity and the support that we need to move forward . . . ."

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., one of three Republican senators who forced the administration to compromise, said he was satisfied with the agreement.

"There is no doubt that the integrity and sprit of the Geneva Conventions have been preserved," he said at a news conference with other senators and administration officials.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., who'd joined McCain and Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner, R-Va., in forcing the White House to temper its original proposal, said he believed the compromise would prohibit simulated drowning, or "water-boarding" as a CIA interrogation technique.

But Graham didn't rule out other aggressive techniques such as sleep deprivation or playing loud music. He said the legislation wouldn't spell out which "alternative interrogation techniques" are permitted and which are prohibited.

Specifics were sketchy, as negotiators didn't immediately release details in writing.

As outlined by lawmakers and administration officials, the deal provides CIA interrogators with protection, retroactive to 2001, against being prosecuted as war criminals for most interrogation methods on high-value detainees.

DOJ_NMG_0067146

But the administration appeared to bow to demands from McCain, Graham and Warner, who'd voiced concerns raised by dozens of current and former high ranking military and diplomatic officials, including five former chairmen of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and Republican Secretaries of State Colin Powell and George Shultz.

The administration had sought to more narrowly define the U.S. obligations under Common Article 3 of the international Geneva Conventions of 1949, which govern the treatment of prisoners of war. Critics said that Bush's approach could allow interrogation tactics too close to torture, invite other nations to back out of their treaty obligations and possibly lead to torture of U.S. soldiers in future wars. They also said it would damage the nation's international reputation by lowering the moral standards America observes in war.

Under the compromise, the administration would agree not to reinterpret the Geneva Conventions. Instead, the U.S. War Crimes Act would be revised to define "grave breaches" of Common Article 3, including murder, torture, biological experiments, rape and other acts.

The CIA would be instructed that it must abide by the Detainee Treatment Act, which was championed last year by McCain and rules out degrading treatment of detainees. But Congress would give the executive branch the power to define a lower category of mid-range felonies under the War Crimes Act.

The administration appeared to accept the senators' demand that classified information couldn't be used to convict a detainee unless the detainee was given at least a sense of what information was being used against him. The sources and methods of U.S. intelligence would be protected.

The senators also appeared to get most of what they wanted in terms of allowing a judge to throw out evidence that appeared to have been gleaned in violation of humane treatment standards.

The American Civil Liberties Union, however, urged lawmakers to reject the deal, saying it didn't protect due process and was "a compromise of America's commitment to the rule of law."

"The proposal . . . deliberately provides a `get out of jail free card' to the administration's top torture officials, " Caroline Fredrickson, director of the ACLU Washington Legislative Office, said in a written statement. ". . .The president would have the authority to declare what is - and what is not - a grave breach of the War Crimes Act, making the president his own judge and jury. . . . These are tactics expected of repressive regimes, not the American government."

But one prominent independent human-rights group hailed the deal.

"Today's agreement makes clear that the president cannot unilaterally downgrade the humane treatment standards of the Geneva Conventions," said Elisa Massimino, the Washington Director of Human Rights First, in a prepared statement. "The administration failed in its attempt to get around the prohibitions against torture and cruelty by arguing that the standards are `flexible.' "

In addition, Massimino said, the agreement "makes clear that `alternative interrogation procedures,' such as stress positions, induced hypothermia and water-boarding are not only prohibited by the treaty, they are war crimes."

However, she added, "concerns remain," including whether the administration's interpretation of the Geneva standards comports with the law, and whether alleged abuses in secret CIA prisons will ever be aired in courts.

Eugene Fidell, the president of the National Association of Military Justice, which serves as a watchdog over military prosecutions, said details of the deal were too scant to render an analysis. He sharply criticized the closed-door negotiations, saying the terms should have been the subject of public Senate hearings.

McClatchy Newspapers correspondents William Douglas, Greg Gordon and Jonathan S. Landay contributed to this report.

A Bad Bargain (NYT)

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

Here is a way to measure how seriously President Bush was willing to compromise on the military tribunals bill: Less than an hour after an agreement was announced yesterday with three leading Republican senators, the White House was already laying a path to wiggle out of its one real concession.

About the only thing that Senators John Warner, John McCain and Lindsey Graham had to show for their defiance was Mr. Bush's agreement to drop his insistence on allowing prosecutors of suspected terrorists to introduce classified evidence kept secret from the defendant. The White House agreed to abide by the rules of courts-martial, which bar secret evidence. (Although the administration's supporters continually claim this means giving classified information to terrorists, the rules actually provide for reviewing, editing and summarizing classified material. Evidence that cannot be safely declassified cannot be introduced.)

DOJ_NMG_0067147

This is a critical point. As Senator Graham keeps noting, the United States would never stand for any other country's convicting an American citizen with undisclosed, secret evidence. So it seemed like a significant concession — until Stephen Hadley, the national security adviser, briefed reporters yesterday evening. He said that while the White House wants to honor this deal, the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, Duncan Hunter, still wants to permit secret evidence and should certainly have his say. To accept this spin requires believing that Mr. Hunter, who railroaded Mr. Bush's original bill through his committee, is going to take any action not blessed by the White House.

On other issues, the three rebel senators achieved only modest improvements on the White House's original positions. They wanted to bar evidence obtained through coercion. Now, they have agreed to allow it if a judge finds it reliable (which coerced evidence hardly can be) and relevant to guilt or innocence. The way coercion is measured in the bill, even those protections would not apply to the prisoners at Guantánamo Bay.

The deal does next to nothing to stop the president from reinterpreting the Geneva Conventions. While the White House agreed to a list of "grave breaches" of the conventions that could be prosecuted as war crimes, it stipulated that the president could decide on his own what actions might be a lesser breach of the Geneva Conventions and what interrogation techniques he considered permissible. It's not clear how much the public will ultimately learn about those decisions. They will be contained in an executive order that is supposed to be made public, but Mr. Hadley reiterated that specific interrogation techniques will remain secret.

Even before the compromises began to emerge, the overall bill prepared by the three senators had fatal flaws. It allows the president to declare any foreigner, anywhere, an "illegal enemy combatant" using a dangerously broad definition, and detain him without any trial. It not only fails to deal with the fact that many of the Guantánamo detainees are not terrorists and will never be charged, but it also chokes off any judicial review.

The Democrats have largely stood silent and allowed the trio of Republicans to do the lifting. It's time for them to either try to fix this bill or delay it until after the election. The American people expect their leaders to clean up this mess without endangering U.S. troops, eviscerating American standards of justice, or further harming the nation's severely damaged reputation.

The Abuse Can Continue (WP)

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

THE GOOD NEWS about the agreement reached yesterday between the Bush administration and Republican senators on the detention, interrogation and trial of accused terrorists is that Congress will not -- as President Bush had demanded -- pass legislation that formally reinterprets U.S. compliance with the Geneva Conventions. Nor will the Senate explicitly endorse the administration's use of interrogation techniques that most of the world regards as cruel and inhumane, if not as outright torture. Trials of accused terrorists will be fairer than the commission system outlawed in June by the Supreme Court.

The bad news is that Mr. Bush, as he made clear yesterday, intends to continue using the CIA to secretly detain and abuse certain terrorist suspects. He will do so by issuing his own interpretation of the Geneva Conventions in an executive order and by relying on questionable Justice Department opinions that authorize such practices as exposing prisoners to hypothermia and prolonged sleep deprivation. Under the compromise agreed to yesterday, Congress would recognize his authority to take these steps and prevent prisoners from appealing them to U.S. courts. The bill would also immunize CIA personnel from prosecution for all but the most serious abuses and protect those who in the past violated U.S. law against war crimes.

In short, it's hard to credit the statement by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) yesterday that "there's no doubt that the integrity and letter and spirit of the Geneva Conventions have been preserved." In effect, the agreement means that U.S. violations of international human rights law can continue as long as Mr. Bush is president, with Congress's tacit assent. If they do, America's standing in the world will continue to suffer, as will the fight against terrorism.

For now, the administration says it is not holding anyone in secret CIA facilities. The detention of those being held by the U.S. military at Guantanamo Bay clearly conforms with international law. If suspects are routed into the CIA program in the future, the administration has pledged to consult with Congress about the interrogation techniques that will be permitted. In theory, Congress could override Mr. Bush's regulations governing treatment if it judges that they are being used to authorize unacceptable practices.

DOJ_NMG_0067148

But the senators who have fought to rein in the administration's excesses -- led by Sens. McCain, Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) and John W. Warner (R-Va.) -- failed to break Mr. Bush's commitment to "alternative" methods that virtually every senior officer of the U.S. military regards as unreliable, counterproductive and dangerous for Americans who may be captured by hostile governments.

Mr. Bush wanted Congress to formally approve these practices and to declare them consistent with the Geneva Conventions. It will not. But it will not stop him either, if the legislation is passed in the form agreed on yesterday. Mr. Bush will go down in history for his embrace of torture and bear responsibility for the enormous damage that has caused.

Gonzales Revisits Deportation Remarks (WP)

By Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales's claim this week that the Justice Department was not responsible for sending Canadian software engineer Maher Arar to a Syrian prison in 2002 was the result of imprecise wording by Gonzales and a misunderstanding by those who reported his remarks, according to a Justice Department spokeswoman.

The matter turns on the meaning of the word "we."

On Tuesday, a day after a Canadian government commission concluded that the Syrian-born Arar was "interrogated, tortured and held in degrading and inhumane conditions" for 10 months after being falsely accused of terrorist ties, Gonzales was asked whether the department owed him "an apology."

"Well, we were not responsible for his removal to Syria," Gonzales replied. "I'm not aware that he was tortured, and I haven't read the commission report."

Gonzales was aware that in 2002 the Immigration and Naturalization Service arranged Arar's removal from the United States and his delivery to Syria after he was accused of ties to al-Qaeda, spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said. The INS has since been transferred from the Justice Department to the new Department of Homeland Security and is known as U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services.

Since Arar was officially deported, Scolinos said, his case was "an immigration-related issue." She said Gonzales was trying to "make that point" because "immigration matters are no longer handled by the [Justice] Department."

On the question of torture, Scolinos said, "My understanding is that the U.S. government received what they believed to be reliable assurances that he would be treated humanely, consistent with international treaties and conventions." Gonzales, she said, was "emphasizing that point."

Arar, now 36 and living in Canada, sued the U.S. government in federal court, but the case was dismissed on national security grounds. He filed a notice of appeal Sept. 12, according to the Center for Constitutional Rights, a legal group that is handling his case.

The possibility of further litigation may have limited what the Justice Department is prepared to say on the matter, said some U.S. officials who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to discuss the matter.

Canada's House of Commons unanimously agreed Wednesday that "apologies should be presented" to Arar on behalf of Canada. Prime Minister Stephen Harper, who earlier acknowledged that Arar had been done "an injustice," balked at going that far, saying it might influence negotiations with Arar's lawyers over possible compensation.

Arar's ordeal began in New York City on Sept. 26, 2002, a year after the al-Qaeda attacks there. Changing planes on his return trip to Canada after visiting Tunisia with his family, he was arrested on what the commission concluded was false information, provided to the FBI by Canadian law enforcement, that he had al-Qaeda connections. After being held for 12 days, he was flown in a government plane to Jordan and transported over land to Syria, the nation he had left as a 17-year-old.

DOJ_NMG_0067149

U.S. officials later confirmed that the order to deport him was signed by then-Deputy Attorney General Larry D. Thompson. They said it would be "prejudicial to the interests of the United States" to send Arar home to Canada, despite his Canadian citizenship.

The Canadian government was not informed until he was gone.

U.S. law prohibits sending anyone, even on national security grounds, to a country where he or she is likely to be tortured. Although the State Department has long branded Syria a human rights violator, then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft responded to Canadian protests by saying the Syrian government had assured that Arar would be treated humanely.

On Tuesday, Gonzales also repeated the administration's denial that Arar's removal was part of the practice of secret "renditions" of terrorism suspects to third countries where they could be more aggressively interrogated. "That is not what happened here," he said. "It was a deportation."

Even if Arar "had been rendered to Syria," he said, "we would have sought those same kind of assurances" against torture.

Correspondent Doug Struck in Toronto and staff researcher Julie Tate in Washington contributed to this report.

State Asks Court To Dismiss Suit Over Phone Company Records (AP)

By Glenn Adams, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 22, 2006

AUGUSTA, Maine --Maine's attorney general asked a federal court Thursday to throw out the government's lawsuit against Maine officials over whether a phone company should release information about its handling of confidential records.

Attorney General G. Steven Rowe said the state's request, filed on behalf of the Public Utilities Commission, asserts the federal government has no jurisdiction in the case. The state also contends that the government is wrong to invoke "state secrets" arguments.

"There are no state secrets at issue here," Rowe said at a news briefing after the motion to dismiss was filed in U.S. District Court in Bangor.

The litigation stems from a press release issued by Verizon and information it provided to the PUC, in which the telecommunications company claims it did not provide phone records to the government for its domestic surveillance program. The company also said in a May news release that it would not discuss any relationship with the National Security Agency program.

The PUC, prompted by a complaint by 22 Mainers, ordered Verizon to provide a sworn affirmation that Verizon's statement about the phone records is true. In response, the federal government sued, saying that the PUC's attempt to force Verizon to answer raised national security concerns.

Rowe was joined by PUC commissioners Thursday in rejecting the government's national security claims in the case.

"It's not about state secrets. It's about the integrity of the Public Utilities Commission process," said Sharon Reishus, one of the regulatory agency's commissioners and a defendant in the government's suit.

PUC Chairman Kurt Adams said the commission took the complaint over the handling of phone records "very seriously," adding that the PUC's ability to carry out its administrative duties was at issue in the case.

A legislator who is deeply involved in utility issues, Rep. John Brautigam, dismissed the federal government's secrecy claim as "the kind of legalistic mumbo-jumbo that gives the administration in Washington a bad name."

"The public has a right to know that their confidential information has been safeguarded in compliance with Maine law and the contractual obligations of the phone companies," said Brautigam, D-Falmouth.

A spokesman for the U.S. Justice Department's public affairs office, Charles Miller, said there would be no comment on the motion because the case is in litigation.

Legal disputes have surfaced in other states over reports of phone company cooperation with government surveillance efforts.

In Vermont, Verizon and AT&T customers, Gov. Jim Douglas and the state's chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union are urging state utility regulators to determine whether the two phone companies violated state statutes by turning records over to the NSA.

DOJ_NMG_0067150

The American Civil Liberties Union last spring filed complaints in more than 20 states over allegations that phone companies shared customer records with the NSA.

The Maine Civil Liberties Union is supporting the phone records complaint of the 22 Mainers.

Bush Administration Asks Appeals Court To Quickly Dismiss Eavesdropping Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Hope Yen, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 22, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The Bush administration asked an appeals court Thursday to step in immediately and dismiss a lawsuit over the U.S. government's warrantless wire tapping program, calling a lower judge's ruling dangerous and wrong.

The Justice Department asked the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to overturn the decision earlier this month by U.S. District Judge Garr King. Government attorneys argued the decision put the disclosure of "highly sensitive foreign intelligence information" at risk.

The lawsuit was filed by the Al-Haramain Islamic Foundation, which had a chapter that went out of business after the U.S. government labeled it a terrorist organization.

The foundation alleged that two of its lawyers and at least one official were under electronic surveillance in March and April 2004. The foundation is asking King to rule the surveillance a violation of a federal law that requires a special court to approve intelligence-related wiretapping.

Typically, appeals are filed at the conclusion of a case in trial court; however, in this case, Justice Department attorneys are asking the 9th Circuit to step in now given the sensitivity and urgency of national security.

In the Sept. 7 order, King declined to dismiss the case, saying he believed there may be a way for the lawsuit filed by a now-defunct Islamic charity to proceed without releasing information that could harm U.S. security.

The decision, the latest of several rulings on the controversial program, drew a stern rebuke this week from Vice President Dick Cheney. He called it "just plain wrong."

In Thursday's filing, Justice Department attorneys argued that King's decision is flawed because classified facts needed to evaluate the case are protected under the so-called "state secrets" privilege.

On the Net:

Justice Department: http://www.usdoj.gov/

Claim 9/11 Terrorists Were Identified Is Rejected (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 21 — The Defense Department's inspector general on Thursday dismissed claims by military officers and others who had insisted that a secret Pentagon program identified Mohamed Atta and other terrorists involved in the Sept. 11 attacks before the attacks occurred.

The inspector general's office, which acts as the Defense Department's internal watchdog, said in a report that its investigators found no evidence to suggest that the intelligence program, known as Able Danger, had identified Mr. Atta, the Egyptian-born ringleader of the attacks, or any of the other terrorists before Sept. 11.

"We concluded that prior to Sept. 11, 2001, Able Danger team members did not identify Mohamed Atta or any other 9/11 hijackers," the report said. "While we interviewed four witnesses who claimed to have seen a chart depicting Mohamed Atta and possibly other terrorists or 'cells' involved in 9/11, we determined that their recollections were not accurate."

The claim that a secret Pentagon data-mining program had known of Mr. Atta and other hijackers before Sept. 11 created a stir when the witnesses' accounts became public last year, because it suggested that the Defense Department had information that might have helped pre-empt the attacks had it been shared outside of the Pentagon.

DOJ_NMG_0067151

The inspector general's report, prepared at the request of several members of Congress, was criticized Thursday by Representative Curt Weldon, Republican of Pennsylvania, who is a member of the House Armed Services Committee and who helped bring information about Able Danger to light.

"I am appalled that the Department of Defense inspector general would expect the American people to actually consider this a full and thorough investigation," Mr. Weldon said, describing the inspector general as having "cherry-picked testimony from witnesses in an effort to minimize the historical importance of the Able Danger effort."

The report found that the recollections of most of the witnesses appeared to focus on a "single chart depicting Al Qaeda cells responsible for pre-9/11 terrorist attacks" that was produced in 1999 by a defense contractor, the Orion Scientific Corporation.

While witnesses remembered having seen Mr. Atta's photograph or name on such a chart, the inspector general said its investigation showed that the Orion chart did not list Mr. Atta or any of the other Sept. 11 terrorists, and that "testimony by witnesses who claimed to have seen such a chart varied significantly from each other."

The report says that a central witness in the investigation, an active-duty Navy captain who directed the Able Danger program, had changed his account over time, initially telling the inspector general's office last December that he was "100 percent" certain that he had seen "Mohamed Atta's image on the chart."

But in an interview this May, the report said, the officer, Scott J. Phillpott, changed his story, telling investigators that he had been confused and was now "convinced that Atta was not on that chart" but that, instead, the terrorist's photograph was reproduced on a separate document that he was shown by an intelligence analyst on the Able Danger team in June 2000.

The inspector general's report suggests that the independent federal commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks was right to dismiss Captain Phillpott's initial claims about Able Danger.

The Sept. 11 commission acknowledged last year that the Navy captain had come to its investigators in July 2004, only days before it issued its final report.

The inspector general's report also rejected claims by another of the witnesses, Lt. Col. Anthony Shaffer, a veteran military intelligence officer, that he had faced reprisals for having make disclosures about Able Danger, including revocation of his security clearance.

FBI Says Its Agents Did Not Visit Puerto Rican Independence Activist (AP)

AP, September 22, 2006

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico The FBI is investigating if people posing as bureau agents visited a shoe repair store in western Puerto Rico owned by a supporter of independence for the U.S. territory, an agency spokesman said Thursday.

Harry Rodriguez, FBI spokesman in Puerto Rico, denied that bureau agents visited Miguel Sanchez's shoe repair store in Mayaguez, though Sanchez said they did come to see him.

"They were not FBI agents who went to Sanchez's business," he said, adding that those people "were impersonating FBI agents."

Rodriguez said impersonating an agent was a crime and that the FBI was investigating.

Rodriguez's comments come three days after FBI agents returned to the homes of two Puerto Rican activists whose properties were searched in February in an investigation into a militant independence group.

FBI teams went to the residences of Liliana Laboy and Norberto Cintron Fiallo, both in the San Juan area, but neither activist was home and the agents left without entering.

Rodriguez said the agents went to the homes as part of an ongoing investigation into the Macheteros, also known as the Puerto Rican People's Army. He declined to provide details.

On Saturday, Puerto Ricans will hold a vigil to mark the one-year anniversary of the death of Filiberto Ojeda Rios, the leader of the Macheteros, which claimed responsibility for bombings and attacks in the 1970s and 1980s aimed at gaining independence for Puerto Rico.

DOJ_NMG_0067152

In August, federal investigators concluded that FBI agents were justified in killing Ojeda, who opened fire first — hitting three agents — when they came to arrest him. The militant had been convicted for his role in the 1983 robbery of US$7 million (€5.5 million) from a Wells Fargo bank depot in Connecticut, but he fled while on bond.

Inside The Ring (WT)

By Bill Gertz And Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

Terrorist hunt

We understand that U.S. commandos have developed a clever technical procedure for tracking terrorists in Iraq, and elsewhere, we presume.

The tracking is used by a special military intelligence unit within U.S. Joint Special Operations Command (JSOC), which includes Navy SEALs and the Army's Delta Force. The technique was instrumental in finding and killing al Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab Zarqawi in June and in capturing a number of his lieutenants.

President Bush paid special tribute to JSOC after a U.S. Air Force F-16 dropped the bomb that killed Zarqawi, one of al Qaeda's most ruthless killers who pledged allegiance to Osama Bin Laden.

Cuban spy damage

Ana Montes, a Cuban spy working inside the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA), caused serious damage to U.S. national security by revealing U.S. electronic intelligence-gathering secrets and also by providing a feedback mechanism for communist disinformation from the Castro regime.

The damage is outlined in a classified assessment completed several months ago by the office of the National Counterintelligence Executive, now under the new Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte. It was disclosed this week in the new book by Bill Gertz, Pentagon reporter for The Washington Times, titled, "Enemies: How America's Foes Are Stealing Our Vital Secrets — And How We Let It Happen."

According to unclassified portions of the assessment, Montes met openly with Cuban intelligence officers at restaurants in the D.C. area as often as twice a week, a rate much more frequently than other spies.

Counterintelligence officials determined that the damage caused by Montes was nearly equal to that caused by CIA turncoat Aldrich Hazen Ames and FBI traitor Robert Philip Hanssen, who both spied for Russia.

Montes had almost unlimited access to U.S. secrets, including the identities of American intelligence personnel and information that defectors provided to U.S. intelligence.

A senior U.S. counterintelligence official familiar with the damage assessment said: "As a career analyst with high-level security clearances, [Montes] had access to virtually unlimited amounts of sensitive data from a number of intelligence community organizations."

She turned down several promotion opportunities to remain as a DIA analyst and keep her access to secrets. The counterintelligence official said that Montes commented during one debriefing she viewed "just about all the information there was about Cuba."

Montes also networked extensively with other civilian and military intelligence officials and agencies, allowing her "to obtain information that was not readily available to the typical analyst," the official said. She sat with a special interagency intelligence group known as the Hard Target Committee, which would meet to discuss all the intelligence operations under way in the most difficult places, including Iran, China and North Korea. Over the years she had access to hundreds of thousands of intelligence reports, many of which she could re-create because "she had an extraordinary, almost photographic memory," according to the counterintelligence official.

The damage assessment concluded, "Montes was the first national-level analyst from the intelligence community known to have turned traitor and the most damaging Cuban spy arrested to date."

The report noted that Montes "was able to effectively inform the Cubans of the United States information gaps and served as a feedback loop for the Cubans that potentially would facilitate the formulation and execution of a robust denial and deception program at U.S. intelligence."

The counterintelligence official said: "Her damage was especially grave and affected every major intelligence community organization. She compromised numerous sensitive intelligence collection activities and provided Havana with a unique window into Washington that undoubtedly helped the Cubans chart their tactics and strategy in dealing with Washington."

U.S. officials also think that information she provided to the Cubans led to the deaths of Nicaraguan anti-communist Contra rebels and possibly of American agents as well.

Pay increase

Throw out the conventional wisdom once again.

A Rand Corp. study has found that rather than taking a salary cut, most reservists called to active duty actual make more money.

In fact, only 17 percent of all Guard and Reserve troops suffered a pay cut compared with their civilian pay stub.

"Typically, these reservists are people in their mid-20s to mid-30s, with some college but not necessarily a bachelor's degree," Rand quoted its economist and lead study author, David Loughran, as saying. "Generally, military pay is quite good for this group. Moreover, reservists receive additional special pay when activated and their earnings are not subject to federal taxes."

Co-ed dorms

Recent accusations of rape and sexual harassment at the service academies is partly a failure of leadership and partly the fault of housing young men and women in the same dorms, say alumni with whom we have talked.

One former Naval Academy graduate tells us Bancroft Hall, the co-ed dorm at Annapolis, is a frequent site of prohibited sexual intercourse. The source said midshipmen know places for having sex where they will not be detected. Such knowledge is passed on to the next class.

Peace through strength

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld addressed the annual Keeper of the Flame award dinner Wednesday night at a black-tie affair in Union Station's East Hall.

Mr. Rumsfeld reminded the several hundred guests, including Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. Peter Pace, and NATO commander Gen. Jim Jones about Winston Churchill's remark after the successful evacuation of British troops from the continent at Dunkirk.

"Churchill said in the Parliament very simply, 'Wars are not won by evacuations.' And we need to remember that today," Mr. Rumsfeld said. "They're not won by retreat or wishful thinking. They're won by determination, they're won by understanding the nature of the enemies we face, and the consequences, I would say the dire consequences of failing to understand them or failing to defeat them."

Mr. Rumsfeld said he met recently with former British Prime Minister Lady Margaret Thatcher, who he noted had been criticized for her outspoken advocacy of "peace through strength," which was the motto for the evening's host, the Center for Security Policy.

The dinner honored Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, along with five veterans of the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan.

•Bill Gertz and Rowan Scarborough are Pentagon reporters. Mr. Gertz can be reached at 202/636-3274 or by e-mail at bgertz@washingtontimes.com. Mr. Scarborough can be reached at 202/636-3208 or by e-mail at rscarborough@washingtontimes.com.

Britain Makes Modest Relaxation In Carry-on Rules (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, September 22, 2006

LONDON — Air passengers can carry a larger bag and musical instruments on board flights leaving Britain starting today, the government announced Thursday.

The new restrictions, announced by the Department for Transport, replace tighter ones imposed after British police announced Aug. 10 that they had broken up an alleged terrorist plot to blow up passenger jets headed for the USA.

DOJ_NMG_0067154

Plotters intended to carry aboard liquids and other bomb-making components, assemble them during flight and blow up the planes, police said. Fifteen people have been charged and are in custody.

A ban on carrying on cosmetics and liquids not purchased inside airports after security checkpoints remains in place. And passengers flying to the USA still cannot carry any liquids onto aircraft. To ensure they don't, passengers will continue to go through a second security check at the departure gate.

The slight relaxation in carry-on baggage restrictions comes after complaints from passengers and airlines and as the government continues to try to balance security with passenger convenience.

"Passengers should be able to travel as freely as possible, but we have no intention of putting their safety at risk," the Transport Department said in a statement. The change, it said, would "lessen the burden on passengers, while maintaining a rigorous security regime."

One carry-on bag now will be allowed. It can be 22 inches long, 17.7 inches wide and 9.8 inches in depth. Previously, the bag was restricted to 17.7 inches by 13.7 inches by 6.2 inches. Large musical instruments now can be carried on board rather than checked, although some airlines may require passengers to pay for an extra seat.

The relaxation also comes as Britain, the European Union and the airline industry continue to work on adopting uniform standards for passenger security inspections and carry-on bags. Requirements vary now from country to country. The varying standards cause confusion for passengers and delays at security checkpoints, the airline industry complains.

Tighter security restrictions, including a ban on carrying on liquids, prompted the cancellation of more than 2,000 flights, hundreds of flight delays and long security lines at British airports last month.

British Airways said it lost about $75 million as a result. Discount airline Ryanair sued the government last month for $6.2 million in damages. In doing so, Ryanair chief executive Michael O'Leary ridiculed many of the restrictions as "Keystone Cops security measures" and unnecessary.

Meanwhile Thursday, EU Justice and Interior ministers met in Finland to discuss new anti-terrorism measures and technology, including better equipment to detect liquid and other explosives that could be carried onto planes.

Woman Sentenced To Death For Role In Jordan Hotel Bombings (WP/AP)

By Jamal Halaby

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

AMMAN, Jordan, Sept. 21 -- A court sentenced an Iraqi woman to death Thursday for her role in al-Qaeda-led hotel bombings that killed 60 people in Jordan's deadliest terror attack.

Sajida al-Rishawi, 35, was intended to be one of the suicide bombers in the Nov. 9 attack. She entered a hotel ballroom with her husband, both strapped with explosives belts. Her husband set off his own belt, the explosion ripping through a wedding party in the room.

Initially, Rishawi said in a televised confession that her own belt had failed to detonate and she fled. But she later told her trial that she was an unwilling participant in the attacks and never tried to set off the suicide bomb.

Rishawi was one of seven defendants in the case, but the six others were still at large and tried in absentia. Like Rishawi, the six were sentenced to death by hanging. Rishawi is the first woman to be sentenced to execution in Jordan on terrorism charges.

Jordanians are still reeling from the attacks, the worst terrorist incident in recent memory and widely labeled "Jordan's 9/11." Suicide bombers entered three Amman hotels and set off their blasts nearly simultaneously, killing 60 people -- mainly Jordanian Muslim women and children -- in an attack claimed by the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq.

"The harsh verdict today sends a clear message to all terror groups: Jordan's stability and security is a red line that can't be crossed," said Mahmoud al-Kharabsheh, a lawmaker who sits on the parliament's Legal Committee.

Ashraf al-Akhras, who was the groom in the stricken wedding party and lost his father and 16 other family members and in-laws, said, "She got her just punishment, but it won't assuage the fire inside for my great loss."

Rishawi "got what she deserved," said Mahmoud al-Akrabawi, a wedding guest who lost his wife and two children.

Rishawi sat silently in the courtroom as the verdict was read.

DOJ_NMG_0067155

She later told her lawyer she had anticipated receiving the death sentence.

"She told me that she expected either to be sentenced to death or to be sent back to Iraq," said the lawyer, Hussein al-Masri. He said he planned to appeal the verdict soon.

Jordan executes by hanging after a protracted legal process that includes several appeals, including to the supreme court -- the highest judicial authority. An average of 10 people -- mostly men -- are executed each year for crimes that include terrorism and premeditated murder.

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

The French government's latest reaction to the global war on terrorism is being scrutinized all over again on Capitol Hill, where one congressman is in search of a French general named Lafayette.

"'Let them eat cake' is what Marie Antoinette said to the starving French people, showing her ignorance of the world around her," recalls freshman Rep. Ted Poe, Texas Republican. "Today it can be used to describe France's position on handling terror threats."

The lawmaker was riled by a recent remark by French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin that "against terrorism, what we need is not a war. It is, as France has done for many years, a determined fight based on vigilance at all times and effective cooperation with our partners."

Mr. Poe, a no-nonsense federal judge in his previous life, says what France "fails to consider is we tried that. Madrid's trains have been attacked. London's buses and subways have blown up. American embassies were bombed. The USS Cole was attacked, and, of course, there was September 11. ...

"What France and free people need is the spirit of Lafayette in this war on terror, not the current ignorance of Marie Antoinette, who was talking all the way to the guillotine and lost her head because she failed to see the real world around her."

In fairness to the French prime minister, he also warned that the risk of a terrorist attack in France using conventional, chemical, biological and nuclear weapons is "real and permanent," and assured French citizens that he would beef up security, particularly after al Qaeda's threat in recent days against French interests.

Crowned prisoners

Anybody who thinks that the terror suspects detained at Guantanamo Bay are being physically mistreated will be intrigued to learn that more dollars are being spent on food for the prisoners than for the U.S. troops guarding them.

"[T]he terrorists have gained weight on the nutritious diet," reveals Rep. Joe Wilson, a South Carolina Republican and member of the Armed Services Committee who twice toured the notorious detention facility.

And apart from their rich diets, the congressman adds, the prisoners' teeth are sparkling white, and their vision is 20/20 when reading the Koran.

"These detainees received 35 teeth cleanings, 91 filled cavities and 174 pairs of glasses," he says of the prisoners he encountered on one trip.

Rush for tickets

Coming soon to Washington, live and on stage, the one, the only — Rush Limbaugh.

Chris Berry of WMAL-630 AM fame tells Inside the Beltway that the Washington radio station over which Mr. Limbaugh is heard daily is bringing the popular broadcaster to the Warner Theatre at 8 p.m. Nov. 16 for an "Evening With Rush Limbaugh."

"Rush has thousands of fans throughout the Washington area," notes Mr. Berry, WMAL's president and general manager. "This will be a unique opportunity for them to see him as they never have before, up close and in person."

The evening is sponsored by the Heritage Foundation. A portion of the proceeds (tickets are $75 and $100, and will be available through Ticketmaster starting tomorrow) will benefit the Fisher House Foundation.

Beat by the clock

The gridiron of Washington's Gallaudet University hosted a rather lopsided flag football game this week between a U.S. Capitol Police squad and Democrats and Republicans who for once sported the same uniform.

DOJ_NMG_0067156

"[I]f it wasn't for the clock running out, we would have had that big comeback and overcome that score of 35-7," insists Rep. Rick Renzi, Arizona Republican.

Doing his best to coach the bipartisan bunch while helping to raise $80,000 for the families of law-enforcement officers was none other than Rep. Tom Osborne, a Republican who during a quarter-century as head coach of the Nebraska Cornhuskers football team, garnered an outstanding 255-49-3 record.

•John McCaslin, whose column is nationally syndicated, can be reached at 202/636-3284 or jmccaslin@washingtontimes.com.

The Trials Of The Century (NYT)

By Lawrence Wright

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

Austin, Tex.

THE fifth anniversary of 9/11 has come and gone, but there was a conspicuous figure missing from the retrospectives and commentaries: Osama bin Laden.

Al Qaeda's founder has clearly been marginalized even in his own movement, as other jihadist spokesmen, Ayman al-Zawahri and an American, Adam Gadahn, issued threats and demanded that Americans convert to Islam. Meantime, Pakistan has negotiated a truce with tribal chiefs promising to keep troops out of the Waziristan districts, where the leadership of Al Qaeda may be hiding, and the C.I.A. has closed Alec Station, the unit devoted to finding Mr. bin Laden. He is the forgotten man.

Fortunately, there are still some members of the American intelligence community who are interested in the terrorist's whereabouts. Not long ago one of them approached me — not because of my reporting on Al Qaeda but because of my experience as a Hollywood screenwriter, a talent pool the C.I.A. occasionally draws on for futurist thinking. The official asked me to envision what we would do with Mr. bin Laden if we caught him. I said that I didn't feel comfortable, as a reporter, writing a script for the C.I.A.

I have given the idea some thought, however. Osama bin Laden is arguably the most famous man alive, and his name will resound through history. If we do have the good fortune of actually capturing him, the manner in which we bring him to justice will make a critical difference in the way in which his legacy will unfold. Here is my scenario for how this movie could end.

First, don't kill him. He'd become a martyr instantly, which is of course his goal. His death at the hands of Americans would be the ideal finale from a Qaeda perspective. Deny him that victory at all costs.

And, please, don't send him to Guantánamo or torture him in an undisclosed location. That route leads to his becoming a symbol of resistance to the erosion of the American legal system. The world will want to know what happens to him, and if he is hidden away, or subjected to a secret trial, then his reputation will soar as ours plummets. He has to be accorded the civilized treatment that he and his movement would never offer their enemies.

But don't bring him to the United States to answer for his crimes, at least not at the beginning. His followers would never accept the verdict of an American court. And, more to the point, neither would hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, of Muslims who sympathize with him and his cause. It's that audience that we have to address in our attempt to roll back Mr. bin Laden's awful legacy.

Moreover, if he were tried in an American court, one can easily envision wide-scale attacks on American holdings and Americans being held for ransom in exchange for the terrorist leader. Placing him in the dock of the World Court would involve similar risks, and could lead to the sort of prolonged trial that sees him dying of natural causes, as in the case of Slobodan Milosevic.

We should, instead, offer him to the authorities in Kenya, where, on Aug. 7, 1998, a Qaeda suicide bomber murdered 213 people in the attack on the American Embassy. More than 150 people were blinded by flying glass in the attack — most of them Africans who were in or near the embassy or the secretarial school across the street, which was flattened by the blast. Let Mr. bin Laden sit in a courtroom in Nairobi and explain to those blind Africans that he was aiming only at an icon of American power.

Then take him to Tanzania, where on the same August morning Al Qaeda hit another American Embassy, killing 11 people, most of them Muslims. The terrorists excused the murder of their co-religionists by saying that the bombing took place on a Friday, when good Muslims should have been in a mosque. That would be an excellent venue to pose the question of what Islam really stands for.

DOJ_NMG_0067157

Thus exposed as a mass murderer of Africans who had no part in his quarrel with America, Mr. bin Laden would be ready to stand trial for the bombing of the American destroyer Cole and, of course, 9/11. By treating him as a criminal defendant instead of a enemy combatant, we could underline the differences between a civil society and the Taliban-like rule he seeks to impose on Muslim countries and eventually the entire world.

Mr. bin Laden could go on to many other venues to answer for his crimes — Istanbul, Casablanca, Madrid, London, Islamabad — but in my opinion there is an obvious last stop on his tour of justice: his homeland, Saudi Arabia, where hundreds of his countrymen and expatriate workers have died at the hands of Al Qaeda. There he would be tried in a Shariah court, the only law he would ever recognize.

If he were found guilty, he would be taken to a park in the middle of downtown Riyadh known as "Chop Chop Square." There, the executioner would greet him with his long, heavy sword at his side. It is a Saudi tradition that the executioner personally beseeches the audience, composed of the victims of the condemned man's crimes, to forgive the condemned. If they cannot, the executioner will carry out his task. After that, Osama bin Laden's body would be taken to an unmarked tomb in a Wahhabi graveyard, as he would have wanted.

There are other ways this movie could end, and as a screenwriter I can't say that any of them are "happy" in the conventional Hollywood sense. But drama demands resolution, in real life as well as fiction. Since the Greeks, dramatists have known that a good ending is one that acknowledges the longing of the audience for justice and the sense that order has been restored.

I think the American intelligence community would be wise to pay attention to those ancient artistic dictates. The role that Osama bin Laden has cast himself in is that of the hero to Muslims who feel slighted by history and victimized by the West. It is a legend that could last for hundreds of years and inspire many generations of future terrorists. By turning his actions in other parts of the world against him, we can justly put that legend to rest.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chief Defends Terror Arrests (MH)

By Lesley Clark

The Miami Herald, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON - Miami Police Chief John Timoney defended the arrest of the Miami Seven to a House homeland security committee Thursday, telling the panel that not all terrorists look like Sept. 11 ringleader Mohamed Atta.

Timoney, who testified about "local strategies in the war on terror" before a House homeland security subcommittee, acknowledged there had been skepticism about the June arrest of the seven men in Liberty City. Some community groups were troubled that the men appeared to lack the means to conduct an attack -- no weapons or bomb-making materials.

The seven defendants who have been charged with conspiring to support al Qaeda in an alleged plot to blow up FBI buildings are to go on trial in March.

"I was skeptical, as was the FBI, but not once did [the suspects] back off," Timoney said. ``Suffice it to say there were enough overt acts that we had to take it seriously."

Timoney's remarks came after Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, R-Miami, asked Timoney about the case, noting that the arrest of the seven men, to some observers, ``hardly passed the smile test."

Timoney suggested the same questions might have been asked if British police had arrested the men responsible for the July 2005 subway bombing in London before they carried it out.

'I can guarantee you if Scotland Yard had arrested them two weeks earlier, people would have said, `That guy's not a terrorist, he's Jamaican,' " Timoney said. ``We all had this perception of a terrorist looking like Mohamed Atta, walking through the airport. Now we know that's not so."

DOJ_NMG_0067158

Timoney told the panel that progress has been made since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in terms of local police working with the FBI.

But he noted that it's still not clear ``who has the ultimate responsibility for intelligence gathering."

Deal Is Reached On Plants And Terrorism (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 21 — The Republican Congressional leaders who oversee Department of Homeland Security operations reached agreement Thursday on a plan that would give federal officials the power to shut down high-risk chemical plants that do not comply with proposed new anti-terrorism measures for that industry.

The proposal is more stringent than an industry-backed plan that many other Republican senators had already endorsed.

Under the agreement reached Thursday by Senator Susan Collins of Maine and Representative Peter T. King of New York, the regulations would apply to all high-risk plants, instead of just those defined as highest risk.

The regulations would also give the Department of Homeland Security the power to review and approve plans devised by plant owners, to inspect facilities to determine compliance and to shut any noncompliant plants, according to a statement by Ms. Collins and Mr. King. To encourage Congress to enact more comprehensive regulations, they would expire after three years.

It is not yet clear that this language — which may be considered too stern by some Republicans and too relaxed by many Democrats — will be approved by the full conference committee, which is scheduled to meet Monday evening on the department's budget. The provisions on chemical plant regulations are supposed to be inserted in that bill, with the goal of final approval of the measure next week.

ID Program Will Cost States $11 Billion, Report Says (WP)

By Darryl Fears

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

The cost to consumers for helping to secure America became clearer yesterday as a coalition of state groups tallied the bill for implementing the Real ID Act and federal officials divulged the price that some of its workers must pay for new smart cards.

In a report released by the National Governors Association, the National Conference of State Legislatures and the American Association of Motor Vehicle Administrators, state motor vehicle officials estimated it would cost more than $11 billion over five years to implement the technology required by the Real ID Act.

Under the law, states must start to re-enroll about 250 million holders of U.S. driver's licenses after May 2008. The states must train workers to verify copies of original birth certificates, Social Security cards, marriage certificates and various identification documents.

"The days of going to the DMV and getting your license on the same day are probably over," said David Quam, director of federal relations for the National Governors Association. "You'll have to take all your documents as if you were applying for the first time. What this comes down to is that more people will be in DMV offices spending more time to get an ID."

The Real ID Act was passed last year to protect against terrorist infiltration and crack down on illegal immigration. Without the new identification, citizens will be barred from airplanes, sections of airports, and military bases and other federal facilities, unless they have another form of federally issued identification, such as a passport.

The report, "The Real ID Act: National Impact Analysis," does not say whether the cost of implementation will be passed on to drivers and holders of state identification cards. But Homeland Security officials said the price of similar new smart cards for 750,000 workers at ports and other transportation facilities will be about $140 each.

The State Department recently raised passport fees for adults to $97 to incorporate security into new e-passports, and a smart ID card for federal workers is expected to cost $100 to $150.

State officials have complained about the costs of Real ID since the law was passed. Re-enrolling drivers and other cardholders alone will cost about $8.5 billion, according to the report. An additional $2.5 billion will be spent to vet applicant information through various agencies, store the data and design new cards.

DOJ_NMG_0067159

House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), who introduced the Real ID Act, strongly disagreed with a similar cost estimate presented by the groups last year, saying it was bloated. The chairman cited a Congressional Budget Office report that estimated the cost of implementation at $100 million between 2005 and 2010.

According to the budget office report, the federal government would reimburse $20 million to states for implementing Real ID. State officials scoffed at that amount.

"Congress has not appropriated anywhere close to the money it takes to implement this law," Quam said.

In the report, DMV officials said the two-year timetable for issuing the new licenses was unrealistic. The report recommended that Congress extend the May 2008 deadline, create a 10-year schedule for ID re-enrollment and give states more money.

Yesterday's revelations about costs came as the House passed three more border security measures aimed at terrorist infiltrators and immigrants who sneak across the southern border in search of jobs.

The proposals would authorize federal prison time for those caught building or financing border tunnels, create tough new penalties for illegal-immigrant gang members and criminals, and grant explicit authority to local police officers to enforce federal immigration laws.

The final bill would also allow the immediate deportation of undocumented Salvadoran workers, who are currently protected under court decisions on asylum dating to El Salvador's civil war in the 1980s. The Washington area has one of the nation's highest populations of Salvadorans.

Staff writers Jonathan Weisman and Spencer Hsu contributed to this report.

Ex-Pan Am Workers Finally Will Get Paid (WT/AP)

By Vinnee Tong

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

NEW YORK -- In the 15 years since Pan American World Airways shut down, Anthony La Pera had assumed he would never get paid his leftover wages and accrued vacation. But Mr. La Pera and another 15,000 former employees can expect to open their mailboxes one day in December and find that a check has arrived, marking the end of the liquidation of an iconic airline.

In July, a federal bankruptcy judge authorized the Pan Am Corp. to distribute the money it had secured in a settlement with the government of Libya. Sending out those checks marks the end of a long process of winding down Pan Am.

"This is about as final as it can get," said Walter Curchack of the law firm Loeb & Loeb, which helped negotiate the settlement agreement on behalf of Pan Am.

The defunct Pan Am, which started in 1927 and helped create what was then a new industry, shut down on Dec. 4, 1991, after declaring bankruptcy that January. Among the last, fatal blows it suffered was the 1988 bombing of Flight 103, a now-infamous attack that ended with 270 dead when a bomb exploded on board as the plane flew over Lockerbie, Scotland.

In 2003, Libya accepted responsibility for the bombing and agreed to pay restitution to the victims. Pan Am's payments come from a separate settlement of a lawsuit its insurers brought against the Libyan government.

Mr. La Pera, 68, and other former employees recently received notices from Wells Fargo & Co., which is coordinating the distribution of about 43 percent of Pan Am's settlement money to former employees. Those who are eligible will get between 5 percent and 6 percent of what they were owed when the airline shut down in 1991.

For Mr. La Pera, that means he will get a check in the range of $1,250 to $1,800, because he was owed between $25,000 and $30,000 for accrued vacation and back pay.

"It's like found money, in effect, because nobody expected anything to come out of this," he said.

Richard Vieta, another former employee, remembers well the day the airline shut down: It was his birthday. And after the company folded, he was one of a small group of employees who remained to catalog and sell off pieces of the airline.

Mr. Vieta had worked at the airline nearly 30 years scheduling maintenance and tracking aircraft parts. His last year was spent at New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport's jet center and hangar No. 19, helping an auctioneer sell off parts from the disassembled planes.

DOJ_NMG_0067160

"What I think Pan Am demonstrates is that these are the unrecognized victims of the industry's problems -- people that did dedicate themselves to an employer for a long time and basically got left out," Mr. Curchack said.

Since the bankruptcy filing in late 1991, Mr. Curchack and others, including former Pan Am lawyer Paul Rendich, have worked to secure a settlement.

"This case has been literally, for the last 10 years, a sort of a matter of honor to many of the people involved in it," Mr. Curchack said. "It's a vindication in that there's some resolution for Pan Am and some of its employees, who felt they were personally attacked by the bombing of Flight 103."

Flight 103 was partially insured for $32 million in damage from acts of war or terror; the entire plane was valued at $67 million. The insurers paid $32 million to Pan Am, then pursued a civil case to recover damages from the Libyan government on behalf of the airline.

But because the civil lawsuit could not proceed until a related criminal one was resolved, there was little movement in the case for about a decade.

In the meantime, two Libyan agents, Abdel Basset Ali al-Megrahi and Lamen Khalifa Fhimah, were prosecuted under Scottish law through a court at The Hague for carrying out the bombing. In 2001, Mr. Fhimah was acquitted and al Megrahi convicted of murder.

As al-Megrahi's appeals wound down, representatives of the insurers and Pan Am began speaking to Libyan negotiators and their French lawyers about a settlement. The discussions intensified in 2004 and continued into 2005 by phone and at meetings in London, Paris and Tripoli.

Mr. Rendich, who had worked as a lawyer for Pan Am since the 1980s, said that at one point, the Libyans tried to pit Pan Am against its insurer and tried to blame the airline's closure on economic factors unrelated to the bombing.

The two sides finally reached a deal on Feb. 18, 2005, and the bankruptcy judge overseeing the case approved the deal a month later.

Minus certain fees and the portion of the settlement that goes to the insurers, Pan Am Corp. will have about $31 million to distribute among former employees, ticketholders, bank lenders, commercial vendors and other creditors.

An Agreement Is Formalized On Rebuilding At Ground Zero (NYT)

By Charles V. Bagli

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

Now, at long last, finally, for sure, the new framework for rebuilding at ground zero is in place. A firm deal was approved yesterday. Really. The developer Larry A. Silverstein is out of the Freedom Tower; the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey is in. The rent disputes are settled.

It took months to get to this point, after a tentative agreement was front-page news in April. Along the way, and with the diligent help of legions of lawyers, the 12-page “conceptual framework” of April mushroomed into 12 thick volumes.

Of course, no agreement or news conference at ground zero would be complete without some last-minute wrangling between Mr. Silverstein and, in this case, city officials.

They worked out their differences through clenched teeth yesterday afternoon, even if it was 90 minutes after the Port Authority board formally voted on the plan, described as a “global realignment” at ground zero.

That was followed by a celebratory, semi-secret news conference at the World Trade Center site with Gov. George E. Pataki, Deputy Mayor Daniel L. Doctoroff, Mr. Silverstein and members of the Port Authority. Most of the press missed it because the announcement went out minutes before it started.

The point of it all was to ratify the tentative April agreement. It ensures that four new office towers, including the $2.2 billion Freedom Tower, are to be built by 2012, along with a shopping mall, a $2.2 billion transit center and the $500 million memorial.

“The time has come to build this,” said Anthony R. Coscia, the authority’s chairman.

After all the delays, squabbling and security concerns of the past five years, there is progress. The Port Authority is building the transit center. Workers are excavating for the footings and foundations of the Freedom Tower and for the memorial.

DOJ_NMG_0067161

Under this agreement, the Port Authority has taken responsibility for the Freedom Tower and a second development site a block away. Mr. Silverstein, who leased the trade center complex from the Port Authority six weeks before it was destroyed, has responsibility for building three towers on the east side of the 16-acre site, along Church Street, by 2012.

The authority has agreed to excavate the sites for two towers by the end of 2007. It must provide the third site to Mr. Silverstein by mid-2008. If the authority, which plans to start running two 10-hour shifts at ground zero, fails to meet the schedule, it must pay him a $300,000-a-day penalty.

If Mr. Silverstein falls behind on even one of the towers, he risks losing them all.

The Port Authority agreed yesterday to lease 600,000 square feet in Tower 4 at $59 a square foot, not the $78 that Mr. Silverstein wanted. After hours of tense negotiations Wednesday night and yesterday morning, the city agreed to rent the same amount of space on lower floors for $56.50 a square foot. Mr. Silverstein also has the option of leasing it to corporate tenants at higher rates, if he can get them.

Last week, the federal and New York State governments tentatively agreed to lease 1 million square feet in the Freedom Tower, the tallest, most symbolic and most widely criticized skyscraper planned for ground zero.

Critics have questioned the decision to build 8.8 million square feet of office space in such a short time, and then to fill these expensive towers with public employees.

But officials praised the deal yesterday. “This is a historic event that details a specific financial plan for this massive rebuilding project, commits to deadlines for various milestones and moves us forward toward a swift completion date,” Governor Pataki said. “I’m extremely proud of the progress we have made so far.”

Mr. Silverstein said: “We need to keep building on this partnership so that together we can get the World Trade Center rebuilt.”

This doesn’t mean all the arguments and debates are over, or even that the Freedom Tower will be built.

As Mr. Coscia said yesterday, the actual plan for the tower “is not part of the agreement we’re executing today.” The Port Authority committed to building the Freedom Tower providing it has a viable financial plan that includes 1 million square feet of leases to anchor the building.

The tentative agreements with the state and federal government, Mr. Coscia said, are a significant step toward an “irrevocable contract.” But a lot can happen before a contract is signed.

There is also outstanding litigation with insurers over the $4.6 billion in insurance proceeds at ground zero. The money, including $973 million for the Freedom Tower, is needed for construction. So far, the insurers have paid only about $2.2 billion, and $1.6 billion has been spent.

The plan for the memorial has not been finished, nor has all the money been raised.

Still, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, who was in California yesterday, told reporters there: “It’s really a very good deal for everybody.”

Pact May Mean Rebuilding Delay At Ground Zero (WSJ)

By Alex Frangos

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Several buildings at Ground Zero may not be completed for another seven years -- a year longer than previously promised -- under terms of an agreement approved yesterday to rebuild the World Trade Center.

The pact between developer Larry Silverstein and the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the site, is the most definitive rebuilding blueprint to date. It divides control of development rights for the five planned towers at the site between Mr. Silverstein and the Port Authority. Mr. Silverstein will build three office skyscrapers on the east side of the site. The Port Authority will own the signature Freedom Tower, one other tower, and a shopping mall.

Amid the din of earth-moving equipment in the 90-foot-deep pit where the Twin Towers stood, New York Gov. George E. Pataki hailed the deal as "the last major hurdle toward the completed redevelopment of the World Trade Center site."

1 THE FOUR TOWERS

See a slideshow2 of architect's plans for three office towers to be built alongside the Freedom Tower.

Details of the pact show, however, that completion of Mr. Silverstein's three office towers may take longer than previously anticipated. He received a one-year "grace period" beyond the 2012 deadline earlier agreed upon, according to Port Authority Chairman Anthony Coscia. Should Mr. Silverstein fail to deliver the three skyscrapers by the new deadline, around the end of 2013, he could lose the properties entirely.

A Port Authority official said Mr. Silverstein's potential construction lenders were uncomfortable with the more-aggressive timeframe.

Construction of the Freedom Tower also remains uncertain. Tentative commitments with federal and state agencies to take space in the Freedom Tower must become actual leases, and Congress needs to approve the federal lease. Preliminary work on the Freedom Tower's foundation is continuing, and the lack of signed leases isn't likely to halt the project right away, but could affect its long-term prospects.

The City of New York agreed to take 581,000 square feet of office space in Mr. Silverstein's Tower 4, for a starting rent of $56.50 a square foot. The city's rent is 5% lower than a deal struck by the Port Authority for the same building because the city is taking lower floors. Mr. Silverstein has an option to cancel the city's lease over the next two years if he finds higher-paying tenants.

Some issues that could halt development remain unresolved, most notably several lawsuits against the Twin Towers' insurers.

WAR NEWS:

Bush To Meet Presidents Of Pakistan And Afghanistan (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The survival of Afghanistan's fragile government in the face of a resurgent Taliban threat will be high on the agenda for President Bush and the presidents of Pakistan and Afghanistan in a series of White House meetings starting Friday.

While the White House credits Pakistan for helping to capture or kill more Al Qaeda operatives than any other country since the attacks of Sept. 11, it worries about support that Pakistan's unruly regions provide for Taliban fighters intent on unseating the government of Afghan President Hamid Karzai.

The White House is counting on Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf to prevail upon tribal leaders to prevent foreign fighters from crossing into Afghanistan.

The White House sessions, starting with a meeting between Bush and Musharraf on Friday, could serve to underscore what one analyst calls a "sweet and sour" relationship between their two countries, once at odds over Pakistani nuclear ambitions but now allies in a war against terrorism. After Bush plays host to Karzai on Tuesday, the administration plans a meeting of all three leaders Wednesday.

"Afghanistan is the issue that is of the greatest danger for the U.S.-Pakistan relationship," says Teresita Schaffer, director for South Asia at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "Because we have been working at cross-purposes. Afghanistan is the one place where you could have Pakistani-supported forces coming into conflict with U.S. soldiers."

Although Musharraf has called the Taliban a greater threat to security than Al Qaeda because of the popular support it enjoys, the Pakistani leader— whose government once supported the Taliban — has made accommodations with its operatives based along the border within his own country.

The White House is counting on Musharraf to work with tribal leaders to prevent foreign fighters from crossing the border, to make those tribal leaders "part of the solution rather than part of the problem" and get them "to put pressure on people to lay down arms and behave," spokesman Tony Snow said Thursday. "That's going to be something which is going to be under discussion" Friday.

Analysts say it is imperative that this message is underscored in the meetings among Bush, Musharraf and Karzai.

DOJ_NMG_0067163

"If they do things right, they will use the Bush-Musharraf meeting to set up the trilateral [meeting] to make it real clear that the U.S. is very concerned about what Pakistan is doing in Afghanistan," said Schaffer, a former assistant secretary of state for South Asia who served in several U.S. embassies there.

Noting the troubling "relationship between the Pakistani government and the extremist organizations," Schaffer said, "I am quite convinced that the policy of the Pakistani government is to manage these organizations, rather than put them out of business. And I am not sure that that's a balancing act that's sustainable."

U.S. and NATO forces are attempting to protect the Afghan government against a violent uprising of the Taliban, who were toppled in a U.S.-led invasion in 2002 but whose key ally, Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, was not captured.

Since then, bin Laden and other Al Qaeda leaders are believed to have secured refuge in Pakistan, which also has harbored other terrorists, including some of those believed responsible for a recently thwarted plot to hijack several airliners bound from Britain to the U.S.

While Musharraf has been praised for democratic reforms since taking control of Pakistan in a military coup in 1999, including election of a parliament that has confirmed his presidency and promises new elections next year, he also has been faulted for failing to secure a vast and violent border region whose rebels threaten not only him but also his neighbor.

"The unfortunate history of our region has placed Pakistan in the front line of the global campaign against terrorism," Musharraf said in an address to the United Nations this week.

"Afghanistan confronts complex security, political and economic challenges, including a resurgent Taliban, who also threaten Pakistan's efforts against extremism and terrorism," Musharraf told the UN. "Problems along the bordering regions of Pakistan and Afghanistan are compounded by the continuing presence in Pakistan of over 3 million Afghan refugees, some of them sympathetic to the Taliban."

Bush credited Pakistan with capturing or killing "hundreds of Al Qaeda terrorists" when he met with Musharraf earlier this year in Islamabad, and the two leaders spent "a good while" talking about "the work that needs to be done."

The president is confident, Snow said, that Musharraf will "complete the job" in going after Al Qaeda operatives "and people sympathetic to the Taliban."

Yet the Bush administration remains concerned about nuclear technology that a network once run by A.Q. Khan, the mastermind of Pakistan's own nuclear bomb development, has provided for Iran, Libya and other nations. The U.S. had imposed sanctions against Pakistan after discovering its clandestine nuclear program in 1990 and tightened sanctions after Pakistan tested a nuclear bomb in 1998 in response to India's bomb testing and the Pakistani military coup of October 1999.

John Bolton, U.S. ambassador to the UN, this week cited blueprints for uranium hemispheres that Khan's network provided for Iran as evidence that Iran's nuclear enrichment program is aimed at bomb-building rather than civilian nuclear power. The casting of uranium into hemispheric shapes forms the core of a nuclear bomb.

"There's only one use of uranium metal formed in the hemisphere, and that's to form a nuclear weapon," Bolton told CNN. "Nothing to do with peaceful uses of nuclear power."

The U.S. lifted its sanctions against Pakistan and resumed military assistance — $3 billion promised over five years — after Musharraf's show of U.S. support after 9/11.

Bush To Press Afghan, Pakistani Leaders On Terror Issues (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON - Faced with a bloody Taliban resurgence in Afghanistan, President Bush over the next several days will be prodding leaders from Afghanistan and Pakistan to work together against Islamic extremists.

The diplomatic arm-twisting comes at a particularly challenging time in a region that remains a spawning ground for international terrorism. In Afghanistan, a Taliban military offensive is testing the viability of the U.S.-backed government in Kabul. Neighboring Pakistan continues to serve as a haven for Taliban operatives and al-Qaida terrorists.

"The real war on terror is going on in Afghanistan, and, frankly, it's not at all clear that we're winning," said William Milam, a former U.S. ambassador to Pakistan. "Pakistan could help by keeping the Taliban out of there."

DOJ_NMG_0067164

Bush is sure to deliver a similar message to Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf when they meet in the Oval Office on Friday. He'll also press Musharraf for information on the search for Osama bin Laden, the al-Qaida leader who's believed to be operating in the Afghanistan-Pakistan border region.

Engaging in shuttle diplomacy from the comfort of the White House, Bush will meet Tuesday with Afghan President Hamid Karzai before welcoming both leaders to a three-way summit over dinner on Wednesday. It could be a heartburn-inducing meal.

"Karzai and Musharraf do not like each other," said Stephen Cohen, a South Asia specialist at the Brookings Institution. "Our influence with both is declining."

Barnett Rubin, a South Asia expert at New York University's Center on International Cooperation, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee Thursday that Pakistan has become "the global center of terrorism." He said Bush should use a "big diplomatic stick" to force Musharraf to shut down the Taliban's headquarters in Quetta, a provincial capital.

"The government of Pakistan has done virtually nothing to disrupt the command and control of the Taliban, which is based in Pakistan," Rubin told the Senate panel. "The destabilization of Afghanistan, insofar as it's coming from abroad, is coming from Pakistan, regardless of the fact that President Musharraf speaks good English, wears a suit and says things that we like to hear."

Karzai has complained repeatedly that Musharraf isn't doing enough to keep Islamic extremists from using Pakistan as a base for attacks in Afghanistan. Pakistan was one of three countries, along with Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, that recognized the Taliban regime when it served as al-Qaida's government sponsor in Afghanistan.

Musharraf switched sides after the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, but critics say he's been a less-than-stalwart ally in the war on terrorism - despite an infusion of more than $3 billion in U.S. aid to Pakistan since his conversion.

Although Pakistan has captured some well-known al-Qaida members, including Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged Sept. 11 mastermind, it hasn't arrested a single Taliban leader.

On Thursday, Marine Gen. James Jones, NATO's top military commander, confirmed that the Taliban leadership is directing the insurgency from Quetta, the capital of a Pakistani province.

Musharraf recently pulled his troops back into their barracks in the border region for what he said were promises from separatists to halt infiltration into Afghanistan. But Western diplomats in Kabul said the deal has effectively ceded the region to the militants.

Musharraf, who has survived multiple assassination attempts, bristles at suggestions that he's soft on terrorism. During a visit to the United Nations earlier this week, he suggested that Afghanistan is exporting extremists to his country.

Musharraf said Pakistan has been burdened with 3 million Afghan refugees, "some of them sympathetic to the Taliban." He blamed the Taliban's resurgence on home-grown Afghan extremists.

"Where were they from, Pakistan?" he asked sarcastically. "Certainly they were from Afghanistan. They were the people of Afghanistan who took over Afghanistan under (Taliban leader) Mullah Omar."

Bush has tussled with both leaders over military operations in their countries. He rebuffed Karzai's efforts last year to assert more Afghan control over U.S. military operations. Bush and Musharraf differed publicly this week over whether the United States could attack bin Laden in Pakistan without involving the Pakistani military.

Bush told CNN on Wednesday that he "absolutely" would send U.S. forces into Pakistan if he had good information on bin Laden's whereabouts. When asked for his reaction, Musharraf told reporters, "We wouldn't like to allow that at all. We will do it ourselves."

Pakistan Official Defends Truce (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

Pakistan's point man on a truce with tribal elders along the country's restive border with Afghanistan yesterday rejected charges that the agreement would undermine the fight against Islamic extremists.

Gov. Ali Muhammad Jan Aurakzai of North West Frontier Province also criticized the United States for being slow to deliver on critical military equipment and support needed to combat Taliban fighters.

DOJ_NMG_0067165

Mr. Aurakzai, who was a corps commander in the border region when the United States invaded Afghanistan, said the agreement he had helped hammer out with tribal leaders of North Waziristan was part of a broader strategy to keep terrorists out.

"It's not just a peace agreement. It is a larger strategy with a military arm, a political arm and a reconstruction arm," Mr. Aurakzai told editors and reporters at The Washington Times yesterday. The government planned to pump $2 billion into the tribal areas over the next nine years for "massive development," he said.

Top officials in both Afghanistan and the United States are skeptical of the deal and of Islamabad's overall commitment to the war on terror. The officials fear that Taliban fighters will continue to use Pakistan as a safe haven, harbored by tribal leaders.

The Taliban rulers of Afghanistan gave refuge to Osama bin Laden and other al Qaeda leaders until the September 11, 2001, attacks, and Pakistan was one of the regime's closest allies. Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf said he decided to cooperate with Washington in the war on terror following a U.S. threat to bomb his country.

In an interview with the CBS news magazine show "60 Minutes" that will air Sunday, Gen. Musharraf said then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage had conveyed the U.S. threat to Pakistan's intelligence chief.

"The intelligence director told me that [Mr. Armitage] said, 'Be prepared to be bombed. Be prepared to go back to the Stone Age,'" Gen. Musharraf said. "One has to think and take actions in the interests of the nation, and that's what I did."

Mr. Armitage was not immediately available for comment. A Bush administration official said there would be no comment on a "reported conversation between Mr. Armitage and a Pakistani official."

But the official said, "After 9/11, Pakistan made a strategic decision to join the war on terror and has since been a steadfast partner in that effort. Pakistan's commitment to this important endeavor has not wavered and our partnership has widened as a result."

Mr. Aurakzai said that despite having 80,000 Pakistani troops currently deployed along 375 miles of border with Afghanistan, there were still areas that people could crawl through.

"You cannot rule out the possibility of infiltration through the gaps and those have to be monitored through electronic intelligence and that [should come] from our friends -- we don't have the means," Mr. Aurakzai said.

He accused the United States of dragging its feet on Pakistan's requests for more help in trying to control the treacherous border terrain, including night-vision equipment, sensors and attack helicopters.

"There is an urgency when we are asked to do something -- then it is the day before yesterday." But Washington's response "is terribly slow, there is no urgency," he said.

The governor acknowledged Taliban members were an integral part of the tribal society of Pakistan and that foreign fighters from the 1979-89 war against the Soviet Union were still living in the area.

But he insisted they would conform to the terms of the Sept. 5 agreement which bans all cross-border movement except for "easement" rights for tribes divided by the border.

If successful, the agreement with the tribes in North Waziristan could be replicated in the more restive South Waziristan, and even Afghanistan, Mr. Aurakzai said.

President Bush in a television interview Wednesday expressed his wariness about the Pakistan deal, and said he would send forces into Pakistan to capture or kill al Qaeda leaders if intelligence tracked them into that country.

"We have made it clear that [Gen. Musharraf] should not provide an environment that enables people to go from his country into Afghanistan," Mr. Bush said.

Mr. Bush is to meet with Gen. Musharraf in Washington today, and hold a joint meeting with Gen. Musharraf and Afghan President Hamid Karzai on Tuesday to discuss Taliban and al Qaeda activities on the border areas.

Mr. Aurakzai rejected suggestions that his country was providing refuge to insurgents.

"The trouble started in Afghanistan. They have been exaggerating things out of proportion. They have been covering their own mistakes," he said.

Congress Stalls On Minimum Wage, Tribunals And Other Key Issues (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0067166

CONGRESS FALTERS on resolving critical issues.

Even amid progress on military tribunals, chances fade for granting Bush more leeway on wiretaps. Prospects wane for pairing minimum-wage increase with incentives for small-business health coverage.

Despite calls from vulnerable House Republicans -- and paltry congressional job-approval ratings -- lawmakers are unlikely to raise Medicare payments to physicians since financing possibilities rankle "whoever's ox is gored," a Republican aide says.

Promoting book on Congress,"The Broken Branch," co-author Norm Ornstein calls gridlock a "gift that keeps on giving."

LACKLUSTER FUND RAISING clouds Republican Senate hopes.

Though Democrats face uphill climb for six-seat gain, Republican strategists fear opposing campaign committee's $12 million cash edge heightens chances of an upset. Defenders of Sen. Dole, who heads up Republican committee, cite cash competition from 2008 presidential wannabes Frist and McCain.

Democrats believe Menendez of New Jersey is their only incumbent at risk, though they dismiss talk of replacing him on ballot with Rep. Andrews. After scare from antiwar left, incumbent Cantwell in Washington leads Republican challenger McGavick. In Maryland, Democrats grudgingly credit Republican Steele for effective, offbeat ads, but count on state's blue tint to elect moderate Rep. Cardin to succeed retiring Sarbanes.

WHITE HOUSE FRETS about Afghanistan before Bush meets with Karzai.

The president praises Afghan counterpart, but senior officials worry Karzai isn't strong enough to quell Taliban threat. He hasn't wrested power from warlords or extended his reach much beyond Kabul.

Karzai blames Pakistan, straining relations with its President Musharraf. Administration officials were surprised by Pakistan's cease-fire agreement with Taliban-linked militants; they privately share Karzai's belief that Muslim extremist groups are using Pakistan as a base.

White House won't press Pakistan publicly now, fearing further reduction in Musharraf's antiterror cooperation.

ZOELLICK'S EXIT from State Department gives Paulson more running room on international economics, since Zoellick had previously been trade representative. Though predecessor Snow traveled to Ohio battleground during 2004 campaign, Paulson swears off political travel, saying, "The president wants me to be secretary of the Treasury."

UNITED? Though most countries agree U.N. Security Council needs more than five countries with veto, three of those with that power dissent for different reasons. U.S. wants Japan to join that club, but only after U.N. reforms. Russia and China fear their prestige would be diluted in larger group.

SPITZER WILL JOIN actor Martin Sheen for October fund-raising clambake at Kennedy family compound in Hyannis Port, Mass. Event will swell coffers of Ted Kennedy son Patrick, a Rhode Island House member occupied lately with recovery from prescription-drug addiction.

GENERATION GAP? Democratic insiders worry about age of those slated for important chairmanships if House changes hands. Dingell of Energy and Commerce is 80 years old, Conyers of Judiciary is 77, and Rangel of Ways and Means is 76 -- each more than a decade older than Republican chairman. But attempts to leapfrog veterans would trigger infighting and look unlikely.

ADMINISTRATION FACES congressional resistance to Vietnam trade pact.

Textile-friendly Republican Sens. Dole of North Carolina and Graham of South Carolina resist letting Vietnam join WTO. They warn trade representative Schwab of "large-scale job losses in both our states" and seek limits on Vietnamese apparel exports to U.S.

"We're looking for some way for the industry to defend itself," says industry advocate Cass Johnson. To soothe domestic companies, Commerce Department official Lavin visits North Carolina textile executives.

After returning from China, Paulson will meet with Sen. Schumer, who may seek floor action on tariff bill.

MINOR MEMOS: Former NFL quarterback Heath Shuler, battling Republican Rep. Taylor in North Carolina, says he's happy his children aren't old enough to understand negative TV ads. ... Brad Meltzer, author of best-selling terror-themed novel "The Book of Fate," says Americans crave politicians like reluctant-hero Spider-Man to battle al Qaeda.

Taliban's Gains Forestall U.S. Troop Reductions In Afghanistan (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson, Washington Post Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0067167

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

The U.S. military plans no troop cuts in Afghanistan before March, as fighting intensifies against Taliban forces that have gained influence in a political and security "vacuum" in the southern part of the country, according to a senior U.S. commander.

"Our troop levels in Afghanistan will remain about steady through . . . February," said Lt. Gen. Karl W. Eikenberry, who leads the Combined Forces Command in Afghanistan. There are approximately 20,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan, the highest number since the U.S.-led invasion in October 2001 to overthrow the Taliban government.

Eikenberry said Taliban fighters and extremists have grown more numerous, organized and determined in some parts of the south and southeast, where foreign troops were limited and the Afghan government was weak.

"You do have challenges where Taliban has moved into an area you could perhaps call a vacuum, or at least very weak governance," Eikenberry said at a Pentagon news conference. "In some areas there are more Taliban extremists than there were at this point last year. And within some areas they . . . demonstrated better command-and-control and they're fighting harder."

Yet a more robust Taliban is still no match for U.S. and NATO troops and 76,000 Afghan security forces, Eikenberry said. "Wherever our forces go, wherever NATO forces go, increasingly wherever the ANA, the Afghan National Army, goes, then the enemy is defeated and they disappear," he said.

The primary challenge in Afghanistan is not military but rather one of extending the reach of the central government and bolstering economic development, Eikenberry said.

Nevertheless, he said, Afghanistan's burgeoning drug trade presents a fundamental threat that could ultimately undermine both the U.S. military mission and the nation's government. The sheer scale of the drug trafficking and the money involved creates "the prospect of absolute corruption of the government," he said, as well as the likelihood that drug money will fund terrorism.

The contingent of U.S. troops in Afghanistan has swelled in recent years partly because far more American soldiers -- about 5,000 now -- are in the country training Afghan security forces. An additional 2,000 are doing logistical work or providing manpower for12 Provincial Reconstruction Teams (PRTs) that are assisting local Afghan officials with rebuilding, he said.

The U.S. military is also keeping troop levels steady as NATO prepares to take over another contentious region -- eastern Afghanistan along the Pakistan border -- by the end of this year.

As a member of NATO, the United States will remain the biggest provider of troops in Afghanistan and will retain the lead role in combating terrorist leaders and groups such as al-Qaeda. Asked about the politically sensitive issue of waging strikes against Osama bin Laden or other terrorist leaders across the border in Pakistan, Eikenberry said he has the "authority and flexibility to take the fight to international terrorism."

"We will maintain our strong national capability in support of counterterrorism missions to strike al-Qaeda and its associated movements wherever and whenever they are found," he said in an opening statement.

Pakistani Leader Says Armitage Made Bomb Threat (USAT/AP)

USA Today, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf says a State Department official threatened to bomb his country "back to the Stone Age" after the Sept. 11 attacks if he did not help the U.S. war on terrorism.

The threat was delivered by Richard Armitage, who at the time was deputy secretary of State, to Musharraf's intelligence director, the Pakistani leader told CBS' 60 Minutes.

"The intelligence director told me that (Armitage) said, 'Be prepared to be bombed. Be prepared to go back to the Stone Age,' " Musharraf said in an interview to be broadcast Sunday. "I think it was a very rude remark," Musharraf told reporter Steve Kroft.

By agreeing to cooperate with the United States, Musharraf said, he reacted responsibly. "One has to think and take actions in the interests of the nation, and that is what I did," he said.

Armitage disputed the language attributed to him but did not deny his message was a strong one, 60 Minutes said.

The former deputy secretary of State could not be reached immediately Thursday by the Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0067168

Julie Reside, a State Department spokeswoman, declined to comment on the reported conversation between Armitage and the Pakistani official. “We are referring all questions to Mr. Armitage,” she said.

Pakistan has been a close ally in the war on terrorism, Reside said.

“We are continuing to work cooperatively with them and in the process are broadening our bilateral relationship,” Reside said.

The relationship has shown signs of strain. Pakistan vowed Thursday not to let foreign forces enter its territory, a day after President Bush told CNN he would “absolutely” order American military action inside the country if Osama bin Laden were found hiding there.

In a speech in January 2002, four months after the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, Musharraf gave a speech in which he clearly came down on the side of reform at home and opposition to Islamic fundamentalism.

In recent months, though, as the Taliban insurgency has intensified in Afghanistan, Pakistan has shown a reluctance to go after militants taking refuge in the rugged, mountainous region along its 1,500-mile border with Afghanistan.

Earlier this month, Musharraf's government struck a deal with tribal leaders along the border. It requires them to expel foreign al-Qaeda fighters in return for the release of tribesmen arrested in sweeps for Islamic militants.

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., one of the deal's many critics, accused Pakistan of “turning a blind eye to the Taliban high command” operating on its soil.

Musharraf is scheduled to meet with Bush today at the White House. The two leaders are scheduled to get together again next week in a three-way meeting with Afghan President Hamid Karzai.

$70B OK'd For Iraq And Afghan War Funds (AP-Y)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, September 22, 2006

House-Senate negotiators Thursday approved a new $70 billion infusion for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan as they wrapped up talks on a $447 billion Pentagon funding bill.

The additional war funds would bring the total approved by Congress for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan since Sept. 11, 2001, to more than $500 billion, with another installment likely to come next spring.

At the same time, the White House beat back an attempt by Republicans on the appropriations committees to take an additional $2 billion from defense programs to ease cuts to domestic programs such as education and grants to local governments.

The bill would be the first of 11 spending bills to clear Congress for the budget year beginning Oct. 1. With progress so slow on other bills — the homeland security bill is the only other spending measure likely to pass before Congress adjourns next week to campaign for fall elections — the Pentagon measure will also carry a stopgap funding bill to keep open agencies whose funding bills won't have passed.

The defense measure is certain to enjoy sweeping support in Congress despite widespread anxiety about how well the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan are going. Even opponents of the war tend to support the measure because it supports U.S. troops in harm's way.

"The troops are stretched thin," said Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania, the top Democrat on the House Appropriations Defense Subcommittee. "We're not making progress."

Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, said the $70 billion infusion for Iraq and Afghanistan operations will fund the war "at least until May, but we hope beyond that."

The bill provides for a 2.2 percent pay increase for the military as President Bush requested in his February budget.

The measure would cut about $2 billion from Bush's request for procurement of new weapons systems, providing $81 billion. Almost $11 billion of that would be used to build eight ships, including two DD(X) destroyers. That is significant because it would allow Bath Iron Works in Maine and Northrop Grumman's Ingalls Shipbuilding in Mississippi to build one ship each.

A House-passed defense policy bill had called for only one DD(X) ship, to be built in Mississippi.

DOJ_NMG_0067169

The final House-Senate agreement also largely restores cuts made by the Senate from the Army's request of more than $3.5 billion for the Future Combat System. The service's key weapons program is expected to produce more than a dozen manned and unmanned vehicles and aircraft for combat.

The bill also contains good news for lawmakers from California and Missouri, who won a total of 22 C-17 cargo planes, including seven added in end-stage talks. That is expected to keep manufacturing lines open for about an additional year despite the Air Force's wish to end production with the completion of a 180-plane inventory.

The C-17 is built in Long Beach, Calif., but several components are assembled at Boeing's St. Louis-based defense company.

Negotiations on the bill demonstrated the flexibility with which the Congress and the White House treat budget limits set on the Pentagon. The bill was originally supposed to carry $50 billion for Iraq and Afghanistan, but that figure jumped after lawmakers heard about rapidly deteriorating Army and Marine Corps readiness caused as equipment has worn out in harsh overseas conditions.

The bill cuts about $4 billion from Bush's request for core defense programs in order to ease White House cuts to domestic programs. The original Senate bill had proposed a $9 billion shift, provoking a veto threat.

An attempt by House and Senate appropriators to settle on a $5.9 billion transfer to domestic programs was scuttled by the White House and House and Senate GOP leaders.

But senators from western states succeeded in preserving $200 million of $275 million added by the Senate to combat wildfires.

House-Senate Panel Approves Defense Budget (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- House-Senate negotiators approved a $447.4 billion Pentagon budget including $70 billion in emergency funds for the war in Iraq and to begin the rebuilding of Army and Marine units worn down by the conflict.

Together with prior appropriations for Iraq, the total U.S. commitment will now approach $375 billion, and final concessions to the White House could squeeze billions from domestic spending bills delayed until after the November elections.

The action came as Republican leaders gave their reluctant blessing to a pre-election deal that tacitly recognizes the practice of individuals' bringing cheaper prescription drugs for personal use into the U.S. from Canada. Customs officers would be barred from preventing persons re-entering the U.S. with medicines, as long as the drugs were carried on their person and in limited quantities, such as filling a prescription for as long as three months.

The compromise should help expedite final action next week on a second major spending bill funding the Department of Homeland Security for the new fiscal year that begins Oct. 1. But it represents a significant breach in the tight alliance between Republicans and the drug industry, which remains a major source financial support for House and Senate campaigns.

Asked if he was pleased with the deal, House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) said bluntly: "No. But it looks like that's where we're going." The Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, which had assumed the proposal would be killed, was clearly upset with the outcome.

"If I were PhRMA, I wouldn't make a fight on this," said Rep. Jo Ann Emerson (R., Mo.), who had won an even broader amendment in the House earlier this year. Mail order, Internet sales and persons in the business of importing drugs wouldn't be covered by the exemption, and the drugs covered would have to be medicines approved by the Food and Drug Administration and not controlled substances.

But Ken Johnson, a senior vice president for PhRMA, said "We are adamantly opposed to importation for safety reasons." The group argues that counterfeit drugs represent a growing multibillion-dollar market in Canada and hazard to Americans that the FDA can't supervise in these circumstances.

Together, the defense and homeland-security budgets, are two of the last major legislative packages Republicans hope to complete before sending members home next week to campaign, and each will be used to carry additional legislation.

DOJ_NMG_0067170

The defense bill, for example, will incorporate a stopgap funding bill to keep domestic agencies operating through Nov. 17, buying time for a lame-duck session after the elections. And the $34.8 billion homeland-security measure could become a vehicle for enacting new legislation announced last night giving the department authority to require high-risk chemical plants to carry out security measures and be shut down, potentially, if they don't comply.

Even as talks continued on the homeland bill, the House was churning out new immigration-related measures yesterday that it wants to add to the package. Senators have complained of the procedures, but Mr. Hastert was unswayed. "You have to look at the bigger good," he said. "It's good stuff. It makes sense."

The Pentagon bill has its own quota of "stuff" as well, but it is most important for its sheer volume of money. The greatest share of the $70 billion in emergency funds would go to pay for personnel and operations overseas. And an additional $6 billion is provided for weapons-procurement accounts, including funds for 10 C-17 cargo aircraft built by Boeing Co. (See related article1.)

The measure provides $1.4 billion to fully fund the purchase of 20 F-22 fighter aircraft, but to cover this cost, Lockheed Martin's F-35 Joint Strike Fighter program appears to face a 40% cut in production funds. Instead of being able to buy five planes in the coming year, the Air Force would have money for just two, and the advanced procurement would also be trimmed back to 12. Within shipbuilding accounts, the Navy is promised $2.6 billion to begin production of two DDX destroyers, and Gulf Coast shipyards are expected to benefit from the addition of $117 million for an oceanographic research vessel.

--Anna Wilde Mathews contributed to this article.

GOP Leaders Work Out Deal On Defense Spending (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — With national security looming as a major issue in approaching midterm elections, Republican congressional leaders agreed Thursday to a new defense spending bill that would push the price tag for the war on terrorism above $470 billion.

The agreement on the 2007 defense appropriations bill — expected to be approved by the full House and Senate next week — spares Republicans the embarrassment of leaving Washington without funding the cash-strapped military.

But it marked another grim milestone for wars in Iraq and Afghanistan that by one estimate have already cost two-thirds as much as the Vietnam War, which lasted more than twice as long as the current conflicts have so far.

The prolonged and difficult negotiations over next year's Pentagon funding underscored the financial toll of war-related costs on other military-related services.

On the same day Republican leaders hammered out their agreement, advocates for military families came to Capitol Hill to talk about cutbacks in military-base libraries, child-care centers and other services for armed forces personnel and their kin.

"Our families are not whiners … but they are worried," said Joyce Wessel Raezer, a lobbyist for the National Military Family Assn.

"Our deployed service members want to know their families are being taken care of."

Before the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, Bush administration officials repeatedly said Iraq's oil wealth ultimately would pay for the reconstruction of the country.

Yet the U.S. government continues to bear the financial burden of the ongoing conflict in Iraq. And increasingly, reports suggest skyrocketing costs are seriously straining the military.

Senior House Democrats in recent months have spotlighted how military units in this country often don't have enough equipment to be combat-ready and that base commanders have had to scrimp to pay utility bills.

Army officials have described cutting back on personnel travel, freezing new contracts and taking other measures to make it to the next funding period.

At the same time, congressional Republican leaders have been under increasing pressure from some of their own members not to cut popular domestic programs.

DOJ_NMG_0067171

"It's the return of the guns-and-butter debate," said Bryan Riedl, a senior policy analyst at the conservative Heritage Foundation think tank, referring to the Lyndon B. Johnson administration's struggle to maintain large domestic expenditures as the costs of the Vietnam War escalated.

This year, the Senate cut $9 billion from its version of the president's proposed defense budget, in part to pay for domestic programs. The Senate vote prompted a veto threat from the Bush administration and weeks of tough negotiations.

In the end, congressional leaders agreed Thursday to cut the defense appropriations bill by $4 billion, as House leaders had proposed, bringing its price tag to $428 billion for the fiscal year that starts Oct. 1.

Although spending breakdowns have not yet been disclosed, the deal reportedly will pay for an additional 22 C-17 military cargo planes, which may delay Boeing's plans to close the Long Beach factory that produces the jets.

Congressional leaders plan to augment the military budget with an emergency infusion of $70 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

That would follow a $65.8-billion emergency allocation in June and more than $50 billion in emergency funding in December, as well as other such supplements since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11.

The Bush administration defends the system of emergency funding as necessary during wartime.

"The nature of the war on terror continues to make it difficult to predict with precision future funding needs," Office of Management and Budget spokesman Scott Milburn said Thursday.

But the practice has drawn increasing criticism from members of both parties.

"There seems to be an unwillingness to be real," said Rep. David L. Hobson (R-Ohio), a member of the House Appropriations Committee. "We need to really be straightforward about what we're funding and where it's coming from."

Democrats: War Forces Army To Cut Back On Base Operations (MCT)

By Drew Brown

McClatchy Newspapers, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Army is $500 million short of the money it needs to operate its bases this year because of the war in Iraq, forcing many posts to cut back on training, force protection and family support programs, House Democrats said Thursday.

Since June, some Army installations have had to close mess halls, reduce training time and cut back on ammunition, equipment, food and fuel to non-deploying units. Funds for family support activities, including child care, gyms, bus services and other programs have also been cut, hurting morale for families whose loved ones are fighting overseas, the congressional Democrats said at a press conference.

The Bush administration failed to anticipate the Army's needs and budget enough money to cover those expenditures, the group said. The Democrats called for a congressional investigation.

"You can't expect to fight an extended war without paying for it," said Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., the ranking Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee. "Cutting services that support soldiers and their families is shortsighted and just plain wrong. We should not be rewarding their service this way."

The problem has been building for several years, with the Army under-funding its base operations accounts. When fiscal year 2006 started last October, the Army had only 69 percent of the funds it needed for activities ranging from cutting grass and building maintenance to paying civilian workers to man security gates and equipment warehouses.

The Army was counting on money from the Bush administration's $72 billion emergency defense spending request to help cover those activities, but when Congress failed to pass the bill before the Memorial Day recess, belt-tightening began.

Army Vice Chief of Staff Gen. Richard Cody warned in a memo in May that unless Congress passed the bill, the Army would have to cut back on spare parts and supplies and cancel travel and training, and in June it would have to stop hiring civilians and let temporary workers go.

Even when Congress approved $94 billion in emergency war spending in June, including $722 million for Army base operations, the Army was still $500 million short of the total it needed, according to the House Democrats.

Army spokesman Dave Foster said Thursday that he had no immediate comment on the Democrats' analysis of the shortfall.

DOJ_NMG_0067172

In testimony to Congress during the summer, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, testified that the Army needed a larger annual budget to address all of its needs.

For 2007, the Army has requested $5.2 billion in base operating funds and $17 billion to replace equipment damaged, worn out or lost in the war.

Skelton said the war has become a "black hole for resources" that is "sapping the non-deployed forces in order to support units in combat."

Rep. Vic Snyder, D-Ark., said cutting back on base services sends the wrong message to the men and women who are fighting overseas. It says "that even in a time of war that their country doesn't care about them," he said.

Rep. Silvestre Reyes, D-Texas, said Congress needs to exert more oversight and come up with ways of fixing the problem.

"At a time when they're fighting for us, and we're treating them this shabbily, that's unconscionable," Reyes said.

Joyce Raezer, director of government relations for the National Military Family Association, said troops serving in Iraq and Afghanistan want to know that their families are being taken care of back home. But she said indications are that services at many bases at getting worse, not better.

"Our families aren't whiners," she said. "They'll accept a certain amount of sacrifice to support their service member, but they're worried about the trend that seems to be developing."

Casey: Iraq War Becoming Internal Fight (AP-Y)

By Elena Becatoros, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 22, 2006

The conflict in Iraq is changing from a fight against U.S.-led coalition forces to an internal struggle for political and economic power, the top U.S. general in Iraq told The Associated Press in an interview Thursday.

Gen. George Casey acknowledged the security situation has become more difficult in the past few months, and said Iraqi leaders must find common ground on key issues if progress is to be made.

"We're starting to see this conflict here transition from an insurgency against us to a struggle for the division of political and economic power among the Iraqis," Casey told the AP.

The general made the comments as he finished a visit to a northern Baghdad neighborhood to talk with local officials about an operation aimed at curbing violence in the capital.

Maj. Gen. Bashar Mahmood Ayoub, commander of the 9th Iraqi army, said the situation has deteriorated in recent months.

"These days, the violence is worse and the politicians are not supporting us," Ayoub told the AP. He said it was up to political leaders to resolve the security situation, adding that the army could do nothing further for now.

Casey acknowledged the difficulties.

"I think the security situation is more complex and more difficult than it was in December '05," when Iraq held general elections.

The February bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra, 60 miles north of Baghdad, led to a surge of violence.

"It's why I think it probably is somewhat more complex than it was back in December," Casey said. "But it's peaked and it's come down again."

The general flew from the fortified Green Zone in the center of the city to visit the Shaab and Azamiyah neighborhoods, where Iraqi and U.S. forces have been conducting searches as part of Operation Together Forward.

Reducing violence in the capital is crucial to any possible success in Iraq, Casey said.

Baghdad is "critical in the overall campaign. In military parlance we would say it's the center of gravity for the country," he said. "Everybody knows that. The bad guys know it, we know it, the Iraqis know it. So we have to help the Iraqis secure their capital if they're going to go forward. And I think they're committed to doing that."

The operation is designed to clear the capital neighborhood by neighborhood, with security forces cordoning off areas and searching all buildings.

DOJ_NMG_0067173

"The whole thought process here is to target the worst neighborhoods where the killings and the violence was the greatest, clear them out, impose Iraqi security forces back into the areas and then follow with economic reconstruction so that you keep the people looking ahead and not looking back," Casey said.

Col. Mike Shields, commander of the 172nd Stryker Brigade which is conducting much of the security operation in the capital, said his men were searching and clearing 1,000 to 3,000 buildings a day.

In Shaab, local officials said the operation was mostly working. But there were some complaints. They included problems with deliveries of water, and access by teachers and doctors to some areas.

Part of the security operation is the creation of physical barriers around the city — in the form of berms, trenches and roadblocks — to funnel traffic entering and leaving Baghdad through 28 checkpoints. Viewed from the air, the network of irrigation canals and ditches almost completely ringing the capital is clear.

The barrier "takes advantage of the rivers and the canals around the area, and really just blocks bridges and puts checkpoints around," said Casey. "The notion is push the bad guys out, keep them out, and then gradually go back and re-clear areas so that the people feel safe in their own neighborhoods."

"But it's a long process, it's not going to happen in two weeks," he said.

Inspired by Islamic history, the plan for a ditch around Baghdad is the newest twist in what has so far been a losing battle to prevent suicide car bombs and other weapons from entering the capital.

Casey said that for progress to be made, unity among Iraqi leaders was crucial.

"I think the greatest challenge at the moment is to get the Iraqi leaders to come together and resolve the four or five key issues that are dividing the country right now."

He said Iraqi leaders must focus on purging the government of senior officials who were members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party and on passing a law to govern management of the nation's huge petroleum reserves.

Another crucial issue is federalism — Shiite Arabs in the south want to create an autonomous region like that controlled by Kurds in the north, but are opposed by Sunni Arabs who fear losing out on oil riches. A second key problem is the prevalence of militias.

"If the leadership can come together and resolve those, and then codify them in law so people understand that their rights are going to be protected, then I think we'll start seeing people giving up the fighting," Casey said.

U.N. Expert: Iraq Torture May Be Worse (AP)

By Eliane Engeler, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 22, 2006

Torture in Iraq may be worse now than it was under Saddam Hussein, with militias, terrorist groups and government forces disregarding rules on the humane treatment of prisoners, the U.N. anti-torture chief said Thursday.

Manfred Nowak, the U.N. special investigator on torture, made the remarks as he was presenting a report on detainee conditions at the U.S. prison in Guantanamo Bay as well as to brief the U.N. Human Rights Council, the global body's top rights watchdog, on torture worldwide.

Reports from Iraq indicate that torture "is totally out of hand," he said. "The situation is so bad many people say it is worse than it has been in the times of Saddam Hussein."

Nowak added, "That means something, because the torture methods applied under Saddam Hussein were the worst you could imagine."

Some allegations of torture were undoubtedly credible, with government forces among the perpetrators, he said, citing "very serious allegations of torture within the official Iraqi detention centers."

"You have terrorist groups, you have the military, you have police, you have these militias. There are so many people who are actually abducted, seriously tortured and finally killed," Nowak told reporters at the U.N.'s European headquarters.

"It's not just torture by the government. There are much more brutal methods of torture you'll find by private militias," he said.

A report by the U.N. Assistance Mission in Iraq's Human Rights office cited worrying evidence of torture, unlawful detentions, growth of sectarian militias and death squads, and a rise in "honor killings" of women.

DOJ_NMG_0067174

Iraq's government, set up in 2006, is "currently facing a generalized breakdown of law and order which presents a serious challenge to the institutions of Iraq" such as police and security forces and the legal system, the U.N. report said, noting that torture was a major concern.

Nowak has yet to make an official visit to Iraq and said such a mission would be unfeasible as long as the security situation there remains perilous. He based his comments on interviews with people during a visit to Amman, Jordan, and other sources.

"You find these bodies with very heavy and very serious torture marks," he said. "Many of these allegations, I have no doubt that they are credible."

According to the U.N. report, the number of Iraqi civilians killed in July and August hit 6,599, a record-high that is far greater than initial estimates suggested, the U.N. report said Wednesday.

It attributed many of the deaths to rising sectarian tensions that have pushed Iraq toward civil war.

Associated Press writers Bradley S. Klapper in Geneva and Nick Wadhams at the United Nations contributed to this report.

Antiwar Push Starts Near White House; 34 Arrested (WP)

By Sue Anne Pressley Montes

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

A group of ministers, veterans and peace activists attempted to deliver a "declaration of peace" to the White House yesterday, kicking off a week of vigils and other activities in 350 communities across the country calling for the prompt withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq.

Thirty-four people were arrested here and charged with disorderly conduct after they demanded to speak with President Bush, then refused to leave the west gate of the White House. As part of an initiative of more than 400 groups, many of them religiously affiliated, the activists said they had to "bear moral witness" against the U.S. military role in Iraq.

"We are in a time of peril, and people of morals have got to stand up," said the Rev. Lennox Yearwood Jr., who founded the D.C.-based Hip Hop Caucus to involve youths in political and social action and helped to lead yesterday's protest. "If we don't stand now in the 21st century, there will not be a 22nd century. We will destroy ourselves -- we will either solve this together or die as fools together."

The day's activities also featured vigils for peace in dozens of cities and towns, including Little Rock; Tucson; Pasadena, Calif.; Miami; Decatur, Ga.; Pittsburgh; and Austin. In San Diego today, there will be a Dance Action for Peace. Tomorrow in Cincinnati, a tent city dedicated to peace will be erected. San Francisco is hosting a mass bicycle ride to protest the conflict in Iraq, and Madison, Wis., is holding community forums on the issue.

The week's activities will include civil disobedience actions at the U.S. Capitol, organizers said, as participants try to persuade members of Congress to sign the declaration of peace, a document demanding that the Bush administration "establish a concrete and rapid plan to end the U.S. occupation of Iraq."

The declaration of peace was created after religious and secular peace groups, including the Methodist Federation for Social Action, the Presbyterian Peace Fellowship and United for Peace and Justice, began discussions in January. Since then, the document has received more than 12,000 signatures online. Thousands more signatures have been gathered in petition campaigns around the country, organizers said.

At yesterday's event outside the White House, about 75 people listened as Yearwood and others explained their purpose. Some held small, red "stop" signs to show their support for an end to the war and chanted, "No to war! We declare peace!"

"Today, here in front of the White House, we kick off a week of intensive antiwar action throughout the nation," said Leslie Cagan, national coordinator for United for Peace and Justice, which she described as the country's largest antiwar coalition. "It is time to end the war in Iraq. It is time to bring all of the troops home."

Army Meets Recruiting Goal (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, September 22, 2006

The Army is ending its best recruiting year since 1997 and expecting similar success in 2007, despite the weight of grim war news from Iraq, Army Secretary Francis Harvey said Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0067175

In an Associated Press interview, Harvey said the Army will enlist its 80,000th soldier on Friday, reaching its goal for the year with eight days to spare. That is a considerable turnaround from last year when the Army missed its target for the first time since 1999 and by the widest margin in more than two decades.

At the start of this recruiting year, which began Oct. 1, 2005, many questioned whether the Army would reach 80,000, given the many alternative career options available to young people and the growing unpopularity of the Iraq war. But a package of new financial incentives, new recruiting approaches and a bigger recruiting corps did the trick.

Army recruiters are making more use of the Internet to attract young prospects, and the Army this year began allowing people as old as 42 to enter the service; the maximum age previously was 35.

The Army also has accepted a larger number of recruits whose score on a standardized aptitude test is at the lower end of the acceptable range, and it has granted waivers to permit the enlistment of people with criminal records that otherwise would disqualify them. The Army says it does not grant waivers if there is a pattern of criminal misconduct or for convictions of drug trafficking or any sexually violent crimes.

Harvey said the Army would stick with the formula it used over the past 12 months, while adding a few new wrinkles for recruiters.

He described himself as "moderately optimistic" about reaching the 80,000 goal again next year. It is too early to know the final number for the current recruiting year, which ends Sept. 30, but Harvey said it would be the highest in nine years. Last year the Army fell short of its goal by the widest margin since 1979.

Harvey was flying to New York to personally enlist on Friday the 80,000th recruit — Shirley Salvi, 23, a Rutgers University graduate who will report to Fort Leonard Wood, Mo., to become an Army linguist or intelligence analyst.

The trend in recruiting is particularly important for the Army now because it is striving to expand its overall ranks. The expansion is fundamental to an Army plan that increases the number of combat brigades available for fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan, thereby giving soldiers more breathing room between overseas tours.

The Army secretary said combat brigades now get, on average, only 14 months at home for every 12 months at war. The goal is 24 months at home for every 12 months at war, but Harvey said they currently are moving in the wrong direction. Not long ago, combat brigades were getting 18 months between war tours.

By the end of the budget year on Sept. 30, the active-duty Army expects to have a total of nearly 504,000 soldiers, up from 492,000 a year ago. A year from now it hopes to reach its goal of 512,000, but that will not happen if recruiting slips again. Harvey indicated he expects recruiting to remain strong in the coming year.

"We're sticking with all the improvements we made" over the past year, including a beefed up recruiting corps, Harvey said. "If we start seeing trends that we don't like, we may" add even more recruiters, he said.

There are now about 6,600 recruiters for the active-duty Army, up from 6,401 a year ago and 5,119 two years ago. The Army National Guard and Army Reserve also have greatly increased their recruiting corps.

The outlook for 2007 is brightened a bit by the fact that the Army expects to begin the new recruiting year with about 14 percent of the target number of 80,000 already signed up. Many who signed up this month, for example, did so with the understanding they will not begin basic training for several weeks or months. The Army began the 2006 recruiting year with about 12 percent of the year's total already signed up.

Strained, Army Looks To Guard For More Relief (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 21 — Strains on the Army from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have become so severe that Army officials say they may be forced to make greater use of the National Guard to provide enough troops for overseas deployments.

Senior Army officers have discussed that analysis — and described the possible need to use more members of the National Guard — with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's senior adviser on personnel, David S. C. Chu, according to Pentagon officials.

DOJ_NMG_0067176

While no decision has been made to mobilize more Guard forces, and may not need to be before midterm elections, the prospect presents the Bush administration with a politically vexing problem: how, without expanding the Army, to balance the pressing need for troops in the field against promises to limit overseas deployments for the Guard.

The National Guard has a goal of allowing five years at home between foreign deployments so as not to disrupt the family life and careers of its citizen soldiers. But instead it has been sending units every three to four years, according to Guard officials.

The question of how to sustain the high level of forces abroad became more acute this week as General John P. Abizaid, the senior American commander in the Middle East, said that the number of troops in Iraq, currently at more than 140,000, could not be expected to drop until next spring at the very earliest.

That disclosure comes amid many signs of mounting strain on active Army units. So many are deployed or only recently returned from combat duty that only two or three combat brigades — perhaps 7,000 to 10,000 troops — are fully ready to respond in case of unexpected crises, according to a senior Army general.

An internal Army document that was provided to The New York Times notes that the demand for troops in Iraq and Afghanistan has greatly exceeded past projections that predicted earlier troop reductions. According to the document, the Army needs $66.1 billion to make up for all of its equipment shortfalls. Referring to the units that are to deploy next to Iraq and Afghanistan, or are in training, the document shows a large question mark to indicate their limited readiness.

The Army had to offer generous new enlistment bonuses of up to $40,000 to attract recruits into such dangerous jobs as operating convoys in Iraq. It was able to meet its active-duty enlistment goals this year with the addition of 1,000 new recruiters.

Enmeshed in negotiations with Bush administration officials over its spending request for next year, neither Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army Chief of Staff, nor any of his top Pentagon aides would agree to be interviewed about the personnel stresses they are confronting. But Army officials have shared their concerns with retired Army officers and members of Congress, and quietly distributed budget tallies, including the internal document on troop and equipment demands, to their supporters. Military officers and civilian Pentagon officials interviewed for this article would discuss the issues only on condition of anonymity.

An examination of the Army's plan for deploying its force shows some of the ways it has been overextended.

In overhauling its structure, the active-duty Army is growing to 42 combat brigades. Army officials have said they want to establish a pattern in which an active brigade spends two years at home for each year it is deployed overseas.

But so many units are needed for the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan that combat brigades are generally spending only a year at home for each year they are deployed. Military analysts concluded that this has severely reduced the number of forces that are available for other contingencies.

"The continuing frequent deployments to Iraq and Afghanistan have stretched the U.S. Army so thin that there are few brigades ready to respond to crises elsewhere," said Lynn Davis, a senior analyst in the Arroyo Center, a division of the RAND Corporation that does research for the Army.

Ms. Davis said that there was no quick fix for the limited number of troops. The longer-term solution, she said, was to rely more on the National Guard or to increase the number of Army brigades, a move that would cost billions of dollars.

Gordon R. Sullivan, the former Army chief of staff and president of the Association of the United States Army, said in an interview that the Army was simply too small for the many responsibilities it faced and should be expanded from about 500,000 in the active force to some 560,000. It also needs to make greater use of the National Guard, he said.

"The biggest challenge is manpower," General Sullivan said.

Barry R. McCaffrey, the retired four-star Army general, also asserted that the armed forces needed to be expanded. "We cannot sustain the current national security policy with an Army, Marine Corps, Air Force lift capability and Special Operations forces of this size," he added. "They are clearly inadequate."

The pace of deployments and financing shortfalls, he said, had taken a toll of units in the active duty Army and the National Guard. "One third is completely ready to fight, and two-thirds are severely impaired," he said.

Asked if it was true that only a handful of combat brigades not currently deployed were immediately ready for a crisis, a spokesman for the Army said he could not address specifics because the information was classified.

DOJ_NMG_0067177

Mr. Rumsfeld has not favored substantially expanding the Army, concluding that such a step would draw money from programs he favors to overhaul the military and calculating that the high level of troops in Iraq and Afghanistan will prove temporary. Congress, however, has mandated a temporary 30,000-soldier increase for the Army.

As for whether any decision on mobilizing more members of the Guard can be expected, Mr. Chu, the Pentagon's chief personnel officer, declined through a spokeswoman to be interviewed on Army discussions about how to meet its needs.

But active commanders have highlighted the issue. At a recent conference at Fort Benning, Ga., Gen. Dan K. McNeill, the head of the Army's Forces Command, which oversees training and mobilization for all Army forces in the continental United States, suggested that the service needed to make greater use of the National Guard if the United States was to pursue what the Bush administration has described as a "long war" against Islamic terrorists.

"If we are going to prosecute this long war, we need relatively unencumbered access to the citizen soldier formations," General McNeill said.

The equivalent of several Guard brigades are deployed today in Iraq, Afghanistan, Sinai, the Horn of Africa and Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. Sending more Guard units to Iraq is politically sensitive because of complaints from families and employers while the Guard and Reserve were used extensively in Iraq and Afghanistan in 2004.

Restrictions on the use of the Guard are a matter of interpretation. Guard officials said that under President Bush's current mobilization order, its members may not be called up if they have served for 24 consecutive months. But a conflicting Defense Department policy interprets the order as limiting the call-up of those who have tallied 24 months of total service, regardless of the length of time served consecutively. That view would put more Guard members off-limits for remobilization without a new order from the president.

If the military cannot deploy enough members of the Guard by following either interpretation of the rules, officials may be forced to propose that Mr. Rumsfeld advise President Bush of the need to sign a new mobilization order that would reset the clock for many Guard members who have already served overseas.

Lt. Gen. H Steven Blum, the head of the Guard, said his forces would be prepared to meet current requirements and to send more forces if needed.

"Can I sustain that?" General Blum said. "I say the answer is, 'Absolutely' — if three things remain, three critical things."

He said Guard members must continue to feel that what they are doing is important and that they have the support of the American people. Finally, he said, "We've got to give them some predictability or some kind of certainty so they can balance their civilian life, with their employers and their family, with their military service to the nation."

Given the lengthy lead time required for calling up, training, equipping and deploying Guard forces, Pentagon officials said that if more Guard members were mobilized, it would probably be for a rotation that begins in 2008.

Even so, Pentagon and military officials said that it was unlikely that any decision on a Guard mobilization would be necessary for several months or even into next year, which would place any announcement beyond the November mid-term Congressional elections.

To take on a greater load in Iraq and remedy existing equipment shortfalls, the Guard needs $23 billion over five years, Guard officials say.

"There is no brigade in the United States Army active, Guard or reserve that is completely ready back at home," General Blum said. "That is to ensure that every brigade overseas is completely ready. And by ready I mean completely equipped. Right now, the key to readiness of the total force is equipping it, resetting it and modernizing it. It is a function of time and money."

The stress of wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have prompted senior Army officers to pass a colorful hand card around Capitol Hill explaining that it will take $17.1 billion in extra spending over the next year to repair and replace tanks, trucks, radios and other equipment for the total force. The card indicates that another $13 billion is needed each year for the following five years to fix and replace equipment.

One Army official said this week that the service is seeking about $138 billion for the next fiscal year, compared with the $112 budget request the Army submitted last year.

DOJ_NMG_0067178

DOJ:

Office Of U.S. Attorney 'stressed' (SEAPI)

By Paul Shukovsky, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, September 22, 2006

Federal prosecutor has seen budget steadily shrink

The federal prosecutor for Western Washington says his office is "stressed to the limit" because of years of budget cuts that threaten to slow the pace of criminal prosecutions.

U.S. Attorney John McKay has issued this warning to county prosecutors and special agents in charge of federal agencies, including the FBI, the Drug Enforcement Administration and Immigration and Customs Enforcement: "We may not be as responsive as you want us to be on the cases you refer to us."

The office has been hemorrhaging prosecutors and support staff members even as the other Washington is poised to impose another budget cut for the 2006-07 fiscal year.

The office, which handles federal criminal prosecutions and civil cases involving the U.S. government, is down six criminal prosecutors and one civil attorney, leaving 58 assistant U.S. attorneys, McKay said.

Fourteen positions in the office are unfilled, and McKay still must pay his 118 employees a mandatory 3 percent cost-of-living raise.

McKay said he is proud that the office has been able to maintain its productivity -- prosecuting more than 800 defendants last year. "We are on track to do slightly more than that" this year, he said.

But cases that might have been prosecuted under tougher federal laws are increasingly being sent to local prosecutors.

"We're not taking as many of these cases as we'd like to take," McKay said. "We're working hard to take up the slack, but we're not always successful in taking the cases we should."

A bigger budget would mean more prosecutions in burgeoning problem areas, such as cybercrime, according to McKay's top assistant, Mark Bartlett.

"You'd see more cases like 'botnet,' " he said, referring to the recent prosecution of a young man from California who infected thousands of computers around the world for personal profit. "You'd see more collaboration with Microsoft and other intellectual-property firms where piracy is a huge concern."

The office's cybercrime unit has two vacancies that "prevent us from being as proactive as we'd like to be," Bartlett said.

In fiscal 2003-04, the office's budget was $12.1 million. In fiscal 2004-05, it slid to $11.4 million. In the current fiscal year ending next week, the budget will have shrunk further, to $11 million.

It's not clear what the next budget will bring, but McKay has been told that the best case is a flat budget and that more cuts are possible.

The strain on the U.S. Attorney's Office is being felt in Whatcom County, where criminals who move contraband such as drugs, undeclared cash and illegal immigrants across the U.S.-Canadian border are arrested by the federal agents, but frequently prosecuted by locals.

McKay said his office is declining about 80 percent of the cases at the border that could be prosecuted in federal court. It's a lost opportunity, he said.

"We try to flip people by putting them through federal prosecution," said McKay, using a slang term for persuading criminals to cooperate with law enforcement in return for a lighter sentence. "We don't have that flexibility right now."

Whatcom County Prosecutor Dave McEachran said he's "amazed" that McKay is facing the possibility of more budget cuts.

McEachran needs federal prosecutors to take some of the load off his attorneys, who are handling an average of 200 felony cases apiece.

"We have a huge caseload here," he said.

McEachran said local prosecutors on the U.S. side of the Mexican border had to threaten to stop prosecuting arrests made by federal agents to get federal dollars to help them with the crush of border-related crime.

There have been attempts by northern border prosecutors to get similar federal assistance. But they have never received congressional approval, McEachran said.

Cuts in the U.S. attorney's budget also affect violent crimes such as bank robberies, which occur at a high rate in Western Washington.

Bank robberies can be prosecuted federally, and those convicted given harsher sentences. But "most of them are shifting over to the locals," McKay said. Only the most violent cases or serial bank robberies are seeing the inside of a federal courtroom.

As for "note jobs," in which an unarmed robber slides a demand note to a teller -- "we're not seeing those," McKay said.

"This is going into our third year of really tough budgets," he said. "We keep expecting it to get fixed, but that's dependent on Congress."

P-I reporter Paul Shukovsky can be reached at 206-448-8072 or paulshukovsky@seattlepi.com.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

H-P's Hurd Likely To Testify Before House Panel (WSJ)

By David Rogers And Don Clark

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Hewlett-Packard Co. Chief Executive Mark Hurd appears headed for a House committee examining the "pretexting" scandal at the company.

Mr. Hurd yesterday offered to testify after Rep. Joe Barton of Texas, chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said the computer maker's top executive may be called as a witness.

The hearing, scheduled for Thursday before the House subcommittee on oversight and investigations, already had a witness list that includes H-P General Counsel Ann Baskins and Patricia Dunn, the H-P chairman who pushed for an investigation of board leaks.

1 EMAIL TRAIL

Below are links to some key internal H-P documents: • In a series of emails2, Robert Sherbin, H-P's vice president of external communications, warns Ms. Dunn there is a "fresh" leak. In one message, Mr. Sherbin lists five directors Mr. Hurd suggested as investigation targets.

• H-P lawyer Kevin Hunsaker sends a email3 to his investigation team discussing how phone records were obtained. The message admits pretexting was used, but says the practice "is not unlawful."

But H-P emails reviewed by The Wall Street Journal suggest that Mr. Hurd was more closely involved in some aspects of the probe than previously thought. Mr. Hurd has scheduled a news conference for this afternoon. (See related article7.)

Yesterday, H-P shares fell 5.2%, or $1.91, to 34.87 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

In other developments, H-P disclosed that the Securities and Exchange Commission's enforcement division had made new requests for information from the company. In a filing on Sept. 6, H-P reported that the SEC's corporation-finance department had requested information about an H-P filing last May that reported the resignation of director Thomas Perkins, who resigned in protest over the leak investigation.

An H-P filing yesterday disclosed that the SEC division had requested information related to Mr. Perkins's resignation, a Sept. 6 company filing about the matter as well as "investigations conducted by HP or any of its directors into possible sources of leaks of HP confidential information."

H-P said it is cooperating with the SEC investigation. Other agencies, including the FBI and the California attorney general's office, are investigating H-P's conduct.

Rep. Barton was given expanded subpoena authority this week by his committee and appears to have strong support for the inquiry from Michigan Rep. John Dingell, the ranking Democrat on the Energy and Commerce Committee. Both men sit as ex-officio members of the investigative subcommittee, and the extra subpoena power will allow them to expedite orders seeking additional documents, for example, that investigators may want in preparation for next week's hearing.

Mr. Barton has a long history of support for protections of privacy. He and Mr. Dingell backed legislation, reported from the committee in March, to prohibit the practice of fraudulently posing as someone to gain access to telephone records, known as pretexting. H-P has admitted pretexting directors, reporters and others as part of an internal probe to track the source of board leaks.

Mr. Barton said he hoped the controversy would spark more pressure to move ahead with the legislation in Congress. There are various laws against using fraud to obtain private records, but "under current federal and state law, there is no specific statute that makes pretexting illegal," he said.

Mr. Barton said H-P "went overboard" in trying to identify board leaks to the media. "It's an unknown whether the higher-ups at H-P knew how the information was obtained, but somebody at H-P had to know how they obtained these records.

"When you get people's phone records and things like that, that would not be the type of information the subjects being investigated would voluntarily divulge," he said.

H-P's filing with the SEC yesterday disclosed some terms of a separation agreement between the company and Mr. Perkins, who resigned as a director in May in protest over the leak investigation, and George Keyworth, whom H-P identified as a leaker and who wasn't renominated for re-election to the board.

The company and the two directors agreed not to sue each other. But the two men, who are close friends, are entitled under the agreement to prosecute legal claims against security or investigative firms, or their contractors, involved in unlawfully obtaining personal information about the former directors or their family members.

Mr. Keyworth is being represented by Reginald Brown, an attorney with the Washington firm Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale & Dorr. Mr. Brown yesterday declined to comment about the possibility that Mr. Keyworth would sue any of H-P's outside investigators.

Mr. Perkins's attorney, Viet Dinh, of Bancroft Associates PLLC, couldn't be reached to comment.

Focus Turns To The Chief Of H.P.; Stock Falls (NYT)

By Damon Darlin And Matt Richtel

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 21 — Pressure is mounting on Hewlett-Packard's chief executive, Mark V. Hurd, to explain what appears to have been a greater role in the company's spying operation than was initially indicated.

Mr. Hurd has largely escaped mention in connection with the company's efforts to obtain private phone records and otherwise trace leaks from its board. But on Thursday, after his name figured in documents newly appearing in the investigation, Hewlett-Packard's stock price fell significantly for the first time since the revelations began early this month. The shares closed down 5.19 percent, at $34.87.

The California attorney general, Bill Lockyer, threatened at one point Thursday to issue subpoenas to Hewlett-Packard because of what he said was a lack of cooperation in his criminal investigation. But later in the day, a spokesman for his office said H.P. had expressed a willingness to cooperate, as the attorney general wanted.

The problem for Mr. Hurd arises from a sheaf of e-mail messages and other documents obtained by news organizations that suggest that he approved of at least one aspect of the spying operation, offered names of possible targets and may have been briefed by the supervisors of the effort at the start of a crucial phase.

None of the leaked documents directly implicate Mr. Hurd. He did not write any of the e-mail messages, nor is it clear that he was sent copies of others that refer to him and actions attributed to him.

But what may yet emerge — Hewlett-Packard delivered more than 5,000 pages of documents to investigators with the House Committee on Energy and Commerce this week, and more are expected Monday — is what seems to have worried investors and analysts.

"To the degree it impacts the C.E.O., that is something we are nervous about," said A. M. Sacconaghi, an analyst who tracks Hewlett-Packard for Sanford C. Bernstein & Company. But he said that "at this point the probability is very low" that Mr. Hurd, credited with turning the company around since his hiring in March 2005, might face criminal charges or be forced out.

Mr. Hurd offered Thursday to testify at a House subcommittee hearing on the case next Thursday. Several other Hewlett-Packard executives have also been asked to appear.

In addition, the company said the Securities and Exchange Commission was seeking records and information related to the resignation of Thomas J. Perkins from the board in May. It was Mr. Perkins's effort to force the company to acknowledge the reason for his resignation — his objection to the leak investigation — that brought the operation into public view.

Since then, documents have shown that Hewlett-Packard's detectives not only gained phone records of directors, employees, journalists and others, but also tried to plant software on a reporter's computer to track a bogus document it sent her and even considered infiltrating newsrooms with spies masquerading as clerical workers or cleaners.

E-mail messages between company officials, cited Thursday in The New York Times and The Wall Street Journal, show efforts to organize a briefing for Mr. Hurd last January, when the leak investigation entered an intense phase over a news account of a senior management meeting. It is not clear whether the briefing occurred.

Another message said Mr. Hurd pointed to five potential leakers on the board at that juncture. And The Washington Post reported that e-mail from the company's chairwoman, Patricia C. Dunn, cited Mr. Hurd as "fine with both the concept and the content" of the software tracking effort.

Mr. Lockyer, the California attorney general, said Thursday that he did not know yet whether the state would find culpability among senior officials in the company. "We haven't ruled anything in or out," he said. "We want to know who committed the wrongdoing."

The company promised that Mr. Hurd would answer questions at a news conference Friday afternoon, after the stock market's close, but the timing of the events also put investors on edge. "Traditionally in corporate America, bad news is delivered on a Friday after the markets close," Mr. Sacconaghi said.

Several people with close ties to board members said Mr. Hurd was preparing a plan to present to the board for how get the company beyond its current problems. It may announce dismissals or resignations, though that course could present other problems. Ex-employees have no incentive to protect the company or its executives or managers.

Hewlett-Packard's chairwoman, Ms. Dunn, has acknowledged that she authorized the internal inquiry, and documents have shown that she involved herself in it. Other documents show that Kevin T. Hunsaker, a senior company lawyer, directed the operation, which involved Hewlett-Packard investigators and several layers of outside detectives and their subcontractors.

Mr. Hunsaker has hired a San Diego criminal defense lawyer, Michael Pancer. Ann O. Baskins, the company's general counsel, to whom Mr. Hunsaker reported, has hired Cristina C. Arguedas, a white-collar crime specialist with the law firm of Arguedas, Cassman & Headley in Berkeley, Calif.

Mr. Hurd has been popular with investors because he is transforming Hewlett-Packard from a lumbering technology company content to live off the profits of its lucrative ink-cartridge business into a growth company. Hewlett is projected to bring in $91.2 billion in revenue this year — enough to make it the largest technology company in the world.

Oddly, the internal animosities exposed in the disclosures from the leak investigation had their roots in the activities of a board subcommittee established in 2002 to help the company make smarter technology strategy decisions.

After its contentious $25 billion merger with Compaq Computer, the board and some top executives became bitterly divided over how quickly the computer business could grow and how it should invest in the future, according to a person with direct knowledge of the divisions within the board.

Established at the urging of Mr. Perkins, a Silicon Valley venture capitalist who returned to the company as a director after the Compaq merger in 2002, the technology subcommittee routinely met a day before each board meeting to thrash out technology strategy issues and wrestle with how to restart growth at Hewlett-Packard.

The subcommittee was dominated by directors who maintained that the company could grow much more quickly by investing in information technology. Initial members included Mr. Perkins; George A. Keyworth II, a former Reagan administration science adviser; Richard A. Hackborn, a former Hewlett-Packard executive; and Lawrence T. Babbio Jr., vice chairman of Verizon. Shane V. Robison, the executive in charge of research and development, attended the meetings.

Mr. Hurd began attending after he joined the company, succeeding Carleton S. Fiorina as chief executive. It was where the most spirited deliberations about Hewlett-Packard's future took place, a person briefed on the sessions said.

DOJ_NMG_0067182

But Ms. Dunn, who had become chairwoman, did not take part, and some subcommittee members have concluded that her exclusion rankled her. She and several other directors were skeptical of large research investments in computing, a person with detailed knowledge of the subcommittee's activities said.

"The conflict on the board wasn't about personalities; it was about growth strategies," said Mark Stahlman, a financial industry analyst who is now a strategist at Gartner Invest, a Wall Street research firm.

Friends of Ms. Dunn, who asked not to be identified, said some of the animosity could also be traced to the period when Mr. Hurd was hired. Mr. Perkins, Mr. Keyworth and Ms. Dunn were in charge of the search committee, and while they agreed about Mr. Hurd, Ms. Dunn became angry with leaks from the board about the search, those friends said.

Mr. Perkins and Mr. Keyworth became targets in both phases of the leak investigation, around the time of Ms. Fiorina's dismissal and again early this year. Their resulting confrontation with Ms. Dunn — Mr. Keyworth was identified as a source of unauthorized disclosures — ended in their resignations.

Nonetheless, with Ms. Dunn's decision last week to step down as chairwoman in January, to be succeeded by Mr. Hurd, the strategic dispute was settled. "The growth faction has now won," Mr. Stahlman said.

In a filing Thursday with the S.E.C., the company said Mr. Perkins and Mr. Keyworth, who resigned after Ms. Dunn stepped down, had agreed not to sue Hewlett-Packard, and the company had agreed to pay expenses arising from government inquiries or legal proceedings in the spying fiasco. The company and the former directors signed mutual non-disparagement agreements.

Hewlett-Packard Receives SEC Request For Information (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Allan Dodds Frank And Karen Gullo

Bloomberg, September 22, 2006

Sept. 21 (Bloomberg) -- Hewlett-Packard Co. received a request for information from the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission over its investigation into media leaks as California Attorney General Bill Lockyer complained the company stopped cooperating with him.

Hewlett-Packard disputed Lockyer's assertions and said it is cooperating with his probe, as well as reviews by the SEC, U.S. Justice Department and a congressional committee. Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd offered to appear before the committee, the company said today.

``Today we ran into a brick wall," Lockyer said in an interview. ``Frankly I'm pretty angry about it. I've instructed my lawyers this morning to paper the place with subpoenas."

The SEC probe and Lockyer's statements intensify the scandal hanging over Hewlett-Packard on the eve of Hurd's first press conference to discuss the methods the company used to uncover the source of boardroom leaks to the media. Lockyer said some tactics, including the use of fake identities to obtain phone records, are criminal.

Hewlett-Packard shares had their biggest one-day decline in more than two years after the Washington Post reported that e- mails it obtained suggest Hurd had more involvement in the investigation than the company has said. Hurd said in a statement today that he plans to give ``as much clarity as we can" to the probe.

``If Mark Hurd is being implicated and had a bigger role than it was thought to date, that would jeopardize his running the firm and that would be a severe negative on the stock," said Michael Cuggino, Pacific Heights Asset Management LLC in San Francisco, which owns 200,000 Hewlett-Packard shares. ``He's recognized as the driver behind H-P's turnaround."

No Change

The company said there has been no change in its level of cooperation with the state, according to Ryan Donovan, a Hewlett- Packard spokesman. ``HP has been and continues to cooperate fully with the California Attorney General's investigation," he said.

Tom Dresslar, a spokesman for Lockyer, said Hewlett- Packard's lawyers had contacted the Attorney General's office after he spoke today.

``The lack of cooperation that we had been experiencing seems to have been addressed," Dresslar said in an interview. Lockyer had been seeking to conduct interviews with employees and examine communications between the company and outside contractors. ``Interviews with the people we wanted to talk with are being arranged," Dresslar said.

SEC

The SEC's enforcement division asked for records and information relating to the resignation of Tom Perkins from its board of directors and the company's probe of boardroom leaks, the company said today.

Hewlett-Packard also disclosed today that it hired law firm Morgan Lewis & Bockius to conduct an analysis of its investigation. A representative of the firm will join Hurd tomorrow at a press conference. Lockyer said he might show up at the event.

The new lawyers have advised Hewlett-Packard to stop handing over documents or talking. The law firm ``is not now honoring the original agreements we had," Lockyer said.

Morgan Lewis spokeswoman Amy Kalin didn't immediately return calls seeking comment.

Chairwoman Patricia Dunn, 53, said on Sept. 12 that she will resign in January to take responsibility for the investigation. Lockyer has said he has enough evidence to lay charges against company officials and outside investigators.

Shares Fall

The shares fell $1.91, or 5.2 percent, to $34.87 at 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange Composite trading after being little changed since the company made the investigation public on Sept. 6. That is the largest single-day drop since Aug. 2004 when the shares fell 13 percent.

In the past week, the company has been accused of following reporters and plotting to send bugs to their computers and spies into their newsrooms, according to newspaper reports. Hurd and Dunn approved a ``sting" operation to be conducted on a Cnet.com reporter to find out who she communicated with at the company, the Washington Post reported, citing e-mails from Dunn.

The e-mails link Hurd for the first time to the internal investigation, the Post said. Hewlett-Packard declined to comment on the e-mails, Donovan said.

Hurd, 49, was named to replace ousted CEO Carly Fiorina in March 2005 after a seven-week search by the board that was led by Dunn.

Meetings

Investigators hired by the company also sought meetings with Hurd, the Wall Street Journal reported, citing e-mails from January between Kevin Hunsaker, the company's senior ethics lawyer and Hewlett-Packard investigator Tony Gentilucci. It is unclear whether Hurd met investigators during that probe, the Journal reported.

Hewlett-Packard's first statement said its efforts to uncover the source of media leaks led investigators to take on false identities to obtain phone records of some directors and employees as well as nine reporters and other people outside the company. Since then, e-mail documents obtained by media outlets have suggested that the company went further.

The Post today said the company created a fictitious source named Jacob to deceive Cnet.com reporter Dawn Kawamoto. E-mails from Dunn and Hunsaker also indicate that she and Hurd approved a plan to feed Kawamoto information through Jacob, the Post said.

Dunn kept in touch with the probe, often sending responses to e-mails on her BlackBerry, the Post said.

Spies

The New York Times this week reported that the company considered sending spies into the newsrooms of the Wall Street Journal and Cnet.com posing as clerical employees or cleaning staff to help uncover the source of the leaks.

The U.S. Energy and Commerce Committee has requested Dunn and others involved in the probe testify next week before its subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations. General Counsel Ann Baskins will also testify.

Hurd, who wasn't asked to attend, today said he offered to appear before the committee. The hearing will focus on the company's use of investigators who assumed false identities to gain phone numbers, known as pretexting.

``Mark wants to be as transparent as possible," Donovan said. ``He wants to apologize publicly and talk about how we are ensuring that these events will not happen again."

Business Week today reported that investigators masqueraded as telecom employees to obtain the records from Verizon Communications Inc. customers.

DOJ_NMG_0067184

James Brosnahan of San Francisco-based Morrison & Foerster LLP said in an e-mail today that he has been hired to serve as Dunn's lawyer. He didn't return a call seeking comment.

Second Investigation

Morgan Lewis will conduct the second investigation into the probe. The first was run by Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, the company's usual outside counsel. Larry Sonsini, the firm's president, was also the subject of investigation and has agreed to appear before the Energy and Commerce Committee next week.

The briefing tomorrow will end more than a week of silence from Hewlett-Packard, which has refused to comment on the scandal since Dunn agreed to step down. She will remain a director.

``What began as an effort to prevent the leaks of confidential information from HP's boardroom ended up heading in directions that were never anticipated," Hurd said today in an earlier statement. ``HP is working hard to determine exactly what took place and when, and without all the facts it has been difficult for us to respond to the questions that have been raised."

To contact the reporter on this story: Connie Guglielmo in San Francisco at Cguglielmo1@bloomberg.net .

Plot Thickens In HP's News-leak Probe (USAT)

By Jim Hopkins And Jon Swartz

USA Today, September 22, 2006

Hewlett-Packard's boardroom spying scandal intensified Thursday when the Securities and Exchange Commission ratcheted up its inquiry into the company's covert news-leak probe.

HP shares fell more than 5% on heavy volume as investors responded to a published report that for the first time tied CEO Mark Hurd to shady tactics used by the company's private investigators.

Hurd offered to testify next week before a congressional committee investigating the matter. He'll hold a news conference today to talk about steps the tech giant is taking in the case. The embattled HP board met again Thursday.

The Washington Post, citing an e-mail sent by HP Chairman Patricia Dunn, said Hurd had “approved an elaborate ‘sting' operation” on a reporter for the tech-news site CNet in February aiming to uncover news leaks from HP's board.

The Post report suggests Hurd, hired last year to lead a crucial turnaround, was more deeply involved, and at an earlier stage, in planning the news-leak investigation than HP has previously acknowledged.

HP said last week that Hurd did not learn about the probe's initial findings until March, and that he had learned about questionable tactics used against journalists and others “only in recent weeks.”

USA TODAY was unable to independently confirm the authenticity of the e-mails cited by the Post. HP had no comment on the story, said spokesman Ryan Donovan.

But a document obtained by USA TODAY shows one of HP's outside investigators sent CNet reporter Dawn Kawamoto an e-mail on Feb. 9 that contained a “tracking capability” that could help investigators find the board leak.

The document was prepared by Security Outsourcing Solutions, a Boston-area firm that is a focus of a California law-enforcement probe of HP. The document was provided to the newspaper by a source who is not directly involved in the investigation.

The Post said none of the e-mails it reviewed were to or from Hurd, and they did not “detail what information Hurd had when he approved the sting operation.”

The SEC's enforcement division is seeking records and information related to HP director Tom Perkins' resignation in May, HP said. The division also wants information about HP's news-leak probes and related Sept. 6 and May 22 SEC filings by the company. HP said it is cooperating.

HP's probe, which started early last year and continued through spring, involved spying on directors, employees and at least nine journalists.

Investigators hired by HP obtained private home phone-calling records of at least two directors and some journalists.

Hurd's offer to testify before the House Energy and Commerce Committee next Thursday came after Rep. Bart Stupak, D-Mich., asked other panelists to consider seeking his testimony. Stupak cited “allegations and media reports regarding Mr. Hurd's possible knowledge of HP's various deceptive investigative techniques.”

The committee does not yet have plans to call Hurd, said spokesman Terry Lane. Dunn and other senior HP executives already are scheduled to testify at the high-profile hearing, likely to focus on thousands of pages of internal documents the panel received from HP this week.

Kawamoto told USA TODAY in an e-mail that she is "shocked and outraged that they rifled through my phone records. … Not only was my privacy violated, my family's privacy was violated, and my ability to do my job was challenged."

The HP scandal already has led to a boardroom reshuffling, announced last week, in which Hurd is to replace Dunn as chairman in January. Also, director George Keyworth, identified as the boardroom leak, resigned. Perkins resigned in protest on May 18, a move that forced HP three weeks ago to disclose its probe.

The Post's disclosures about Hurd, 49, come at a crucial time for the computer and printer maker, a corporate pillar in Silicon Valley and a leading Fortune 500 company.

Hurd, CEO since April 2005, is leading a critical revamping of the company as it recovers from the tech bust and a controversial merger with Compaq Computer that was engineered by predecessor Carly Fiorina.

HP shares fell 5.2% Thursday, closing at $34.87. About 42 million shares changed hands, nearly three times average volume. Financial analysts, who until recently brushed aside the boardroom drama, say Hurd's possible role in the spy plan could now affect HP.

"The stock market is voting correctly," says Roger Kay, CEO of Endpoint Technologies Associates. "You can lose any number of board members and nobody cares, but if the CEO is somehow impaired, then that raises questions about the operational side of the house."

The specter of Hurd becoming ensnared in the legal machinations could divert him from running the $86 billion company, Kay and others say.

"Hurd has done a remarkable job with the company. Yes, there are concerns he would be distracted," says Charlie Wolf of Needham and Co.

"There is a modest jeopardy here. Fortunately, HP has a strong bench (of executives), so there should be no material impact on the company's financial performance."

Hurd will be joined at today's news conference by a representative of Morgan Lewis & Bockius, a law firm hired by HP on Sept. 8 to defend the company amid investigations by the Justice Department, California Attorney General Bill Lockyer, the FBI and the SEC.

HP said Thursday that Morgan Lewis has begun a "comprehensive analysis" of the company's news-leak investigations that began early last year around the time the board was ousting Fiorina.

"HP is working hard to determine exactly what took place and when, and without all the facts it has been difficult for us to respond to the questions that have been raised," Hurd said in a statement. "We plan to give as much clarity as we can to these matters."

Lockyer spokesman Tom Dresslar said HP is now cooperating after "some stonewalling." "We will now gain expedited access to individuals and documents," he said.

Morgan Lewis partner John Hemann, a former assistant U.S. Attorney in San Francisco who helped prosecute Enron executives Ken Lay and Andrew Fastow, has met with federal prosecutors in San Francisco investigating the case, the San Francisco daily legal newspaper The Recorder has reported.

Hemann specializes in white-collar criminal defense and internal corporate investigations, according to the 1,250-lawyer firm's website.

Hemann did not return calls seeking comment.

HP Stock Falters In Spying Scandal (WP)

By Yuki Noguchi And Brooke A. Masters

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

The scandal over Hewlett-Packard Co.'s conduct in investigating press leaks started affecting its business yesterday for the first time, weighing down its stock price and raising questions about the future of its leadership.

Shares of the printing and computing company dropped 5 percent, the first major price dip since the company revealed early this month that it had obtained personal phone records of its board members and nine journalists under false pretenses. HP shares, which had been trading near a 52-week high of $37.25, dropped $1.91 to close at $34.87.

The decline came on the same day as a newspaper report that HP's president and chief executive, Mark V. Hurd, had personally approved an elaborate plan to trick a reporter into identifying her sources by sending her false information. That e-mail "sting" operation, reported by The Washington Post, was part of a broader leak probe that involved physical surveillance, false documents and electronic bugs, all in an attempt to flush out who on its board spoke with reporters.

Hurd yesterday offered to join HP Chairman Patricia C. Dunn and several others who are scheduled to testify next week at a House Energy and Commerce Committee hearing about the scandal. HP also disclosed in a filing that the Securities and Exchange Commission's enforcement division requested documents relating to its leak investigations and to the May resignation of a board member.

Separate probes by the California state attorney general, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Justice Department also are under way. New details are dribbling out almost daily about HP's spying efforts, which began early in 2005 after company leaders resolved to identify which board members were leaking confidential information to reporters.

Meanwhile, HP's board of directors met yesterday and Hurd plans to hold a news conference this afternoon.

"This has nothing to do with the strategy or operations of HP," Hurd said in a statement "What began as an effort to prevent the leaks of confidential information from HP's boardroom ended up heading in directions that were never anticipated."

But yesterday, investors who previously shrugged off disclosures of the company's spying activity reacted unhappily to the report that Hurd had approved an e-mail sting. The operation involved sending an e-mail embedded with software to trace where the reporter subsequently sent the message.

Hurd was brought in last year to help HP recover from the stormy tenure of his predecessor, Carleton "Carly" Fiorina. He is widely seen as crucial to the firm's future.

"Hurd is the guy driving the turnaround at HP, and it's not done yet," technology industry analyst Rob Enderle said. "This is pulling him away from managing the business and it's going to have an impact," which could cause a slowdown in the company's operations by next year, he added.

Research analysts at most of the major investment banks have so far shied away from trying to quantify the impact of the spying imbroglio on HP's bottom line. But there are contracts HP would not want to jeopardize because of any criminal investigations. Earlier this week, HP beat out some of its computing rivals by winning a $5 billion, 10-year deal with the U.S. Army to provide computers, printers, displays and scanners.

Analyst Roger Kay, president of research firm Endpoint Technologies Associates Inc., said the scandal was not likely to affect the company's sales. "You don't look at an HP server or laptop as a lesser product because the CEO ordered a sting operation," he said.

But Robert Passikoff, president of research consulting firm Brandkeys Inc., disagreed. His firm's surveys show that HP has lost 14 percent of what is known as "brand strength," a measure of consumer sentiment for a brand name, since the scandal began and has dropped from third place in its sector to seventh. While the allegations do not appear to affect how consumers think about the technical aspects of HP products, they have pushed down its reputation for openness, honesty and trustworthiness, Passikoff said.

The allegations dovetail with consumer fears about spyware and privacy loss in an information age, he said, noting that people are asking, "If they are doing that there, what are they doing to me?"

Until corporate spying became an issue for HP, the company stood to benefit from recent missteps by rivals Apple Computer Inc. and Dell Corp., which recently recalled millions of laptop computer batteries because of overheating. "People will reserve judgment on the company for a few weeks, but if there isn't a big change, with someone of high credibility brought in, it's going to start to affect business," said Paul Argenti, a professor of corporate communication at the Tuck School of Business at Dartmouth. "When a breach in ethics happens in a senior group of managers, it calls into question the management of the company."

DOJ_NMG_0067187

"It takes years and years to build up a reputation and a few weeks to lose it. They're doing a very good job of losing it right now," Argenti said.

Although it remains unclear whether HP executives or its outside investigators violated laws, some analysts said the prospect of criminal charges against either the firm or its executives and directors could seriously tarnish the company.

"If it were simply a civil matter, it would be easier to solve," said Howard Rubenstein, founder of New York public-relations firm Rubenstein Associates. But in this case, where California officials are talking about criminal wrongdoing, "they've got to be cautious that they don't convict themselves out of their own mouths."

Staff writers Mike Musgrove and Ellen Nakashima contributed to this report.

Hewlett-Packard, Wilson Sonsini Part Ways In Calif. Probe (LAW)

By Susan Beck, The American Lawyer

American Lawyer, September 22, 2006

Hewlett-Packard Co. said Thursday it has dropped Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati as its outside counsel in the California attorney general's criminal investigation of the company.

Wilson, HP says, will continue to represent the company in other matters, but in a written statement by spokesman Ryan Donovan, the company said that "Hewlett-Packard and Wilson Sonsini mutually agreed it would be in the best interests of both parties for Wilson to terminate its representation of HP in the California attorney general's inquiry."

Wilson chair Larry Sonsini has been HP's primary outside counsel for years, advising the client on the massive Agilent Technologies Inc. spin-off in 1999, and guiding it during the tumultuous proxy fight waged by former director Walter Hewlett that spanned 2001-2002. Sonsini has stated that he was not involved in the design of the leaks probe, but he did review the results of the probe for the company, and initially took the position that it was "within legal limits."

The probe by California AG Bill Lockyer centers on whether the company broke the law as it tried to uncover the source of leaks to the news media on deliberations by the company's board of directors. Lockyer is trying to determine whether crimes were committed when the phone records of directors and journalists covering the company were obtained under false pretenses. Last week, Lockyer said he believed he had "sufficient evidence" to indict people in the company.

On Thursday, Bloomberg reported that Lockyer said Hewlett-Packard had stopped cooperating with his investigation. "Today we ran into a brick wall," Lockyer said in the Bloomberg interview. He said the state of California would become more aggressive in its probe because of the company's "stalling tactics." He explained that HP's new law firm had advised the company to stop handing over documents and talking to investigators.

Later in the day, however, Lockyer spokesman Tom Dresslar said representatives of HP had been in contact with the AG's office since Lockyer had talked to Bloomberg, and the company's lack of cooperation "appears to be corrected." He added, "It seems now we'll be getting quick access interview subjects."

In a separate news release, HP announced that it will hold a press conference Friday where CEO Mark Hurd and lawyers from Morgan, Lewis & Bockius will address the leaks investigation. The press release states that Morgan Lewis was retained on Sept. 8 by HP to conduct a "comprehensive analysis of the leak investigations." It also notes that, "Morgan Lewis also is representing HP in connection with several government inquiries." The press release does not mention Wilson Sonsini's involvement for HP.

Donovan refused to clarify if Wilson continues to advise the HP board of directors in other aspects of the leaks investigation. He did emphasize, however, that "Hewlett-Packard and Wilson Sonsini continue to enjoy a strong relationship."

Wilson Sonsini spokesperson Courtney Dorman confirmed the HP statement. "We all agree it was the right decision," she wrote in an e-mail. She added, "Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati will continue to have a relationship with HP," but declined to say more.

Brosnahan: Don't Blame HP Chair, She's Not A Lawyer (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, September 22, 2006

Don't blame Hewlett-Packard Chairman Patricia Dunn, her new lawyer said Wednesday, for the convulsions the company's board have suffered in the wake of its troubled investigation of boardroom leaks.

"She's neither a lawyer nor is she an investigator," said James Brosnahan, the Morrison & Foerster litigator whom Dunn hired this week. "And she's not the kind of person, frankly, who would advise people to do something illegal."

Dunn has come under scrutiny for her role in directing the troubled probe -- The Wall Street Journal reported Wednesday that she closely supervised it -- and she's the latest figure in the imbroglio to get a big-name lawyer in response to multiple government investigations.

Brosnahan, long-known for handling high-profile clients -- including John Walker Lindh, the Marin County man once charged with fighting for the Taliban -- will represent Dunn before a congressional subcommittee and in the state and federal investigations into HP's probe of board members, journalists and employees.

The company's leak probe became public earlier this month, when The Journal reported that HP director Tom Perkins had resigned in protest of the methods used, which included "pretexting" -- or lying -- in calls to phone company officials in order to gain access to board members' phone records.

Reached Wednesday afternoon as he was in transit from a San Jose, Calif., trial to Dunn's induction dinner for the Bay Area Business Hall of Fame, Brosnahan said his client was trying to plug a troubling hole in HP's corporate security, and had relied on others to make sure the methods were legal.

The leak "was causing havoc in the securities market at the time, disrupting the ability to have business strategies vis a vis competitors," said Brosnahan.

In response, he said, Dunn ordered the investigation, relying on others to execute it. Once complete information about the probe comes out, Brosnahan said, Dunn's role will seem less problematic, even to skeptics.

"When the full story is out and clear, they will see she was pursuing a legitimate goal," he said. "She's confident, as am I, that she's not a good candidate for prosecution."

Thomas Carlucci, a Foley & Lardner partner and former federal prosecutor not involved in the case, said Dunn should be able to mount a strong defense by saying she relied on advice of counsel.

"We can all question her judgment about doing the investigation in the first place, but in the pretexting," he said, "I've got to believe she's relying on her general counsel or outside lawyers."

HP's general counsel, Ann Baskins, has hired Berkeley, Calif., defense lawyer Cristina Arguedas. Another in-house lawyer, HP ethics director Kevin Hunsaker, is represented by San Diego solo Michael Pancer. Arguedas could not be reached for comment by press time.

Larry Sonsini, the high-powered Silicon Valley lawyer who has long advised HP, has hired Michael Madigan, a Washington, D.C.-based partner at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, in connection with a congressional subcommittee hearing later this month.

Sonsini investigated the methods used by HP to plumb the leaks and has long been the board's outside adviser, a role which continued after the news of the leak probe broke. The Journal reported last week that Sonsini led the board discussions that culminated last week in Dunn's decision to relinquish her role as chair at the end of the year.

It isn't clear if Sonsini and his firm will continue in that role. When asked about this, Wilson Sonsini spokeswoman Courtney Dorman provided the following written statement: "Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati will continue to have a relationship with HP."

Ryan Donovan, a spokesman for Hewlett-Packard, said Wednesday that he wasn't able to answer questions about the company's relationship with Wilson Sonsini by The Recorder's deadline.

Susan Beck, a senior writer at The American Lawyer, contributed to this story.

HP's Dunn Toasted At Gala Dinner (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, September 22, 2006

Chairman receives warm welcome, standing ovation when accepting award from advocacy group that touts business ethics.

SAN FRANCISCO--Hewlett-Packard's embattled chairman, Patricia Dunn, accepted a "hall of fame" leadership award at a gala dinner here on Wednesday night where she received a standing ovation from local executives.

The applause and paeans to a long and successful career seemed to gratify Dunn, who has been the subject of ongoing criticism and media scrutiny since reports in the last two weeks revealed that she had called for and perhaps helped to direct an intrusive probe into boardroom leaks.

Dunn thanked the Bay Area Council, a regional business lobbying and networking group, for "courage in standing by your decision (to grant the award) in such unexpected circumstances." The council's board of directors includes representatives of Wells Fargo, Pacific Gas & Electric, Bank of America, and the law firm Pillsbury Winthrop Shaw Pittman.

"All I will say about the maelstrom is that I look forward eagerly, in the near future, to the time when I can set the record straight and go back to leading my life as discreetly as possible," Dunn said during her after-dinner speech.

HP's investigative practices have become the subject of criminal probes by the U.S. Justice Department and the California attorney general. The U.S. House of Representatives has scheduled a hearing for Sept. 28 where Dunn is expected to testify. HP's investigators accessed the phone records of more than a dozen people, including three CNET News.com reporters, and apparently engaged in physical surveillance and sending bogus e-mail tips.

The bizarre juxtaposition of receiving a leadership award from an organization that stresses business ethics and good corporate governance was not lost on Dunn, who said she's aware of the "irony of being inducted into the Bay Area Business Hall of Fame."

But for the most part, other dinner speakers offered plaudits to Dunn--there was even a slideshow with her high school yearbook photo--with only passing references to her recent troubles.

David Zenoff, chairman of Larkin Street Youth Services, applauded "her strong sense of humanity, high standards and doing the right thing." (Dunn and her husband are major donors to the nonprofit organization, which seeks to help homeless youth in San Francisco.)

Dunn "epitomizes the special spirit and qualities that our country and the Bay Area have long cherished," Zenoff said.

"Without the leadership our Bay Area Hall of Fame honors, we would be in a heck of a mess," said Alexander Mehran, CEO of the Sunset Development Company and the council's chairman.

Mehran did joke, however, that news reports have painted Dunn as the "new J. Edgar Hoover of Silicon Valley."

Dunn capped her speech with a joke as well. She said "it wouldn't hurt if the pope continued to make controversial comments"--which might get her name off the front page.

According to an HP spokesman on Thursday, CEO Mark Hurd--who has now been linked to the investigation--did not attend the dinner. (News.com was unable to verify who was present at the head table on Wednesday night because reporters were required to stand in the back of the hotel ballroom in a roped-off area.) The Washington Post reported on its Web site late Wednesday night that Hurd approved of an elaborate sting operation aimed at deceiving News.com reporter Dawn Kawamoto.

A second unlikely juxtaposition was Dunn sharing a stage with Bill Keller, the executive editor of The New York Times, which had at least one of its reporters "pretexted" by HP investigators. But Keller, who spoke afterward, stuck to a prepared script about national security and journalism.

Correction:Due to incorrect information provided by the Bay Area Council, the original story misstated who was sitting at the head table at a dinner honoring Hewlett-Packard chairman Patricia Dunn. An HP representative said on Thursday that CEO Mark Hurd did not attend the dinner.

Senators Press Probe Of Gemstar Ex-CEO (LAT/BLOOM)

From Bloomberg News

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

Gemstar-TV Guide International Inc. has enlisted two U.S. senators to press the Justice Department to speed up its investigation into what role the company's former chief executive, Henry Yuen, played in a $248-million accounting fraud.

Democratic Sens. Charles E. Schumer of New York and Dianne Feinstein of California wrote Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales to inquire about the government's case against Yuen, who withdrew eight months ago from a plea agreement with federal prosecutors in Los Angeles after a federal judge said the deal was too lenient. The senators also forwarded a letter from Gemstar's general counsel warning that a legal deadline to charge Yuen was approaching.

The Yuen case "may raise some questions about the adequacy of tools available to prosecutors to fight corporate wrongdoing," Schumer wrote in his Sept. 13 letter to Gonzales.

Gemstar's stock price has fallen about 76% since the fraud was revealed in April 2002. The Hollywood-based company, controlled by Rupert Murdoch's News Corp., publishes TV Guide magazine and is the largest provider of software for cable television program guides.

While saying he didn't want to interfere, Schumer added, "It is important that Congress be kept well-informed about this and other similar cases so we can monitor the enforcement of the laws designed to protect average Americans from the type of conduct of which Mr. Yuen has been accused."

Feinstein, who wrote Gonzales on Aug. 23, said, "I do not believe it is appropriate for me to intervene in prosecutorial decisions," but the Gemstar general counsel's letter "does raise some serious allegations."

The letters ratchet up a campaign by Gemstar to have Yuen sent to prison for his role in the fraud. The company, which has paid more than $100 million in civil settlements and attorneys' fees in connection with the accounting missteps, has taken the unusual stance that it is a victim of Yuen's alleged crimes.

Yuen has already been sanctioned for securities fraud in a civil case brought by the Securities and Exchange Commission. In May, a federal judge ordered him to pay $22.3 million — one of the largest penalties against an individual in an accounting case — for misleading investors and Gemstar's auditors while inflating the company's revenue from 1999 to 2002. Yuen is appealing.

Gemstar General Counsel Stephen Kay, in his letter to the senators, asked them "to do whatever you can to ensure that this case receives the attention it deserves so that the decision about whether or not to prosecute Mr. Yuen will be well-reasoned rather than the product of inexplicable neglect."

He said that most, if not all, potential charges against Yuen would be barred by March 2007 because of the statute of limitations on such offenses.

Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for U.S. Atty. Debra Yang in Los Angeles, who has been supervising the Yuen case, would not make further comments, saying, "The matter is still under investigation." Yuen's attorney Brian Maas declined to comment on the Justice Department probe. He said Yuen was still fighting Gemstar to collect his severance, about $30 million.

Cablevision Gave Backdated Grant To Dead Official (WSJ)

By Peter Grant, James Bandler And Charles Forelle

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Cablevision Systems Corp. awarded options to a vice chairman after his 1999 death but backdated them, making it appear the grant was awarded when he still was alive, according to a company filing and people familiar with the matter.

The country's fifth-largest cable operator in terms of subscribers also improperly awarded a compensation consultant options but accounted for them as if he were an employee, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission filing, citing the results of a six-week investigation by an outside law firm.

The findings of the probe were released yesterday as the Bethpage, N.Y., company restated its financial results and said two of its directors had stepped down from posts on the board's audit and compensation committees as part of an escalating investigation into its improper granting of stock options.

The company also said it had received a grand jury subpoena in connection with an investigation into its options practices from the U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of New York.

The improprieties regarding the deceased executive -- Vice Chairman Marc Lustgarten, who died in 1999 -- and a compensation consultant are among the more unusual allegations of abuse that have surfaced in the scores of investigations that have been launched this year over improper stock-options practices. About 100 companies are under federal investigation for possibly backdating or otherwise manipulating stock-option grants to secretly boost their value.

DOJ_NMG_0067191

Stock options give recipients the right to purchase shares at a fixed exercise price, usually the market price on the day the options were granted. Backdating typically involves pretending the grant was made on an earlier date, when prices were lower, thus increasing the potential value of options.

Cablevision backdated options from 1997 to 2002, according to its SEC filing. In practically all cases the share prices were lower, "sometimes substantially lower," on the option awards than they were on the actual date options were granted, the filing said. "The company's board of directors and senior management believe that the practices...are contrary to the high ethical standards they believe should apply," the filing stated.

Cablevision announced on Aug. 8 that it was launching the options probe, would restate earnings and would delay reporting its results for the second quarter. The company also has said it is under investigation by the SEC as well as the U.S. attorney's office.

Cablevision's filing didn't address how many options were tainted, who received the options or whether executives holding backdated options would be forced to surrender them or reimburse shareholders. The filing also didn't identify the outside law firm that led the investigation, though it said the firm wasn't involved in the stock-option-grant process. It also didn't say whether the firm had advised Cablevision in other matters. Regulators and law-enforcement officials have been skeptical of probes that aren't conducted by independent, outside firms.

Earlier company filings show that Cablevision awarded at least 2.9 million options from 1997 to 2002 to at least five executives, including Chief Executive James Dolan and to Mr. Lustgarten, who died in 1999 of pancreatic cancer at the age of 52.

In its filing, Cablevision said only that an "executive officer" had received backdated options after his death. People familiar with the matter identified Mr. Lustgarten as that executive. He received at least 400,000 options from 1997 to 1999, according to filings. Besides being Cablevision's chief negotiator, Mr. Lustgarten was a close confidant of James Dolan and of his father, the founder of the company, Charles Dolan.

It remains unclear which of the options grants to Mr. Lustgarten was backdated. In its 2000 proxy statement, the company said it had granted options to four other senior executives carrying a date of Aug. 2, 1999, which was four weeks before Mr. Lustgarten's death. The proxy didn't include Mr. Lustgarten's name among those executives.

It wasn't clear when the options granted to Mr. Lustgarten posthumously were dated and whether they were exercised. Mr. Lustgarten's estate was entitled to exercise all his stock options upon his death, according to his 1994 employment agreement. A Cablevision spokesman declined to provide details. The co-executor of Mr. Lustgarten's estate, Robert S. Lemle, who also is a former general counsel of Cablevision, couldn't be reached for comment.

Harvey Pitt, former chairman of the SEC, called the grant to the deceased executive "really bizarre" and "absolutely crazy."

John Coffee, a professor of law at Columbia University, noted that options are intended to create an incentive for executives to boost their company's stock price. "Trying to incentivize a corpse suggests they were not complying with the spirit of shareholder-approved stock-option plans," he said.

The filing didn't identify the compensation consultant that was paid in options, but stated that the award was cancelled in 2003. It isn't clear whether those options were backdated. The company did say it improperly accounted for the grant as if the consultant was an employee. The company also said the consultant "directly participated in the options dating process."

The consultant and officers of the company who participated in the improper options dating "have either retired or had their relationship with the company otherwise terminated" more than a year before the options investigation began, Cablevision said in its filing.

The two board members who relinquished committee posts were Richard Hochman, who stepped down from the compensation and audit committees, and Victor Oristano, who left the audit committee. The two directors, who served on those committees during the period in question, sent letters to Cablevision Wednesday stating that they were making the moves "in light of the public attention" over the options investigation and the "numerous shareholder lawsuits" that name them, among others, as defendants, the company's filing states. Both remain directors.

DOJ_NMG_0067192

The company restated its earnings for 2003 through 2005 and the first quarter of 2006. The results all were adjusted to show the cumulative impact of the improper options dating and other noncash compensation items, from 1997 to March 2006, which decreased net income in that period by a total of $89.2 million.

At 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading yesterday, Cablevision was down two cents, or 0.1%, to $22.99.

Brian Foley, a White Plains, N.Y., compensation consultant, said that while the dollar amounts of the restatement were relatively small compared with restatements at other companies with stock-options timing issues, he was surprised by the depth and range of the problems unearthed by the investigation.

"Once you take the lid off and look inside, you realize that the short rubber boots aren't going to do and you need the hip-waders," Mr. Foley said. "How could you have this many things go awry?"

Cablevision yesterday also reported its second-quarter earnings, which had been delayed by the probe. The company earned $14.6 million, or 5 cents a share, compared with $213.8 million, or 74 cents a share, during the same period in 2005, when earnings were boosted by an asset swap between Cablevision and News Corp. that resulted in a $332 million cash gain for the cable operator. Second-quarter revenue was $1.42 billion, up from a restated $1.23 billion in 2005 on strong sales of digital video, phone and high-speed Internet connections.

SEC Tightens Hedge Fund Scrutiny (FT)

By Jeremy Grant

Financial Times, September 22, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission is tightening scrutiny of hedge funds by stepping up examination of the links between hedge funds and broker-dealers, particularly where they are owned by a hedge fund, a senior SEC official said.

The move is a sign that the SEC continues to find ways to regulate hedge funds after a US court federal court in June overturned an SEC rule forcing hedge fund advisers to register with the agency.

Walter Ricciardi, deputy director of enforcement, said: “I think some of the problems we’ve seen with hedge funds, one of the risk factors, red flags, is where they have their own broker-dealer.

“That creates quite a conflict in the sense that investors’ money is sitting there and a hedge fund decides to trade through their own broker-dealer and [the hedge fund] gets a fee for such trading.

“It gives them an incentive to run up trading fees. It may not be in the best interests of investors,” he told the Financial Times.

While the SEC’s office of compliance already conducts routine inspection of broker-dealers, Mr Ricciardi said the enforcement division – which is focused on alleged wrongdoing in the securities markets – was “stepping up [the focus] on hedge funds”.

The SEC took similar steps in the wake of the collapse of Long Term Capital Management in 1998.

The timing of the fresh scrutiny comes as Amaranth Advisors, a hedge-fund manager that lost over $6bn in the past month, has become the second largest hedge fund loss since LTCM.

Last week, SEC enforcement chief Linda Thomsen said the SEC had used similar tactics to unearth evidence about late trading and market timing in mutual funds by hedge funds.

“The regulated entities [broker-dealers] are our window into hedge funds,” she said.

“Everybody’s doing business with them. We’re going to find out what they’re doing through what we can see.”

Mr Ricciardi said that hedge funds’ fee structures might have “attracted some miscreants”. “Probably the vast majority of hedge fund managers are very honest traders but in any environment where there is that much money and that much incentive to cheat you’re going to have some bad apples,” he said.

The types of issues that the SEC had seen revolved around evidence that trades might not have occurred, even though they were being recorded as having taken place, he added.

“You have statements coming from the hedge fund to investors and there may not be sufficient controls over that process. We’ve seen some instances where it’s just a phoney statement and the investments shown on the statements do not exist.

DOJ_NMG_0067193

"A good question to ask is whether there are third party administrators to check to see that the investments are real and properly priced," Mr Ricciardi said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Fitzgerald Given Way Out Of Libby CIA Leak Case (MSNBC)

By Joel Seidman, Producer

MSNBC, September 22, 2006

Judge says he can dismiss case if classified secrets will be revealed

WASHINGTON - The judge in the CIA leak case ruled Thursday that if Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald feels that admitting certain classified documents at the upcoming trial of I Lewis "Scooter" Libby can jeopardize national security, Fitzgerald can then move to dismiss the perjury charges against Libby.

Judge Reggie Walton cannot automatically allow classified materials to be admitted at trial. He first must go through a series of closed hearings under CIPA regulations. CIPA, the Classified Information Procedures Act, protects and restricts the discovery of classified information in a way that does not impair the defendant's right to a fair trial. It also allows the government to propose a redacted version of a classified document as a substitution for the original, having deleted only non-relevant classified information.

In his ruling this morning, the Judge Walton, has given a technical legal victory to Libby's attorneys concerning the admissibility of classified materials they want to present at trial for their defense.

Three-part test

The issue concerns determining a standard for which the judge will review these secret documents, in a series of closed hearings later this month, to determine the use, relevance, or admissibility of classified information.

Fitzgerald argues that because of the sensitive national security value of the classified materials, a special three part test must apply before determining if a document can be admitted at trial.

That test, according to Fitzgerald, must include: (1) that the document is relevant; (2) that the document is "helpful to the defense," and (3) that the defendant's interest in disclosure of the document outweighs the government's need to protect the classified information.

Victory for Libby

Walton disagreed with Fitzgerald and favored Libby's attorney's argument that in reviewing the classified material to be presented at the hearing, he must simply apply the Federal Rules of Evidence.

Walton also suggested that, "if the government is still not satisfied that the classified information is adequately protected at the conclusion of these hearings, the government has the power to preclude entirely the introduction at trial of the classified information. While invocation of this option may require dismissal of this case."

Walton argues against adopting the balancing test proposed by the government, because it, "could infringe on the defendant's constitutional right to put on a defense by preventing him from introducing relevant and otherwise admissible evidence at his trial because the government's interest in nondisclosure was considered of greater significance."

Crush of national security work

While is it not publicly known which classified materials are at issue, Libby's attorneys have requested and have been given in recent months two batches of summaries and redacted versions of classified morning intelligence briefings which Libby attended with Vice President Cheney in 2003.

Libby's attorneys wish to present at trial a picture of their client as being overwhelmed by the crush of critical national security work at the White House — a client who may have misremembered, what they wish to portray as insignificant, the identity of former ambassador Joseph Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame who was a CIA employee at the time. Using certain classified documents at trial his lawyers could underscore that Libby was involved with important work at the time of the Plame leak.

Crux of the case

DOJ_NMG_0067194

Fitzgerald's case rests on the premise that Libby lied to the FBI and to a grand jury about his own conversations with reporters confirming that Plame worked for the CIA and was somehow responsible for her husband's fact finding trips to Africa in search of proof about Iraq's alleged quest for fissile materials. Wilson wrote in a New York Times op-ed, in July 2003, that that quest did not exist, and that the administration was "twisting" the facts about Iraq's determination to procure Niger's yellowcake.

Fitzgerald has said in court filings that the Plame leak from Libby was orchestrated specifically to undermine the credibility of Wilson's public pronouncements — which Fitzgerald says consumed the vice president's office for several weeks in the summer of 2002.

Libby was charged in October, 2005 with lying to the FBI and a federal grand jury about how he learned the name of CIA officer Valerie Plame and when he subsequently told three reporters about her. He faces five counts of perjury, making false statements and obstruction of justice. Libby's trial is scheduled to begin Jan. 17, 2007.

Judge Rules For Cheney Aide (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

A federal judge ruled in favor of Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff in a fight over release of classified information in the Valerie Wilson case. The judge, Reggie B. Walton of Federal District Court, decided that he would not impose strict standards sought by prosecutors who wanted to limit the classified information used in the trial of the aide, I. Lewis Libby Jr. Judge Walton said that once he rules on which evidence is relevant government lawyers could propose parts to be blacked out or summarized. Mr. Libby is accused of lying to the authorities about discussions he had with reporters about Ms. Wilson's job at the Central Intelligence Agency.

Limits Used In Terror Cases Are Imposed On A Mob Figure (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

Alberto R. Gonzales, the United States attorney general, has imposed a set of highly restrictive rules generally reserved for terror suspects on an imprisoned mob figure who is under investigation for plotting to kill a federal judge, a prosecutor and three Mafia turncoats, prosecutors disclosed yesterday.

The move was the latest development in an increasingly bizarre case. The mob figure in the case, Vincent Basciano, has contended that a list he wrote naming the judge and the others was not part of a murder plot, as prosecutors have asserted, but an effort to use a mystical religion to improve his chances at his forthcoming trial, at which he could face the death penalty.

The disclosure that Mr. Gonzales had imposed the measures was made at a hearing in United States District Court in Brooklyn. The judge in the case, Nicholas G. Garaufis, who prosecutors have said was one of Mr. Basciano's targets, also unsealed a transcript from an Aug. 28 hearing at which the investigation and the list were discussed.

In July, Mr. Basciano provided the list to a fellow inmate at the Metropolitan Correctional Center in Manhattan who, unknown to Mr. Basciano, was cooperating with the authorities. Prosecutors have said Mr. Basciano indicated to the inmate that he wanted the people on the list killed.

The transcript of the Aug. 28 hearing provided additional details about what Mr. Basciano, known as Vinny Gorgeous, has said was his effort to use Santeria, a Caribbean religion, to influence the outcome of the trial.

One of Mr. Basciano's lawyers, James Kousouros, said at the August hearing that the inmate approached Mr. Basciano and told him that his mother was a Santeria "priestess."

The inmate "told Mr. Basciano to make a list of everybody involved, put it in your right shoe, stamp five times every day during the trial and it will help," Mr. Kousouros said. He did not explain why Mr. Basciano instead gave the list to the inmate.

The restrictive rules, known as special administrative measures, severely limit Mr. Basciano's phone and mail privileges, visits and communications with people other than his lawyers.

The measures, which were developed in 1996, have been carried out about 40 times, all but about 15 times in terrorism cases, according to Jaclyn Lesch, a Justice Department spokeswoman.

DOJ_NMG_0067195

In one of the most high-profile cases, they were imposed on Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman, a Muslim cleric serving a life sentence for planning to bomb New York City landmarks. The sheik's lawyer, Lynne F. Stewart, was convicted last year of aiding terrorism by smuggling messages from the sheik to his followers, and of lying when she pledged to abide by the special rules.

Only the attorney general can impose the rules.

At the hearing yesterday, John Buretta, an assistant United States attorney, suggested that the measures were meant to prevent Mr. Basciano from communicating what prosecutors believe are his ill intentions.

Mr. Kousouros asked the judge to hold a hearing with testimony from the other inmate, who has not been identified. He also indicated that he might seek to have the judge recuse himself.

Judge Garaufis said that before he could determine whether to hold a hearing, Mr. Basciano's lawyers must consult with their client and decide whether they will seek to have him removed from the case.

Mr. Basciano was convicted earlier this year of racketeering conspiracy, but the jury deadlocked on a murder charge.

Defense: Reputed Mobster Used Santeria Ritual (NEWSDAY)

By ANTHONY M. DESTEFANO, NEWSDAY STAFF WRITER

Newsday, September 22, 2006

Well, at least he didn't try sticking pins in a voodoo doll.

Eager to seek an edge in his recent racketeering trial, reputed Bonanno crime family member Vincent Basciano was told by a fellow jail inmate to place a list with names of the prosecutor, trial judge and witnesses in his shoe and stomp his foot five times to get good luck.

The resulting list that Basciano drew up to carry out the ritual was simply part of a Santeria-related method and not a hit list as prosecutors have suspected, his defense attorneys said Thursday.

Basciano, at one time the acting street boss of the Bonanno crime family, is under investigation for allegedly creating the list and in "sum and substance" giving it to his fellow inmate to seek the murder of the listed persons, Brooklyn federal prosecutors have stated in court papers.

Named on the list were assistant U.S. attorney Greg Andres, who prosecuted Basciano earlier this year; federal judge Nicholas Garaufis; disgraced attorney Tom Lee; and mob turncoats Dominick Cicale and James Tartaglione, court papers stated.

But while prosecutors put a sinister spin on the list and Basciano's attempt to seek magical intervention, his lawyers say that wasn't the case at all.

During a court hearing Thursday and in interviews, Basciano's attorneys related how their client was seeking Santeria help and not seeking murders.

Santeria is an amalgamation of African religion and Roman Catholicism that uses magic. Adherents seek out a babalawo, also known as a godfather, and a santera, or godmother, for help when in desperate straits.

"He is not denying he came up with the list, but it's not like he called up Lucca Brazzi," defense attorney Ephraim Savitt told Newsday, referring to the fictional hit man in the film "The Godfather."

Savitt, who stated the ritual was Santeria-like, said that the idea of preparing the list came from a fellow inmate of Basciano's at the federal detention center in Manhattan. The unidentified inmate was originally from the Caribbean and was facing drug charges, said Savitt. Basciano put stock in the idea and gave him the list, said the attorney.

The Santeria explanation first came up in a sealed courtroom hearing last month when the investigation of Basciano first surfaced. In a transcript of the hearing unsealed Thursday by Garaufis, it was defense attorney James Kousouros who first explained how Basciano was approached for the list by the inmate.

"This inmate, the person we believe to be this inmate, is somebody who approached our client and told him that this mother is some priestess for [Santeria]," said Kousouros and "told Mr. Basciano to make a list of everybody involved, put it in your right shoe, stamp five times every day during the trial and it will help."

Kousouros said there were other witnesses who could corroborate Basciano's story. Savitt told Newsday that there was even a second list that had names of defense attorneys on it.

Thursday prosecutors Thomas Buretta and Winston Chan disclosed in court that the probe of Basciano and the list was continuing. Buretta said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales had approved holding the defendant under special administrative measures, very strict detention standards usually reserved for terrorists.

Savitt said Basciano is allowed visits from his wife, as well as a woman friend with whom he had another child, a complicated domestic situation that had previously been disclosed in court papers.

Attorneys Deny Allegations Client Plotted To Kill Judge (LAW)

By Tom Perrotta, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, September 22, 2006

Attorneys for a former Mafia boss who might face the death penalty in an upcoming trial expressed dismay Wednesday at the unsealing of court documents that reveal their client, Vincent Basciano, is under investigation for a potential plot to kill a federal judge.

The attorneys, James Kousouros and Ephraim Savitt, said they would ask for an evidentiary hearing into the alleged plot against Eastern District Judge Nicholas G. Garaufis, which Kousouros said did not exist. Kousouros said it was "very unfortunate" that he was not notified by federal prosecutors that the document was going to be made public late Tuesday evening.

"I'm not saying we were entitled to notice," Kousouros said. "We have to now consider motions for recusal. This now creates a mess."

He said the unsealed papers could taint the jury pool, and might contribute to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' decision on whether the government will seek the death penalty.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Winston Chan said he would not comment, as the investigation into the plot is still active.

Judge Garaufis scheduled a hearing for noon Thursday to discuss the matter.

In May, Judge Garaufis presided over Basciano's conviction on racketeering charges; the jury did not reach a verdict on murder charges. Basciano may face the death penalty in an upcoming trial, also before Garaufis, for allegedly conspiring to kill a federal prosecutor.

On Tuesday, federal prosecutors asked the judge to unseal a letter they submitted to the court and defense counsel on Aug. 28. The letter detailed another possible murder plot, this time against Garaufis, and included several pages of correspondence written by Basciano.

One document was a list of names that prosecutors said Basciano gave to an unnamed inmate who was cooperating with the government, indicating, "in sum and substance," that he wanted the individuals on the list to be murdered. Garaufis was second on the list, after Assistant U.S. Attorney Greg Andres, the prosecutor at the center of the previous plot in which Basciano is accused.

Basciano's attorneys contend that their client passed the list to an inmate because he thought the inmate had a connection to Santeria, a Caribbean religion. A priest or priestess of the religion, Basciano believed, could bless Basciano and make people tell the truth about him.

"It was utter foolishness," Kousouros said. "[Prosecutors] know he believes in this hocus-pocus nonsense."

The investigation into a possible threat against Garaufis was the subject of a closed hearing on Aug. 28. Basciano's attorneys said Wednesday that they were surprised that the investigation was made public while it was still pending.

"I don't understand what the rush was to go ahead and reveal something like this," Savitt said. "I don't think it helps to disclose information that you are still investigating. I just can't understand why it's being done."

However, Savitt said he did not necessarily think that the incident required Garaufis to recuse himself from the case, especially if prosecutors conclude that the list was not threatening.

"I believe that if the investigation reveals what really happened here, there's no question that the judge can continue on this case," Savitt said.

The U.S. Marshals Service for the Eastern District would not say whether Garaufis had been given additional security. Chief Deputy Timothy E. Hogan said the office had been working on the case for a number of months, in concert with the Federal Bureau of Investigations.

DOJ_NMG_0067197

"Based on the information we have, we take what precautions we feel necessary," Hogan said.

FBI Raid Targets County Job Files (CHIT)

By Mickey Ciokajlo, Robert Becker And Jeff Coen

Chicago Tribune, September 22, 2006

FBI agents fanned out across Cook County on Thursday with grand jury subpoenas and a search warrant, probing deep into the role clout plays in county hiring.

The investigation, quietly under way since late last year, burst dramatically into public view Thursday morning. The flurry of activity indicated that federal prosecutors are now taking a hard look at clout and hiring in Cook County, even as they are investigating state hiring by the Blagojevich administration and city hiring by the Daley administration.

More than a dozen agents descended on the County Building around 9 a.m. Thursday to search the county's human resources bureau, where hiring and personnel records are kept. Agents remained all day in the 8th floor office at 118 N. Clark St.

In addition to the search warrant, agents delivered subpoenas for documents related to hiring at departments throughout the county. Subpoenas went to county health facilities, the Highway Department and the Cook County Forest Preserve District.

In a statement, Cook County Board President Bobbie Steele said the county would cooperate fully in responding to subpoenas delivered to various departments. Steele also said the human resources bureau was cooperating with the execution of the search warrant.

"I am committed to doing what is necessary to root out any problems," Steele's statement said. Steele assumed the office Aug. 1, replacing John Stroger, who had suffered a stroke.

The subpoenas seek documents related to "non-exempt" jobs, Steele said. Under a court order known as the Shakman decree, those positions are supposed to be filled on the basis of qualifications, not political influence.

Mayor Richard Daley's patronage chief, Robert Sorich, and three other former city officials were convicted of committing fraud and other crimes to circumvent the decades-old Shakman decree, which first applied to the City of Chicago and later to Cook County.

The federal investigation into the city's hiring is still under way.

Prosecutors are also engaged in a broad probe of hiring under Gov. Rod Blagojevich, who has acknowledged being interviewed by federal authorities.

In June, U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald sent a letter to Illinois Atty. Gen. Lisa Madigan saying his office has developed a number of credible witnesses in its investigation of allegations of "endemic hiring fraud" in multiple state agencies.

Though Thursday was the first public indication that the federal government is investigating hiring practices in Cook County, sources familiar with the investigation said the probe got under way in late 2005.

The sources said the search warrant was issued specifically for the human resources bureau because that is an area where records are concentrated.

The affidavit outlining the reason for seeking the search warrant is under seal.

Cheryl Cato, spokeswoman for the county's health bureau, said agents visited a number of its facilities early Thursday, including Stroger, Provident, Oak Forest and Cermak Hospitals.

"I don't know if they've taken anything," Cato said.

The flurry of activity on Thursday came about two weeks after Steele placed Gerald Nichols, who had been Stroger's patronage chief, on paid suspension.

Steele's actions followed a Chicago Sun-Times article in which a county highway supervisor claimed Nichols pressured him to hire a political ally of Stroger's.

The government's investigation quickly became an issue in the Nov. 7 election for County Board president.

Republican candidate Tony Peraica, a county commissioner, held an impromptu news conference outside the human resources office while agents searched inside. Peraica's Democratic opponent, Chicago Ald. Todd Stroger (8th), is John Stroger's son.

DOJ_NMG_0067198

"Clearly this is just the tip of the iceberg," Peraica said. "There's a criminal conspiracy here that has been going on for quite some time to falsify job applications, to alter test scores, to hire unqualified individuals, principally from the 8th Ward."

Todd Stroger suggested the federal activity was linked to a motion filed by Michael Shakman, the lawyer whose lawsuit led to the Shakman decree. Shakman returned to federal court in recent weeks to request the appointment of a federal monitor to oversee county hiring.

Stroger said he was not surprised by the investigation, and he added, "I don't think it's a surprise to many people. And I don't know what they are looking for or what they will find."

Stroger sought to distance himself from the federal probe.

"That's my father's administration," said Stroger, who was speaking at a news conference on an unrelated matter when the news broke of the federal search. "At this point, I am a city councilman and that is the job I've been doing."

County Commissioner Forrest Claypool, who lost to John Stroger in the March Democratic primary, said he was not surprised that the federal government is now probing hiring at the county.

"County government has been a patronage dumping ground for years, a place where unqualified politically connected people have been dumped by the thousands," Claypool said. "It wouldn't surprise me if lines were crossed and laws were broken in the hiring practices in Cook County.

"It's sad that reform at the county government is likely to come through law enforcement rather than through the political process," Claypool added. "We've known for years about these problems and very little has been done about it."

Shakman, too, wasn't surprised by the federal government actions, alleging the county has been engaged in violating his civil court order much as the city of Chicago was.

At a court hearing last week, a federal judge allowed the county time to respond in writing to Shakman's recent motion for a monitor to oversee county hiring, like with the city.

"The county seemed to be engaged in the same kind of systematic violation of court orders that the city engaged in, and it seemed that nobody at the county was prepared to supervise hiring to make sure it was nonpolitical," Shakman said.

Tribune staff reporters Brendan McCarthy, Todd Lighty, Laurie Cohen, Dan Mihalopoulos and Gary Washburn contributed to this report.

FBI Raids Cook County Office (CHIST)

By ABDON M. PALLASCH, NATASHA KORECKI, STEVE PATTERSON AND ERIC HERMAN, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, September 22, 2006

FBI agents descended on Cook County government offices this morning, serving a search warrant in an investigation that apparently centers on county hiring practices.

FBI agents could be seen carrying boxes of documents out of the Cook County Human Resources Department at 118 N. Clark St., as county human resources director Mark Kilgallon and county general counsel Laura Lechowicz Felicione looked on.

“We are fully cooperating” with the investigation, Felicione said.

While the seizure of documents proceeded downtown, federal agents served the search warrant at other county offices, too — including Provident Hospital, Cermak Hospital and the forest preserve district.

The federal agents hit the county offices starting at 9:15 a.m.

FBI spokesman Ross Rice said the search warrant is tied to a criminal affidavit that is under seal. “We’re looking for possible evidence of a crime,” Rice said. No arrests have been made and no charges filed, Rice said.

The search warrant comes one month after the Chicago Sun-Times reported that county officials said they routinely were told to hire politically connected candidates for county jobs over candidates who scored higher on civil service exams. A Cook County Highway Department supervisor, Eric Petraitis, said he felt coerced to change test scores to hire candidates connected to former Cook County Board President John Stroger.

Following that report, County Board President Bobbie Steele ordered the suspension, with pay, of Stroger’s patronage chief, Gerald Nichols, and four lower-level employees responsible for administering employment tests.

DOJ_NMG_0067199

The Sun-Times also reported in late August that nearly 1,300 people were added to the Cook County payroll in the months after Stroger suffered a stroke. Stroger's campaign manager and his chief of staff's daughter were among those added to the payroll — even amid a hiring freeze — and more than a dozen others with ties to powerful political machines were also hired.

In response to the reports, attorney Michael Shakman went to federal court seeking to have a federal monitor appointed to oversee county hiring.

Steele didn't show up to a 12:30 p.m. news conference on the FBI activity, as she said she would. But her spokeswoman read a two-sentence statement saying Steele had been advised not to talk about the case, but her office is "fully cooperating."

Ald. Todd Stroger, who is running to succeed his father John and replace Steele, said the raid was not a surprise and that he believes it was connected to a motion filed by Shakman asking that a federal monitor oversee county hiring.

''I believe that everyone expected the federal government would come in the county building and Mr. Shakman has been saying there's problems and I believe he's been over to federal court,'' Todd Stroger, the Democratic candidate for County Board president, told reporters. ''And I don't know what they are looking for or what they will find,'' he said.

He also called the county's hiring system antiquated and said it needs to be revamped.

Todd Stroger's Republican opponent, Anthony Peraica, said the raid stems from what he called a ''criminal conspiracy to deny the rights of well-qualified persons and applicants jobs that were instead given to the politically connected.''

''Test scores were rigged, applications were falsified in order to allow hiring of clearly unqualified individuals, some with criminal histories,'' Peraica said.

FBI Raids Cook County HR Office (WMAQ-TV)

WMAQ-TV, September 22, 2006

CHICAGO -- The FBI conducted a search inside an office of the Cook County Building Thursday morning, NBC5 reported.

Federal investigators executed a search warrant at the offices of the county Bureau of Human Resources at 118 N. Clark St.

Agents executed a search warrant at 9 a.m. at Cook County's Bureau of Human Resources, FBI spokeswoman Cynthia Yates said. The search was part of an ongoing investigation, but Yates declined to say what the investigation was about.

NBC5's Phil Rogers reported that agents may have accessed the office's computer servers, looking for information about hiring practices and possibly the testing of Cook County employees.

Allegations have arisen that tests were rigged or changed to favor political cronies in the John H. Stroger administration, Rogers reported.

Chicago Mayor Richard M. Daley's patronage chief, Robert Sorich, along with four other former city officials are awaiting sentencing for a scheme to use fraud to cover up violations of a ban on patronage hiring.

Daley has not been accused of any wrongdoing.

Cook County's Bureau of Human Resources coordinates all human resource activities for the departments under the jurisdiction of the Cook County Board, including the Cook County Forest Preserve District.

Chicago Alderman Todd Stroger, who is running to replace his father, John Stroger, as Cook County board president, said the raid was not a surprise and that he believes it was connected to a motion filed by attorney Michael Shakman asking that a federal monitor oversee county hiring.

"I believe that everyone expected the federal government would come in the county building and Mr. Shakman has been saying there's problems and I believe he's been over to federal court," Stroger, the Democratic candidate for board president, told reporters.

"And I don't know what they are looking for or what they will find," he said.

He also called the county's hiring system antiquated and said it needs to be revamped.

Stroger's Republican opponent, Anthony Peraica, said the raid stems from what he called a "criminal conspiracy to deny the rights of well-qualified persons and applicants jobs that were instead given to the politically connected."

"Test scores were rigged, applications were falsified in order to allow hiring of clearly unqualified individuals, some with criminal histories," Peraica said.

FBI Agents Raid Cook County Office (WP/AP)

The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

CHICAGO -- FBI agents Thursday raided the offices where the Cook County government keeps its hiring records.

FBI spokeswoman Cynthia Yates would not say what the investigation was about.

However, Mayor Richard M. Daley's patronage chief and four other former city officials are awaiting sentencing for a scheme to subvert a ban on patronage hiring, or doling out jobs according to applicants' political connections. Daley has not been accused of any wrongdoing.

Chinta Strausberg, a spokeswoman for acting Cook County Board President Bobbie Steele, said only: "We are fully cooperating with the investigation."

Chicago Alderman Todd Stroger, who is running to replace his father, John Stroger, as Cook County Board president, said he believes the raid was connected to an activist's request that a federal monitor oversee county hiring to prevent abuses.

Stroger's Republican opponent, Anthony Peraica, said the raid stemmed from a "criminal conspiracy to deny the rights of well-qualified persons and applicants jobs that were instead given to the politically connected."

"Test scores were rigged, applications were falsified in order to allow hiring of clearly unqualified individuals, some with criminal histories," Peraica said.

Ex-N.O. Prosecutor Gets Life In Federal Civil Rights Rape Case (AP)

AP, September 22, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, La. -- A former deputy city attorney was sentenced Thursday to life in prison for using his position to rape two women in his office.

U.S. District Judge Lance Africk sentenced Henry A. Dillon on Thursday, more than four months after a jury found him guilty of depriving the women of their civil rights under color of law, by aggravated sexual abuse.

"He committed unspeakable acts of violence against innocent women while disguising himself as a public servant," U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said in a news release.

Dillon, 49, raped each woman after telling her in Municipal Court that he needed her to come to his office to complete some court business, according to the indictment.

Dillon admitted having sex with both women, but said it was consensual. That testimony "calls into question your grip on reality," Africk told him Thursday.

His arrest and firing on Dec. 1, 2004 marked the second time Dillon had been accused of rape.

In 1998, Dillon was arrested on the same charge and accused of raping a woman at his home.

Nearly a year after he was suspended from his job without pay, the state Attorney General's Office said it had too little evidence to prosecute, allowing Dillon to return to work at the City Attorney's office.

Dillon was jailed in December, when a magistrate ruled that he was a danger to the community.

He was indicted after relatives of one woman approached the Metropolitan Crime Commission of Greater New Orleans, a nonprofit police watchdog. That woman said Dillon used a wrestling move to pin her down _ and another woman had made a similar claim in 1998, the crime commission said.

Former Orange Beach Mayor's Wife Pleads To Obstruction Count (AP)

AP, September 22, 2006

MOBILE, Ala. (AP) — Crystal McDonald Russo, wife of former Orange Beach Mayor Steve Russo, pleaded guilty in federal court Thursday to one felony obstruction of justice charge as part of a plea agreement with prosecutors.

Prosecutors agreed to dismiss two other counts against her and recommend a sentence that will likely only get Crystal Russo probation, the Press-Register reported on its Web site Thursday.

Russo, 25, was facing trial next month for allegedly trying to help her 44-year-old husband hide $96,000 that was sought for forfeiture by prosecutors in their probe of the former mayor. On Sept. 1, Steve Russo, Orange Beach City Attorney Larry Sutley and developer Ken Wall were convicted by a federal court jury in Mobile of fraud and related charges in a real estate scheme in the Gulf Coast resort.

DOJ_NMG_0067201

"She is glad that she's now seeing some closure in this and she thinks she's doing the right thing," Gordon Armstrong III, Crystal Russo's lawyer, said outside the courthouse.

U.S. District Judge Kristi DuBose scheduled Crystal Russo to be sentenced on Dec. 28.

Another Gamble For Online Betting (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Legal Wrangling in the U.S. Is Clouding the Prospects For the Industry World-Wide

Two recent arrests of online-gambling executives in the U.S. are drawing attention to a spirited but so far unsuccessful effort in Washington to clarify the legal status of Internet gambling and resolve the political and legal issues of regulating it.

Earlier this month, Peter Dicks, at the time nonexecutive chairman of Sportingbet PLC, Britain's largest publicly traded Internet-gambling company, was arrested in New York on a Louisiana warrant. That followed the July arrest of David Carruthers, then-chief executive of BetOnSports PLC on federal charges. The two cases aren't directly related but have combined to spook executives of foreign Internet-gambling companies, which are wary of entering the U.S.

The developments underscore a fundamental problem for the Internet-gambling industry: U.S. lawmakers haven't agreed on whether the practice is legal. This summer the House passed legislation that would outlaw most forms of Internet gambling, including poker and casino-style games. But similar legislation is in limbo in the Senate, despite recent efforts by Majority Leader Bill Frist to attach the measure onto a must-pass defense-authorization bill this year.

Taming Internet gambling is difficult, however, given uncertainty about which rules apply to it. The Bush administration maintains that all interstate Internet gambling is illegal, but acknowledges that enforcement is sporadic. To shut down Internet sites, prosecutors rely mostly on the 45-year-old federal Wire Act, which prohibits sports betting across state lines, but was written with telephone, not Internet, lines in mind.

But not all judges agree that Internet gambling is already illegal, and Internet-gambling companies argue the Wire Act doesn't apply to the Internet.

"It's never really been clear up to and including now, how the 1961 Wire Act applies to the Internet," says Keith Whyte, executive director of the National Council on Problem Gambling, an advocacy group that helps gambling addicts.

"There's a lot of gray area to make some arguments. There's been an utter failure of Congress to address this issue. They're relying on a pretty antiquated law to stretch over this," Mr. Whyte says.

Pressure on Congress to resolve the issue is likely to increase. Eight states have prohibited Internet gambling -- a pattern that has led to calls for a unified national approach.

Lawmakers' failure to clarify the legal issues of Internet gambling has frustrated many in the industry. According to Christiansen Capital Advisors, a New Gloucester, Maine, research firm, online gambling is a $12 billion-a-year industry globally, and growing. For years, some online-gambling companies have sought U.S. legislation to regulate the industry to weed out dodgy companies and promote investor confidence.

More broadly, Congress's inability to act reflects lawmakers' ambivalence about the Internet and how to strike a balance between letting it operate without much interference and requiring it to adhere to socially desirable behavior.

Republican Rep. Bob Goodlatte, who represents a rural Virginia district, personifies the sometimes-conflicting impulses. In his seven terms in Congress, Mr. Goodlatte has built a conservative voting record faithful to free-market, small-government principles. In June he voted against a proposal, which failed, that would have prevented Internet providers from moving some traffic faster than other -- in part, he said, because he was worried that "government involvement often stifles innovation in the marketplace."

A few weeks later, however, he voted for a bill to outlaw most Internet gambling in the U.S. "There are those of us who are simply opposed to gambling because of societal problems that exist," he says, adding that with the Internet, "every home in Virginia now has a wide array of casino gambling to choose from."

DOJ_NMG_0067202

Mr. Goodlatte, a 53-year-old father of two, has spent years trying to impose some order on the Internet -- such as preventing access to child pornography and protecting consumers' ability to encrypt emails. "We don't want it to become the Wild, Wild West," he says.

Some forms of gambling have largely avoided the U.S. government's focus. For example, the government has done nothing to stop Youbet.com, a publicly traded Internet company in Woodland Hills, Calif., that offers betting on horse racing. YouBet says it complies with state and federal gambling regulations, arguing that changes made in 2000 to the federal Interstate Horse Racing Act allow state-licensed interstate "interactive" parimutuel betting. Yet the company's financial statements note that the Justice Department says Internet gambling is prohibited in the U.S.

Justice Department officials say they launched a civil probe into Internet-gambling operations, including horse betting, last year, but say they have limited resources.

Even when the U.S. government tries to set rules for the Internet-gambling business, the global nature of the Internet gets in the way. In the United Kingdom, online gambling will be regulated and -- more importantly -- taxed, beginning in 2007. It is as easy for a would-be bettor to reach a gambling Web site in Athens, Greece, as one in Athens, Ga.

Indeed, the U.S. government's assertion that interstate Internet gambling is illegal has provoked an international trade fight. In March 2004, the World Trade Organization ruled the U.S. had violated global trade pacts by banning offshore firms from offering U.S. citizens some forms of Internet gambling -- notably sports betting -- while providing exceptions for U.S. companies that offer horse betting and state-run Internet lotteries. The U.S. says it has the right to ban imports that may be found morally objectionable.

Even if Congress agrees on tough legislation, enforcement would be difficult. The legislation pending in Congress is designed to make it more difficult for Americans to electronically transfer money to fund their online gambling. But banks already have policies that restrict customers from using credit cards at Internet-gambling sites. Online-gambling companies have been able to get around that by miscoding transactions or encouraging customers to use other types of electronic money transfers.

Write to Amy Schatz at Amy.Schatz@wsj.com1

Feds Charge WTC Painter In $1 Million Ripoff From Sept. 11 Fund (NEWSDAY)

By Jennifer Maloney, Newsday Staff Writer

Newsday, September 22, 2006

A New Jersey painter was arrested Thursday on charges he bilked the U.S. Justice Department's Sept. 11 compensation fund of more than $1 million -- the biggest scam yet.

Mario Mastellone, 39, of East Windsor was accused in an indictment in U.S. District Court in Manhattan of accepting $1.07 million from the September 11 Victim Compensation Fund of 2001 by falsely claiming that had been disabled that day and had not worked since.

His lawyer, Peter Bark of Central Islip, said his client had suffered disabling back injuries and has not worked since then, except for a recent job as an extra on a film set, which the Justice Department had approved.

"He's been victimized twice -- once by him being in the World Trade Center on 9/11 and now by the U.S. Attorney's office," Bark said.

Prosecutors said Mastellone lied to a Department of Justice agent investigating his case and lied to a hearing officer evaluating his claim for compensation. According to the indictment, he also fraudulently sought compensation from the New York State Workers' Compensation Board and the Painting Industry Insurance Fund.

If convicted of fraud charges, Mastellone could face up to 40 years in prison.

Bark said Mastellone's Sept. 11 fund claim was legitimate.

"The government doctors examined him and they concurred with his doctors that he's disabled," Bark said. "He cannot do any kind of labor. Unfortunately, he's learning disabled so he can't do a desk job. All he can do is physical labor, and that he can't do."

Prosecutors Say Map-stealing Collector Motivated By Resentment (AP)

AP, September 22, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- A renowned dealer who admitted stealing nearly 100 rare antique maps acted out of resentment toward the prestigious libraries and to pay for his expensive tastes and mounting debts, prosecutors said Thursday.

Authorities filed court papers that offered the first official explanation of why E. Forbes Smiley III stole the maps over eight years from the New York and Boston public libraries, the Newberry Library in Chicago, the Harvard and Yale university libraries and the British Library in London.

"He explained that his initial thefts were acting out of resentment toward persons at certain institutions that he believed had wronged him, individuals who he believed had slighted him or used certain of his research without accreditation," prosecutors wrote. "Other thefts he explained resulted from some misguided sense of entitlement to the maps because he had, through collectors, provided better versions of the same map to the institution. He also acknowledged that stealing maps was profitable and he had mounting debts."

An FBI review of Smiley's computer records showed he had expensive tastes and mounting debts, prosecutors said.

Smiley, a 50-year-old resident of Martha's Vineyard, faces restitution and up to six years in prison under federal guidelines when he is sentenced Sept. 27. His attorney has asked for a sentence of up to three years, citing Smiley's cooperation with the investigation, charity work and unspecified "mental and emotional conditions which contributed" to the thefts.

Prosecutors did not specify a sentence, but recommended he be given credit for his cooperation with the investigation that led to the recovery of most of the maps.

They called Smiley's conduct "reprehensible," saying his victims included the libraries and dealers who suffered severe harm to their finances and reputations.

The British Library last week urged the court to impose a stiff sentence, saying Smiley systematically looted treasures that told the story of the new world and had survived catastrophic events over the centuries. Some of the maps have not been recovered, while others were damaged, the library noted.

The British Library has raised suspicions that Smiley stole additional maps, a charge he has denied.

Authorities defended their investigation, saying it involved hundreds of phone calls with curators, map historians and legal representatives of the institutions and checking Smiley's computer, phone and bank records. They said inaccurate cataloguing by some libraries, wide public access to materials and other issues made it difficult to prove Smiley stole a particular map.

"Based on this review, the FBI has not identified other information suggesting that Smiley has a hidden cache of maps or is protecting some unidentified purchaser of his maps," prosecutors wrote.

Smiley was arrested after a Yale librarian found a razor blade on the floor. The arrest prompted Yale and other top map libraries to review their security procedures.

Credit Card Companies Pledge Help In Fighting Child Pornography (NYT)

By John Files

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 21 — Executives from credit card companies, including Visa, MasterCard and American Express, told a Congressional panel Thursday that they were determined to eliminate the use of their services in the Internet child pornography business.

But they also said it was difficult to keep pace with those who seek to exploit children on the Web and called for broad collaboration among those in the financial services industry and law enforcement authorities around the world.

“Child pornography is a global problem in need of a coordinated response,” said Mark MacCarthy, a senior vice president for public policy for Visa U.S.A.

Mr. MacCarthy said that by working together with other financial services companies, the industry could “enhance our efforts to identify Web sites and pinpoint merchants that are trafficking in this illicit activity, cut them off from use of our network and provide assistance to law enforcement to put them in jail and shut them down for good.”

“The way forward lies in collective action,” he said.

DOJ_NMG_0067204

Mr. MacCarthy and other executives testified at a hearing of the oversight and investigations subcommittee of the House Energy and Commerce Committee. The hearing was the sixth this year convened by the subcommittee to examine the growth of child pornography online.

Others who spoke to the committee included Ernie Allen, the president of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, and Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney for New Jersey, who led an investigation that in 2004 dismantled an Internet child pornography service stretching from Eastern Europe to Mount Laurel, N.J.

Mr. Allen described tactics adopted in recent months to combat child pornography Web sites, including the creation of the Financial Coalition Against Child Pornography, a group of major financial institutions and Internet companies. The coalition will seek to "follow the money," Mr. Allen said, in an effort to eradicate such business by 2008. MasterCard, Visa, American Express, Bank of America, Citibank, PayPal, Yahoo and AOL, among others, have joined the coalition.

"We have changed our process for monitoring the Internet," said Arne L. Christenson, a senior vice president for federal government affairs at American Express. "In the past our search for child pornography sites took place as part of our broader efforts to enforce our Internet pornography policy, and there was not always a clear differentiation between the two in our review and reporting."

Among purveyors of child pornography, Mr. Christenson said, there is a "growing trend toward steering visitors of these sites to various alternative payment methods."

Mr. Christie said one of those methods involved granting access to Web sites in return for explicit photographs of children. "That phenomenon is something that we are very concerned about," Mr. Christie said.

Data Retention Bill Expected Next Week (CNET)

By Anne Broache, And Declan McCullagh

CNET News, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON--A Democratic member of the U.S. House of Representatives said Thursday that she plans to introduce legislation next week that would force Internet providers to record customer information for one year.

Rep. Diana DeGette of Colorado said that she is working with Republicans Reps. Ed Whitfield, chairman of the House Energy and Commerce oversight and investigations subcommittee, and Joe Barton, chairman of the full committee, to finalize language mandating a controversial practice known as data retention.

"Internet service providers across the board do retain this data for some period of time right now, so all were doing in this legislation is requiring a standard in the industry," DeGette said at a morning hearing here on online child pornography, which was at least the sixth event dealing with online child exploitation in the House this year.

The data retention requirement is necessary because members of Congress have "learned that Internet service providers and social networking sites have information that law enforcement needs when investigating pedophiles online, and that is the IP address on a particular date and time that will help identify those involved," said Whitfield, a Kentucky Republican who is also heading a probe into Hewlett-Packard's boardroom scandal.

Privacy groups and industry groups have generally opposed mandatory data retention, with some companies such as Comcast voluntarily agreeing to retain user data for longer periods. Also, under an earlier proposal described by DeGette, the information would be available not only to police but to civil litigants as well, including divorce lawyers hoping to track someone down or employers embroiled in a lawsuit with a former employee.

Plans to enact the Bush administration's data retention proposal--reiterated this week by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales--have been brewing in Congress for months but have received increased attention as the November elections draw near.

DeGette, for her part, planned this spring to introduce such a proposal (click for PDF) as an amendment to a House telecommunications bill but ultimately dropped those plans. A senior House Republican also drafted a bill this year (click for PDF) but then backed away from it.

DeGette's bill is expected to be consistent with repeated calls for mandatory data retention in recent months from Gonzales and from 49 state attorneys general (click for PDF).

DOJ_NMG_0067205

The two law enforcement officials at Thursday's hearing, representing the cybercrimes division of Homeland Security's Immigrations and Customs Enforcement bureau and the U.S. attorney's office in New Jersey, also offered endorsements.

"We need more and more information, and we need it as quickly as we can possibly get it," said Christopher Christie, U.S. Attorney in New Jersey.

Details on data retention

In general, data retention legislation could follow one of two approaches.

One form could require Internet providers and perhaps social networking sites and search engines to record for a year or two which IP address is used by which user. The other form would be far broader, requiring companies to record data such as the identities of e-mail correspondents, logs of who sent and received instant messages (but not the content of those communications), and the addresses of Web pages visited.

During a series of meetings with Internet companies hosted by the Justice Department--first reported by CNET News.com--officials have been ambiguous about how they want legislation worded, private-sector participants say. Those involved have included AOL, Comcast, Google, Microsoft, Verizon Communications and trade associations.

DeGette said Thursday that her proposal would not require retention of the communications themselves, but would identify data so that law enforcement officials--if they had probable cause to believe a crime has been committed--could go in and get a subpoena and subpoena these IP addresses.

An IP address is a unique four-byte address used to communicate with a device on a computer network that relies on the Internet Protocol. An IP address associated with CNET.com, for instance, is 216.239.113.101.

Ernie Allen, president of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, said he liked that DeGette's proposal was not focused on retaining content. "Obviously this is a real dilemma for the Internet service providers for a host of reasons, and I think there is an appropriate time frame that can be established," he said. "But overwhelmingly, we support (data retention mandates)."

DeGette sought to allay concerns raised by privacy advocates about the approach, adding, "I'm concerned about privacy considerations, too, especially in light of what I believe to be illegal surveillance of telephone records by this administration."

CIVIL LAW:

Federal Officials Scrutinizing Company Payments To Doctors (NYT)

By Barry Meier

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

Ela Medical, a small producer of implantable heart devices, said this week that it had received a subpoena from federal health care fraud officials seeking information about possible inducements paid by the company to doctors using its products.

In response to an inquiry last week from a reporter, Ela Medical stated that it had received an administrative subpoena from the inspector general of the Department of Health and Human Services. The company is a division of the Sorin Group, which is based in Milan.

According to Ela Medical, the subpoena sought any documents related to “arrangements, clinical studies, provision of monitoring equipment and services and other agreements by which the company may have provided benefits to persons in a position to recommend purchase of devices.”

Federal law prohibits certain types of payments to doctors that are meant to influence their choice of a particular product. Ela Medical, which has previously said that it complied with all relevant laws, said in its statement that it was cooperating with the investigation.

Last year, the Justice Department started to investigate the country’s biggest makers of heart devices — Medtronic, St. Jude and Guidant — to determine if they provided doctors with excessive payments to enroll patients in postmarketing studies of their devices as a way of increasing sales. All three companies have said they did nothing wrong.

Such studies can have questionable scientific value, experts say.

DOJ_NMG_0067206

In March, a federal official said that the government had begun an inquiry into Ela Medical that was focusing on, among other things, financial relationships between the company and doctors in the Miami area, including physicians who were enrolling patients in postmarketing trials.

At that time, however, officials of Ela Medical said they were unaware of any government inquiries into its practices. Earlier this week, a spokeswoman for the Sorin Group said it had received a subpoena last week.

Ela Medical had only a small piece of the market in this country for heart devices like defibrillators, according to analysts' estimates. Together, it and Biotronik, based in Berlin, have about a 5 percent market share.

Pediatrix Finalizes $25.1M Settlement (AP-YBIZ)

AP, September 22, 2006

Pediatrix Finalizes $25.1 Million Settlement With Justice Department

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. (AP) -- Pediatrix Medical Group Inc. on Thursday said it paid the federal government $25.1 million as part of its final settlement with the Justice Department related to a probe into the company's billing practices.

The settlement ends a federal investigation into the company's Medicaid and Tricare practices related to neonatal services provided between January 1996 and December 1999. In addition, the pediatric services provider said it would reach separate state settlements for each state Medicaid program involved.

Information for the period 2000 to 2003 also was reviewed as part of the investigation, and Pediatrix is not making any payments for this period.

Pediatrix announced a tentative settlement in February and set aside reserves related to the investigation during periods through December 2005. The settlement will not affect the company's operating results this year.

Shares of Pediatrix closed down 71 cents to $47.67 on the New York Stock Exchange.

IRS To Pay Former Workers Whose Jobs Were Outsourced (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

Ten former mailroom employees at the Internal Revenue Service who lost their jobs because of outsourcing will receive about $4,000 each in back pay as part of a legal settlement, the National Treasury Employees Union has announced.

The settlement ends a lawsuit brought by the union in a dispute over the meaning of an appropriations bill that prohibited the IRS from turning federal work over to a contractor during much of 2004 without first conducting a public-private competition.

In March, a federal judge ruled that the IRS, which did not hold a competition for the mailroom jobs, had improperly converted the jobs in the time period that had been put off-limits by Congress.

When the job conversions began two years ago, the IRS had 87 mailroom employees. Most of the employees left, some taking cash buyouts and others finding jobs elsewhere in the IRS. The contractor, a nonprofit organization, hired some IRS employees after being awarded a $33 million contract to operate more than 30 IRS mailrooms.

The employees who accepted job transfers or left their jobs voluntarily were not eligible for back pay, the union said.

An IRS spokesman would not comment on the settlement. Shortly after the court ruling, the IRS said it thought it had complied with procurement rules and regulations.

Colleen M. Kelley , the union president, said lawsuits challenging outsourcing decisions by agencies are difficult to win. "This is the first case of which NTEU is aware in which the government has paid money to employees in settlement of a contracting out lawsuit," Kelley said. "It was important to us to hold the IRS accountable."New Deadline for Defense?

Gordon England , deputy secretary of defense, has put a Senate oversight committee on notice that the Pentagon may come to Congress next year for additional time to establish a new labor-management relations system.

The Defense Department faces a 2009 deadline for implementing new labor rules, but progress has been slowed by litigation and other factors.

A federal court stopped the new labor system after finding that the Pentagon's plan went too far in limiting the collective-bargaining rights of Defense civil service employees. The case is on appeal, and England said he did not expect a decision until early next year.

Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) held a hearing Wednesday afternoon to check on the progress of the National Security Personnel System, which more rigorously links the job performance of Defense civilians to pay raises. The contested labor rules are one part of the NSPS.

Because of the litigation, the NSPS rollout has been limited to nonunion Defense Department employees. About 11,000 employees converted to the NSPS on April 30 in the program's first phase. A second phase begins Oct. 1 and will include more than 66,000 Defense employees.

When fully implemented, the NSPS will cover about 700,000 workers, or about half of the government's civil service workforce.COLA Countdown

With less than a month to go in the counting period, most government retirees appear on track for a cost-of-living adjustment of at least 3.5 percent.

The calculation is based on a Labor Department index showing that consumer prices rose again in August. The 12-month period measured by the index ends this month, and the Labor Department will announce the 2007 COLA in mid-October.Talk Shows

Carol A. Bonosaro , president of the Senior Executives Association, will be the guest on "Fedtalk" at 11 a.m. today on http://federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

Josefina Carbonell , assistant secretary for aging at the Health and Human Services Department, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Chastang Appointment To Be Reviewed By Department Of Justice (MR)

By Dan Murtaugh, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), September 22, 2006

Juan Chastang's future as a Mobile County commissioner is now in the hands of the U.S. Department of Justice, after the state decided not to appeal a federal court order handed down last month, a spokesman from the attorney general's office said.

The order, handed down by a panel of three federal judges Aug. 18, said Gov. Bob Riley had 90 days to get clearance from the Justice Department that the Chastang appointment complied with the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

If the Justice Department approves the appointment, nothing will change and Chastang, the commission's president, will continue to represent District 1.

But if the department finds that the appointment violated voters' rights, it could force Chastang out of office and call for a special election to fill the seat.

Suzanne Webb, a spokeswoman for the Alabama Attorney General's office, said Tuesday that the governor would not appeal the judges' decision to the U.S. Supreme Court and would instead ask for Justice Department clearance.

Chastang said he's confident the Justice Department will approve his nomination.

"Everything's going to be OK," he said. "I trust their legal opinion that that's the best option."

The attorney general's office represented the governor in a federal lawsuit in the matter, filed last year by state Reps. Yvonne Kennedy and James Buskey, both D-Mobile, and Bill Clark, D-Prichard.

The judges ruled that when Riley appointed Chastang to replace Sam Jones on the commission after Jones became mayor of Mobile in October, the governor failed to follow a provision of the Voting Rights Act that requires the Justice Department to review in advance any changes to Alabama election practices.

Justice Department review is necessary because of a Civil Rights-era law making Alabama, along with a number of other states, ask for federal approval before changing election laws.

In 1985, the Alabama Legislature passed a law requiring a special election to fill any Mobile County Commission vacancy with more than a year remaining in the term.

DOJ_NMG_0067208

That law was ruled unconstitutional in 1988 because it conflicted with a state law that gave the governor the power to make such appointments.

In 2004, though, the Legislature passed a law allowing local acts, such as the 1985 Mobile County ordinance, to make exceptions to the general rule of gubernatorial appointments.

Therefore, when Riley appointed Chastang instead of calling for a special election, he changed voting law, the judges ruled.

Chronicle, Job-fair Firm Called Biased Against Noncitizens (SFC)

By Vanessa Hua, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, September 21, 2006

The Chronicle and a firm that produces job fairs tried to bar noncitizens from an employment event in June, according to a complaint the ACLU and other civil rights groups filed Tuesday with the federal Justice Department.

The Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights, the American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California and the ACLU Immigrants' Rights Project allege that Expo Experts, a Cincinnati company that organizes job fairs in partnership with newspapers nationwide, discriminates against legal immigrants.

The complaint, filed in Washington, D.C., charges that the company illegally bars noncitizens from attending job fairs in violation of federal anti-discrimination laws and asks the Justice Department to impose civil penalties and issue a cease-and-desist order to stop the practice. The civil rights groups filed a companion complaint against The Chronicle, which co-sponsored the June fair with Expo.

An advertisement before the event, published in the newspaper and on its affiliated Web site, SFGate.com, said job-seekers were required to have U.S. citizenship to enter a pavilion featuring engineering, technology and security clearance positions, the complaint alleges. A second pavilion featured professional jobs.

When the Lawyers' Committee and the ACLU objected to the restriction in the days before the event, Expo Experts and The Chronicle removed the discriminatory language from the online version of the advertisement and opened both pavilions to all job-seekers, according to the complaint.

"The San Francisco Chronicle is aware that the Lawyer's Committee for Civil Rights has filed a complaint with the U.S. Department of Justice," said Brandon Hamm, spokesman for the newspaper. "The Chronicle denies that it has violated any laws or acted wrongfully as alleged in the complaint. The Chronicle previously addressed concerns raised by the LCCR and considers the matter to be resolved. There is no basis for the complaint."

Susan Turner, Expo's president, said many government jobs require applicants to be U.S. citizens. "That's nothing we made up, or The Chronicle made up -- that's through the government."

E-mail Vanessa Hua at vahua@sfchronicle.com.

Library's Ban On Prayer Service Upheld On Appeal (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, September 22, 2006

Judges rule 2-1 that distinction between worship, other meetings is constitutional

Contra Costa County did not intrude on religious freedom when it barred a church from holding prayer services in a meeting room of the Antioch library, a federal appeals court ruled Wednesday in a case that drew arguments from the Bush administration in support of the church.

In a 2-1 decision, the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco said that the Faith Center Church Evangelistic Ministries had the right to hold religious discussions in a room that was open to other community groups, but that the county could prohibit it from conducting worship services.

"The county has a legitimate interest in ... excluding meeting room activities that may interfere with the library's primary function as a sanctuary for reading, writing and quiet contemplation," and in preventing the room from being "transformed into an occasional house of worship," Judge Richard Paez said in the majority opinion.

DOJ_NMG_0067209

He acknowledged that there may be little difference between prayer services and other types of meetings by religious groups in some cases, and said judges and government agencies are not competent to make such distinctions. But in this case, Paez said, Faith Center itself described its planned library gathering as one for "praise and worship."

Judge Richard Tallman stressed the same issue in his dissenting opinion. "Separating religious worship from other religious speech inevitably leads to state entanglement in religion" and is beyond the government's authority, he said.

U.S. District Judge Lawrence Karlton of Sacramento, temporarily assigned to the appeals court, cast the deciding vote for the county. He wrote a separate opinion saying the "sorry state of the law" was due to Supreme Court rulings that have weakened the separation of church and state by blurring the distinction between "religious practice and secular speech."

The Bush administration entered the case on the side of the church, arguing last fall that barring worship services, while allowing social and political groups to meet at the library, would violate the religious group's freedom of expression.

"Religious worship is also communicative," the Justice Department said in its brief. "Hymns and prayers are expressions among believers, and to observers, of their common faith."

A lawyer for Faith Center said he would appeal Wednesday's ruling.

"The effect of this decision is to treat Christians and all religious people, who might want to worship in an otherwise public meeting room in a public library, as second-class citizens," said attorney Gary McCaleb of the Alliance Defense Fund.

But Deputy County Counsel Kelly Flanagan said the county was concerned that allowing prayer services in a public building would amount to an unconstitutional government endorsement of religion.

"We think a library and a church are different things and should stay different," Flanagan said.

Meeting rooms at the Antioch library, at 501 West 18th St., have been used by community and political groups, including the Sierra Club and a local Democratic Party chapter. The county initially banned all religious activities in the rooms, but, after Faith Center filed suit, modified the exclusion in December 2004 to prohibit only religious services.

Faith Center held a general meeting and a prayer service at the Antioch library in May 2004, but library officials denied permission for the church to hold another service two months later. A federal judge issued an injunction against the county's policy in May 2005, saying it was probably unconstitutional, but no further prayer meetings were held during the appeal.

E-mail Bob Egelko at begelko@sfchronicle.com.

ANTITRUST:

Samsung Exec Guilty Of Price-Fixing (AP)

By Dan Caterinicchia, AP Business Writer

AP, September 22, 2006

Justice Department Says Samsung Executive Agrees to Plead Guilty for Price-Fixing

WASHINGTON (AP) -- An executive from Samsung Semiconductor Inc., the world's largest manufacturer of dynamic random access memory (DRAM) used in computers, has agreed to plead guilty and to serve jail time for participating in a global price-fixing conspiracy, the Justice Department said Thursday.

Thomas Quinn, senior vice president of memory sales and marketing at the U.S. subsidiary of Korean firm Samsung Electronics Co. Ltd., was charged with a felony for his alleged participation in an agreement to fix DRAM prices and to coordinate bids in an auction held by a buyer.

The scheme directly affected sales to U.S. computer makers Dell Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co., Compaq Computer Corp., International Business Machines Corp., Apple Computer Inc., Gateway Inc., and Sun Microsystems Inc., according to the Justice Department. There were about $7.7 billion in DRAM sales in the U.S. in 2004, according to the department.

Under the plea agreement, which must be approved by the court, Quinn will serve eight months in prison and to pay a criminal fine of $250,000. In addition, Quinn has agreed to assist the Justice Department in its ongoing investigation.

"Prison time for price-fixers remains the most potent deterrent to illegal cartel activity," Thomas O. Barnett, Assistant Attorney General in charge of Justice's Antitrust Division, said in a release.

DOJ_NMG_0067210

John E. Lucas, a spokesman for the California company, said Quinn remained a Samsung employee and issued a statement that read: "Samsung and the Department of Justice have previously reached a comprehensive settlement in the DOJ's industrywide investigation into alleged violations of U.S. antitrust laws among manufacturers of DRAM memory. Samsung is strongly committed to fair competition and ethical practices and forbids anticompetitive behavior."

Between April 1, 2001, and June 15, 2002, Quinn communicated with competitors to discuss the prices of DRAM to be sold to certain customers and agreed with competitors to coordinate bids submitted to Sun Microsystems Inc., according to Justice.

To date, a total of 13 individuals from Samsung, Hynix Semiconductor Inc., Infineon and Micron Technology Inc., have been charged and fines totaling more than $731 million have resulted from the investigation, which is being conducted by the antitrust division of Justice and the FBI in their San Francisco offices.

Shares of Sun Microsystems added 5 cents to close at $5.21, while Dell slid 32 cents to end at $21.18, and Apple lost 61 cents to finish at $74.65, all trading on the Nasdaq.

Shares of Hewlett-Packard lost $1.91, or 5.2 percent, to end $34.87, while Micron Technology gained 18 cents to end at $17.74, and U.S.-traded shares of Infineon Technologies AG dipped 2 cents to close at $12.29, all on the New York Stock Exchange.

IBM lost $1.81, or about 2.2 percent, to close at $81.61, while Gateway fell 11 cents, or 5.4 percent, to close at $1.93, both on the NYSE.

Samsung US Executive Gets 8 Months For Price-fixing (SJBIZ)

San Jose Business Journal, September 22, 2006

A marketing executive with the U.S. unit of Samsung Electronics Co. Ltd. agreed to plead guilty and serve prison time for taking part in price-fixing in the computer memory chip business, the U.S. Justice Department said Thursday.

South Korea-based Samsung and its San Jose-based subsidiary agreed last year to pay a $300 million criminal fine for fixing prices.

The Justice Department said Thomas Quinn is the fourth Samsung manager to plead guilty in connection with the probe. Quinn is expected to serve eight months in prison and pay a $250,000 fine under the plea deal, and investigators said that if he had been convicted at trial, he could have faced a larger fine and a prison sentence of up to three years.

Quinn conspired to fix the price of memory chips sold to computer makers around 2001 and 2002, investigators said.

The government said the victims of the alleged price-fixing included Dell Inc. (NASDAQ:DELL - News), Compaq Computer Corp. (NYSE:CPQ - News), Palo Alto-based Hewlett-Packard Co. (NYSE:HPQ - News), Cupertino-based Apple Computer Inc. (NASDAQ:AAPL - News), International Business Machines Corp. (NYSE:IBM - News), and Gateway Inc. (NYSE:GTW - News).

Korean manufacturer Hynix Semiconductor Inc. and German manufacturer Infineon Technologies AG (NYSE: IFX - News) also agreed last year to plead guilty; Hynix was fined $185 million and Infineon was fined $160 million.

Four Infineon executives pleaded guilty to price-fixing charges, serving prison terms of four to six months and each paying fines of $250,000.

Samsung Executive Agrees To Jail Term For Chip Conspiracy (AFP-Y)

AFP, September 22, 2006

A US executive of South Korean electronics giant Samsung agreed to plead guilty and to serve jail time for participating in a global conspiracy to fix prices for memory chips, officials said.

The Justice Department said Thomas Quinn, vice president of marketing for memory products at Samsung Semiconductor, the California-based US unit of Samsung, agreed to the deal that would result in an eight-month prison term and a 250,000-dollar fine.

Quinn was charged with violating the US antitrust laws in a one-count criminal complaint alleging participation in an agreement to fix prices of dynamic random access memory (DRAM) chips.

The plea agreement, which must be approved by a US federal judge, also calls for Quinn to assist the ongoing investigation.

"Prison time for price-fixers remains the most potent deterrent to illegal cartel activity," said Thomas Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the department's antitrust division.

"Today's action sends a clear message: Those who engage in price-fixing schemes will be held accountable for their illegal conduct."

To date, four companies and 13 individuals have been charged and fines totaling more than 731 million have resulted from the DRAM investigation.

Last November, Samsung pleaded guilty as a company to charges of price fixing in a deal that came with a fine of 300 million dollars.

US authorities have alleged a conspiracy with Samsung and other producers to fix DRAM computer chip prices between April 1, 1999 and June 15, 2002.

DRAM is the most commonly used semiconductor memory product, providing high-speed storage and retrieval of electronic information for computer, telecommunications and consumer electronic products.

There were approximately 7.7 billion dollars in DRAM sales in the United States in 2004.

Authorities said the price-fixing scheme directly affected sales to US computer makers Dell, Hewlett-Packard and others.

Quinn is the fourth Samsung executive to agree to a prison sentence in the investigation. Three foreign-based Samsung executives, Sun Woo Lee, Young Woo Lee and Yeongho Kang, previously pleaded guilty and agreed to serve prison terms ranging from seven to eight months.

In additional, jail terms were agreed for Hynix Semiconductor executives Dae Soo Kim, Chae Kyun Chung, Kun Chul Suh and Choon Yub Choi; and Infineon executives T. Rudd Corwin, Peter Schaefer, Gunter Hefner and Heinrich Florian.

Wright Deal Tweaked To Address Antitrust Concerns (DMN)

By Sudeep Reddy, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, September 22, 2006

New language wins over key detractor, Hutchison says

WASHINGTON – Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison said Thursday that new language addressing antitrust concerns in the Wright repeal bill has passed muster with a key detractor to the legislation.

With newfound support from Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, legislation that would lift restrictions on long-haul flights at Dallas Love Field may be poised to move forward.

"It's a major step forward, but it's not the end of the road," Ms. Hutchison said.

The Texas Republican initiated procedures Thursday to bring the revamped Wright bill to the Senate floor.

It could come up for a vote next week, though a packed schedule in the final days before a congressional recess may force the issue into a post-election session in November.

The new language removes a phrase that could have provided a blanket exemption from competition laws for the June agreement by the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, American Airlines Inc., Southwest Airlines Co. and Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport.

But the proposed amendment still offers potential legal cover to the North Texas compromise, by employing additional language sanctioning the deal.

Rather than issue a sweeping order that gates be eliminated at Love Field, the latest version of the bill orders the city of Dallas to tear down the facilities under its existing authority. It also orders the city to accommodate new carriers at the airport, as specified in lease agreements.

"I think it protects the parties on the balance of the agreement, which has been my goal," Ms. Hutchison said.

Mr. Specter said in a statement that he was "pleased to have worked with" Ms. Hutchison and Texas Sen. John Cornyn in resolving the Wright concerns.

The North Texas agreement, which marked the end of a rancorous dispute among the cities and the airlines over the 1979 law, would lift the Wright amendment in 2014 and immediately allow flights anywhere in the U.S., as long as passengers stopped inside the nine-state perimeter.

The number of available gates at Love would be cut to 20 from 32. Nineteen gates are now operational.

Gate concerns

Concerns over the gate-reduction provision had stalled the bill, as a few powerful lawmakers protested that the deal would reduce competition and circumvent antitrust laws.

The House Judiciary Committee removed the antitrust exemption from an original version of the bill last week.

The Dallas City Council had scheduled a meeting for this morning to consider whether the agreement could go through even without securing new language. That closed-door session was canceled late Thursday.

House members have said over the last week that they would find a way to get the original Wright bill – with an explicit antitrust exemption – onto the House floor, even though it could create a battle over the language that was removed by the House Judiciary Committee.

North Texas members' latest plan was to bring their original bill to the floor next week under procedures that suspend regular rules. That could allow the legislation to slide through without amendments, though if any influential members objected, it might force supporters to scramble for the two-thirds majority needed to pass the measure.

The move could draw out powerful members such as the House Judiciary chairman, Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., creating a floor battle over the language and forcing lawmakers with little interest in the bill to choose sides among several committee chairs.

"I expect he would vote against that on the floor," Jeff Lungren, a spokesman for Mr. Sensenbrenner, said of the efforts to sidestep the committee's changes.

'Infinite possibilities'

House members now face the question of whether to pass that version, which would face Senate opposition, or using a Senate bill that's more acceptable to Mr. Specter and other lawmakers who had objected to the antitrust language.

"There are infinite possibilities, and which one will be chosen hasn't been decided yet," said Rep. Kay Granger, R-Fort Worth.

The Senate side still isn't free of obstacles. The top Democrat on its Judiciary Committee, Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., hasn't signed off on the new version of the bill. A spokeswoman for Mr. Leahy said Thursday evening that "good-faith negotiations continue" on the Wright issue.

Ms. Hutchison's move on Thursday – known as "hot-lining" the bill – is used to put uncontroversial legislation on a fast track to passage without a formal vote.

The procedure can draw out detractors, forcing them to put a hold on the legislation to signify their disagreement or their plans to block the legislation through a filibuster or other procedure.

If Mr. Leahy or any other lawmaker were to do that, it would force Ms. Hutchison to line up votes on the Senate floor to overcome the maneuver.

"I think if I can get to the floor," she said, "I will have the votes."

Ms. Hutchison said she spoke with Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, who supports the Wright legislation, and received his backing for moving it onto the Senate floor.

The overwhelming approval from the bill's originating committees, and its bipartisan support in both chambers, should help win passage, she said.

But the procedures of the House and Senate could force the issue into the short post-election session, Ms. Hutchison said: "We knew that this would be a tough road, and it has been."

Staff writer Emily Ramshaw in Dallas contributed to this report.

NYSE-Euronext: One, But Two (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

NYSE Group Inc. and Euronext NV will create separate U.S. and European entities to ensure that markets on each continent retain their independence if the stock-exchange operators complete their proposed merger.

Euronext will have a Dutch foundation for its markets to prevent U.S. lawmakers from affecting the rules and requirements for listing stock in European countries. Likewise, NYSE will create a three-person Delaware trust to ensure that no laws are passed in Europe that will affect how U.S. companies are regulated. The structure was unveiled in a regulatory filing with Securities and Exchange Commission.

The goal is to persuade everyone concerned that the planned deal won't encroach on securities laws on either side of the Atlantic. NYSE owns the New York Stock Exchange. Euronext owns stock markets in Paris, Amsterdam, Brussels and Lisbon as well as a major derivatives exchange in London.

The two entities will exist behind the scenes unless and until lawmakers or regulators pass rules that were viewed to affect the independence of regulators or companies in the other market. Essentially, they will only be able to react to laws or regulations rather than create strictures of their own.

Europeans are concerned that Congress or the SEC might take the merger of the two companies as an opportunity to try to extend U.S. regulatory reach to Europe. Such a scenario is particularly frightening to European executives, who would prefer to avoid the strict accounting and governance rules that U.S. companies are subject to since the Sarbanes-Oxley law was passed in 2002. Both SEC officials and Euronext have stressed such U.S. rules won't apply in Europe.

The economic rights of any shares would remain with a combined NYSE-Euronext.

In the filing, Euronext also said that it held preliminary merger discussions with another major U.S. exchange in late 2005 and early 2006. While the exchange wasn't named, Euronext continued the discussions through late April on how to structure a possible transaction with the exchange. By this point, NYSE talks were becoming more advanced and Euronext's talks with the other exchange went nowhere. At the time, the Chicago Mercantile Exchange -- the largest U.S. exchange operator by market value -- had expressed interest in parts of Euronext's business. A CME spokeswoman declined to comment.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Interior Official Says She Will Not Try To Recoup Lease Money (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 21 — A top official at the Interior Department said on Thursday that she would not try to recover $1.3 billion in royalties that the government lost as a result of flawed oil and gas leases it signed in the late 1990's.

"That would be very hard to recoup," said Johnnie M. Burton, director of the Minerals Management Service of the Interior Department, at a forum held by Platt's, an oil industry newsletter.

Ms. Burton added that she had little or no bargaining power — and did not want any — to force more than 50 companies to renegotiate offshore drilling leases that currently allow them to escape as much as $10 billion in royalty payments over the next decade.

Administration officials say that they are close to reaching agreement with Shell Oil and BP and that they have held talks with about 10 companies. But more than half of the companies that hold the flawed leases have not responded to the government's pleas.

"I don't like to say 'negotiate' because I really don't have anything to trade," Ms. Burton said. Rather, she said, the government had told the companies that "we would really appreciate it" if they changed their contracts.

Even if the companies do agree to change their leases, she said, the government would not try to recapture the $1.3 billion in royalty payments that the companies have already been able to escape.

At issue are hundreds of offshore drilling leases for the Gulf of Mexico that were signed in 1998 and 1999 and that allow companies to extract up to 87.5 million barrels of oil per lease without paying royalties to the government. In what investigators believe was an unintentional bungle, the leases omitted a clause that would normally require companies to pay the full 12.5 percent royalty if oil prices climbed above about $36 a barrel.

Democrats reacted angrily to Ms. Burton's remarks, as well as to new allegations by a group of federal auditors who have charged that the Interior Department blocked them from recovering underpayments by more than two dozen companies.

DOJ_NMG_0067214

"If things keep going like this, we're going to need two sets of handcuffs: one for the oil companies and one for the bureaucrats," said Representative George Miller, Democrat of California.

In May, the House passed a Democratic proposal that would pressure companies to change their leases by prohibiting those that refuse to do so from acquiring additional federal leases in the future. But the measure has stalled because Republican leaders in both the House and Senate are opposed to it.

Democratic lawmakers also called for investigations into new allegations by three current and one former federal auditor that the Interior Department had stopped them from trying to recover $30 million in deliberate underpayments by oil companies.

The allegations, disclosed on Thursday by The New York Times, were made in lawsuits that the auditors filed under a law to encourage whistle-blowers.

"These claims, while as yet unproven, are serious and cannot be brushed aside," wrote Senator Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico and Representative Nick J. Rahall II of West Virginia in a letter to the Interior Department's inspector general.

Ms. Burton dismissed the allegations, saying that the auditors "did not follow proper procedure" in filing the lawsuits.

At E. Coli Hunt's End, A Safety Standards Gap (WP)

By Annys Shin

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

It took exactly 14 days from the time state health officials in Wisconsin noticed five cases of E. coli O157:H7 in the same county until investigators arrived Wednesday at a field in California's Salinas Valley in search of the bacteria that ended up in bagged spinach and sickened 157 people in 23 states.

The outbreak -- the largest, in terms of victims, caused by fresh produce -- has exposed strengths and weaknesses in the highly fragmented U.S. food safety system. And the extent of it has federal officials talking about imposing tougher regulation.

"There are good agricultural practices out there. . . . The question that will be addressed is: Are they adequate? Are they being followed? Does the industry need to be further regulated to be safe?" said David W. Acheson, a top Food and Drug Administration food safety official.

Even as public health officials have gotten better at identifying the onset of illness borne by raw fruits and vegetables, the rules and procedures to prevent those outbreaks remain weaker than those for meat and poultry, consumer advocates and food safety experts said. And their enforcement relies on the voluntary efforts of growers and processors, and on the FDA, which has responsibility for much of the food supply but nowhere near the authority or resources devoted to the monitoring of meat and poultry.

"The FDA is acting like the fire department after the fire has already started," said Caroline Smith DeWaal, director of food safety for the Center for Science in the Public Interest.

Public health officials have sought to contain E. coli O157:H7, which over the past 20 years has turned up in hamburgers, alfalfa sprouts, apple juice, cheese and lettuce. Escherichia Coli is normally found in the digestive tracts of humans and warm-blooded animals, but the rare and particularly toxic strain, E. coli O157:H7, damages the intestinal lining, leading to internal bleeding and organ failure. It can be fatal, especially for the very young and old. The latest outbreak killed a 77-year-old woman in Wisconsin.

Wisconsin public health officials were the first to sound the alarm on the current outbreak and call in the federal government, after receiving a report on Sept. 5 of five E. coli cases in Manitowoc County, located between Green Bay and Milwaukee. It later turned out that only one of those cases was linked to the tainted spinach; the others were traced to a local fair. But the initial cluster helped put state epidemiologists on high alert two days later when they learned of five more cases in the southeastern part of the state.

In those five, all of the victims had come down with Hemolytic Uremic Syndrome, a condition caused by E. coli that leads to kidney failure. On Sept. 8, Wisconsin officials notified the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Altanta and shared the DNA fingerprint of the E. coli strain with PulseNet, an 11-year-old network of public health labs operated by the CDC that has become instrumental in uncovering outbreaks of food-borne illness.

DOJ_NMG_0067215

By Sept. 13, detailed interviews with seven of the victims led Wisconsin officials to believe there was a link with spinach, Department of Health and Family Services spokesman Jason Helgerson said. Through the CDC, they learned Oregon officials had reached the same conclusion. With spinach suspected as the culprit, the CDC called in the FDA.

On Sept. 14, the CDC held a conference call with several states reporting cases of E. Coli O157:H7. That evening, the FDA issued its initial warning to consumers not to eat bagged fresh spinach.

The next day, last Friday, the FDA, based on information gathered from victims, narrowed down the search to Natural Selection Foods, which processes spinach used by 30 different brands, and broadened its warning to include all fresh spinach, loose and bagged.

Using supplier and distribution records at Natural Selection, the FDA confirmed California as the source of the contamination on Tuesday. The next day, about a dozen FDA and California state investigators descended on a farm in the Salinas Valley, the first of nine farms they had singled out through records.

On Wednesday, New Mexico officials said they found the strain of E. coli involved in the outbreak in an opened bag of spinach from which a victim had eaten; that helped investigators with further details such as what fields the tainted crop may have come from. Yesterday, FDA officials sent six more investigators into the fields, bringing the total to 19.

Over the past decade, outbreaks of E. coli caused by fresh produce have become more frequent, while the number caused by meat and poultry has declined. Consumer advocates and some food safety experts believe the disparity reflects differences in the regulation of fresh produce and of meat and poultry.

The bifurcated system, which puts the U.S. Department of Agriculture in charge of meat and poultry and gives the FDA oversight of the rest of the food supply, has changed little since its creation a century ago following publication of "The Jungle," Upton Sinclair's expose of Chicago slaughterhouses.

Last year, the FDA's approximately 800 inspectors conducted about 20,000 food safety inspections of all non-meat products, allowing them to visit a processing plant on average once every few years. By contrast, the USDA, which has an inspector daily in more than 6,000 processing plants nationwide, performs the same number of inspections in a matter of days, said Tony Corbo, a lobbyist with Food and Water Watch.

"I liken this to Jack in the Box all over again," said Michael Doyle, director of the University of Georgia's Center for Food Safety. He was referring to a 1993 outbreak of E. coli in Jack in the Box hamburgers that sickened hundreds and killed three.

After that episode, the USDA mandated tougher processing standards, which food safety experts credit with lowering the frequency of meat- and poultry-related E. coli and salmonella outbreaks.

"Until the government comes in and says we're going to have a law here . . . I don't think we're going to make any monumental change in improving the safety of bagged salads in general," Doyle said.

Food safety in the fresh produce industry is largely a matter of self-regulation. Typically, the FDA and state health department officials can inspect only processing plants and don't venture onto farms unless there's an outbreak. The FDA doesn't have the power to order recalls, though it can seize food before it has gone to retailers if a producer doesn't agree to one. The federal government has more powers when it comes to produce that has a plant disease that threatens other crops, DeWaal said.

Growers and processors say they have an added layer of scrutiny from third-party auditors they hire "to avoid the situation we're seeing now," said Bob Perkins, executive director of the Monterey County Farm Bureau.

The FDA was more assertive after the 19th episode of E. coli-tainted greens last October, sending a warning letter to the industry, which in the following months worked out a set of voluntary best practices for farmers and processors.

Yesterday, industry leaders were talking again about more voluntary guidelines.

Earlier this month, the FDA and California state officials, with the cooperation of the industry, began visiting fields and processing plants to get a better grasp of possible sources of contamination.

Industry leaders and some food safety experts contend there is no point to further regulation until scientists can figure out how produce becomes contaminated with E. coli.

DOJ_NMG_0067216

"If you don't know what the problem is how is that inspector going to help you?" said Jerry Welcome, spokesman for the United Fresh Fruit & Vegetable Association. "Is the answer throwing inspectors in and putting more regulations in, or do we need to spend more time and effort to figure out how does it happen?"

Top E.P.A. Official Rejects Recommendations On Soot (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 21 — The Environmental Protection Agency's administrator on Thursday rejected the recommendations of his staff — and an unusual public plea from independent science advisers — choosing instead to tighten only one of two standards regulating the amount of lethal particles of soot in the air.

The short-term daily standard, intended to control acute exposure to the minute particles, was cut nearly in half. But the annual standard, which affects chronic exposure, remains at its original 1997 level.

A large volume of research has implicated the soot particles — which are less than one-thirtieth the diameter of a human hair and can penetrate deep into the lungs and the circulatory system — in tens of thousands of deaths annually from both respiratory and coronary disease. Scientists say they are among the deadliest contaminants to which the public is regularly exposed, and for which the E.P.A. sets exposure levels.

Stephen L. Johnson, a career scientist at the agency and the third administrator appointed during President Bush's six years in office, said in a conference call on Thursday that the annual standard would remain at its current level while research continued. No change was made now, he said, "due to insufficient evidence'' linking health problems to long-term exposure.

"Wherever the science gave us a clear picture, we took clear action," Mr. Johnson said, adding, "All Americans deserve to breathe clean air, and through these more protective standards that is exactly what we are delivering today."

The E.P.A. sets standards under the 36-year-old Clean Air Act, and is required to review the standards every five years, taking into account the latest science. There have been no new standards since the first ones were established in 1997. The agency was under a court-ordered deadline to finalize new rules by Sept. 27.

The process of setting the new standards for soot, which comes from sources that include power plants, heavy industry and vehicle tailpipes and tires, drew intense scrutiny from medical and environmental as well as industry interests. Neither side was pleased with the final result.

In a rare display of solidarity, all but 2 of the 22 members of the agency's Clean Air Scientific Advisory Council had urged that the long-term standard be lowered to a range of 12 to 14 micrograms per cubic meter, from 15.

The American Medical Association, which seldom intervenes in such matters, agreed with the scientists in a letter to the agency in April. The letter also recommended that the daily, or acute exposure standard, be further reduced. Thursday's action reduced the daily standard to 35 micrograms per cubic meter from 65, though the A.M.A. favored a level of 25 micrograms. Edison Electric Institute, which represents investor-owned power plants that generate about 60 percent of the country's electricity, said the agency was going too far in nearly halving the daily standard.

Dan Reidinger, an Edison spokesman, said power plant emissions associated with fine particles had been cut by 40 percent since 1980. "E.P.A. persists in overemphasizing studies that suggest a possible benefit to tightening the air quality standard, '' Mr. Reidinger said, "while downplaying those suggesting that doing so may not provide the health benefits E.P.A. is seeking to achieve."

The reaction from medical and environmental groups was sharper. Joel Schwartz, an epidemiologist at the Harvard School of Public Health who has written many peer-reviewed papers on the health impact of particulates, said lowering the standard to the level set by the science advisers would prevent 3,000 premature deaths annually.

Frank O'Donnell, who heads Clean Air Watch, an environmental lobbying group in Washington, said, "Particle soot kills more people than any other form of air pollution, and this E.P.A. decision will allow particle soot to continue killing many thousands of Americans that would be spared if the air were cleaned up."

DOJ_NMG_0067217

In the teleconference, Mr. Johnson, the E.P.A. administrator, and two top agency officials, William Wehrum, the acting assistant administrator who heads the Office of Air and Radiation, and Dr. George Gray, an assistant administrator who heads the Office of Research and Development, stressed that the science advisers were not unanimous in their recommendations.

In an interview later Thursday, Mr. Johnson said, "The bottom line is these air standards are more protective today than they were yesterday."

Asked about the health-related benefits of the tighter standard for daily exposure, he cited the agency's statistical estimates that the new rule would avoid an estimated "2,500 premature deaths in people with heart or lung disease, 2,600 chronic bronchitis cases, 5,000 nonfatal heart attacks," among other things.

He said he could not provide estimates for the benefits associated with toughening the annual standard to 14 micrograms from 15.

Ron Wyzga, a scientist and biostatistician with the Electric Power Research Institute, an industry group, said a review of health studies showed "there's no magic number saying what a standard should or shouldn't be, so it's a matter of judgment. And different people have different judgments."

EPA Cuts Soot Level Allowable Daily In Air (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

The Bush administration imposed stricter standards on the nation's air quality yesterday for the first time in nearly a decade, ruling that communities across the country must cut back on the amount of soot in the air on any given day.

The agency did not go as far as its own scientists had urged in curbing soot, which is linked to heart and lung disease as well as childhood asthma. The decision sparked complaints on both sides of the pollution debate, with public health experts saying it was inadequate and industry officials calling it too stringent.

The Environmental Protection Agency's new rule lowers the limit on how much fine particulate matter Americans may be exposed to over a 24-hour period, cutting the existing standard of 65 micrograms per cubic meter of air to 35. However, it leaves unchanged the annual limit for "fine particulate matter," or soot, in the air. That standard remains an average of 15 micrograms per cubic meter per day over the course of a year.

"Today EPA is delivering the most health-protective national air standards in our nation's history," agency Administrator Stephen L. Johnson said in a telephone news conference yesterday. "All Americans deserve to breathe cleaner air, and through these more protective standards, that's exactly what we're delivering today."

The EPA's scientific advisory panel voted overwhelmingly last year to recommend cutting the annual amount of soot Americans breathe, from a daily average of 15 micrograms per cubic meter to 13 or 14 micrograms. But William L. Wehrum, the EPA's acting assistant administrator for air and radiation, said officials concluded that the current annual standard "is in fact adequate to protect public health with an adequate margin of safety, and there isn't sufficient evidence to justify a tightening of that standard."

Under federal law, officials are supposed to revise air quality rules every five years to reflect the latest scientific findings. Wehrum said the Supreme Court has ruled that officials should be "no more and no less stringent" than is needed to protect public health. "We have to hit the sweet spot here," he said.

The District and Baltimore -- which lie downwind of several power plants and are clogged with traffic -- are struggling to meet existing federal soot standards, which date to 1997.

Vince Morris, a spokesman for D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D), said the city is disappointed with the decision to leave the annual fine-particulate standard unchanged.

"It's discouraging to see the EPA take this approach, but it's not really surprising," Morris said. "We're trying to make the air cleaner for District residents against an avalanche of suburban sprawl and upwind factories, and this decision isn't going to help us at all. It's really a shame."

Public health activists, who noted that 60,000 Americans are estimated to die prematurely each year because of air pollution, were harsher in their assessment. According to an EPA analysis, the stricter standards endorsed by the scientific advisory panel would have reduced air pollution-related deaths in nine cities by 48 percent; the administration's new rules would cut deaths in those same cities by 22 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0067218

"It is the single worst action the Bush administration has taken on air pollution," said Frank O'Donnell, president of the advocacy group Clean Air Watch. "With this decision, the Bush administration has abdicated its responsibility to protect breathers from dangers in the air."

Dan Riedinger, spokesman for the Edison Electric Institute, whose members generate 60 percent of the nation's electricity, attacked the administration from the opposite perspective. Power plants have cut their fine-particulate emissions by 40 percent since 1980, he said, and the industry plans to spend more than $50 billion to cut emissions an additional 60 percent in Eastern states.

"EPA persists in overemphasizing studies that suggest a possible benefit to tightening the air quality standard, while downplaying those suggesting that doing so may not provide the health benefits EPA is seeking to achieve," Riedinger said. "Under the new standards, hundreds of counties that currently meet existing air quality standards will be in violation of the new ones, requiring tens of billions of dollars in annual expenditures to reduce emissions from all sectors of the economy."

The new rules will take effect in 2015; by then, the affected communities must draft plans for reducing air pollution or risk losing federal funds.

If the revised standards were in effect today, the District as well as Arlington and Loudon counties in Virginia would be out of compliance. But EPA officials said they expect all three areas to meet them by 2010.

Wehrum estimated that when the new rules take effect, about 32 additional counties -- most of them in Southern California -- will be out of compliance. Bebe Heiskell, who serves as county commissioner in Walker County, Ga., which is working to meet the 1997 standards, said she is concerned that the new rules will make it even harder for her community to attract businesses.

"It could have a detrimental impact on economic development and maintenance of the industry we do have," said Heiskell, who is appealing the EPA's decision to label her county as out of compliance. When it comes to soot in the air, she added, "I don't think it's affecting health in my community."

Confirmation Likely For Parks Nominee (AP)

By Mary Clare Jalonick

AP, September 22, 2006

Mary A. Bomar, President Bush's nominee to head the National Park Service, appeared headed for a quick confirmation as senators praised the British native Thursday for her professionalism and history with the agency.

Bomar, who has served as the Park Service's Northeast regional director since 2005, offered few opinions on current park service policy or the agency's budget problems at her Senate confirmation hearing. Bomar said she would help the agency "search for creative ways of working within our means."

If confirmed, Bomar will replace Fran Mainella, who announced this summer that she would step down for family reasons.

Senate Energy and Natural Resources Chairman Pete Domenici, R-N.M., and Wyoming Sen. Craig Thomas, the Republican chairman of the subcommittee on national parks, predicted that most senators will support her nomination.

"This will move fast," Domenici said after the hearing.

Bomar was born and raised in England and became a U.S. citizen in 1977. She has worked in numerous parks, serving as acting superintendent at Rocky Mountain National Park and as the first superintendent at the Oklahoma City National Memorial, among other jobs.

The Bush administration's handling of the national parks has drawn persistent critics. But the agency has recently retreated from some of its most controversial plans.

Officials this year rejected a management proposal that critics said would have expanded the use of snowmobiles and all-terrain vehicles on federal land. Instead, Mainella later signed a policy emphasizing that conservation is the parks' first responsibility.

But other issues remain. Bomar would take over the Park Service as the agency struggles with a yearslong backlog of maintenance and rehabilitation projects.

DOJ_NMG_0067219

Bomar declined to elaborate on her personal views on a number of subjects, including snowmobiles and the maintenance backlog. She said she planned to "stay the course" and continue to look at the backlog.

"You have done a very good job of not answering the questions," Domenici teased during the hearing, adding that she appeared to understand the agency has serious issues to confront.

Oregon Sen. Ron Wyden, a Democrat, pressed Bomar on recent ethics issues at the Interior Department.

The department's inspector general, Earl Devaney, lashed out last week at what he said was the department's failure to deal with ethical missteps and conflicts of interest.

"I will be a leader who demonstrates high ethical standards and promotes transparency in all our activities," Bomar said.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Judge Suspends Jail Time For BALCO Journalists, Pending Appeal (CCT)

By Thomas Peele

Contra Costa (CA) Times, September 22, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - A federal judge Thursday ordered two journalists jailed on contempt charges for as long as 18 months for refusing to reveal who leaked them secret grand jury testimony in the BALCO steroids case.

U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White immediately suspended his order pending the outcome of appeals to the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. He rejected the requests of San Francisco Chronicle investigative reporters Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada that they be fined rather than jailed.

In a tense exchange, Fainaru-Wada told White he would not, under any circumstances, reveal the source.

"Do you intend to honor the subpoena as issued to you?" White asked Fainaru-Wada after the reporter made an emotional statement before a crowded courtroom that journalism is a "meaningful, honorable profession."

"No," he answered. "I will not comply."

Williams told White that he meant "no disrespect to you and the judicial system," by defying the subpoena. "I have a deeply held ethical and moral belief as a journalist and a man that I have to keep my word," he told White.

But a justice department lawyer said the reporters' testimony was critical to its investigation of the leak.

"Our job is to get information and get to the truth," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Douglas M. Miller. "We want to indict the right people, not the wrong people. We have a right to prove our case."

The judge praised Fainaru-Wada and Williams as journalists and persons, but said the legal matter before him was incredibly complicated

"It is a very difficult area of the law and a conflict between the First Amendment and the Grand Jury's right to conduct its investigation." He cited a 1972 Supreme Court decision that journalists must comply with such subpoenas.

"The law in this country is quite clear. The reporters in this matter have no right not to testify. Every citizen has a duty to comply with a subpoena," White said.

The government has a legitimate need to determine who leaked the reporters the secret testimony of baseball stars Barry Bonds and Jason Giambi.

Giambi told the jurors he knowingly used steroids, according to the transcript. Bonds said he did not know that substances he used contained steroids. His personal trainer, Greg Anderson, has been twice jailed for also refusing to testify.

The Grand Jury is investigating whether Bonds lied when he said he did not know that substances called "the clear" and "the cream," which he admitted using, contained steroids. Fainaru-Wada said the pair's reporting and the book they wrote on steroids in baseball exposed a fraud committed against the public. "We were assigned to cover a story to the best of our ability," he said.

White's ruling speaks directly to the need for a federal law protecting journalists from revealing sources, Eve Burton, general counsel of the Chronicle's owner, the Hearst Corp., said outside court following the hearing.

The proposed federal "shield law," which is pending in the U.S. Senate, would allow judges to use a balancing test to weigh whether the public good served by a story should be considered when asking a journalist to testify in court, Burton said.

In the past 18 months federal judges have stopped using such tests, she said. In the last year Hearst journalists received 78 Grand Jury subpoenas compared to five in the previous year, Burton said.

At a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing Wednesday the No. 2 official in the Justice Department opposed a bipartisan bill to create a shield law. Despite that, Burton said she believes President Bush "wouldn't veto" the bill if it reaches him. The trend of requiring reporters to testify before federal grand juries "is a crisis of great proportion in this country," Burton said.

In one instance, a story involving a "case of public corruption" was not published recently because a reporter involved feared being subpoenaed. White's courtroom was packed for the nearly three-hour hearing. The crowd, which included a group of sportswriters from around the country, began to gather outside the federal court house in a show of support for Williams and Fainaru-Wada.

"This one hit us right in the wheelhouse," said the group's organizer, Rick Telander, a Chicago Sun-Times columnist. "This may be the end of investigative reporting as we know it."

Sportswriters, he said, "are usually a bunch of grumpy old guys looking for free food. But we want to stand behind Lance and Mark. We want the American people to see us. We want the president to see us. This is way beyond sports."

Reporters Get Jail In Steroids Inquiry, But Ruling Is Stayed (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 21 (AP) — Two San Francisco Chronicle reporters were ordered jailed Thursday for a maximum of 18 months, pending an appeal, for refusing to testify about who gave them secret grand jury testimony from Barry Bonds and other elite athletes.

The reporters, Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada, wrote a series of articles and a book based partly on the leaked transcripts of the testimony of Bonds, Jason Giambi and others before a grand jury investigating the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, a nutritional supplement company in Burlingame, Calif., that was exposed two years ago as a steroid ring.

Federal prosecutors asked Judge Jeffrey White of Federal District Court to send the reporters to prison for the full term of the grand jury investigating the leak, or until they agreed to testify. Both sides agreed to stay the ruling pending an appeal to the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit.

Mr. Williams and Mr. Fainaru-Wada have repeatedly said that they would go to jail rather than comply with the grand jury's subpoenas and reveal their source or sources.

The reporters agreed with the government that they are in contempt, but had sought a "nominal monetary fine" and other punishment "short of full-blown incarceration," including house arrest and weekend jailing, according to court documents.

The authorities are seeking to prosecute whoever unlawfully leaked the transcripts, and told Judge White that the reporters were the only ones who knew the identity of their sources. Judge White ordered the two to testify on Aug. 15.

The criminal conduct being investigated in the Bonds leak case includes possible perjury and obstruction of justice by government officials, defendants in the steroid inquiry and their lawyers. All had access to the leaked documents, but have sworn that they were not the source of the reporting by Mr. Williams and Mr. Fainaru-Wada.

In August, Judge White ruled that his hands were tied by a 1972 Supreme Court precedent that said no one, journalists included, was above the law and could refuse to testify before a federal grand jury.

The Chronicle reported that Bonds told the grand jury that he believed he was using flaxseed oil and arthritic balm, not steroids, supplied by his trainer Greg Anderson, one of five defendants convicted in the steroid scandal.

Mr. Anderson served his three months and is in prison again for refusing to testify before another federal grand jury investigating whether Bonds committed perjury.

San Francisco Reporters Sentenced To Jail In Bonds Steroids Case (CCT)

By Thomas Peele, Contra Costa Times

Contra Costa Times, September 22, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - A federal judge Thursday ordered two journalists jailed on contempt charges for as long as 18 months for refusing to reveal who leaked them secret grand jury testimony in the BALCO steroids case.

DOJ_NMG_0067221

U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White immediately suspended his order pending the outcome of appeals to the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. He rejected the requests of San Francisco Chronicle investigative reporters Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada that they be fined rather than jailed.

In a tense exchange, Fainaru-Wada told White he would not, under any circumstances, reveal the source.

"Do you intend to honor the subpoena as issued to you?" White asked Fainaru-Wada after the reporter made an emotional statement before a crowded courtroom that journalism is a "meaningful, honorable profession."

"No," he answered. "I will not comply."

Williams told White that he meant "no disrespect to you and the judicial system" by defying the subpoena.

"I have a deeply held ethical and moral belief as a journalist and a man that I have to keep my word," he told White.

But a Justice Department lawyer said the reporters' testimony was crucial to its investigation of the leak.

"Our job is to get information and get to the truth," Assistant U.S. Attorney Douglas Miller said. "We want to indict the right people, not the wrong people. We have a right to prove our case."

The judge praised Fainaru-Wada and Williams as journalists but said the legal matter before him was incredibly complicated

"It is a very difficult area of the law and a conflict between the First Amendment and the Grand Jury's right to conduct its investigation," White said.

He cited a 1972 Supreme Court decision that journalists must comply with such subpoenas.

"The law in this country is quite clear. The reporters in this matter have no right not to testify. Every citizen has a duty to comply with a subpoena," White said.

The government has a legitimate need to determine who leaked the reporters the secret testimony of baseball stars Barry Bonds and Jason Giambi, White said.

Giambi told the jurors he knowingly used steroids, according to the transcript. Bonds said he did not know that substances he used contained steroids. His personal trainer, Greg Anderson, has twice been jailed for also refusing to testify.

The Grand Jury is investigating whether Bonds lied when he said he did not know that substances called "the clear" and "the cream," which he admitted using, contained steroids. Fainaru-Wada said the pair's reporting and the book they wrote on steroids in baseball exposed a fraud committed against the public.

"We were assigned to cover a story to the best of our ability," he said.

White's ruling speaks directly to the need for a federal law protecting journalists from revealing sources, Eve Burton, general counsel of the Chronicle's owner, the Hearst Corp., said outside court following the hearing.

The proposed federal "shield law," which is pending in the U.S. Senate, would allow judges to use a balancing test to weigh whether the public good served by a story should be considered when asking a journalist to testify in court, Burton said.

In the past 18 months, federal judges have stopped using such tests, she said. In the last year, Hearst journalists received 78 Grand Jury subpoenas compared to five in the previous year, Burton said.

At a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing Wednesday, the No. 2 official in the Justice Department opposed a bipartisan bill to create a shield law. Despite that, Burton said she believes President Bush "wouldn't veto" the bill if it reaches him. The trend of requiring reporters to testify before federal grand juries "is a crisis of great proportion in this country," Burton said.

In one instance, a story involving a "case of public corruption" was not published recently because a reporter involved feared being subpoenaed. White's courtroom was packed for the nearly three-hour hearing. The crowd included a group of sportswriters from around the country who gathered outside the federal court house in a show of support for Williams and Fainaru-Wada.

"This one hit us right in the wheelhouse," said the group's organizer, Chicago Sun-Times columnist Rick Telander. "This may be the end of investigative reporting as we know it."

Sportswriters, he said, "are usually a bunch of grumpy old guys looking for free food. But we want to stand behind Lance and Mark. We want the American people to see us. We want the president to see us. This is way beyond sports."

Judge: BALCO Reporters Face Prison If They Lose Appeals (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, September 22, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- A federal judge in San Francisco said today he will sentence two Chronicle reporters to prison if they lose their appeals of his decision requiring them to reveal their sources of confidential grand jury testimony about star athletes using performance-enhancing drugs.

Imprisonment is the only adequate means of pressuring reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams to comply with their legal duty of providing evidence to a federal grand jury about the source of the leaks, U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White said in what he described as a tentative ruling.

He rejected arguments by the journalists' lawyers that a monetary fine would be a more appropriate sanction for contempt of court. A fine would not put enough pressure on the reporters to testify, White said.

The judge also rejected federal prosecutors' request for an 18-month prison sentence and instead ordered the reporters confined for the rest of the current grand jury term, unless they agree to testify earlier.

Prosecutors haven't said how long the grand jury will be in session, but it could be as late as October 2007, according to court documents. Assistant U.S. Attorney Douglas Miller told White, however, that the reporters would not necessarily be free at that point, because prosecutors could convene another grand jury to continue the investigation.

The government has agreed to delay Fainaru-Wada's and Williams' imprisonment until a panel of the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decides whether they have a right not to reveal who leaked the grand jury testimony to them. That ruling is at least several months away.

Fainaru-Wada and Williams wrote a series of articles in 2004 quoting closed-door grand jury testimony by Jason Giambi of the New York Yankees, sprinter Tim Montgomery and other athletes. All of them said they had used performance-enhancing substances that, according to prosecutors, were illegal steroids supplied by the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, or BALCO.

Also leaked was testimony by Giants outfielder Barry Bonds, who denied knowingly using steroids but said he had taken substances he thought were flaxseed oil and rubbing balm for arthritis. Descriptions of those substances matched "the clear" and "the cream," two undetectable performance-enhancing drugs distributed by BALCO.

Bonds' sworn statements have given rise to a perjury investigation by a separate grand jury.

The disclosure of the athletes' testimony prompted a congressional investigation about drug use in sports and contributed to professional baseball's decision to implement a new steroid-testing policy. High school athletes in California are now required to sign pledges that they will not use steroids.

Five defendants in the BALCO case, including company founder Victor Conte, pleaded guilty to illegal drug distribution. But prosecutors did not make the athletes' grand jury testimony public or even reveal their names during the investigation of the laboratory, and have convened another grand jury to determine who disclosed the transcripts to the Chronicle reporters. Prosecutors say whoever leaked the testimony broke the law.

In refusing to testify, the reporters have claimed that the constitutional guarantee of freedom of the press includes the right to keep promises of confidentiality to their sources.

Lawyers for Hearst Corp., which owns The Chronicle, argued that reporters should be forced to disclose their sources only if the harm caused by the breach of grand jury secrecy outweighs the public benefit of the reporting -- a standard proposed in a journalists' "shield law" now before the U.S. Senate.

California and most other states have their own shield laws that contain even stronger protections for confidential news sources.

There is no such federal law, however, and White ruled last month that journalists have no right to withhold information from a federal grand jury in a criminal investigation.

E-mail Bob Egelko at begelko@sfchronicle.com.

Jailing The Messenger (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2006

Locking up reporters is the wrong way to plug grand jury leaks.

A DRUG DEALER SELLS HIS WARES to professional baseball players, whose steroid-distorted performances subvert the game. Major League Baseball knows but does nothing. The feds find out and raid the drug lab. Two reporters look into the raid, discover rampant use of steroids in baseball and write a series of articles and a book that shock the public, launch a congressional probe, prompt the president to decry drug use in sports and finally move baseball to impose a tough steroid-testing policy.

The dealer goes to jail. Might anyone else do time in this web of corruption, deceit and ineptitude? Why, the reporters, of course. The suspected ballplayers got immunity, and baseball executives escaped scrutiny. But the journalists are facing time for their work.

San Francisco Chronicle reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams are scheduled to appear before a federal judge today to say why they do not deserve to go to jail for refusing to betray the source who gave them grand jury transcripts about the case. If they don't, the judge could put them behind bars until they change their minds.

Prosecutors say, correctly, that the reporters witnessed a crime when they received the sealed statements made during the grand jury probe of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroid scandal. They also argue that such proceedings are sacrosanct and must remain so in order to get witnesses to come forward. But prosecutors have at their disposal the full investigative power of the U.S. government to subpoena witnesses, grant immunity and compel testimony. They should be able to keep their own house in order. If they can't, and someone on their team or elsewhere in the courthouse leaks the testimony, they should be able to plug the leak without compelling reporters to break their promises to their own sources.

There is no room here for objections about how allowing reporters to protect their sources might interfere with the government's ability to keep the nation secure from attack in a time of war. The two Chronicle reporters are not withholding information about a security risk in the White House or the CIA. Nor is this argument about whether reporters deserve some kind of consideration others don't. They are acting on the public's behalf, and any rights they gain — or lose — also belong to the public.

Californians recognized the importance of protecting reporters from compelled testimony about their sources by passing a shield law and making it part of the state Constitution. Federal judges have the discretion to let the state law guide them in their rulings on the reporter's privilege. Meanwhile, Congress should pass a federal version of the shield law, even one that falls far short of perfect, such as the bill from Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) to restore the balance between the government — with its power to probe and compel — and two reporters backed by their enterprise and the 1st Amendment.

Contempt On Steroids In S.F. (DENP)

Denver Post, September 22, 2006

Their startling stories about Major League baseball provoked a national debate on the dangers of illegal steroid use. Incredibly, San Francisco Chronicle reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams could be sent to jail today in a contempt case that should never have seen the light of day.

At issue is a Justice Department subpoena that seeks to force the reporters to reveal who provided them with grand jury testimony in the Bay Area Laboratory Cooperative (BALCO) case. Federal judge Jeffrey White is set to decide whether their refusal - aimed at protecting the anonymity of their sources - merits jail time.

Federal authorities have been zealous in pursuing the reporters, but they haven't been so tough on themselves. After all, it was their own blunders that resulted in the release of information they meant to expurgate. The information, filed in an electronic court brief, summarized e-mail messages between BALCO President Victor Conte Jr. and Fainaru-Wada. The FBI obtained the e-mails when they searched Conte's home. In the messages, the two discussed the possibility of Conte giving Fainaru-Wada a copy of grand jury materials. Shortly after the exchange, the Chronicle ran a story quoting from the grand jury testimony of Olympic sprinter Tim Montgomery.

One might deduce that the feds already know what they want to know. People involved in the case, including Conte,have served time behind bars. What is the point in launching a gratuitous attack against the reporters?

DOJ_NMG_0067224

This summer, a number of conservatives called for the prosecution of New York Times reporters after the paper published a story regarding a government program tracking the bank transactions of terror suspects - despite the fact that President Bush had on numerous occasions publicly talked about tracking terrorists' financial transactions as part of the war on terror.

The work of a free press is imperiled by the threat of government persecution. Congress is considering a national reporters' shield law, which would give journalists a qualified privilege. Most states already have such protections, and we urge the Senate and the House to act now.

Theodore Olson, former solicitor general in the Bush administration, testified Wednesday in support of a shield law, saying it would promote investigative journalism. Such protection would ease the burden on the San Francisco journalists whose coverage of the baseball steroids story has been a valuable public service.

Outcome For Chronicle Reporters Means We All Lose (ESPN)

By Wright Thompson

ESPN.com, September 22, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams stood in front of the federal courthouse. Moments before, the two San Francisco Chronicle reporters had listened to a judge decide that they'd face jail time as a way of coercing their testimony.

They faced a wall of cameras and talked about the First Amendment and the importance of the press.

These words are being written in the sports department of the Chronicle, which opened its doors to out-of-town media in town for the legal proceedings. And there is a pall over the entire office.

A man stood near the back, anonymous. No one noticed that Michael Rains, Barry Bonds' attorney, had come to see rock bottom for the two men most responsible for exposing his client's alleged steroid use. Rains had tried to listen for the verdict on the radio and, like a lot of people in town, had been curious if the reporters would be ordered to do time. To him, there is no difference between them and Greg Anderson, Bonds' trainer, who is being jailed for his refusal to testify in front of a grand jury.

"Contempt is contempt," Rains said. "There shouldn't be preferential treatment because they claim to have a higher calling in life."

That's the question posed often by non-journalist friends of mine: Why should these two men have more protection than Anderson? What is the difference?

There is one. There is a difference between a steroids dealer who is covering for his friend and two hard-working journalists. Look, Anderson might be a very nice man. He certainly is a loyal friend. But he's hardly an innocent bystander in all of this. He did time for dealing harmful performance-enhancing drugs.

Mark and Lance? Their biggest mistake, it seems, was doing too good a job of exposing steroid use. Sure, their work got them a book deal and accolades. But it also got them 18 months. I've won journalism awards. They ain't worth 18 months.

These reporters were assigned a story, did it well and, in the process, sparked a national debate that did big things like teach kids about the danger of steroids and small things like help force a sport to clean up its act. In the end, those are the only relevant facts to me. They provided a public service, worked long hours, endured criticism and dead ends, pursuing the truth.

Funny, isn't that what the government is supposed to do?

In the end, it seems that the only people with pure motives in this entire saga are Williams and Fainaru-Wada.

Bonds and the rest of the BALCO athletes allegedly took steroids to cheat the games they play. They're a part of this because of their egos.

The U.S. attorneys have become so obsessed with winning this case -- seems to be going around these days -- that they're missing the forest for the trees. For all the talk of wanting to expose those who abuse steroids, they asked for the stiffest possible penalty for two men who actually did the thing they so desperately want to do.

Anderson is sitting in jail to protect a friend. If he wasn't, if he could clear Bonds, don't you think he would have done so by now?

Then there are Mark and Lance. In the courtroom, Fainaru-Wada got up and made a speech to the court in his defense. He started speaking fast, and the judge asked him to slow down. His mother and wife were among the spectators in the crowd.

DOJ_NMG_0067225

"I tend to speed up when I get nervous," he said.

He told about wanting to be like his big brother, Steve Fainaru, a Washington Post reporter who recently wrote a string of outstanding stories about Iraq.

The Fainaru brothers are out there on the front lines, telling stories that make a difference. Since the days of Thomas Payne, this country has been built on the foundation of a free press. It's why that amendment was the first one. There's a reason the founding fathers -- I'll take Thomas Jefferson over the two government suits in the courtroom on Thursday -- didn't make the First Amendment about protecting secret grand juries.

"My name is Mark Fainaru-Wada," he told a packed courtroom, "and I have been a journalist for most of my adult life. ... Like many of my colleagues today, I had seen the movie and read the book 'All The President's Men,' and it inspired me to become a reporter. Journalism seemed like an honorable, meaningful profession."

He talked of wanting to do something that would cause change, that would help people. He wasn't trying to win a case or a baseball game. Those two well-meaning government attorneys should have felt real low at that moment. They'd spent lots of money going to law school, working hard to get these jobs and, instead of helping make the world a better place, they were sending difference makers to jail.

"Nobody is above the law," U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White said.

The government wants to know who leaked secret grand jury testimony to the reporters, and they're going to the mattresses to find out. That's their right. The law says they can do that, though I believe the law is wrong. Right now, Congress is debating a federal shield bill that would protect journalists working on important stories. Write your congressman or congresswoman and let them know that you support it. One of those stories might be about a plant polluting your neighborhood or a corrupt school district that is supposed to be educating your children.

These words are being written in the sports department of the Chronicle, which opened its doors to out-of-town media in town for the legal proceedings. And there is a pall over the entire office. Not long ago, Williams walked out of the building, his attorney by his side, the lawyer's tie loosened.

It had been a long day, one in which the government won and we all lost.

Wright Thompson is a senior writer for ESPN.com and ESPN The Magazine. He can be reached at wrightespn@gmail.com

NFL, Union Meet To Discuss Drug Tests (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

Filed at 7:58 p.m. ET

NEW YORK (AP) -- NFL commissioner Roger Goodell met Thursday with union chief Gene Upshaw and a group of other league and union officials on a range of issues, including the possibility of expanding testing for performance-enhancing drugs.

NFL spokesman Greg Aiello said nothing definitive would come out of the session, one of the first formal meetings of its kind since Goodell took over three weeks ago from Paul Tagliabue.

The meeting has been scheduled for a while to work out details of the extension to the labor agreement, arrived at last March in Dallas. Goodell, as the NFL's chief operating officer under Tagliabue, was the league's main contact with Upshaw during those negotiations.

But it also includes such subjects as putting a team in Los Angeles -- Goodell was the league's point man on that issue before becoming commissioner -- and expanded testing for steroids and other performance-enhancing substances, such as human growth hormone.

"There was a wide-ranging CBA follow-up meeting today involving several people and many issues, including the drug program," Aiello said in a statement. "Those meetings will continue."

"No announcements," Upshaw said in an e-mail to The Associated Press.

The HGH issue became more urgent in the last month after the Charlotte Observer ran details of medical records produced in court for the trial of Dr. James Shortt. Shortt, was sentenced to a year and a day in prison after prescribing steroids and human growth hormone for several Carolina Panthers in 2002 through 2004. They went to the Super Bowl after the 2003 season.

DOJ_NMG_0067226

More recently, Washington offensive tackle Jon Jansen said on HBO he believes "perhaps 15, 20 percent" of NFL players use HGH, human growth hormone. Jansen later backed off that figure.

The league currently tests seven players per team per week on a random basis for performance-enhancing drugs. It has asked the union to consider more and Upshaw, after first balking, has indicated he would be amenable to additional tests.

Goodell, Upshaw Discuss Drug Testing Program (WP)

By Mark Maske, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell and Players Association chief Gene Upshaw met yesterday without agreeing to any modifications of the league's steroid-testing program, officials said.

Goodell and Upshaw discussed a variety of topics, including the league's drug policy. A league spokesman said no agreements were reached on that issue but that conversations would continue at some point. Goodell said in recent weeks that he had opened discussions with Upshaw about the possibility of strengthening the program, possibly by increasing the frequency of tests and adding substances to the banned list.

Upshaw said most recently he was open to the possibility of modifying the sport's drug policies if the league's medical advisers recommended it. Previously, he'd said he didn't think more tests were necessary and he thought the drug program should be changed only when scientific advancements in testing warranted it.

The two also discussed topics related to the economics of the sport and the league's efforts to put a franchise in the Los Angeles market.Panthers' Smith Practices

Wide receiver Steve Smith participated in the Carolina Panthers' practice yesterday, perhaps signaling that he will return to the club's lineup Sunday in Tampa.

Smith hadn't practiced the previous two weeks and missed the Panthers' first two games of the season because of an injured hamstring muscle. The Panthers and Buccaneers will take identical 0-2 records into Sunday's matchup of teams that reached the NFC playoffs last season but are struggling now. The game also will mark the first time that Buccaneers Coach Jon Gruden and Panthers wide receiver Keyshawn Johnson will be on the same field since Gruden de-activated Johnson for the final six games of the 2003 season for insubordination.

The two coexisted peacefully during the Buccaneers' Super Bowl-winning season in 2002, but clashed while the club struggled the following season. Gruden reacted by sending Johnson home even though the team had to continue paying him. The Buccaneers traded Johnson to the Cowboys after that season, and he spent two seasons in Dallas before being released this past offseason and signing with the Panthers. . . .

Left tackle Orlando Pace participated in portions of the St. Louis Rams' practice yesterday. He suffered a concussion during last weekend's loss at San Francisco. The Rams upgraded Pace's playing status for this weekend from doubtful to questionable on their official injury report. . . .

The New York Giants play Sunday in Seattle, the site of the memorable game last season when they lost in overtime after committing 11 false-start penalties amid the din of the Qwest Field crowd. The Giants also watched their place kicker, Jay Feely, miss three potential game-winning field goals. Feely's misadventures even spurred a "Saturday Night Live" skit. Left tackle Luke Petitgout had five of the false starts.

Goodell has said he likes venues with loud, boisterous fans, but he and members of the competition committee will consider possible measures to lessen the disadvantage that visiting teams face in such settings. Goodell has said it's possible that, in the future, all offensive players could have radio receivers in their helmets to be able to hear the quarterback's signals.

Ex-city Worker Admits Heroin Dealing (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, September 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0067227

A former hoisting engineer for the city's Department of Water Management pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court Thursday to running a heroin distribution ring while working for the city.

George Prado, 48, is cooperating with federal investigators in the case against his alleged supplier, Sandra Stewart, and in other ongoing drug investigations, authorities said.

He admitted Thursday that he purchased large quantities of heroin that he distributed through a network of couriers and dealers, including fellow city employees Anthony Ritacco and Michael Hart.

Hart and Ritacco, who is Prado's brother-in-law, also have pleaded guilty in the case. Like Prado, they have lost their city jobs.

Stewart, 32, of Bensenville, allegedly received drugs directly from Colombian suppliers. She is scheduled to stand trial in December.

Prado likely will be a key witness in the case.

Standing in court Wednesday shackled at the legs, Prado meekly acknowledged that from 2002 to 2005 he ran a drug ring that dealt in hundreds of thousands of dollars of heroin.

"You were kind of a middleman. You would obtain heroin from sources ... and then deliver it to your couriers?" Senior Judge Harry Leinenweber asked.

Prado admitted that was the role he played in the heroin trade.

According to authorities, Prado was captured on a wiretap threatening to kill one of his own couriers.

If he had gone to trial, Prado would have had to listen to a series of such wiretaps and face testimony from several members of his ring who also pleaded guilty.

Under the deal he reached with prosecutors, he likely will face a little more than 8 years in prison.

Prado's indictment in 2005 came at a time when the city's Water Management Department was reeling from the Hired Truck scandal. And one week before Prado's arrest, then-Water Department Commissioner Richard Rice was fired in the aftermath of an alleged time-sheet scam.

But investigators said Prado's drug ring was unconnected to other problems in the scandal-plagued department.

During his guilty plea Thursday, his work for the city wasn't mentioned.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Michael Gurland instead chronicled a series of specific drug deals that Prado admitted he orchestrated.

Gurland also noted Prado's history of laundering drug money through the purchase of property.

Under his plea agreement, Prado must forfeit more than $433,000.

The U.S. Marshals Service seized one home Prado owned at 5900 S. Newcastle Ave. The home was sold for more than $59,000.

Prado's home in the 5800 block of South Nordica Avenue is also subject to forfeiture unless Prado can pay off his debt to the government some other way.

Gurland asked that Prado's sentence be delayed until Stewart is tried.

He is scheduled to be sentenced in January.

rrbush@tribune.com

Feds Break Up Alleged Coke Ring (BOSH)

By Steven Ryan

Boston Herald, September 22, 2006

Federal authorities seized 150 kilograms of cocaine and busted 13 people for running a sophisticated drug ring in Lynn, Revere and Dorchester, the U.S. Department of Justice announced today.

“Residents of the North Shore should not have to live with drug dealers operating in their communities,” said U.S. Attorney Michael Sullivan in a press release.

A federal grand jury investigating the alleged ring handed down indictments against 13 people, according to June W. Stansbury, special agent in charge of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration in New England, and Sullivan. They were charged with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute 5 or more kilograms of cocaine.

DOJ_NMG_0067228

The feds said the charges stem from a wiretapping investigation from May to August of this year of the alleged cocaine ring.

The wiretaps caught conversations allegedly arranging for the distribution and payment of wholesale quantities of cocaine that were shipped from New Jersey and Texas. Investigators intercepted three separate deliveries of the cocaine, two of which were transported by tractor trailers.

"We will not allow traffickers to turn our interstates into cocaine highways," said Stansbury. "As this case demonstrates, it's a dead end."

Eleven of the 13 suspects were arrested in August, while another one, Daniel Mueses, 30, of Hackensack, N.J., was arrested yesterday in New Jersey. The last suspect, Joseph Ovalle, 33, also of Hackensack, remains a fugitive and is believed to be in the Dominican Republic.

The seven locals charged in the drug distribution ring are Dario De Los Santo-Pascal, 31, Bertha Valencia, 43, and Jose Valencia, 25, all of Revere, Juan Estrada, 26, and Yokasta Dejada, 26, both of Dorchester, Orlando Moldonado, 29, of Melrose, and Joseph Valeri, 25, of Fitchburg.

Huge Coke Bust (DI)

By David Liscio

Daily Item, September 22, 2006

LYNN - Thirteen members of an alleged North Shore cocaine distribution network, including three Revere residents, were indicted in federal court Thursday following a wiretap investigation and a major drug seizure in Lynn.

Federal agents from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) and other law enforcement organizations spent three months listening to and recording conversations among the suspects, culminating in the interception of three separate cocaine shipments, according to Samantha Martin of the U.S. Attorney's Office in Boston. Two of those deliveries involved tractor-trailers. The largest - containing 123 kilograms of cocaine - was seized in a Lynn parking lot Aug. 14.

Another drug seizure occurred shortly after undercover agents spotted some of the suspects in the Walgreens pharmacy parking lot at the corner of Broadway and Fernwood Avenue in Revere. The suspects were seen transferring a white, powdery substance in a red-and-blue diaper bag emblazoned with a picture of Elmo. Police followed the suspects' vehicle to Lynn, where it was stopped. A police dog found the drugs inside the Elmo bag on the car's backseat, according to court documents.

Overall, as a result of the sting, authorities seized approximately 150 kilograms, or more than 300 pounds of cocaine.

Named in the indictment are: Dario De Los Santo-Pascal, 31, also known as Felipe Acevedo and nicknamed "The Mayor", 58 Florence Ave., Revere; Bertha Valencia, 43, 341 Beach St., Revere; Jose "Freddy" Valencia, 25, 536 Beach St., Revere; Juan Estrada, 26, and Yokasta Dejada, 26, both of Boston's Dorchester section; Orlando Maldonado, 29, of Melrose; Alfredo Salinas, 41, and Callentano Longoria, 33, both of Texas; Joseph Valeri, 25, of Fitchburg; Miguel Lugo, 24, and Nicholas Lugo, 38, both of Tijuana, Mexico; and Joseph Ovalle, 33, and Daniel Mueses, 30, both of Hackensack, N.J.

According to court documents, the investigation was conducted from May to August and included court-authorized wiretaps to probe suspected cocaine trafficking in Lynn, Revere and Dorchester. The defendants were heard making plans to pick up, distribute and pay for wholesale amounts of cocaine shipped into Massachusetts from other parts of the country, including New Jersey and Texas. In some instances, the suspects used a Lynn woman's cell phone to conduct business, based on wiretap monitoring records.

DEA agents, State Troopers, and police departments in Lynn, Revere, Boston and Everett, participated in the investigation that traversed several North Shore communities. Undercover officers tracked the suspects to several locations, including parking lots at the Square One Mall in Saugus, a Peabody truck stop, and a junkyard off Western Avenue in Lynn, according to court records.

A federal grand jury returned the indictment on charges of conspiracy to possess cocaine with intent to distribute. Eleven defendants were also charged with cocaine possession.

"Residents of the North Shore should not have to live with drug dealers operating in their communities, brazenly conducting their drug deals in mall parking lots and truck stops," said U.S. Attorney Michael J. Sullivan.

DOJ_NMG_0067229

Only one suspect, Ovalle, was not apprehended and police believe he fled to the Dominican Republic. If convicted, each defendant faces a mandatory minimum sentence of 10 years imprisonment and up to life behind bars.

Worker On New Las Vegas FBI Office Nabbed On Old Murder Warrant (AP)

AP, September 22, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) - A man applying for work building a new Las Vegas FBI office was nabbed on a 22-year-old murder warrant after a background check found he was wanted in a double slaying in Texas.

Jesus Garcia, 50, was arrested Aug. 24 and returned to Harris County, Texas, to face charges in a Sept. 7, 1984, shooting that left two men dead and two other men wounded in a Houston-area lounge, said David Staretz, spokesman for the FBI office in Nevada.

"Even after 20 years, the law eventually will catch up with you," Staretz said Thursday.

Garcia voluntarily provided fingerprint samples when he applied for a construction job at a new southern Nevada FBI regional office, Staretz said. The prints matched those on file with a warrant in the slaying.

Garcia was one of 21 workers arrested or notified they were wanted for crimes and infractions based on background checks required for work building the Las Vegas FBI office, officials said.

The $28 million, 120,000 square-foot building is being built by Virginia-based Harwood and Associates for lease to the FBI for a minimum of 15 years.

Judge In Nightclub Fire Case Upbraids Prosecution Over Leak (NYT)

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

BOSTON, Sept. 21 — A Rhode Island Superior Court judge chastised the state's attorney general Thursday, saying his office had leaked to the press a letter telling relatives of 100 people killed in a nightclub fire that the club owners would plead no contest to involuntary manslaughter charges and that one would not face jail time.

The judge, Francis J. Darigan Jr., said the leak was "unethical, reprehensible, devoid of any consideration for the victims of this tragedy and totally abrogated an agreement reached after weeks of discussion."

Judge Darigan said the court mailed out its own letter to families Wednesday night explaining the terms of the plea agreement. He said he had intended for them to receive word of it before the news media.

The office of Attorney General Patrick C. Lynch had planned to send a separate letter telling families he objected to the deal, but his letter was faxed to a television station Wednesday night and was made public a short time later.

Mr. Lynch said in a statement that notifying all the families personally would have been an "unprecedented challenge." While many families would be "deeply hurt" by the news of the plea arrangement, he said, most would have heard of it through the press anyway.

"While each of us had the victims' best interests in mind in sending individual letters, the reality is that the vast majority of people would still learn of the court's intentions through the news media," he said.

Mr. Lynch also said he shared Judge Darigan's concern "that the process did not work as well as we had hoped, and I will, in time, find out why." He did not say if his office had faxed the letter to the station, and his spokesman did not return telephone calls seeking comment.

Judge Darigan's letter to families said that even though the prosecution and the defense could not come to an agreement, he accepted the no-contest pleas after seeing video and photographic evidence "of a most disturbing nature" that would have been presented at trial.

"I am sure this evidence would only serve to further traumatize and victimize not only the loved ones of the deceased and the survivors of the trial, but the general public as well," he wrote.

Under the plea agreement, the nightclub owners, Jeffrey and Michael Derderian, who are brothers, are to plead no contest to 100 counts each of manslaughter. Michael Derderian is to be sentenced to four years in a minimum security prison. Jeffrey Derderian is to receive three years' probation and 500 hours of community service. The agreement was reached during jury selection for Michael Derderian's trial.

DOJ_NMG_0067230

Michael Derderian is facing greater penalties because he was involved in buying highly flammable soundproofing foam that ignited when it was hit by a pyrotechnic. Jeffrey Derderian was in the club, The Station in West Warwick, when the fire erupted the night of Feb. 20, 2003. The men are to be sentenced Sept. 29.

A lawyer for Michael Derderian, who has been speaking for both brothers, did not respond to phone messages.

News of the agreement angered many relatives of those killed and the 200 people injured in the blaze.

"People are being held above the law," said Eileen DiBonaventura, whose son Albert died. "This was the ultimate disrespect for the victims who perished in that fire."

IMMIGRATION:

U.S. Prosecutors Indict 15 In Alleged Commercial Driver's License Conspiracy For Unqualified Immigrants (FINDLAW/AP)

By Steve Brisendine, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 22, 2006

(AP) - KANSAS CITY, Missouri-The operators of two trucking schools were charged with conspiracy and fraud for allegedly helping unqualified Somalian and Bosnian immigrants pass driving tests in order to obtain commercial driver's licenses, federal prosecutors said in an indictment unsealed Thursday.

The indictment, returned Wednesday by a grand jury in Springfield, Missouri, names 15 defendants who face charges including conspiracy and mail fraud, making a false writing and causing a false identification document to be produced.

It stems from an investigation dating to fall 2004 of testing practices at the South Central Career Center Truck Driving School in West Plains, Missouri, in which authorities found a suspiciously high percentage of students passing the driving tests.

"The pass rate for the school was found to be 99 percent," Col. Jim Keathley, superintendent of the Missouri State Highway Patrol, said. "The average pass rate statewide is 83 percent."

The school's superintendent, Dean P. Proffitt, 71, was among those indicted, as was Ernest Arnel White, who ran a Kansas City-area school and would send students to Proffitt's school to take the driving exam.

Proffitt was placed on a leave of absence in February, and the school can no longer test for commercial driving licenses.

White, who allegedly provided test answers to students at his driving school in Kansas City, also is charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm.

The indictment alleges that White, 49, who converted to Islam while in prison for a 1993 robbery conviction, used his connections in the Muslim community to recruit students to his Muslim Brothers and Sisters driving school.

"Many of the individuals to whom he gave the answers spoke little or no English," Schlozman said.

The FBI's Mark Wagoner said White, who operated his school in Kansas City, Missouri, and Kansas City, Kansas, at various times, did have an old semitrailer that could have been used for instruction.

However, prosecutors said, his students were rarely given the full two-hour proficiency tests required by state law. Instead, the indictment alleges South Central Career Center instructor Orbin May gave shortened examinations, drove trucks while White's students rode along or simply signed their examinations without their having even shown up in West Plains.

White, whose school is no longer operating, funneled between 200 and 300 students through his school, Schlozman said, and "developed a reputation in the Somali community for being able to obtain what he called 'invisible licenses.'"

Prosecutors allege White and Proffitt both profited from the students' payments for the fraudulent licenses.

The indictment also names Howard E. Schneider, 39, of Overland Park, Kan.; Hiram Chebar Oliver, of Raytown; Osman Abdullahi, 30, of San Diego; Abdiwahab Mohabud Mohamed, 37, of Minneapolis; Samir Hasanovic, 22, of Arnold; and Kansas City residents Elias Mohamed, 25, Ahmed Muhidin Sharif, 27, Abdulfatah Osman Farah, 24, Yusuf Kalmole, 34, Adil Majlovic, 19, Mersud Kajtazovic, 31, and Abdirizak Abdi Mohamed, whose age was given as 25 or 32.

The other defendants assisted in the fraud by various means, Schlozman said, including providing translation or transportation services or by directing license applicants to White.

DOJ_NMG_0067231

All of those who obtained licenses through White's school will have to pass another competency test or lose them, Schlozman said.

Twelve of the 15 defendants, including Proffitt, White and May, were in custody early Thursday afternoon.

Authorities do not believe terrorism was involved, U.S. Attorney Bradley J. Schlozman said, but public safety was at risk because some of the immigrants - more than 100 of whom also earned endorsements to transport hazardous material - never proved even rudimentary big rig driving skills.

House Bills Make Illegal U.S. Entry Tougher (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — With a majority of Democrats joining virtually all Republicans, the House today passed three bills designed to make it harder for foreigners to enter the United States illegally and to increase the penalties for those who do.

The bills had already cleared the House last July as part of a larger package of measures to control illegal immigration. The Senate passed its own version of immigration legislation that included a guest worker program and a path to citizenship for some foreigners in this country illegally.

The punitive House bill and the more lenient Senate approach were so different that the two chambers have not tried to forge a compromise. Instead, the House is passing part of its original bill piecemeal.

The House approved last week the first proposal — 700 miles of fence along some of the most popular crossing points on the U.S.-Mexican border. The Senate was considering that bill today.

However, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) said he believed the issue should not be dealt with piecemeal and the future of the House bills seemed cloudy at best.

Of the three bills considered by the House today, the first dealt with the treatment of persons in the U.S. illegally. It would give the government the authority to expel illegal immigrants deemed to be dangerous, including gang members. It would also allow the detention of illegal immigrants beyond the current limit of six months.

Rep. John Conyers of Michigan, the top-ranked Democrat on the House Judiciary Committee, accused Republicans of "political gamesmanship" for bringing up individual provisions that the House had already approved in bulk. Today's bills "are clearly designed to distract the American public," he said.

Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) argued that the Republicans had voted down Democratic proposals to add border patrol agents and immigration officials, along with more beds in border detention facilities. She pointed out that the new bills did not provide any new money but relied on subsequent legislation to do that.

"Republicans are all talk but cheap on action to secure our borders," she said.

House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) replied that House Republican leaders were bringing up the bills separately in hopes of moving something through the Senate to President Bush's desk before Congress' planned adjournment at the end of next week for the November elections.

"This Congress is running out of time," Sensenbrenner said.

The House passed the first of the three bills by a count of 328 to 95. Republicans supported the bill, 222 to 4, and Democrats did as well, 105 to 91. The House's lone independent also voted for the bill.

The second of the three bills, approved by a vote of 277 to 140, would provide federal assistance to state and local authorities responsible for enforcing immigration laws. The third, approved unanimously, would penalize those who tunnel under the border to smuggle people or objects into the United States.

joel.havemann@latimes.com

House Passes 3 Bills On Border Security (USAT)

USA Today, September 22, 2006

The House of Representatives approved three border security bills Thursday that would impose prison sentences of up to 20 years for tunneling under the border, allow the Homeland Security Department to hold illegal immigrants detained for crimes or as threats to national security beyond six months, and empower state and local authorities to arrest illegal immigrants.

DOJ_NMG_0067232

It's unlikely this year that Congress will pass broader immigration changes favored by the Senate, so House GOP leaders said taking action to seal the border was a matter of urgency.

"We're running out of time" on the larger immigration legislation, said House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., and "the American people say border security first."

Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., said Republicans were playing "political gamesmanship."

Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said the individual bills are unlikely to pass the Senate.

Investments measure would shield troops

Servicemembers would be protected from people pushing overpriced financial service and insurance packages under legislation ready for President Bush's signature. The measure, which was given final congressional approval Thursday in the House of Representatives, would allow state insurance regulators to better enforce state and federal law on military bases.

It also would ban discredited financial products that are no longer available on civilian markets but are still sold to servicemembers. The House approved the bill on a 418-3 vote. The Senate passed it on a voice vote in July. Rep. Geoff Davis, R-Ky., said that as a former combat arms officer, he was among those losing thousands of dollars from deceptively advertised investments.

Deal would ease ban on Rx drug imports

House Republicans tentatively agreed to relax a ban on importing prescription drugs from Canada, said Sen. David Vitter, R-La. "This is a very significant breakthrough," he said. The deal would let Americans carry up to a 90-day supply of medication back to the USA from Canada without it being seized by Customs agents. Medications are generally cheaper in Canada because of government price controls.

There was no indication when legislation to implement the agreement might pass Congress.

Report: Info couldn't have stopped 9/11

Intelligence gathered by a secret military unit could not have stopped the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, a report from the Pentagon inspector general's office said.

An investigation found no evidence that the unit, known as Able Danger, had identified any of the attackers before the hijackings. The report contradicts assertions by Army Lt. Col. Anthony Shaffer, a former intelligence officer who worked on Able Danger, and Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., vice chairman of the House Armed Services and Homeland Security committees. It also rejected Weldon's claim that Pentagon lawyers barred the unit from giving information to the FBI.

House Passes Border Security Bills (AP)

By Jim Abrams

The AP, September 21, 2006

Republicans took a new crack at old border-security legislation Thursday as the House approved pre-election bills on deporting gang members, imprisoning tunnelers and empowering local police to arrest illegal immigrants.

With no prospects this year for passing broader immigration changes favored by the Senate, House GOP leaders said taking action to seal the border was a matter of urgency.

"We're running out of time in this Congress," said Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis. "The American people say border security first."

But Sensenbrenner's Republican counterpart in the Senate, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, said, "I don't see how we can deal with the immigration issue on a piecemeal basis." There would be no motivation for the House to negotiate on the issue "if we take care of all of their priorities and none of the Senate's," he said.

The House passed legislation last December that concentrated on border security and enforcement of laws banning employment of undocumented workers. The Senate in May passed a broader bill, generally endorsed by President Bush, that included provisions for a guest worker program and ways for the nation's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants to work toward legal status and eventual citizenship.

There's been no progress in efforts to reconcile the two bills.

DOJ_NMG_0067233

The three border security bills the House took up Thursday were in large part already included in the bill passed last December.

House leaders said one plan was to try to attach the bills to Homeland Security spending legislation that Congress must clear before the end of the session, an approach that Specter, also a senior member of the Senate Appropriations Committee, appeared to dismiss.

The Senate, meanwhile, was debating legislation passed by the House last week that would approve construction of a 700-mile fence stretching across one-third of the U.S.-Mexico border.

Democrats said Thursday's votes were an attempt to cover up the failure to pass more comprehensive immigration changes.

"It's political gamesmanship that forecasts an election" less than two months away, said Rep. John Conyers of Michigan, top Democrat on the Judiciary Committee.

Congressional Democratic leaders, seeking to capitalize on Hispanic opposition to the get-tough policy on illegal immigrants, on Thursday unveiled plans to enact immigration changes and improve education and health care for Hispanic families. "For too long this do-nothing Republican Congress has ignored, and in some cases worsened, the critical challenges facing Latinos," said Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid.

The three House bills would:

_Impose prison terms of up to 20 years for those who knowingly construct or finance an unauthorized tunnel under a U.S. border. People who permit the construction of such a tunnel could face 10 years in prison. Sensenbrenner said 50 tunnels, used to smuggle narcotics and illegal immigrants, have been discovered along the Mexican border since 1990, and 36 in the last five years. It passed 422-0.

_Allow the Department of Homeland Security to hold illegal immigrants detained for crimes or as threats to national security beyond the current limit of six months, and set up expedited procedures for deporting these people. The bill also would make it easier to detain and deport illegal immigrants found to be part of criminal street gangs. It passed 328-95.

The National Immigration Forum voiced opposition to the provision, saying it "gives the attorney general the ability to designate any group as a gang and then punish an individual for belonging to that group, regardless of whether the individual committed a crime."

_Reaffirm the authority of state and local law enforcement to arrest, detain and transfer to federal custody illegal immigrants. It would ask the Justice Department to increase the number of attorneys prosecuting immigrant smuggling cases. It also would close loopholes that have led to "catch and release" policies in which illegal immigrants, mainly non-Mexicans, are released because they cannot be immediately deported. It passed 277-140.

Bush Ready To OK Border Barrier (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

President Bush will sign the bill to construct 700 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border if it is approved by the Senate, the White House said, as Congress continued yesterday drafting more legislation to combat illegal immigration.

On Wednesday night, Mr. Bush told CNN's Wolf Blitzer that he would sign the bill if approved by the Senate, which spent the past two days debating whether they should even consider the fence bill.

Late yesterday, Democrats finally agreed to allow the bill to be taken up.

The House, meanwhile, approved a slew of new bills to speed the deportation of illegal aliens, outlaw tunneling under the border and close loopholes that allow criminal aliens to be released into the U.S.

"I think today's actions here in the House on these three border-security bills demonstrate that House Republicans are serious about securing our borders and enforcing our laws," House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, said yesterday. "The American people have called on Congress to take immediate action, and we have."

DOJ_NMG_0067234

While the bills passed the House by wide margins yesterday, they face an increasingly dim future in the Senate, which has refused to approve major border-security legislation unless it is coupled with a guest-worker program and a direct path to citizenship for most of the illegal aliens currently in the U.S.

Senate Republicans have spent the past two weeks fighting among themselves over a White House proposal for dealing with terrorism suspects, and Democrats have stalled for more than a week approving the House bill to construct 700 miles of border fencing.

The most contentious immigration legislation approved by the House yesterday was a 277-140 vote to give state and local law enforcement more authority to combat illegal immigration. Also, it would close a decades-old loophole that bars federal officials from placing illegals from El Salvador into "expedited removal proceedings." The provision, adopted during El Salvador's 1980s civil war, means that suspected illegals often are freed back into the U.S. to await deportation proceedings but never heard from again.

The vast majority of Republicans in the chamber were joined by 62 Democrats to approve the changes in policy.

The House also overwhelmingly approved a bill to allow federal officials to detain illegals for more than six months if they are awaiting deportation. The same bill also would bar illegals from obtaining political asylum if they are found to be part of a "criminal street gang." That bill passed on a 328-95 vote.

A third bill passed without objection and would close a loophole in current federal law. The Border Tunnel Prevention Act of 2006 would criminalize the construction and financing of border tunnels with criminal penalties of up to 20 years' imprisonment for persons who knowingly construct or help finance an unauthorized tunnel across a U.S. international border.

Under current law, it is illegal to cross over a border, but not under a border. In recent years, 39 such tunnels have been found along the southern border through which illegal aliens and large quantities of drugs are smuggled. That bill passed on a 422-0 vote.

While House Democrats say they would prefer a single comprehensive bill to address illegal immigration, many, including top party leaders, joined in supporting yesterday's measures.

"Overwhelmingly in our caucus there is support for bipartisan comprehensive immigration reform," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said yesterday. "Some of these things that they are putting forth piecemeal are awful; some are OK; but all of them are more acceptable in the context of comprehensive immigration reform. At the end of the day, if the issue is managed, there is a path to legalization, if the border is secure, if the workplace enforcement is there, if American workers are protected, then you can absorb some of these other initiatives they put forth. But standing alone, they don't manage the issue."

Immigration Ugliness (WP)

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

THE CYNICAL immigration endgame of the 109th Congress isn't particularly surprising. But after a session in which the Senate actually managed to produce a bipartisan, comprehensive measure to overhaul the existing system, the latest, enforcement-only developments are nonetheless disappointing and dangerous.

The House has passed, and the Senate seems ready to go along with, a measure to require construction of a 700-mile fence along the Mexican border. That would cost at least $2 billion, and that's in addition to a $2.5 billion initiative, entrusted to Boeing Co. this week, to erect "virtual fences" along the northern and southern borders.

A fence would damage relations with Mexico, harm the environment and, especially in the absence of broader changes, be ineffective. Even if a foolproof fence could be placed along every mile of the border, it wouldn't eliminate illegal immigration. Perhaps half of those in the country illegally did not slip secretly across a border but arrived through official entry points, using fraudulent documents or coming in legally and overstaying their visas.

But the fence is, sadly, the least offensive of the measures under consideration. On Wednesday, the House approved an unnecessary and arguably unconstitutional bill to require voters to show photo identification to take part in federal elections beginning in 2008; in 2010, the ID would have to demonstrate proof of citizenship. This would effectively disenfranchise many poor and elderly Americans, who are less likely to have, or be able to obtain, such documentation. It responds to a non-problem.

DOJ_NMG_0067235

The manifold challenges of election administration do not include large numbers of noncitizens trying to vote. The Senate should not go along.

Yesterday, the House passed another batch of immigration-related measures, the worst of which would deputize state and local law enforcement officers to enforce federal immigration laws. The measure would permit, but not require, state and local police to arrest and detain illegal immigrants for even civil violations of federal immigration law. This would undermine the ability of law enforcement to deter and prosecute violent crime. As New York Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg told the Senate Judiciary Committee in July, "Do we really want people who could have information about criminals -- including potential terrorists -- to be afraid to go to the police?"

The most disappointing aspect of the debate is the passive posture of President Bush. Mr. Bush could have used his bully pulpit to make clear the importance of comprehensive reform. He could promise to veto the bills on the understanding that enforcement measures, even justifiable ones, will be needed as leverage to obtain the comprehensive program he says he wants. Instead, he's meekly following the worst instincts of his fellow Republicans. "Yes, I'll sign it into law," Mr. Bush told CNN, adding, "If your question is, 'Will I stop trying to push for a comprehensive reform?' The answer is, 'No, I won't stop trying to push for comprehensive reform.' " With pushing like this, who needs opponents?

U.S. Project To Secure Borders Will Begin In Arizona Desert (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 21 — A rugged, largely unpopulated 28-mile stretch of desert southwest of Tucson will be the testing ground for the latest high-tech campaign by the United States government to wrestle control of the border, this time in a partnership with Boeing, the military and aerospace company.

Yet as top Department of Homeland Security officials and Boeing executives gathered here on Thursday to hail the start of the project — which will cost an estimated $2 billion over six years and eventually cover the entire 6,000 miles of the Mexican and Canadian borders — they acknowledged that the first challenge was disproving skeptics.

“The common complaint about the government is there is a lot of lofty rhetoric, but the achievement always falls short,” Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said. “We are very mindful of that. This is a very tall order. This is about a solution we believe is going to do the job.”

Boeing, Mr. Chertoff formally announced, beat out other military contractors that had bid to be the engineer of sorts for the program, the Secure Border Initiative.

In that role, Boeing will be charged with lining up radar systems, cameras, ground sensors, aerial vehicles, wireless communications equipment and vehicle barriers, as well as traditional fences. It will also coordinate their use by a Border Patrol force that is supposed to be made up of 18,000 officers by 2008. That is the year by which the Department of Homeland Security intends to achieve “operational control” of the border.

“There have never been before all of these tools collected in one plan,” said the department’s deputy secretary, Michael Jackson. “It is a radical change in business as usual at the border.”

The department is well aware of the decades of failed or incomplete border-security efforts, including most recently a program known as the Integrated Surveillance Intelligence System that turned out to be a $429 million flop.

In that effort, begun in 1997, the cameras often broke down, fogged up in the cold and rain, or were never installed as promised. Even when cameras or sensors set off alerts, they most often were false alarms or, if they were not, the Border Patrol often did not investigate them, a report by the department’s inspector general said last year.

Given this track record, the department is starting small with a tiny section of the Arizona border, so it can quickly adjust if the strategy does not work. That means for now, the Boeing contract is worth $70 million, enough to cover setting up the management for the entire project and to pay for installing the equipment near the border post at Sasabe, Ariz., one of the busiest spots for illegal crossings.

“We recognize we are in a fish bowl here, and everybody will be watching, and we have to perform,” said J. Wayne Esser, the Boeing executive who supervised the company’s pitch for the contract. “Failure is not an option.”

DOJ_NMG_0067236

At Sasabe, Boeing intends to install nine tower-mounted camera and radar systems, to track movement, day or night, in any weather. Sensors will be buried in the ground to cover areas outside the radar's reach, Mr. Esser said. When the radar or camera notices activity, the cameras would be used to figure out how many people are involved, if they are on foot or in a vehicle or if the motion is an animal instead.

Border Patrol officers will be able to monitor the camera images from the field through wireless laptop connections. The officers will also probably have tiny unmanned aerial vehicles that can be launched from a truck to keep track of illegal immigrants until they can be caught.

Boeing will rely on subcontractors for most of the equipment. Its primary job, similar to the role it plays in building airplanes, will be to integrate all the parts into a working system, officials said. It will be given work orders in small increments, so Department of Homeland Security officials can monitor its performance.

"Build a little, prove it, build more," Mr. Jackson said.

The key, he said, will be figuring out how to use the Border Patrol staff most effectively to pick up the illegal immigrants and return them to Mexico or other countries of origin quickly enough so that the system is not overwhelmed.

Tamar Jacoby, a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute, a conservative research group, said the technology sounded impressive, but he wondered if it was enough.

"As long as you have half a million new jobs here going empty each year but for these workers, they are going to find a way to get around whatever obstacles we put in their way," Ms. Jacoby said.

About $700 million has been budgeted for the project this year and next. While officials had given an overall estimate of $2 billion, Mr. Chertoff refused to put a price on the project. "As inexpensive as possible" was all he said.

U.S. To Closely Watch Boeing's Border Plan (WP)

By Griff Witte And Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said yesterday that the government learned its lessons from failed border-security initiatives and will move cautiously with its private-sector partner, Boeing Co., in the latest effort to use technology to curb illegal immigration.

In announcing that Boeing had won the Secure Border Initiative Network (SBInet) contract, Chertoff emphasized that his department would call the shots and keep close watch on the company's progress.

Homeland Security officials had been criticized by some immigration experts and lawmakers for indicating that the private sector would be given wide discretion in shaping a new system to secure 6,000 miles of land border. Previous attempts to do that have cost the government hundreds of millions of dollars but left little to show for it as equipment malfunctioned, agents were overwhelmed with false alarms and illegal immigration continued to climb.

"Prior efforts to put technology on the border have been focused on individual tools but have not been focused on integrating all the tools together as part of a comprehensive program," Chertoff said. SBInet, he said, will allow border patrol agents "to know when anybody or anything is crossing that border."

That will not happen for several years, at least. The SBInet program is estimated to be worth as much as $2.5 billion, but initially Boeing will be given just under $70 million to work on a high-traffic, 28-mile stretch of the border south of Tucson. Government officials want the company to fully deploy its technology there within the next eight months. Assuming the program receives funding from Congress, the company would expand its operations from there, working on other areas of the Mexican border first and then moving to the Canadian border. The contract runs for three years, with three option years.

Boeing beat four other competitors for the contract by proposing a network of 1,800 towers that could be used for surveillance and communications. Homeland Security officials said yesterday, however, that their choice of Boeing has not locked them into a specific number of towers or type of technology, and that the strategy will vary depending on the terrain and on what's working.

"At every step of the way as we roll out additional segments of the border under this contract, we will have the opportunity to negotiate the best price," Chertoff said. "We will have the opportunity to look for alternatives."

DOJ_NMG_0067237

Chertoff's announcement was met with skepticism by T. J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council, which represents 11,000 agents. Bonner said giving agents a better sense of who is crossing the border and where wouldn't do much good on its own. "Surveillance technology can be useful if you have enough people on the ground to respond to it," he said. "But if you don't, you just have to file it away because you're too busy with the first 50 people that the cameras caught. It's not the solution to the illegal immigration problem. The solution is denying access to jobs so people don't come across in the first place."

The government's most recent attempt to use technology to enhance border security triggered too many false alarms to be effective. Boeing has said that its technology is more sophisticated and can better distinguish between genuine threats and routine movement.

Even if the technology behind SBInet works, there remains the challenge of integrating it with other border security programs. SBInet does not cover ports of entry, and it does not involve patrolling the coasts.

Boeing executive Wayne Esser said in an interview this month that he hopes more surveillance will deter some people from trying to cross borders illegally at all. But he conceded that it could merely shift the problem elsewhere. "It'll put a lot more pressure on the ports of entry, and it's going to put a lot more pressure on our coastal borders," he said.

Pickers Are Few, And Growers Blame Congress (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

LAKEPORT, Calif. — The pear growers here in Lake County waited decades for a crop of shapely fruit like the one that adorned their orchards last month.

“I felt like I went to heaven,” said Nick Ivicevich, recalling the perfection of his most abundant crop in 45 years of tending trees.

Now harvest time has passed and tons of pears have ripened to mush on their branches, while the ground of Mr. Ivicevich’s orchard reeks with rotting fruit. He and other growers in Lake County, about 90 miles north of San Francisco, could not find enough pickers.

Stepped-up border enforcement kept many illegal Mexican migrant workers out of California this year, farmers and labor contractors said, putting new strains on the state’s shrinking seasonal farm labor force.

Labor shortages have also been reported by apple growers in Washington and upstate New York. Growers have gone from frustrated to furious with Congress, which has all but given up on passing legislation this year to create an agricultural guest-worker program.

Last week, 300 growers representing every major agricultural state rallied on the front lawn of the Capitol carrying baskets of fruit to express their ire.

This year’s shortages are compounding a flight from the fields by Mexican workers already in the United States. As it has become harder to get into this country, many illegal immigrants have been reluctant to return to Mexico in the off-season. Remaining here year-round, they have gravitated toward more stable jobs.

“When you’re having to pay housing costs, it’s very difficult to survive and wait for the next agricultural season to come around,” said Jack King, head of national affairs for the California Farm Bureau Federation.

California farms employ at least 450,000 people at the peak of the harvest, with farm workers progressing from one crop to the next, stringing together as much as seven months of work. Growers estimate the state fell short this harvest season by 70,000 workers. Joe Bautista, a labor contractor from Stockton who brings crews to Lake County, said about one-third of his regular workers stayed home in Mexico this year, while others were caught by the Border Patrol trying to enter the United States.

With fewer workers, Mr. Bautista fell behind in harvests near Sacramento and arrived weeks late in Lake County. “There was a lot of pressure on the contractors,” he said. “But there is only so much we can do. There wasn’t enough labor.”

For years, economists say, California farmers have been losing their pickers to less strenuous, more stable and sometimes higher-paying jobs in construction, landscaping and tourism.

DOJ_NMG_0067238

"If you want another low-wage job, you can work in a hotel and not die in the heat," said Marc Grossman, the spokesman for the United Farm Workers of America. The union calculates that up to 15 percent of California's farm labor force leaves agriculture each year.

As they sum up this season's losses, estimated to be at least $10 million for California pear farmers alone, growers in the state mainly blame Republican lawmakers in Washington for stalling immigration legislation that would have addressed the shortage by authorizing a guest-worker program for agriculture. Many growers, a dependably Republican group, said they felt betrayed.

"After a while, you get done being sad and start being really angry," said Toni Scully, a lifelong Republican whose family owns a pear-packing operation in Lake County. "The Republicans have given us a lot of lip service, and our crops are hanging on the trees rotting."

Tons more pears that were harvested were rejected by Mrs. Scully's packing plant because they were picked too late. The rejects were dumped in a farm lot, mounds of pungent fruit swarming with bees, left to be eaten by deer. "The anthem about the fruited plain," Mrs. Scully said sadly, "I don't think this is what they had in mind."

Some economists and advocates for farm workers say the labor shortages would ease if farmers would pay more. Lake County growers said that pickers' pay was not low — up to $150 a day — and that they had been ready to pay even more to save their crops. "I would have raised my wages," said Steve Winant, a pear grower whose 14-acre orchard is still laden with overripe fruit. "But there weren't any people to pay."

The tightening of the border with Mexico, begun more than a decade ago but reinforced since May with the deployment of 6,000 National Guard troops, has forced California growers to acknowledge that most of their workers are illegal Mexican migrants. The U.F.W. estimates that more than 90 percent of the state's farm workers are illegal.

Most California growers gave up years ago on recruiting workers through the seasonal guest-worker program currently in place. Known as H-2A, the program requires employers to prove they tried to find American workers and to apply well in advance for relatively small contingents of foreign workers for fixed time periods.

"Our experience with the current H-2A program has been a nightmare," said Luawanna Hallstrom, general manager of Harry Singh & Sons, a vine-ripe tomato grower based in Oceanside, near San Diego.

Ms. Hallstrom said her company tried to use the program in the months after the Sept. 11 attacks, when security checks forced it to fire illegal migrant employees who were working in tomato fields on a military base. Her company lost $2.5 million on that 2001 crop, she said.

Over the years, occasional programs to draw American workers to the harvests have failed. "Americans do not raise their children to be farm workers," Ms. Hallstrom said.

The failure of Congress to approve a new guest-worker program surprised California growers because a proposal that the Senate passed stemmed from a rare agreement between growers' organizations, the U.F.W. and other advocates for farm workers, and legislators ranging from conservative Republicans to liberal Democrats.

Known as AgJobs, the proposal would create a new temporary-resident status for seasonal farm workers and give them the chance to become permanent residents if they work intensively in agriculture for at least three years. It was included in a bill that passed the Senate in May. The House has passed several bills focused on border security, and has avoided negotiations with the Senate on a broader immigration overhaul. [Three of the House bills were passed Thursday.]

Mr. Ivicevich, a 69-year-old family farmer, is not given to displays of emotion. But he paused for a moment, overwhelmed, as he stood among trees sagging with pears that oozed when he squeezed them. His nighttime sleep, in his cottage among his 122 acres of orchards, is disrupted by the thud of dropping fruit and the cracking of branches.

For decades, Mr. Ivicevich said, migrant pickers would knock on his door asking for work climbing his picking ladders. Then about five years ago they stopped knocking, and he turned to a labor contractor to muster harvest crews. This year, elated, he called the contractor in early August. Pears must be picked green and quickly packed and chilled, or they go soft in shipping.

"Then I called and I called and I called," Mr. Ivicevich said.

The picking crew, which he needed on Aug. 12, arrived two weeks late and 15 workers short. He lost about 1.8 million pounds of pears.

DOJ_NMG_0067239

His neighbor, Mr. Winant, standing in his drooping orchard with his hands sunk in his jeans pockets, said he would rather bulldoze the pear trees than start preparing them for a new season.

"It's like a death, like a son died," said Mr. Winant, 45, who cares for the small orchard himself during the winter. "You work all year and then see your work go to ground. I want to pull them out because of the agony. It's just too hard to take."

Illegal Workers Supplant U.S. Ones, Report Says (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

New illegal immigrants accounted for 56 percent of the increase in employed workers in the United States in the five years after 2000, and competition from these immigrants contributed to a sharp decline in employment of teenage and young adult Americans, according to a labor market study released yesterday.

The survey found that in the five-year period, foreign-born workers, including both legal and illegal immigrants, made up 86 percent of the net increase in the total number of employed workers, the highest share for immigrants ever recorded in this country.

At the same time, the number of employed native workers ages 16 to 34 fell by more than 1.5 million. The study contends that 90 percent of the job deficit for young Americans would be erased if American teenagers and young adults held the jobs that immigrants now hold.

The study was carried out by Andrew Sum, Paul Harrington and Ishwar Khatiwada from the Center for Labor Market Studies at Northeastern University in Boston and was published by the Center for Immigration Studies, a group in Washington that advocates reducing immigration.

Last month a study by the Pew Hispanic Center, another Washington research organization, concluded that there was no nationwide pattern of displacement of American workers by immigrants.

Several economists noted that the past five years had been marked by a slow economic recovery that created unusually few jobs for all workers in the United States. They said that several factors contributed to declining employment among young people and that an increase in the number of youths going to college was one.

Employment rates have plummeted for young black men without high school diplomas.

"They face tremendous barriers, but immigrant competition is not the biggest one," said Jared Bernstein, an economist at the Economic Policy Institute, a Washington group that focuses on labor issues. "If immigrant competition were to drop significantly, they would still have big problems."

TAX:

I.R.S. Inquiry Into Sermon Is Challenged By Church (NYT)

By Stephanie Strom

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

A California church under investigation by the Internal Revenue Service for possible violations of laws against political activities by churches has denied the agency's request for documents.

The decision forces the I.R.S. either to drop the case or to ask the Justice Department to take the church, All Saints Episcopal Church, in Pasadena, to court. The agency could also revoke the church's tax exemption, but legal experts said that was unlikely.

The church said it regarded an I.R.S. investigation of an antiwar sermon delivered by the church's former rector on the Sunday before the 2004 election as an attack on freedom of speech and religion.

"We have nothing to hide, but there are principles here we think we need to uphold," said Robert A. Long, the lay leader, or senior warden, of All Saints.

DOJ_NMG_0067240

Mr. Long said the 26 members of the church's vestry, or governing body, had voted unanimously to decline to comply with two formal requests, called administrative summonses, for documents, testimony and other information that it received from the I.R.S. last Friday.

The church was making a point by requesting the summonses, which asked for documents ranging from copies of church policies and e-mail message to utility bills, as well as an interview with Rev. J. Edwin Bacon Jr., the rector. Mr. Bacon said the church asked for the formal process after receiving the second of two informal I.R.S. requests for information "that was far more intrusive and that we thought were clearly aiming to invade our worship practices, which is clearly illegal."

The request for formality is also a time-honored way of getting disputes with the I.R.S. into court, legal experts said.

"This looks like the short-cut way for the church to get the issue as to whether this is a valid investigation or not right into the court and allow it to rule on the constitutional issues," said Kevin J. Hasson, founder and chairman of the Becket Fund for Religious Liberty. "It's a perfectly respectably legal maneuver, not something like a militia movement refusing to put license plates on their cars."

Federal law prohibits the I.R.S. from discussing any specific taxpayer. In a statement outlining its general procedures, the agency noted that in cases involving questions of inappropriate political activity by churches and other charities, it rarely revokes tax exemption, preferring to work with organizations to bring them into compliance with the law.

"Speaking generally, Congress has said that churches and charities that are exempt from federal taxes are prohibited from speaking on behalf of, or against, any candidate in office," the statement said.

The role of churches and other charities in politics has increased as Republicans and Democrats alike have sought to tap into networks of members and donors. Charities are prohibited generally from what the I.R.S. calls "campaign intervention," but the boundaries between what is acceptable and what breaks the law are not always clear. Does allowing one candidate to use a church's plane, for instance, amount to support for that candidate that would run afoul of the prohibition on campaigning for a specific candidate?

Churches and other religious organizations have been hoping for a court case to clarify the issue, though most anticipated that a conservative church would be the first to challenge the I.R.S., not a left-leaning church like All Saints.

Mr. Bacon said that was precisely what the church was trying to do. "We're not trying to change the rules, we're trying to make sure the rules are interpreted the way the I.R.S. has always interpreted them in the past," he said.

He said the church had been critical of the internment of Japanese-Americans during World War II, the Vietnam War and the country's response to Sept. 11 without inciting I.R.S. inquiry. "My question is why now?" he said.

The I.R.S. has not said what part of the sermon the Rev. George F. Regas delivered at All Saints on Oct. 31, 2004, may have violated the law. In the sermon, Mr. Regas, the former rector, imagined Jesus chiding President Bush and his Democratic opponent, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, on topics including the war in Iraq, nuclear weapons, poverty and the increasing income gap.

He singled Mr. Bush out for criticism by portraying Jesus as saying things like "President Bush, you have not made dramatically clear what have been the human consequences of the war in Iraq" and "Mr. President, your doctrine of preemptive war is a failed doctrine."

Mr. Regas said in his sermon it was not his intent to tell his listeners how to vote. "When you go to the voting booth on Tuesday, take with you all that you know about Jesus the peacemaker," he said in closing. "Take all that Jesus means to you. Then vote your deepest values."

IRS Probe Of Cal Church Could Reverberate In Political Season (AP)

By Gillian Flaccus, The Associated Press

AP, September 22, 2006

PASADENA, Calif. - An Episcopal church's decision Thursday not to cooperate with an IRS investigation into an anti-war sermon delivered before the 2004 presidential election sets up a high-profile confrontation between the liberal congregation and the IRS, which usually keeps such inquiries private.

DOJ_NMG_0067241

The leaders of the 3,500-member All Saints Church voted unanimously to resist an order to turn over documents related to the sermon, which was given just two days before the election. The decision means the IRS must decide whether to ask the Justice Department to pursue the case in court. A judge would then rule on the validity of the agency's demands.

Bob Long, the senior warden at All Saints, said the 26-member vestry voted unanimously early Thursday to reject the IRS' demands, which included an interview with the rector, copies of e-mails and internal correspondence and utility bills.

"We're going to put it in their court - and in a court of law - so that we can get an adjudication to some very fundamental issues here that we see as an intolerable infringement of rights," Long said.

IRS spokesman Terry Lemon said he could not comment on the specific case and would not say whether the agency would request a court hearing. He instead issued a statement describing the procedure during such an investigation.

"If the entity ultimately declines to answer the summons, the IRS can ask the Justice Department to pursue the case in court," the statement read.

The dispute has attracted the attention of religious leaders on the right and left, who say the IRS' actions could make it more difficult for them to speak out on moral issues such as gay marriage and abortion during the midterm election campaign.

Under federal tax law, church officials can legally discuss politics, but to retain tax-exempt status they cannot endorse candidates or parties. Most who do so receive a warning.

The IRS, however, has promised tougher enforcement of the law during this year's mid-term elections and in the 2008 election cycle.

The agency completed investigations of 90 tax-exempt churches and charities in 2004 and found wrongdoing in 70 percent of the cases. Four - none of them churches - lost their tax-exempt status. In 2005, the agency began audits of 70 churches and charities and has 40 cases pending so far this year.

Earlier this week, the conservative Alliance Defense Fund and the Family Research Council sent letters to thousands of pastors informing them about their right to speak to congregations on issues in this year's elections, including abortion and gay marriage.

In recent years, Republicans in particular have teamed with conservative evangelical leaders to motivate would-be voters, a strategy credited with helping President Bush win re-election.

The dispute with All Saints centers on a sermon titled "If Jesus Debated Sen. Kerry and President Bush" that was delivered by guest pastor Rev. George Regas on Oct. 31, 2004. Though he did not endorse either President Bush or Sen. John Kerry, he said Jesus would condemn the Iraq war and Bush's doctrine of pre-emptive war.

"I believe Jesus would say to Bush and Kerry: 'War is itself the most extreme form of terrorism. President Bush, you have not made dramatically clear what have been the human consequences of the war in Iraq,'" Regas said, according to a transcript.

The IRS reprimanded the church in June 2005 and asked that it promise to be more careful. Church officials refused.

Last week, the IRS demanded documents and an interview with the rector by the end of the month.

According to the IRS, the only church ever to be stripped of its tax-exempt status for partisan politicking was the Church at Pierce Creek near Binghamton, N.Y., which was penalized in 1995 after running full-page ads against President Clinton in USA Today and The Washington Times in 1992 during election season.

All Saints member Sally Howard, of West Hollywood, said she agreed with the vestry's decision.

"The church should not back down from speaking to issues of peace and justice. And if that means that the church is going to face loss of its tax-exempt status, then that will be," she said. "We do not want to be in that position of being neutral or being silent because of the political ramifications."

Howard said Regas never urged parishioners to vote for particular candidates.

"He has never, and he didn't that day, he's never stated that a particular person should be voted for," she said.

All Saints Episcopal Church Won't Comply With IRS Probe (LAT)

By Louis Sahagun, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0067242

Pasadena's All Saints Episcopal parish board challenges a request to turn over documents in a case over a 2004 antiwar sermon.

A liberal Pasadena church on Thursday declared that it will refuse to comply with an IRS investigation into its tax-exemption status launched after a guest speaker was critical of President Bush in a sermon.

At a news conference attended by 50 cheering supporters gathered before the marble altar at All Saints Episcopal Church, the Rev. Ed Bacon said his 3,500-member congregation did not violate tax regulations barring tax-exempt organizations from endorsing or opposing candidates when a former rector, George F. Regas, criticized the Bush administration two days before the 2004 presidential election.

The Episcopal faith, the 58-year-old rector said, "calls us to speak to the issues of war and poverty, bigotry, torture, and all forms of terrorism … always stopping short of supporting or opposing political parties or candidates for public office."

Joined by members of other faiths, he added, "We are also not here for ourselves alone but to defend the freedom of pulpits in faith communities throughout our land."

The All Saints case escalated a week ago when the IRS slapped the 80-year-old parish with a summons demanding that it turn over by Sept. 29 all materials, such as newsletters and sermons, produced during the 2004 election year with political references. Bacon was told to testify in person Oct. 11.

At stake, several religious leaders say, is freedom from government intimidation when churches address moral issues of the day from the pulpit.

In an interview, Richard Land, president of the Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission of the Southern Baptist Convention, said, "Churches should not endorse political candidates. But the IRS is seriously out of kilter and wrong-headed on this one; it's an appalling intrusion and it smacks of intimidation."

Now, as the November election approaches, some churches worry that they may be the next targets of the IRS. This summer, the agency issued a statement warning nonprofits, including churches, that it was stepping up its efforts to crack down on illegal electioneering.

The Interfaith Alliance announced Thursday that it has started distributing 20,000 pamphlets to churches, synagogues and mosques offering advice on how to comply with federal law.

The Rev. C. Welton Gaddy, president of the alliance, a national group with 185,000 members, said that he was concerned that "the recent rush of candidates and political parties — and their often aggressive tactics — to reach out to people of faith lures religious organizations into dangerous legal territory."

The goal, Gaddy said, is to avoid the kind of partisan politicking recently aired in a televised campaign ad for Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. (D-Tennessee), who is running for a Senate seat. The commercial is set inside a church.

Then there was Kansas Atty. Gen. Phill Kline, a Republican who, according to a four-page strategy memo leaked to the news media, told his reelection campaign to get pastors to recruit "money people" who could help his reelection campaign.

At All Saints, the 26-member vestry voted unanimously early Thursday to "challenge the IRS in a court of law," said senior warden Bob Long. Federal law prohibits the IRS from discussing a specific case. But in an interview Thursday, Steven T. Miller, commissioner of the agency's tax-exempt and government entities division, said the law is clear: The nation's roughly 1 million nonprofits, including churches, are barred from speaking on behalf of, or against, any candidate.

The law is not new; it dates back to 1954. What is new is a concern over the level of prohibited activity that the IRS has been seeing by charities and churches in recent years. A recent IRS report reviewed 87 completed cases of alleged illegal campaigning by nonprofits in the 2004 election cycle.

Of those closed cases, 71% were found to have engaged in what the agency called "political intervention." But in only four of those cases, none of them involving churches, did the IRS revoke a group's tax-exempt status.

If an entity declines to answer a summons in a case of alleged illegal campaigning, the IRS can ask the Justice Department to pursue the case in federal court, which is exactly what All Saints wants to happen.

"That is not to say that this challenge, as well as many other steps we have already taken to respond properly and timely to the IRS investigation, does not stretch us financially — it does," Long said. To help defray the legal costs, Bacon said All Saints, the largest Episcopal church west of the Mississippi, has created a new category of membership, "Solidarity Membership," for supporters of other faiths wishing to join the cause.

DOJ_NMG_0067243

"We smell intimidation," said Maher Hathout, chairman of the Islamic Center of Southern California. "It smells rotten, and we should not allow any aspect of intimidation to be directed to any member of our great country."

Rabbi Steven Jacobs of Temple Kol Tikvah, who also attended the news conference, said, "There seems to be an assault upon the pulpit, and it seems to fit a pattern of focusing on those challenging our administration."

All Saints' public skirmish with the IRS is only the latest example of how it has been speaking out on political issues since a rector protested the internment of Japanese Americans during World War II. Bacon, a former Southern Baptist who was a conscientious objector during the Vietnam War, continues that tradition. The church has even posted documents central to the case on its website, http://www.allsaints-pas.org , and Bacon likes to say that social action is a requirement of religious faith.

Tax experts, however, expressed mixed opinions about the church's chances of prevailing against the IRS. A federal judge could order the church to produce the documents or face sanctions, including fines.

"It's very difficult to beat a summons in court," said Ed Robbins, an attorney specializing in tax exemption litigation. "At the end of the day, if the IRS digs in its heels and wants this data, they'll get it."

All Saint's, however, had welcome news about three weeks ago when one of its attorneys, Marcus Owens, a former head of the IRS exemption office, persuaded the IRS to drop an audit of the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People. That investigation was also sparked by a speech that criticized Bush and the Bush administration's war in Iraq.

Immediately after Thursday's news conference, Owens informed the IRS of the church's decision. "We believe the only way to challenge the IRS' actions in this case is through a summons enforcement proceeding in court," he told IRS officials in a letter, "and therefore the church respectfully declines to respond to the summons. Rev. Bacon will not appear to testify Oct. 11."

louis.sahagun@latimes.com

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Rare Judicial Impeachment Hearing Ends With Little Action Taken (LAW)

By T.R. Goldman, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 22, 2006

A House Judiciary subcommittee on Thursday held a rare impeachment hearing for a California federal judge but reached no conclusions and appeared eager to let a special committee of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals finish its investigation before deciding whether to take up the matter in Congress again.

Judge Manuel Real, a Lyndon Johnson appointee who in November will have been a federal judge for 40 years, spent Thursday morning rebutting -- for the first time in public -- allegations that he had improperly seized control of a bankruptcy proceeding involving a woman whose criminal probation he was overseeing.

"I am here to tell you I categorically deny any misconduct on the bench," said Real, 82, who was seated next to his wife, Elizabeth, and lawyer and longtime friend, Donald Smaltz, the former independent counsel who a decade earlier had headed the investigation into former Clinton Agriculture Secretary Mike Espy. "I have never been sanctioned for any type of judicial misconduct."

Real has a reputation as a stern and autocratic jurist. "There are a lot of people who dislike you," said subcommittee member Chris Cannon, R-Utah. "No," responded Real, who spoke slowly but forcefully. "I don't think there are many people; I think there are a few."

One of those, the man who first filed the original complaint more than 2 1/2 years ago, is Stephen Yagman, a Venice, Calif., attorney whom Real fined $250,000 in 1984 for his conduct in a defamation case Real was handling. The sanction was later reversed by the 9th Circuit, but, Real noted, Yagman has had a "personal vendetta against me for over 20 years."

Yagman, in fact, has no connection to the underlying bankruptcy case. But under the 1980 Judicial Conduct and Disability Act, anyone, whether he is connected to the underlying case or not, can file a complaint against a federal judge.

DOJ_NMG_0067244

"The issue for me is not what he did now, but the fact that he has been tormenting lawyers and litigants for 40 years and no one did anything about it and everyone knows about it," said Yagman in a telephone interview the day before Real's impeachment hearing.

The hearing, held by the House panel's subcommittee on the Court, was chaired by Lamar Smith, the Texas Republican who is on the short-list to take over the House Judiciary Committee when Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., steps down next year. "None of us on the subcommittee relishes this undertaking," said Smith.

Asked by subcommittee member Maxine Waters, D-Calif., whether he had been subpoenaed, Real replied, "I came by invitation, Ms. Waters, [although] I felt it was more than just an invitation."

The ethics case against Real is now in its fourth year and has followed a torturous path. The original complaint was filed in February 2003, then dismissed by the chief judge of the 9th Circuit, Mary Schroeder, six months later.

The 9th Circuit's Judicial Council, which handles misconduct complaints, sent the case back to Schroeder, who dismissed it again in November 2004.

The Judicial Council upheld the dismissal in September 2005 by a 7-3 vote, which included a blistering dissent by council member and 9th Circuit Judge Alex Kozinski.

The complaint was then sent to Washington, to the Judicial Conference Review Body, which reluctantly determined that it lacked jurisdiction to review the 9th Circuit case because Schroeder had failed to appoint a so-called special committee to investigate the allegations.

Less than a month later, on May 23, 2006, Schroeder appointed a "special committee" to investigate the complaints against Real. That committee's work is still in progress.

"I think we should have held off on this hearing to allow the special committee to do its job," noted the subcommittee's ranking member, California Democrat Howard Berman. Today's hearing, he added when it ended, "wasn't a wise thing to do."

Sensenbrenner has long pushed for more congressional oversight of the judiciary, and the long-running and disjointed 9th Circuit investigation of Real has provided an easy target for asserting committee jurisdiction.

Earlier this year, Sensenbrenner, who is term-limited and must give up the chairmanship in January, sponsored a bill that would create an inspector general to investigate complaints of judicial misconduct and allegations of fraud.

"The question is, How much of this is Sensenbrenner trying to do a last hurrah and throw his weight around, or how much of this is really going to happen?" noted a former congressional staffer who is closely following the Real impeachment. "Don't forget, Sensenbrenner is the same person taking the lead for pushing for the 9th Circuit split, which deals with the same chief judge," the ex-staffer added.

Many social conservatives are eager to divide the circuit because its often liberal decisions affect not just California but many far more conservative Western states that are also part of the circuit's vast geographic reach.

Sensenbrenner was also instrumental in the last three impeachments of federal judges -- Walter Nixon, Harry Claibourne and Alcee Hastings -- all of whom were subsequently convicted and removed from office by the Senate. That's nearly half of the seven federal judges who have ever been impeached and removed from office.

And it was Sensenbrenner who introduced the resolution of impeachment against Real on July 17, singling out the failure of the 9th Circuit to discipline Real as his reason. "When the judicial branch has failed to address serious allegations of judicial misconduct, as the 9th Circuit arguably has in this matter, the Constitution provides the Congress only one course of action -- opening an impeachment inquiry," Sensenbrenner said when he introduced his resolution.

The hearing, coincidentally or not, came just two days after a panel headed by Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer released a long-awaited report on judicial discipline, a report that singled out the investigations into Real's alleged misconduct and four other so-called high-profile complaints as "problematic."

Still, the panel's two expert witnesses, Indiana University School of Law professor Charles Geyh and Pittsburgh School of Law's Arthur Hellman, seemed to agree that it would be tough for the allegations against Real, if proved true, to reach the bar needed for impeachment, much less conviction, by the Senate.

"An isolated act of simple favoritism, absent a pattern, doesn't rise to the level of an impeachable offense," Geyh told the half-dozen subcommittee members in attendance.

DOJ_NMG_0067245

Tony Snow (CSM)

By David Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, September 22, 2006

Dodging questions is a key part of the White House press secretary's assignment. At one point in a Monitor-sponsored breakfast with reporters on Thursday, Tony Snow, press secretary and assistant to the president quipped, "I'm going to engage in a little cotton-mouthed diplo-speak."

It is an example of the self-deprecatory humor that Snow has brought to the White House since his first briefing on May 8. "I must say the first day I was absolutely scared stiff because I did not know what to expect, I had never done anything like it," Snow says.

Snow's predecessor in the post, Scott McLellan, was a long-time Bush loyalist who stuck closely to his talking points and seldom seemed to be enjoying himself in the verbal give and take with reporters. It is not clear whether reporters get more information from Snow. But the White House informational diet is clearly being served up now with greater verbal dexterity and humor.

Snow says that what he brings is a major change in attitude toward the press. "I don't come out of the political side where a lot of times you see people coming out of the political side and they will look at the press room and they will look at it as a den of vipers, a seething hostile mass," Snow said. "What I see is a lot of people trying to get information so they can write a story...I think the change in the point of view makes all the difference in the world."

Before moving to Fox News, Snow had a long career in newspapers, working for the Greensboro Record, The Virginian-Pilot, The Detroit News, and The Washington Times. His newspaper column was syndicated to more than 200 papers.

So he relishes the reporting aspect of his current position. "The one thing that I hadn't counted on that I rather enjoy is that the press secretary's job is a reporting job," Snow said. "So in any given day we take a close look at a lot of stories and my first answer is, 'well what is going on here?' and so you make the calls. And you call around and you talk to people who are involved."

Getting ready to answer reporters' questions at two formal sessions a day involves intense preparation. There are days when Snow, a self-described "night person" gets up at 3:45 a.m. to prepare. "The biggest challenge is... just trying to make sure you know enough about the things that are going to be of interest to reporters," he says. "There are a lot of days I come in and I've got to study to the exam. And then, over time, I develop the kind of background that will enable me with greater confidence to give detailed answers to such questions. But it is fun."

Part of the fun is having a voice in policy making. Snow sought assurances on that front before taking the job. "I think when I was talking about having a policy role, I was pushing against an open door," Snow said. "Obviously, when it comes to getting involved in the thickets of [the Geneva Convention's] Common Article Three I just keep my yap shut. That's a lawyers' issue. On the other hand, on issues where I have long experience having been in the business for 28 years as a reporter and editorial writer ... there are areas where I have built up a certain amount of intellectual capital and I certainly put in my two cents worth."

When he was asked about White House negotiations with Senate Republicans over legislation regarding treatment of terrorism suspects, Snow said, "the status is ongoing ...this is like warm milk on the kitchen counter right now. Whatever news I can get you will turn to yogurt by the time you get back to the office."

Turning to the international scene, and efforts to end the genocide in the Darfur region of Sudan, Snow said, "There are behind the scenes, ongoing diplomatic efforts to try to put together the right kind of coalitions of influence that will enable a blue-helmeted UN force to enter Darfur. The president has been speaking about Darfur for a very long time. He has been pressuring the United Nations, pushing the United Nations to acknowledge the genocide that is going on and to act aggressively to deal with it. He is continuing to do so. There is considerable behind-the-scenes diplomacy taking place right now that I am not at liberty to discuss but at some point it will become known. But let me just assure you that the president has been very actively engaged."

With the upcoming Congressional elections marking the start of the final two year's of Mr. Bush's term, Snow was asked about the president's legacy. "The president is not really a legacy guy," Snow said. "Last year he read three biographies of George Washington who, having been dead for 207 years, is still the subject of reappraisal. And if you are visiting that upon arguably the most popular president in American history and certainly one of the most consequential, the idea that you are somehow you are going to be able to retire to Crawford knowing what your legacy is is pure folly. So his view is to do the job and do it the best he can and take on big issues."

DOJ_NMG_0067246

Presidential Ratings Rise With New Message Man (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

Former talk show host Tony Snow took over as President Bush's communications point man four months ago, beefing up the press office staff, honing internal operations and deploying a quick-response strategy.

Now, polls show, the president's approval rating has jumped to its highest level since January.

Could Mr. Snow be responsible for the surge?

"We're just busy going out and trying to be as aggressive as we can in getting the message out," Mr. Snow says. "Part of the challenge is to explain what we are doing and why. ... Sometimes you have to let people know very clearly what the policy is and that is one of our key aims."

The operation has changed dramatically in recent months after crucial missteps, including last year's dead-on-arrival nomination of White House counsel Harriet Miers to the Supreme Court and this year's fiasco over the proposal to allow a company based in the United Arab Emirates to manage U.S. port operations.

Joshua B. Bolten took over as chief of staff and immediately brought in Mr. Snow, a longtime friend and confidant. Since then, the pair have been at the head of efforts to refocus the White House message and the way it is disseminated.

"If there is an operative philosophy for me, it's 'flood the zone,'" says Mr. Snow, using a football term to describe overwhelming the opponent. "If we spin you," he told reporters at a hotel near the White House yesterday, "we die."

Even though he says he was "absolutely scared stiff because I didn't know what to expect, I'd never done anything like it," Mr. Snow says he has fallen in love with the job he has performed since May.

"The most pleasant surprise about this job has been how much fun it is," he says. "I've never had a day when I've gone home and kicked the dog out of frustration. ... I can't think of another job that I would willingly wake up as early as I do for" -- 3:45 a.m. on some days.

But since he took over as the chief White House spokesman, the former television and radio host -- who also once wrote editorials for The Washington Times -- has learned to use the skills he picked up in his 28 years in journalism.

"The press secretary's job is a reporting job," he says, noting that, even with an office right down the hall from the president, he spends a lot of his day calling others in the administration, asking, "What's going on here?"

"And sometimes phone calls are not returned as quickly as you want," he told the reporters, who laughed, knowing that plight well.

As for standing at the podium on behalf of the most powerful man in the United States, Mr. Snow says "there are a lot of days when I come in and I've got to study for the exam." Some reporters have complained that their former colleague doesn't always know the answer to tough questions, and he acknowledged that "the biggest challenge is ... just trying to make sure that you know enough about the things that are going to be of interest to reporters."

Mr. Snow has direct access to his boss. If he needs to know something, he says, "I'll walk into the Oval Office and get it straight from the president."

Mr. Snow sits in on policy discussions with Cabinet members and senior staff. He says views are expressed in frank exchanges, although the president has the job of "making the call at the end of the day."

"There are areas where I have built up a certain amount of intellectual capital and I certainly put up my 2 cents' worth. You have an obligation to give your best advice, and if you lose, you lose," he says. "Nobody elected you; they elected the president. But I think it is incumbent upon people to give their best and most honest advice."

Probe Finds Jackson Urged Favoritism In HUD Contracts (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0067247

An inspector general's report charges that top U.S. housing official Alphonso Jackson urged staff members to favor friends of President Bush when awarding Department of Housing and Urban Development contracts. But investigators so far have found no direct proof that Jackson's staff obeyed.

His chief of staff told investigators that Jackson, the HUD secretary, "personally intervened with contractors whom he did not like . . . these contractors had Democratic political affiliations," says the report, a copy of which was made available to The Washington Post.

The investigation "did not disclose any pattern or practice of issuing contracts based on political affiliation . . . however, there were some limited instances where political affiliation may have been a factor in contract issues involving Jackson," the report says.

Awarding contracts on the basis of party affiliation violates federal law.

The 340-page report by the Criminal Investigations Division of HUD's Office of Inspector General has been released to Jackson for a response and given to members of Congress who requested it. A spokesman for the office declined to say whether the report would be released publicly.

Calls for an inquiry came after Jackson, Bush's onetime neighbor in Dallas and former housing authority chief in that city, told attendees at a public forum in Dallas on April 28 that he had killed a contract award to a firm after its chief told Jackson he disliked Bush. Jackson later took back his remarks and told investigators from the inspector general's office that he had "lied, and I regret having done that."

The investigation found "no evidence that a contract was canceled, rescinded, terminated or not issued as a result of the encounter between Secretary Jackson and the contractor," the report says.

Jackson said the report cleared him of wrongdoing. "As I stated previously, during my tenure, no contract has been cancelled, rescinded, terminated, awarded or not awarded due to the personal or political benefits of the recipient," he said in a statement released yesterday.

"I sincerely regret my April 28 remarks that led to this investigation."

Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.), who called for Jackson's resignation after the April incident, disagreed.

"The President should not tolerate this type of activity by a member of his Cabinet," Lautenberg said in a statement yesterday. "Given the allegations made by very credible witnesses in the Inspector General's report, the Department of Justice needs to get involved."

According to two senior HUD officials, at a staff meeting this year "Jackson had advised . . . that when considering discretionary contracts, they should be considering supporters of the president," the report says.

"I don't recall doing that. They might have misconstrued it," the report quoted Jackson as saying.

Jackson, who reports directly to the White House, "indicated that he did have a bias, in that he wasn't likely to assist someone who would 'castigate' him or the president, although he would not interfere with a contract on that basis," the report reads.

The report describes investigators' research into the political contributions of 29 companies that received HUD contracts. The sample found that officers and key staff members at the 29 winning companies "contributed $101,931 to Republican candidates and $45,320 to Democratic candidates."

Investigators also describe Jackson's personal involvement with contracts and contractors. Jackson "would meet with individuals who were either contractors or who wanted to obtain contracts at HUD," the report said. A former HUD lawyer was quoted as saying "we warned him against it."

The report contains a lengthy description of delays in releasing a contract to Massachusetts-based Abt Associates, after Jackson objected. Though the award had already been granted and publicized, Jackson's dislike of the firm -- which his chief of staff said was politically motivated -- put the release in limbo for weeks while staffers scrambled to satisfy him and allay outside concerns over the delays.

Jackson told investigators his dislike was based on the quality of the firm's work, "an assertion rendered problematic by other testimony and evidence," the report says, including Abt's high marks in the agency's own evaluation process.

DOJ_NMG_0067248

The report says the HUD Office of Inspector General plans to evaluate whether "a more comprehensive audit of HUD contracting activities is feasible and warranted." A spokesman for the office declined to say when that decision would be made.

HUD Chief's Remarks Aside, Study Finds No Favoritism (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 21 — The Bush administration's housing secretary told his aides that they should consider the political leanings of contractors in awarding agency business, an investigation has found. But the inquiry found "no direct evidence" that political favoritism was linked to specific grants or contracts.

Three top officials of the Department of Housing and Urban Development testified that Secretary Alphonso R. Jackson had told them that "it was important to consider presidential supporters when candidates for HUD discretionary contracts were being considered," the department's inspector general, Kenneth M. Donohue, wrote.

Aronetta Baylor, now an assistant deputy secretary and formerly the department's chief procurement officer, told investigators under oath that Mr. Jackson had once said, in the report's exact words, "You know, if we weren't here, if the president hadn't appointed us, they wouldn't be (expletive) getting these contracts."

"And he said that makes him mad that they don't realize that," Ms. Baylor testified.

Ms. Baylor's account is in a 340-page report drawn up by Anthony G. Medici, special agent in charge of the inspector general's criminal investigations division. The report, dated Sept. 18, has not been made public. Its contents were disclosed on Thursday by The Dallas Morning News. The report itself was made available to The New York Times by aides to Democratic lawmakers who have been critical of Mr. Jackson.

It is illegal under federal procurement law to reward or punish contractors on the basis of their political views.

The inquiry, which includes testimony from dozens of witnesses including Mr. Jackson, arose from the secretary's boast on April 28 that he had scuttled a contract for advertising services because the person who was about to get it had been critical of President Bush.

In fact, Mr. Medici's investigation found, no contract was canceled or rescinded under the circumstances described by Mr. Jackson before a real estate forum in Dallas. But a reporter for The Dallas Business Journal heard the remark, and his account touched off a controversy that is not likely to end with the inspector general's report.

Some witnesses testified more than once during the inquiry. Before concluding that there was no direct evidence of political favoritism in the awarding of contracts, Mr. Donohue's office reviewed 22 contracts involving property management, advertising and other services.

Although the inspector general's office concluded that Mr. Jackson had not torpedoed a contract, as he had boasted, the investigation uncovered "instances of Secretary Jackson personally intervening with contractors whom he did not like," the inquiry found.

The report said the inspector general's office would consider undertaking "a more comprehensive audit of HUD contracting activities."

"I lied, and I regret having done that," Mr. Jackson testified during the inquiry. He told the inspector general that his account had been "an exaggeration," the report said.

Soon after his Dallas remarks were reported in early May, Mr. Jackson said he regretted his "anecdotal remarks," which he said were meant to illustrate how things work in Washington.

Mr. Jackson affirmed his regrets in an interview with The Dallas Morning News. "I've never done anything illegal or unethical, and I didn't do it this time, other than shoot off my mouth," he said. "That's what I did, and I made a serious mistake doing it."

Among Mr. Jackson's strongest Democratic critics are Senator Frank R. Lautenberg of New Jersey and Representative Henry A. Waxman of California, who are on their chambers' governmental affairs committees, and Representative Barney Frank of Massachusetts.

DOJ_NMG_0067249

All expressed outrage after the Dallas episode, and Mr. Lautenberg said Mr. Bush should demand Mr. Jackson's resignation if the accounts of the Dallas speech were accurate. Mr. Jackson has headed the department since March 31, 2004.

Mr. Lautenberg renewed his criticism of the secretary on Thursday.

"The inspector general's report contains very serious charges that need to be reviewed by the Department of Justice," the senator said. "This episode cannot be ignored by Congress. We must hold hearings to get to the bottom of this case. However, I am concerned that Republicans will sweep this under the rug."

Don't Let Him Near The Checkbook (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

President Bush's selection of former Agency for International Development chief Andrew Natsios as special envoy to try to halt the violence in Darfur drew mixed reviews from those involved in the region.

His task will be to get the Sudanese government to allow 20,000 U.N. peacekeepers in to stanch the horror in Darfur -- something the government has refused to do.

Natsios, though perhaps not as high-profile choice as might be hoped, could turn out to be a good selection -- he is well-versed on the issues, knows the country and the situation. But, we trust, he'll not be allowed to have anything to do with drawing up aid budgets for the region. We recall his famous prediction, back on April 23, 2003, when he told an incredulous Ted Koppel on ABC's "Nightline" that the rebuilding tab for Iraq would be $1.7 billion.

"You're not suggesting that the rebuilding of Iraq is going to be done for $1.7 billion?" Koppel asked.

"Well, in terms of the American taxpayers' contribution, I do," Natsios said. "This is it for the U.S. The rest of the rebuilding of Iraq will be done by other countries who have already made pledges -- Britain, Germany, Norway, Japan, Canada -- and Iraqi oil revenues. . . . But the American part of this will be $1.7 billion. We have no plans for any further-on funding for this."

Nope, no plans at all.A Hiring First at State?

Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, is back in town for a bit -- and that has sparked chatter that maybe he'll be named deputy secretary of state, maybe with a specific portfolio of Iraq and Afghanistan.

The chatter is likely idle, generated by the fact that the post has been vacant since Robert Zoellick 's departure almost three months ago and that many names have been floated as his replacement. One big concern would be pulling Khalilzad out of Iraq, but there is some thinking in Baghdad that he may have done as much there as he can do.

Our research isn't complete, but we'll go out on a limb and say it appears he would be the first Sunni deputy secretary.

Given the Senate's scheduled departure next Friday, the deputyship would be filled, if at all, by a recess appointment or by an "acting" deputy until after the Nov. 7 elections.Bolton Possibly in Limbo

Speaking of recess appointments, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee calendar has a business meeting scheduled for Tuesday, with votes to be taken on two nominations -- but nothing is scheduled for U.N. Ambassador John Bolton . His recess appointment ends no later than Jan. 3 unless he gets confirmed, but it appears that Sen. Lincoln "Roadblock" Chafee (R-R.I.) hasn't budged -- yet.GAO's Car and Driver

A Loop Fan driving north on the George Washington Memorial Parkway in Virginia calls to say he was headed to work downtown a bit after 7 a.m. and a "black Cadillac scoots in front of me . . . license plate GAO 0001." Our caller said he passed and noticed "someone reading papers in the back, but the windows were tinted."

So David Walker , head of the Government Accountability Office, the watchdog guarding against waste and fraud, is chauffeured to work?

"It's a black Chrysler 300," corrects GAO spokesman Paul Anderson . "And by statute, the comptroller general has the right to be driven to and from work." Walker, however, drives himself "90 percent of the time," but he had a bike accident over Labor Day weekend. He broke his collarbone and four ribs, and hasn't been able to drive.

"We have the X-rays to prove it," Anderson said.More Common-Sense Lawmaking

The Democrats think they're going to take over the House if they can sell their spurious allegation that this is a "do-nothing" Congress. It's going to be a hard sell because the House intends to work hard in the remaining days of this session.

DOJ_NMG_0067250

We note action was pending this week on H Con Res 235: Expressing the sense of the Congress that States should require candidates for driver's licenses to demonstrate an ability to exercise greatly increased caution when driving in the proximity of a potentially visually impaired individual .Mazel Tov, Etc.

The Jewish High Holidays begin tonight, capping a week in which it was learned that Sen. George Allen 's mom was Jewish. That means, as far as Jewish law is concerned, Allen is considered Jewish, able to fly over to Tel Aviv and claim immediate citizenship.

Loop Fans have been writing in with congratulations, new year's wishes and a hearty "L'shana tova."

Payment To Lewis Aide Is Cleared (LAT)

By Tom Hamburger

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — The House Ethics Committee on Thursday cleared a longtime aide to House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis of any breach of rules for accepting a nearly $2-million payout from his former lobbying firm.

The aide, Jeffrey Shockey, received $1.96 million in severance payments when he left Washington-based Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White to return to work for Lewis (R-Redlands) as deputy staff director of the Appropriations Committee. Federal investigators are examining the relations between the firm, which specialized in appropriations matters, and Lewis.

Since federal investigators began looking into links among lobbyists, powerful members of Congress and the special appropriations known as earmarks, the firm has received unwanted attention and split into two companies.

Federal investigators have requested information from the firm's clients who have received appropriations earmarks, including several communities in Southern California represented by Shockey.

Ethics Committee staffers were specifically reviewing whether Shockey's 2005 payout from Copeland Lowery might have broken rules that prohibit congressional staff from receiving income earned after becoming federal employees. But Shockey showed the committee documents revealing that his compensation was based on work completed before he returned to Capitol Hill.

"It appears that the terms of your buyout agreement are consistent with applicable laws and House rules," wrote Reps. Howard L. Berman (D-Valley Village) and Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) the top ranking members of the ethics panel.

A spokesman for Shockey said the congressional aide was pleased by the committee's statement and decision to cease further review of the matter. "Jeff Shockey said all along he wanted to do things by the book," spokesman Trent Duffy said. "Now he welcomes the fact that the official judges agreed" he has done so.

Although Shockey apparently violated no laws or official standards in reporting his compensation, his move from the Capitol to lobbying firm and back to the Capitol remains an example of the "revolving door" in Washington. It also shows the extraordinary amounts of money private interests are willing to pay for help in getting earmarks into appropriations bills.

Defense contractors, universities and municipalities have paid high fees to lobbyists who they believed could help get these spending directives for them. The lobbyists, in turn, often made large campaign contributions to lawmakers such as Lewis who preside over the process.

Shockey, who worked for Lewis in the 1990s as a congressional aide, became one of a category of lobbyists in Washington that specialized in appropriations matters. His former employer is a specialist in earmark lobbying and helped Lewis raise tens of thousands of dollars in campaign contributions.

One of the firm's senior partners was Bill Lowery, a former Southern California congressman and close friend of Lewis.

Shockey's lawyers have said he did nothing wrong and noted that he has not been contacted by federal investigators looking into Lewis and his relationship with the lobbying firm.

The President, Up Close And Personal (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0067251

President Bush sat for interviews with the hosts of the three network evening news programs in recent weeks, surrounding the anniversaries of Hurricane Katrina and the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. The interviews focused mostly on the administration's response to the devastation of the Gulf Coast, and its performance in the Iraq war and its anti-terrorism effort. But anchors Charles Gibson of ABC, Brian Williams of NBC and Katie Couric of CBS also offered a window into the president's mind-set and personal life. Here are some excerpts:

On his frustrations: "The death of innocent people and our soldiers. That's the hardest thing for me. I meet with a lot of the families. And -- I do the best I can to cry with them or, you know, laugh with them if they wanna laugh and hug them." (CBS)

On when he is overwhelmed with emotion : "Generally, it's triggered when I meet somebody who lost their loved one . . . and that happens fairly frequently. . . . It's a good sign you're able to empathize, that your heart breaks for somebody who suffered. . . . Tears can get contagious, as far as I'm concerned." (ABC)

On his relationship with his father: "My relationship is adoring son. . . . My dad means the world to me as a loving dad. He gave me the greatest gift a father can give a child, which is unconditional love. And, you know, we go out and float around there [at the family retreat in Kennebunkport, Maine] and try to catch some fish and chat and talk. But he understands what it means to be president. . . . I explain exactly . . . how I view the current tensions. And he takes it onboard and he leaves me with this thought, "I love you, Son.' " (NBC)

On his reading habits, which recently included "The Stranger" by Albert Camus: "I was in Crawford and I said -- I was looking for a book to read, and Laura said, 'You ought to try Camus.' I also read three Shakespeares. . . . I'm reading about the battle of New Orleans right now. I've got an eclectic reading list."

Census Data On Some Of 1,100 Missing Laptops (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, September 22, 2006

The Commerce Department said Thursday that 1,100 of its laptops have been lost or stolen, including some that contain personal information collected by the Census Bureau.

Department officials said that the potential loss of personal data was limited, however, and that it is unaware of any data being improperly used.

“The amount of missing computers is high, but fortunately, the vulnerability for data misuse is low,” Secretary Carlos Gutierrez said in a statement disclosing the discovery. “While we know of no instances of personal information being improperly used, we regret each instance of lost material.”

The announcement followed a review of more than 30,000 computers used by department personnel dating to 2001. Of that total, the department said 1,137 were lost, stolen or missing, and 249 of those computers contained personally identifiable information. Each laptop contains information on an estimated 20-30 households.

“All of the equipment that was lost or stolen contained protections to prevent a breach of personal information, and we are moving to institute better management, accountability, inventory controls, 100% encryption and improved training," Gutierrez said.

Most of the missing laptops were from the Census Bureau. It used field representatives to compile survey data across the country using laptop computers. The department said the Census Bureau had in place technological means to protect that data and make it inaccessible, once entered in databases, even to the workers using the laptops.

The disclosure follows a series of other computer losses. The Veterans Affairs Department said a laptop with information on 26.5 million current and former military personnel was stolen in May. The laptop was recovered and the FBI said personal data had not been copied.

1,100 Laptops Missing From Commerce Dept. (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

More than 1,100 laptop computers have vanished from the Department of Commerce since 2001, including nearly 250 from the Census Bureau containing such personal information as names, incomes and Social Security numbers, federal officials said yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0067252

This disclosure by the department came in response to a request by the House Committee on Government Reform, which this summer asked 17 federal departments to detail any loss of computers holding sensitive personal information.

Of the 10 departments that have responded, the losses at Commerce are "by far the most egregious," said David Marin, staff director for the committee. He added that the silence of the remaining seven departments could reflect their reluctance to reveal problems of similar magnitude.

In a private briefing yesterday for three members of Congress, Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez estimated that the disappearance of laptops from the Census Bureau could have compromised the personal information of about 6,200 households, Marin said. He said the department was still trying to determine the extent of the problem.

"We don't know exactly how many computers were lost or whether personal information was compromised," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), who chairs the House Government Reform Committee and attended the briefing. "The secretary has assured me that getting that information is priority number one, and I'm confident he'll get his arms around the problem."

Commerce officials told the congressmen that the inventory of missing laptops had escalated rapidly in recent weeks as the department investigated the disappearances. Marin said the committee was concerned that that number could increase significantly as Commerce officials learn more about missing handheld computers, which are increasingly being used in the Census Bureau.

Commerce officials said in a statement that they knew of no instances in which information from the missing laptops had been improperly accessed, adding that all the equipment contained safeguards that would prevent a breach of personal data.

"The amount of missing computers is high, but fortunately, the vulnerability for data misuse is low," Gutierrez said in the statement.

With its disclosure, Commerce is the latest federal agency to admit in recent months that it had lost laptops with sensitive personal data. In May, an employee of the Department of Veterans Affairs lost a laptop containing unencrypted information on about 26.5 million people. Three months later, Veterans Affairs acknowledged that a second computer, with information on about 38,000 hospital patients in Pennsylvania, was also missing.

The Federal Trade Commission has lost two laptops with files containing people's financial account numbers, and the Department of Agriculture announced that one of its laptops had disappeared along with personal information on about 350 employees.

Gutierrez and his staff told the congressmen that 1,137 laptops had been stolen, lost or otherwise vanished since 2001, mostly from the Census Bureau and the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration. Of these, 249 contained personally identifiable information, nearly all from the Census Bureau. All were password-protected, a low-level safeguard. Only 107 of the computers were fully encrypted.

Commerce Department Has Lost 1,137 Laptops Since 2001 (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Commerce Department has lost 1,137 laptop computers since 2001, most of them assigned to the Census Bureau, officials said Thursday night.

The Census Bureau, the main collector of information about Americans, lost 672 computers. Of those, 246 contained some personal data, the department said in a statement. However, no personal information from any of the missing computers has been known to have been improperly used, the department said.

The number of people affected by the equipment losses could not be determined, the department said.

"All of the equipment that was lost or stolen contained protections to prevent a breach of personal information," said Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez. "The amount of missing computers is high, but fortunately, the vulnerability for data misuse is low."

More than 30,000 laptops were used within the department's 15 operating unit since 2001, the department said, and a total of 1,137 were stolen or missing.

Fifteen handheld devices used to record survey data for testing processes in preparation for the 2010 Census also were lost, the department said. The department was in the process of contacting the 558 households with data recorded on the missing devices, although because of encryption technology, the risk of data misuse was considered low, it said.

A half-dozen other federal agencies or departments have reported data thefts and security breaches involving personal information in the last six months.

The Veterans Affairs Department suffered the biggest loss with the theft in May of a laptop and external drive containing information for 26.5 million veterans and active-duty troops. Burglars stole the equipment from the home of a Veterans Affairs employee, but the computer was later recovered and showed no signs of having been accessed for the personal data.

Other government departments reporting the loss of computers with personal information include the departments of Agriculture, Defense, Education, Energy, Health and Human Services and Transportation. The Federal Trade Commission also has lost laptops with sensitive data.

Capitol Police Revise Details On Intruder (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

Contradicting earlier reports, officials said yesterday that an armed man who raced into the U.S. Capitol this week was stopped by employees of the Flag Office -- not by Capitol Police officers.

The episode exposed gaps in security of the Capitol building and grounds, and legislators are expected to meet Tuesday to grill U.S. Capitol Police about what went wrong. The suspect, Carlos Greene, 20, who was described as high on drugs, drove through a construction entrance partially blocked by a Capitol Police vehicle at 7:45 a.m. Monday and smashed into a concrete wall. He jumped from his vehicle and dashed into the domed building, outrunning police in a wild, four-story chase.

At a news conference Monday, Acting Capitol Police Chief Christopher M. McGaffin said his officers had subdued Greene in a basement office used to fill orders for flags that have flown over the Capitol. But yesterday, McGaffin acknowledged that three employees in the Flag Office had actually "confronted the individual."

"There was a struggle they participated in, in preventing this individual from getting any farther," McGaffin said in a telephone interview. The scuffle, he said, provided "the few precious seconds we needed to catch up with this suspect."

Police found a pistol in Greene's waistband after he was arrested. No one was harmed in the incident.

McGaffin said he did not have details about how the scuffle progressed.

However, other law enforcement and congressional sources gave this account: Greene burst into the Flag Office and grabbed the supervisor, Karen Livingston, demanding to know how he could get out. She broke away and a burly male co-worker corralled the intruder.

Capitol Police arrived seconds later and made the arrest. The sources spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to provide details on the investigation.

Asked why he had provided the incorrect information at his Monday news conference, nine hours after the incident, McGaffin said he was unaware at the time that anyone but Capitol Police officers took part in the arrest. The officers had not mentioned the civilians' role in their report, he said.

Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.), who chairs the subcommittee that funds the Capitol Police, yesterday identified the Flag Office employees who stopped the intruder as Livingston, the supervisor; Dennis Anthony, the assistant supervisor; and Isaac Livingston, a clerk who is not related to the supervisor.

They "did a great job in bringing him under control," Allard said. Their role was first reported by the Hill newspaper.

The three employees were barred from talking publicly about their actions because of the Capitol Police investigation, said Cynthia Snyder of the Architect of the Capitol's office, which oversees the Flag Office.

Legislators have expressed shock and anger that Greene managed to get so far into the Capitol.

"It's very serious," Allard said. "You can just assume that terrorists somewhere are taking note."

Congress has given the Capitol Police hundreds of millions of dollars for new equipment and additional officers since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. The force now has more than 1,600 officers.

DOJ_NMG_0067254

The House Appropriations Committee is expected to meet Tuesday to review how the Capitol Police handled the incident, officials said.

"Frankly, I think it's a bit outrageous that this kind of incident could take place with all of the new police personnel and all of the money we have spent," Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), a committee member, said in a telephone interview. "Obviously, somebody on the front line was simply not paying attention."

Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), said he was "extremely concerned" and "wants a report about how this will never happen again."

The Capitol Police are being assisted by "national security agencies" in their investigation, Allard said yesterday. McGaffin said he had requested the agencies' assistance "so we can have an independent assessment" of the incident. He declined to identify them, but another official said the U.S. Secret Service was involved.

McGaffin has blamed the security breakdown on human error, rather than funding or equipment. He declined to specify what went wrong until an internal review is finished.

He acknowledged that the intruder made it through two key points: the entrance on the perimeter of the Capitol and the door into the building, which was not locked or guarded. That door was being used by construction workers who have been trying to finish the U.S. Capitol Visitor Center that is under construction on the east side of the building.

Since the incident, security has been increased, with added police posts around the Capitol and concrete barriers placed in front of the construction entrance on First Street and Maryland Avenue NE used by the intruder.

Greene, of Silver Spring, has been jailed since his arrest. He is scheduled to appear in court today on a charge of unlawful possession of a firearm by a convicted felon.

Pro-marriage Bill Seeks $4 Million Budget Add (WT)

By Amy Doolittle

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

The chairman of the Senate Appropriations subcommittee on the District said yesterday that he will add $4 million to the D.C. budget next year to help married or engaged couples buy a home, get job training or start a business.

"We need more family formation in the District ... We need more children raised in two-parent homes," said Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican. "This initiative will help with doing that ... It will expand job-training funding for those who get married; there's also funding in there for mentoring and counseling couples."

Mr. Brownback's proposal would add $1 million to a matched-savings program approved by the Senate last year.

Under the program, the federal government contributes $3 for every $1 a D.C. couple invests and allows a maximum lifetime payment of $9,000. Couples must withdraw the money and be married within three years of entering the program.

The new proposal would provide more funds for job training and mentoring. Last year's version was the first of its kind in the country.

D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams said yesterday that he supports Mr. Brownback's bill.

"There are a lot of things we agree on and a lot of things we disagree on," said Mr. Williams, a Democrat who is not seeking re-election. "But this is something on which we wholeheartedly agree, and that is that too many children in our city are being raised by single parents."

The mayor said there are more than 13,000 families headed by single parents in the District who earn less than $10,000 a year and live well below the poverty line. Many parents do not get married for fear of higher taxes, he said.

D.C. Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, a Democrat, said yesterday that the marriage incentive is important because it gives children a chance to be raised by two parents.

"We're talking about the failure to form families at all, and that is becoming the trend across our country," Mrs. Norton said. "We're forgetting who gets hurt -- the children are hurt from the moment they step into this world.

"When Sam said he wanted to do marriage development, I said, 'Right on, right on, anything we can do,'" she said.

Mr. Brownback said he has yet to experience any serious opposition to his bill. He said it likely will go to a vote in the Senate in late November as part of the larger D.C. appropriations bill.

U.S. Recommends Routine Testing For The AIDS Virus (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

All adolescents and adults should routinely be tested for HIV infection in hospitals, clinics and doctors' offices, the federal government said yesterday, signaling a radical shift in the public health approach to the 25-year-old epidemic.

Under the new recommendations from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, patients would no longer have to sign a consent form and get extensive pre-test counseling. But they would have to be told they were being tested for the AIDS virus, asked if they have any questions and given the opportunity to "opt out."

The policy is a huge change from an era when stigma and fatalism led to a unique and -- in the opinion of some practitioners, onerous -- set of procedures for HIV testing.

"This represents a milestone for CDC and for our national health protection," Julie L. Gerberding, the CDC's director, said in a telephone news conference.

Universal HIV testing is part of an all-out effort to address three problems that many experts view as scandalous: 250,000 Americans are infected with HIV and do not know it, 40 percent of infected people are diagnosed when their infection is already at an advanced stage, and the number of new infections annually in the United States has not declined in 15 years.

If medical providers go along, the strategy may be able to reduce the number who do not know they are infected by two-thirds. Because many of those people are highly likely to pass the virus on -- either because of their behavior or because they are in an early stage of the disease, when more virus is in their bloodstream -- that could in turn help prevent new cases.

By rolling an HIV test into routine blood testing to measure blood sugar, kidney function, hemoglobin count and myriad other health indicators, the policy would make AIDS unique in another way. It would become the only infectious disease tested for more or less automatically in medical encounters. Pregnant women are tested for AIDS, syphilis and hepatitis B, but the CDC policy would cover everyone 13 to 64 years old.

Advocates for AIDS patients generally lauded the new strategy but expressed concern that it could lead to occasions when people are not told they are being tested or are not prepared to handle the results.

"It's all in the implementation," said David Munar, associate director of the AIDS Foundation of Chicago. "I am concerned that in some settings that patients will be shortchanged."

Marjorie J. Hill, executive director of Gay Men's Health Crisis in New York, said her organization agrees "that HIV testing needs to be expanded and that the procedures need to be streamlined as far as possible." But she added: "It is also important that the individual who is the object of these procedures and information have meaningful, informed consent. For some people that may be a two-minute conversation. In others it may take longer."

Between 16 million and 22 million HIV tests are done each year in the United States. CDC officials would not speculate on how much that might increase.

Newly identified cases of HIV are reported to local health departments in most states, and under another CDC policy they will soon be reported in all. That allows public health officers to help get those people into care and in some cases to trace sexual contacts.

Practically speaking, the goal is to have everyone in the age range tested at least once, and high-risk people tested at least once a year. Low-risk people do not have to be tested each time blood is drawn.

The District began a campaign three months ago to make HIV tests a routine part of visits to emergency rooms and physicians' offices. This week, officials said 3 percent of people tested at community health sites are infected -- about twice the national rate.

HIV testing is a two-step process. An initial test, called an ELISA assay, screens for antibodies against the virus. If it is positive, a more specific test, called a western blot, is performed. The price ranges from about $8 to $80, which includes the cost of counseling. The lower figure is for a negative ELISA, the higher for a positive test that would require a western blot and more extensive post-test counseling. Rapid HIV tests, which give results in 20 minutes, cost about $20 more.

DOJ_NMG_0067256

The expense of expanded HIV testing would be borne by the current payers of medical care -- insurance companies, the government, hospitals and clinics, and patients. If a medical institution finds that fewer than 1 in 1,000 HIV tests are positive, it can drop routine testing.

Testing regulations differ around the country, and some states will need to change laws to follow the recommendations. Virginia does not require a separate consent form for HIV testing, but Maryland does.

The new recommendations say that "patients should be informed orally or in writing that HIV testing will be performed unless they decline. . . . Information should include an explanation of HIV infection and the meanings of positive and negative test results, and the patient should be offered an opportunity to ask questions and to decline testing."

CDC officials emphasized that while HIV testing may become routine, following up positive tests will still require specific attention.

"Active efforts are essential to ensure that HIV-infected patients receive their positive test results and linkage to clinical care, counseling, support, and prevention services," the recommendations say.

One of the CDC's main goals is to lower the practical and psychological barriers faced both by people offering HIV tests and by those getting them.

The emergency department of Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore set out to offer testing to every patient eight months ago but has found that goal difficult to achieve.

"The legal requirements for written consent in the state of Maryland take time and effort beyond what is feasible in a busy emergency department," said physician Richard E. Rothman.

He said the department recently began using a "facilitator" who counsels patients and gets consent. That has "dramatically increased" the number of tests offered. About 50 percent of patients are now asked, and about 75 percent of them agree.

"Patients are definitely interested in being tested. There is no doubt about that," Rothman said.

Public health officials also hope the shift will help further destigmatize HIV. When the CDC recommended in 1995 that all pregnant women be tested, many clinics found that women embraced the policy, as it no longer required them to identify themselves as "at risk" to get tested.

The benefits of knowing -- and the hazards of not knowing -- one's HIV status are clear from studies. Between 54 and 70 percent of sexually transmitted cases of HIV are transmitted by people who do not know they are infected with the virus.

Once people know, most take precautions. The frequency with which a person has unprotected intercourse, homosexual or heterosexual, falls by about 50 percent once that person knows his or her HIV status. But the rate of unprotected sex may remain as high as 40 percent in some groups.

U.S. Urges H.I.V. Tests For Adults And Teenagers (NYT)

By Donald G. Mcneil Jr.

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

In a major shift of policy, the federal government recommended yesterday that all teenagers and most adults have H.I.V. tests as part of routine medical care because too many Americans infected with the AIDS virus don't know it.

The recommendation, by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, urges testing at least once for everyone aged 13 to 64 and annual tests for those with high-risk behavior.

The proposal is a sharp break from the early days of the AIDS epidemic, when the stigma of the disease and the fear of social ostracism caused many people to avoid being tested.

That led to heated debate about whether positive test results could be shared by medical and governmental authorities in their effort to contain the epidemic by reaching out to partners of those who might be infected.

Under the agency's plan, which states can adopt or modify if they choose, patients would be advised they were being tested, but the tests would be voluntary.

So that the tests could be easily administered, however, the agency urged the removal of two major barriers that some states now have: separate signed consent forms and lengthy counseling before each test.

DOJ_NMG_0067257

That would require new laws in some states, however, which could take years because some civil liberties groups and lobbyists for people with AIDS oppose the changes.

Many doctors are expected to welcome the changes.

"These recommendations are important for early diagnosis and to reduce the stigma still associated with H.I.V. testing," said Dr. Nancy Nielsen, a board member of the American Medical Association, which endorsed the new guidelines.

Dr. Julie Gerberding, the disease control agency's director and a doctor who treated some of the first San Francisco AIDS patients in 1981, said: "Our traditional approaches have not been successful. People who don't know their own H.I.V. status account for 50 to 70 percent of all new infections. If they knew, they would take steps to protect themselves and their partners."

The new guidelines, if adopted, would move the agency toward its "ultimate goals," which Dr. Gerberding described as: no more H.I.V.-infected children, no one living for years without antiretroviral treatment and, eventually, no more new cases of the disease.

About 40,000 Americans are newly infected each year, a number that has been remaining steady. In contrast to the early days of the epidemic, which struck gay men the hardest, many of those now infected are black or Hispanic, are teenagers and were infected by heterosexual sex. The agency estimates that 250,000 Americans, a quarter of those with the disease, do not know they are infected.

Moreover, 42 percent of those who find out they are infected are tested only because they are already seriously ill — which means they have been infected for up to 10 years and may have been passing the infection on all that time, Dr. Gerberding said.

The American Academy of H.I.V. Medicine, a group for AIDS specialists, gave a qualified endorsement of the guidelines, agreeing with the need for more testing but arguing that they gave counseling short shrift.

"Counseling just naturally goes with testing, as diet does to exercise," said Dr. Jeff Schouten, the academy's chairman.

Some civil liberties organizations and those representing people with AIDS, while favoring more testing, have lobbied against removing signed consent forms or pretest counseling for fear that such changes will make testing less voluntary.

Some states, including New York, have laws requiring such counseling and consent forms. They were passed in the early days of the AIDS epidemic, when having the virus amounted to a death sentence, the disease's stigma often led to denial of jobs or housing, and testing was done primarily to protect the blood supply.

Dr. Thomas R. Frieden, New York City's health commissioner, said yesterday that he "absolutely" agreed with the new guidelines and had been lobbying the state Legislature for a law incorporating them.

A bill he supported was introduced late last year, Dr. Frieden said, but opponents kept it from coming up for a vote.

"I am optimistic that it will make it through this year," he said.

Rose A. Saxe, a staff lawyer with the AIDS Project of the American Civil Liberties Union, said her group opposed the recommendation because it would remove the requirement for signed consent forms and pretest counseling. In settings like emergency rooms where doctors are strapped for time, Ms. Saxe said, "we're concerned that what the C.D.C. calls routine testing will become mandatory testing."

Patients, particularly teenagers, she said, "will be tested without an opportunity for understanding the magnitude of having a positive result."

David Ernesto Munar, associate director of the AIDS Foundation of Chicago and a board member of the National Association of People With AIDS, said he favored more testing and faster counseling to encourage it.

"But our fear," Dr. Munar said, "is that on the ground, the rush to get more blood samples is going to railroad right over any consent."

Illinois, like New York, requires written consent before a test, he said.

Disease control agency experts deny that their guidelines would encourage such problems.

They oppose mandatory testing, secret testing or testing without informing patients, at least orally, that such a test will be done. They suggest that whatever general consent for routine medical care a state law requires include consent for H.I.V. testing.

They also want anyone who tests positive to be counseled that AIDS is a serious disease and taught where to get treatment and how to keep from infecting others.

DOJ_NMG_0067258

As an example of success in a related program, Dr. Timothy Mastro, acting director of the agency's AIDS prevention division, pointed to the agency's guidelines to prevent infection of newborns.

The guidelines say that all pregnant women should be tested unless they refuse and that oral consent is acceptable. They also recommend tests again in late pregnancy for women who inject drugs, have sex with many men, have sex for money or live in neighborhoods where AIDS is common.

The number of babies born infected dropped to fewer than 240 a year now from 1,650 in 1991, Dr. Mastro said.

Laws for prisoners, which Dr. Mastro described as "a tricky area," might also need revision. In some states, testing is mandatory for all prisoners. In New York, it is voluntary.

Health officials in other states appeared to welcome the new guidelines. Steve Huard, spokesman for the Hillsborough County Health Department, which includes Tampa, Fla., said: "We strongly believe in universal H.I.V. testing through anonymous and confidential testing. With the recommendations, it would be more widespread. It would go out to private physicians and we should see infection rates going down."

Some states with few AIDS patients, like Wyoming, may be reluctant to adopt the guidelines on the ground that routine H.I.V. tests would be unnecessarily burdensome for doctors and patients.

To compensate for that, the guidelines suggest that routine tests might not be required in areas where fewer than 1 in 1,000 people test positive. But health care practitioners are not very good at guessing what rate will be found among their patients, said Dr. Bernard Branson, the C.D.C.'s associate director for laboratory diagnostics, so there should first be a period of routine testing.

The wholesale cost is about $1 for each test run in batches and about $8 for rapid tests done individually. Each positive test would require a second confirmation test and then counseling, which would raise the cost to about $80, Dr. Branson said.

That is far cheaper than many other routine screening tests like colonoscopies or mammograms, and Dr. Branson said most such tests were paid for by insurers because it was usually cheaper to treat diseases when they were caught early.

CDC Recommends AIDS Tests For Most People (USAT)

By Steve Sternberg

USA Today, September 22, 2006

AIDS virus testing should be offered regularly to everyone ages 13 to 64 in every hospital, doctor's office and clinic to speed diagnosis and help curb the epidemic, federal health officials recommended Thursday.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's recommendations are not legally binding, but they are designed to make HIV testing as routine as tests for high blood pressure, cholesterol and diabetes.

About 1 million people in the USA are HIV-positive, but 250,000 of them have not been diagnosed, according to the CDC.

"It will allow us to identify a lot of people who have HIV and don't know it," says Timothy Mastro of the CDC's HIV/AIDS program.

The guidelines no longer require health workers to provide special counseling before and after the test, and they lift the requirement that patients supply specific written consent, though patients must be given the opportunity to refuse testing.

Daniel Kuritzkes of the University of Colorado, chairman of the HIV Medicine Association, says, "I think the guidelines will help destigmatize HIV testing by making it part of routine medical care and not a test with some special mystique about it."

More than a dozen AIDS advocacy groups released a statement objecting to the decision to drop counseling.

"We fear that some health care settings will interpret today's announcement as a call for universal screening and test patients without informing them or arming them with the information they need to avoid putting others at risk," says David Munar of the National Association of People with AIDS.

Peter Staley, a founder of the protest group ACT UP, disagrees with his peers: "The bottom line is that we're really losing the fight here. We're losing lives. I'm an ACT UP grad, and our motto is 'by any means necessary.'

"I realize that abandoning written informed consent raises issues. People are worried about privacy and stigma. But the bottom line is that this would probably save lives, and that's why I'm very much in favor of it."

DOJ_NMG_0067259

Even patients diagnosed late in the course of the disease can extend their life expectancy by 14 years with standard treatment, according to a recent study led by Rochelle Walensky of Harvard Medical School.

Patients diagnosed soon after infection can extend their lives by as much as 25 years, she says.

Mastro says diagnosis is a powerful tool for prevention. "We think that the quarter of a million people who don't know their infection status account for 70% of sexually transmitted infections," he says. "We have very strong data showing that when patients know they're infected, they take strong measures to avoid infecting others."

Studies have shown that AIDS testing is as cost-effective as tests for high blood pressure and colon cancer.

The new guidelines leave open two key concerns: who will pay for the tests and the cost of treating 250,000 new HIV patients.

"The strain that this is going to place on Medicaid, the Ryan White Care Act and the state AIDS drug assistance programs is going to be enormous," says A. David Paltiel of Yale University, who has studied the test's cost-effectiveness.

Report Recommends Change In Medicare (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 21 (AP) — Quality not quantity should be the federal government's guide in setting payments to doctors, hospitals and other health care providers, said a report that was released Thursday.

Medicare pays doctors and hospitals when they perform a service, but such a system "tends to reward excessive use of services, high-cost complex procedures, and lower quality care," said the report, which was requested by Congress and prepared by the Institute of Medicine, part of the National Academy of Sciences.

Medicare serves nearly 43 million elderly or disabled Americans and spends more than $320 billion a year.

The institute said Congress should cut the base payments that Medicare makes to hospitals, nursing homes, insurers and doctors, and should use the savings to create pools that reward providers when they do work that has been proved effective in improving a patient's health.

Such a change, it said, would not "necessarily reduce the cost of care, but it will help ensure that what is paid for will be more beneficial to patients."

The recommendations did not please many health care providers.

Carmela Coyle, senior vice president for policy at the American Hospital Association, said new financing should be arranged for the bonus pools called for in the report.

Dr. Cecil Wilson of the American Medical Association said, "Congress must provide the Medicare program with additional funding so that Medicare patients' current access to quality care is not jeopardized by cuts that force physicians to make difficult practice decisions."

Medicare Drug Costs Debated (AP)

By Kevin Freking

AP, September 22, 2006

Filling the doughnut hole in Medicare drug plans would cost older people and the disabled about $40 a month more.

Democratic lawmakers estimated the additional cost and said Thursday that is a major reason why 88 percent of the Medicare beneficiaries signing up for drug plans opted for a coverage gap.

Democrats designated Friday as "doughnut hole day," when the coverage gap would hit the average older person who is taking several medications.

"This gap in coverage doesn't have to exist. This was a conscious choice, based on a value system, that put drug companies ahead of our seniors and people with disabilities," said Sen. Debbie Stabenow, D-Mich.

The Bush administration estimates that about 3 million Medicare beneficiaries will hit the doughnut hole, fewer than the 7 million often cited by critics. Mark McClellan, the administration's pointman on Medicare, says the 7 million figure is outdated.

Under the standard Medicare plan, the government subsidizes the drug costs for older people and the disabled. But after costs reach $2,250, the subsidy stops until a beneficiary has paid $3,600 of his or her own money. Then, the government will start picking up 95 percent of each purchase.

DOJ_NMG_0067260

But beneficiaries go back to square one with each new year, and could face the doughnut hole repeatedly over the ensuing years.

Also, beneficiaries must pay the monthly premium even while they are in the doughnut hole.

Those qualifying for a low-income subsidy are not included in the Democrats' estimate of those facing hardship, nor are those who enrolled in Medicare Advantages programs, which work like an HMO.

McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, emphasized that beneficiaries who fall into the gap got a lot of government assistance beforehand.

"If you reach the doughnut hole, you've already gotten $1,500 or more worth of help with your drug costs," McClellan said. "That's a lot of money that you can use for paying for basic necessities or for paying for enhancing your health insurance coverage."

According to the Democrats, it would cost $458 a year on average to switch to a plan that had full coverage. But that figure varies from state to state. Residents of New Jersey, for example, would have to pay, on average, an additional $298. The highest additional premium — $721 — would hit beneficiaries in seven states: Iowa, Minnesota, Montana, North Dakota, Nebraska, South Dakota and Wyoming.

"As this report shows, the opportunity to purchase plans that fill the hole is a mirage," said Rep. Pete Stark, D-Calif. "Beneficiaries are no more able to afford expensive, full-coverage plans than minimum-wage Americans are able to afford a Mercedes."

At a news conference, Rep. Janice Schakowsky, D-Ill, read a letter from a constituent, Pauline Metzger-Aronson of Morton Grove, Ill.

"All I know is that last month what I paid $20.00 for cost me $96.12 this month, and that was only on one prescription. What adds insult to injury is that we must now also pay the premium while we lose our benefits," Metzger-Aronson wrote.

Rep. Bill Thomas, R-Calif., said Democrats were trying to scare and confuse people.

"So, with all the success of the new drug benefit, why are Democrats continuing to attack the program? Because they are terrified that Republicans will get credit for this tremendously successful program," said Thomas, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee.

McClellan said older people approaching the coverage gap should keep using their Medicare drug card because it means the consumer can get the plan's discount. He also said they should contact the drug companies that make their medicine, as well as their state, to see if they qualify for assistance programs. Twenty-one states offer such programs, as do many of the major drug manufacturers.

Democrats contend that one solution to filling the doughnut hole would be to let the government negotiate drug prices on behalf of beneficiaries, instead of having fragmented insurance companies doing that. Then, the government could use the savings achieved to do away with the gap.

But McClellan said it would cost the government an additional $500 billion over 10 years to fill the gap.

Luring Customers From Medicare (NYT)

By Milt Freudenheim

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

For years, private insurers have offered alternatives to the federal Medicare program that are meant to give patients lower-cost options than the government coverage provides. More than 7 million people now subscribe to such plans, out of a total Medicare population of 42.5 million.

But suddenly a type of private insurance plan is gaining ground that looks very similar to the basic coverage long available to anyone with a federally issued Medicare card.

And the government is paying the private insurance industry a subsidy of 11 percent per patient, on average, to provide it.

Since the government substantially increased the subsidies two years ago for these most basic private industry plans — known as private fee-for-service — enrollment in the plans has grown tenfold to 820,000. About 18,000 people signed up in August alone, Medicare said yesterday in its latest update. And some analysts expect enrollments to double or even triple by 2009.

DOJ_NMG_0067261

The $7 billion that Medicare will pay private industry this year to provide this fee-for-service coverage is at least $770 million higher than the government would spend covering those patients itself, based on the 11 percent calculation.

Critics see the trend as further evidence that the government is paying private industry to take Medicare off its hands.

It is a "back-door way of trying to privatize Medicare," said Dr. Jack Lewin, the chief executive of the California Medical Association, a physicians' group. But the Bush administration's Medicare chief, Dr. Mark B. McClellan, insisted yesterday that the trend "is definitely not a 'push to privatization,' " but simply a way to give people with Medicare more choices. "The original Medicare program is and remains an option for those who prefer it," said Dr. McClellan, who plans to step down next month.

Private insurers can offer more choices and cost breaks to patients, he said, while providing overall better health care that will end up saving the government money.

The 11 percent calculation comes from the Medicare Payment Advisory Commission, an independent federal research body that advises Congress. And some insurance executives say the figure is an exaggeration. But there is little dispute that federal subsidies are encouraging the insurance industry to recruit members for the plans.

And while the current industry coverage can be a good deal for some patients, critics worry that Medicare patients reliant on private insurers could be left stranded if the federal money is eventually cut.

"We are very concerned that Congress is going to pull back on the funding," Dr. Lewin said, "and we will be left with a private system that offers fewer benefits and is going to be influenced by Wall Street."

Critics say the growing transfer of the nation's $342 billion Medicare program to private industry has already been playing out through other means, like the new Medicare Part D drug program and various Medicare-linked managed care plans and H.M.O's offered by private insurers.

Providing Medicare coverage in all its guises has become a $60 billion-a-year business and one of the few profitable growth areas for insurers. Medicare enrollees look especially attractive to insurers, as the industry's other main clientele — corporate America — struggles to meet the growing cost of providing health benefits to working people.

The fee-for-service plans, the focus of the current controversy, are in many ways similar to the government's own Medicare. Under the industry version, patients have the right to choose their own doctors and hospitals — as they have long been able to do with their federally issued Medicare cards.

And as with the federal program, enrollees in the private fee-for-service plans typically pay a monthly $88.50 premium to the government.

Under the industry plans, moreover, the hospitals and doctors receive the same rates as when they are paid through the basic federal Medicare program.

Experts say that because the administrative costs of providing the private policies are minimal, they represent easy income for the insurance companies, with profit margins of 4 percent or so.

But many see the private fee-for-service Medicare plans as mainly a feeder program in which insurance companies hope to gradually convert members into even more complex, more profitable private Medicare offerings that the government also subsidizes.

The more lucrative plans, like Medicare health maintenance organizations or doctor-network managed care programs, which have been available longer, can yield profits in the 10 percent range, analysts say.

The more basic private fee-for-service plans, around for less than a decade, were authorized through an amendment to the 1997 balanced budget act as a way to ensure that elderly people could obtain adequate health insurance. Now the plans are envisioned as primarily for rural Americans who typically have few medical choices.

The insurance industry largely ignored the fee-for-service plans until the insurers' subsidies were increased by $14 billion over 10 years by the 2003 Medicare overhaul legislation. Insurance lobbyists had argued that expanding private Medicare programs would eventually lower the government's costs.

DOJ_NMG_0067262

But insurers "are not really being asked to do anything for additional subsidies," said Marilyn Moon, a longtime Medicare researcher who served as a public trustee of the program — a watchdog role — during the Clinton years. She is now at the American Institutes for Research, a nonpartisan research center in Washington.

Insurers, though, say they provide benefits that basic Medicare does not cover.

The leader by far in private Medicare fee-for-service, with more than half the total members, is Humana. UnitedHealth and WellPoint are also big players.

John M. Bertko, a Humana vice president, says benefits included having nurses stay in touch with discharged hospital patients with chronic diseases to make sure they were following doctors' orders.

Other selling points for the private insurance plans include predictable out-of-pocket co-payments — typically $5 to $20 for doctor visits. That compares with the uncertainties patients face under traditional federal Medicare, in which they are responsible for 20 percent of whatever the doctor charges.

Martin Smith and his wife, Donna, of Bristol, Ind., chose a fee-for-service plan from UnitedHealth's Secure Horizons Medicare unit earlier this year.

The monthly premiums of $12.50 each for Mr. Smith, 68, and Mrs. Smith, 70, are in addition to their government Medicare premiums of $88.50 each. But the Smiths say the private plan is paying off.

Mrs. Smith recently had heart bypass surgery. And though the bill has not yet arrived, she knows that the hospital deductible for her Secure Horizons plan is $600, compared with the $952 she would be responsible for under traditional Medicare.

And instead of 20 percent of the approved doctors' fees in traditional Medicare, the Smiths pay only $10 to a primary care doctor and $20 for specialists. Secure Horizons pays the rest out of its subsidies from Medicare — which are $692.29 a month, on average, for each fee-for-service member in that part of the country.

The Smiths chose to sign up for Medicare Part D drug coverage from a separate insurer, Humana.

Like the Smiths, more than half of the private fee-for-service enrollees so far have also chosen drug coverage, and many are choosing a plan that combines both.

One is Cathy Watts, 58, of Decatur, Ill., a former nurse who says she had to retire four years ago because of Parkinson's disease and partial paralysis. Last January she signed up for a fee-for-service offering from Humana that included Part D drug coverage.

Other than the government's $88.50 Medicare premium that is deducted from her monthly Social Security check, Ms. Watts pays no premium to Humana.

She says the drug coverage was the main lure for her because her drug bill last year was $6,000.

"I will probably pay $3,600 this year" for drugs, she said. "So that will be better." And she can still see the doctors of her choice.

While insurers do run a risk of losing money on a patient if he or she has unexpectedly large health costs, the companies can consult county-by-county Medicare cost data and decide where to offer coverage and which high-cost areas to avoid.

In southern Illinois, where Mrs. Watts lives, the average monthly rate the government is paying an insurer to provide Medicare fee-for-service is $692.29 — the same as in Mr. Martin's town in Indiana.

Under Medicare's complicated rules, though, the amount actually paid to a company for a patient can vary. Around the nation, depending on local medical costs and the health profile of Medicare-eligible residents, the monthly federal subsidy to the insurance company can range from $400 to $2,500, said Dr. Scott Latimer, a Humana executive based in Tampa, Fla.

Enrollments in the fee-for-service plans are still primarily, though not exclusively, concentrated in rural and small cities. Before the Medicare subsidies were increased in 2003, insurers had little incentive to focus on such places. With few doctors and sometimes only one or two hospitals in such areas, insurers typically have little bargaining power. And the health care providers have often balked at accepting the lower fees and second-guessing often associated with managed care insurance networks. But when enough patients in a local area have been enrolled in the private fee-for-service plans, the companies say local health care providers may have little choice but to join the insurers' Medicare networks.

Rick Jelinek, the chief executive of UnitedHealth's Secure Horizons Medicare business, acknowledged that the company's strategy was "in the longer term, to build networks around our programs."

DOJ_NMG_0067263

With such networks in place, he said, the company could help manage patients' health — and the insurer's costs — through techniques like having nurses provide telephone health counseling aimed at helping keep patients with heart disease and diabetes avoid hospitalization.

Dan Mendelson, a former Clinton administration health official who is now the president of Avalere Health, a Washington research and consulting firm that advises insurance companies, said the private fee-for-service trend "should save money for Medicare by improving patient care."

But Ms. Moon, the Medicare researcher, said she was "unconvinced by the logic that says, 'If we are overpaying the health plans now, they will save us money later.' "

White House Willing To Deal To Get GSE Bill, Paulson Says (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips And Elizabeth Price

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

BEIJING -- U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson on Thursday said the Bush administration had clearly communicated a willingness to compromise with members of Congress at odds over legislation to establish a new regulator for the housing finance companies Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac.

"They're not waiting for me, or for the administration because we've indicated a willingness to work something out," Mr. Paulson said in an interview with the Wall Street Journal in between meetings with Chinese officials.

"So the key question is whether people can get together on both sides of the aisle and get together in the House."

A bill to create stronger government oversight of the mortgage companies is mired over differences about cutting down the companies' combined $1.4 trillion investment portfolios, which critics argue are too large and are a threat to stability of the U.S. financial system.

Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D., Md.), the Senate Banking Committee's ranking minority member, told reporters after lunch with other Democrats Tuesday that he was waiting to hear to new proposals from the Treasury Department.

"We're quite happy to look at anything that comes along," Mr. Sarbanes said.

Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac are housing government-sponsored enterprises, which buy mortgages on the secondary market from lenders. They are both recovering from massive accounting scandals and have not filed timely financial statements in years.

The House passed a bipartisan bill last year that would give the new regulator the ability to limit the portfolios based on safety and soundness, among other things. Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board have opposed that version of the bill, urging stricter limits on the GSEs.

The Senate Banking Committee passed a different bill, along party lines, that would directly limit the assets the GSEs hold in their portfolios. Champions of each version have been at a stalemate this year, and time is running out to get a law before the end of this Congressional term. Congress recesses after next week, as members return to campaign in their districts during October in preparation for the November elections.

"I would like to hope there could be movement before the elections, but I think it would be a long-shot to get anything as significant as this done in the few weeks we have before Congress goes home," Mr. Paulson said. "I'd sure like to be proven wrong," he added.

However, Congress could return after the elections for a so-called lame duck session, as some legislators have suggested.

GOP Games At The FDA (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

A Senate committee voted Wednesday to endorse Andrew von Eschenbach's nomination to be Food and Drug Administration Commissioner. But now two Republican Senators are threatening to block the impeccably credentialed acting FDA head unless they get their way on two different pet issues. This is an abuse of their "advice and consent" powers under the Constitution and a danger to the health of Americans, who need a confirmed FDA Commissioner with full authority to manage that bureaucracy.

DOJ_NMG_0067264

One of the obstructionists is Jim DeMint of South Carolina, who is threatening a "hold" -- that is, to prevent a full Senate vote -- on Dr. von Eschenbach's nomination unless the FDA moves to take the RU-486 abortion pill off the market. Mr. DeMint claims there are safety concerns with the product, but having lawmakers second-guess the agency's regulatory decisions on various products was hardly what Congress intended when it created the FDA.

Last month we criticized Democrats Hillary Clinton and Patty Murray for blocking the von Eschenbach nomination until the FDA approved over-the-counter sales of the so-called "morning after pill." The FDA has since done so, but Senators Clinton and Murray were wrong to hang their decision on just one of the $3 trillion worth of products -- many of them life-saving drugs -- that the FDA regulates. Senator DeMint's threat is no more defensible.

The other obstructionist is David Vitter of Louisiana, who is threatening a "hold" until he gets his way on "reimporting" cheaper prescription drugs from foreign countries like Canada. This policy shift isn't even within the FDA's power to accomplish. If Senator Vitter thinks prescription drugs are too expensive in America, the proper course is to convince his colleagues to revise the patent system Congress itself created with the intent of providing incentives for drug development. The threatened hold on Dr. von Eschenbach is evidence of Mr. Vitter's failure to move his issue democratically -- i.e., as a Senator.

The FDA badly needs a host of reforms -- especially a streamlined process for approving drugs to treat terminal diseases such as cancer. In Dr. von Eschenbach, President Bush has nominated one of the best available men to do that job. But the acting FDA chief can't get started in earnest without the bureaucratic clout that accrues to a Senate-confirmed Commissioner. If Senators DeMint and Vitter won't be reasonable, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and others should call them on the deadly consequences of further delay.

Back On Track In Space (NYT)

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

We've never been great fans of the International Space Station, an enormously costly project that will yield such limited scientific and economic benefits that it seems destined to be considered a white elephant. Nevertheless, we had to marvel at the magnificent performance of the crew of the shuttle Atlantis, which ended an arduous 12-day mission to the station with a flawless landing yesterday.

The flight drove home the point that the greatest value of the space station undertaking is simply the experience of building such a large and complex structure in space, far from the nearest hardware store or emergency repairman. Michael Griffin, the NASA administrator, aptly described the station as "one of the most amazing construction projects that human beings have ever undertaken."

This was the third shuttle flight since the disastrous loss of the Columbia in 2003 and the first devoted to resuming construction of the station. The astronauts spent three long days working in open space. The only glitches and human fumbles seemed minor and easily surmounted.

For the first time in years it seems possible that NASA may actually be able to finish the station by 2010 and then retire the aging shuttle fleet so as to free up money for new vehicles to carry out the more ambitious program to explore the Moon and eventually Mars. The only caveat is that this flight went so smoothly in part because the crew, which was grounded after the Columbia accident, had more than four years to get ready.

There was no evidence that the shuttle's delicate heat shield had been hit by chunks of debris like that which doomed the Columbia. This was the second successive flight without debris damage, suggesting that NASA's redesign of the external fuel tanks that previously shed foam has made the shuttles much safer. It should now be safe enough to launch at night, thus opening many more launch windows for the flights needed to complete the space station.

Our main hope is that a seemingly safer shuttle and new abilities to inspect shuttles in orbit and possibly even make small repairs will enable a mission to service and upgrade the Hubble Space Telescope before its batteries and gyroscopes run down. Mr. Griffin said NASA wants to service the Hubble by early 2008 if it can be done safely. He rightly described the Hubble as "one of the great scientific instruments of all time," responsible for fundamental discoveries about the universe that would otherwise not be known. It seems more important to service the Hubble than to finish a station whose main value will be the act of finishing it.

DOJ_NMG_0067265

OTHER NEWS:

Bush Talks Taxes In Tampa (SPT)

By Robin Stein And Adam C. Smith

St. Petersburg Times, September 22, 2006

President Bush made a two-city swing through Florida on Thursday, raising money and the spirits of two Republican candidates.

Across the country, Republican candidates have been distancing themselves from Bush before the upcoming midterm elections as the president's approval ratings have sagged while voters have grown dissatisfied with his handling of Iraq and the economy.

But on Thursday, there was no distance between Bush and Charlie Crist, the GOP candidate for governor, or Gus Bilirakis, who is running for Congress, as Bush zeroed in on tax policy, typically a point of strength for Republicans.

The issue, which Bush called a "fundamental difference" between the parties, is particularly timely in Florida. After years of absorbing hikes in property taxes and home-owners insurance premiums, residents in recent weeks have staged waves of protests in local tax offices.

"Elections are all about giving the people clear choices," Bush said in Tampa. "Do you want to keep your taxes low so we can keep the economy growing, or do we raise taxes and let the politicians in Washington try to grow the economy?"

Of course, matters of national security remained at the fore, too.

The normally soft-spoken Bilirakis seemed to burst with newfound resolve as he took to the stage just after 1 p.m. at Raymond James Stadium to introduce Bush.

"By the way, president," he said. "Thank you for making us safer."

For his part, Bush once again defended his policy of taking preemptive action to thwart terrorism.

"We've got to take threats seriously before they come home to hurt us," he said. "Getting rid of Saddam Hussein was the right thing to do, and the world is peaceful because of it."

As the applause tapered off, Bush quickly corrected himself: "The world is more peaceful because of it."

That is a matter of some debate, even among Republicans.

Indeed, in other circumstances, Democrats would be hard-pressed to claim any realistic shot at winning House races in traditional Republican strongholds such as Sarasota's District 13 and District 9, the seat Bilirakis hopes to keep in the family. (His father, Mike Bilirakis, has held the seat since 1982.)

For many Democrats those hopes are still a long shot, but leading Florida Democrats on Thursday pounced on the chance to cast Crist, Bilirakis and Katherine Harris, the Republican candidate for U.S. Senate, as "stay the course'' supporters of the president.

"We would hope that George Bush stays in Florida the entire election,'' said Mitchell Berger, finance chairman for Crist's Democratic opponent, Jim Davis.

A throng of protesters waved posters near Raymond James stadium.

The price of entry for the Bilirakis event — $1,000 a ticket or $2,100 for a one-on-one photo with the president — proved useful fodder for a counterattack from Phyllis Busansky, the Democratic candidate for District 9.

Busanksy hosted a luncheon in protest on Thursday.

"If your homeowner insurance rates went up by $1,000 or more," she wrote in the invitation, "I'd like to buy you lunch — and we can discuss ways we will fight back!"

While national polls and pundits suggest Democrats' most powerful weapon is the popular discontent with Bush, Florida Republicans didn't flinch.

"I'm just proud to have him here," said Carole Jean Jordan, chairman of the Republican Party of Florida.

"Floridians are proud to stand beside President Bush."

Among the nearly 500-person crowd gathered in Tampa were state Rep. Trey Traviesa, former governor Bob

DOJ_NMG_0067266

Martinez and embattled Senate candidate Harris.

Before the president's remarks, Harris was effusive in her praise for the president's policies and dodged questions about whether she had been invited to fly to Orlando aboard Air Force One.

The GOP establishment's support of Harris has been a matter of bitter contention for months.

In his remarks, Bush gave Harris a noticeably terse mention and afterward offered a clipped, "Thank you," as he pushed past her without making eye contact. Later, while Crist and Bush mingled with the big-dollar guests in one reception room at the Ritz-Carlton in Orlando, Harris was in the $500-per-person reception down the hall.

She was relegated to the crowd of spectators as Crist stood on stage, side by side with the president and his brother Gov. Jeb Bush.

The president praised Crist, who won the Republican primary for governor on Sept. 5, as "a people's governor."

"He likes to shake hands, he likes people," Bush said. "You want somebody who feels comfortable with the people of a state, somebody who can make decisions, and somebody who can set a clear vision on behalf of this vital state. And that's Charlie Crist."

And in between the two fundraisers, Bush and Bilirakis made an unannounced stop by the Buccaneers' new headquarters just as the team was wrapping up practice for the day.

Jackets were off as the president marched onto the sun-baked field and huddled with a ring of cheering players.

As much as Democrats savored the chance to link Republicans to President Bush, the day also underscored the immense fundraising advantage Florida Republicans enjoy again this year.

In less than eight hours, the president helped raise more than $450,000 for Bilirakis in Tampa, and in Orlando, he brought in at least $2-million for the Crist's campaign and the state Republican party.

President's Visit Pads GOP's War Chests (TT)

By William March

Tampa Tribune, September 22, 2006

TAMPA - President Bush helped Republicans raise at least $2 million for gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist and $500,000 for Gus Bilirakis, running for a Tampa Bay area congressional seat, in fundraising stops Thursday in Tampa and Orlando.

Although he boosted those two candidates, Bush was cool to his party's nominee for the U.S. Senate, Katherine Harris, giving her a short-shrift handshake along the rope line at the Tampa event and no ride on Air Force One.

Bush spoke to a crowd gathered in the club level of Raymond James Stadium at midday Thursday for Bilirakis, defending Republican tax cuts and the war in Iraq as well as touting the candidate for Congress. About 440 people attended the event, which raised half a million in donations.

Bush then made an unannounced stop at the Tampa Bay Buccaneers' new practice facility.

For about 40 minutes, the president signed footballs, talked to players and coaches and admired the biceps of running back Michael Pittman, said to have the biggest on the team at 19 inches.

Bush responded sympathetically when Coach Jon Gruden mentioned that the Bucs' season has not started well.

"I've been 0 and 2 before," Bush said. He then thanked the players for their volunteer work and said, "I admire the courage you show out there on the football field.

"Any Texans here?" he called out to the players gathered around for a huddle chat on the practice field, getting responses from, among others, offensive lineman Jeb Terry.

"Have faith in your coach, faith in each other, and be resilient - that was the message he gave us," cornerback Ronde Barber said.

It was Gruden's first meeting with Bush, even though a Super Bowl-winning coach normally meets the president. Gruden was not able to make the White House trip after the Bucs won Super Bowl XXXVII three years ago.

Bush then took off for Orlando, where he spoke to a $25,000-a-person reception intended to raise money for the Republican Party to spend on its candidates in November's elections, most of it for Crist. Senate Candidate Acknowledged

DOJ_NMG_0067267

Harris, whose relationship with the Republican Party leadership has been troubled, got brief mentions in Bush's speeches at both events.

"I'm proud to be here with Congresswoman Katherine Harris, running for the United States Senate," he said in Tampa, mentioning her as part of a list of other acknowledgments in his speech.

Even though she will top the GOP ticket in November, Harris was not onstage at either event and said she was not asked to travel on Air Force One. Bilirakis was invited aboard for the Tampa-Orlando flight but had campaign commitments here, a spokeswoman said.

"That's what you'd call icy cordiality," said University of South Florida political scientist and Republican Party historian Darryl Paulson. "Bush does not want to create any ill feelings among Republican activists and Harris supporters by publicly trashing her. On the other hand, he does not want Harris to play a prominent role in the campaigns and potentially damage other Republican races." Tampa Boy Gets Award

When he arrived at Tampa International Airport, Bush conferred an award for volunteer service on 8-year-old Zach Bonner of Tampa, who has logged hundreds of hours collecting money and gifts for hurricane victims.

"I was very nervous," Zach said later, "but when he came over to me, I wasn't as nervous as before. I said, 'Hi,' and he said he was proud of me."

During the event for Bilirakis, his Democratic opponent, Phyllis Busansky, responded by offering free lunch at a Spanish restaurant in West Tampa for anyone whose homeowners insurance has gone up more than $1,000 a year.

"I think it's safe to say that Gus Bilirakis will not exactly be an agent for change in Congress," Busansky said in a statement, calling him a "rubber stamp" who has "embraced the failed leadership of Dick Cheney, Speaker [Dennis] Hastert, Newt Gingrich and now George W. Bush."

In his speeches, Bush hammered on two major points: telling voters that Republicans will lower taxes and Democrats will raise them and arguing that the war in Iraq is necessary to defend the nation against terrorism.

He said the United States is "a nation at war" and "Iraq is the central front in the war on terrorism."

Urging the Republicans to work for continued control of Congress, Bush said Democrats "will raise your taxes, and it will hurt our economy." Republicans, he said, have "cut the taxes on the small businesses and working people to make sure you had more money in your pocket."

He said the beneficiaries of the tax cuts were "the working people, the small-business owners, those who struggle to put food on the table for their families."

Democratic Rep. Charles Rangel of New York, whom Bush singled out for criticism in his Tampa speech, responded that the tax cuts have been "tax breaks for the wealthy that no one has asked for and have driven our nation deeper into debt."

Reporter Roy Cummings contributed to this report, which includes information from The Associated Press.

President Pitches Crist To Party Faithful (MH)

By Mary Ellen Klas

The Miami Herald, September 22, 2006

ORLANDO - Bush pitches Crist to faithful

Conjuring up images of tax-obsessed Democrats and emphasizing the need to stay the course in America's "great ideological struggle" against terrorism, President Bush urged party faithful in Florida on Thursday to defeat Democrats in November and put Charlie Crist in the governor's office.

The president took his blue-state pitch to a Tampa fundraiser for congressional candidate Gus Bilirakis and later to a high-end fundraiser for Crist and the Republican Party of Florida in Orlando.

At Orlando's Ritz-Carlton, a throng of lobbyists, business leaders and community activists from around the state agreed to pay $25,000 apiece just to get in the door.

"This is an extraordinarily successful event, and I thank you," the president told the cheering crowd.

Party officials said they expected to raise $2 million toward their goal of collecting $30 million for Crist's election bid, although organizers boasted they might collect as much as $4 million.

DOJ_NMG_0067268

The event was co-sponsored by Orlando trial lawyer and Democrat John Morgan, whose firm employs Crist's running mate, state Rep. Jeff Kottkamp. Morgan, who endorsed Democrat Jim Smith in the primary, didn't attend the event but headed to Gainesville instead, where singer Tom Petty was performing at his alma mater, the University of Florida.

After recognizing Crist and urging the crowd to support U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris' run for the U.S. Senate, Bush unleashed a torrent of warnings about tax-loving Democrats and the failed policies he said they will attempt to pursue if they regain control of Congress.

TAX MESSAGE

"One of the issues that is important for our nation and our state is taxes. I think you're taxed too much. So does Charlie,'' the president said. ``I aim to make taxes a key issue across this country."

Bush said Crist would take the same approach.

"If you get him in office, he's going to cut your property taxes and you can take that to the bank," Bush said, referring to Crist's plan to double the homestead property tax exemption from $25,000 to $50,000.

The president's tax-cut theme was echoed in his remarks in Tampa, where he spoke to about 300 people at Raymond James Stadium and then stopped briefly to give a pep talk to Tampa Bay Buccaneers players as they worked out on the practice field.

In Orlando, the president warned the audience of Republican loyalists that Democrats 'may not tell you they're going to raise your taxes. They're just going to say they're just going to let the tax relief expire. That's like a boss who came in and said, `You know something, I'm going to let your last pay raise expire.' "

The tax-cut emphasis was at odds with what Florida voters have told pollsters this election season. Voters have said they are concerned about rising gas prices, the war in Iraq and the continued turmoil in the Middle East.

The crowds in both Tampa and Orlando didn't seem to care. People lined up for more than an hour to have their picture taken with Bush in Orlando "because people are proud to stand next to their president," said Carole Jean Jordan, chairwoman of the Republican Party of Florida.

Some of the party's top moneymen agreed. "People are wrong to criticize this president," said Zachariah Zachariah, a Fort Lauderdale cardiologist and leading fundraiser for the Republican Party. ``This president's approval ratings are climbing every day."

In an apparent gesture of acknowledgement of the president's critics, Gov. Jeb Bush defended his brother, saying the nation should ``be glad we have someone who's steadfast, who's resolute and who's bold and who will not be deterred by all of the critics and all of the pundits."

Gov. Bush introduced Crist as "a great attorney general" who will have the courage of his convictions and who will ``build on our platform of success."

Crist thanked the Bush family for its legacy and Gov. Bush for his service to the state, and noted that the president once gave him a nickname when he was running for state commissioner of education: Chalkboard Charlie.

The president responded that "Chalkboard Charlie" should be changed to ``Gov. Charlie."

HARRIS ATTENDS

In the audience was Harris, the U.S. Senate candidate whose campaign was derided by Republicans for months before she won the primary with half the vote in a four-way race.

The governor tried to recruit a replacement candidate, and the head of the state party refused to back Harris in the primary and said she couldn't defeat incumbent Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson.

After Harris won, Crist and other Republicans declined to invite her on a fly-around to a series of GOP unity rallies across the state.

Harris said Thursday that the Republican Party of Florida has warmed up to her candidacy "finally," adding: ``I'm really glad for that."

Harris, who has derided her fellow party members as being part of the "Republican elite," said she has received phone calls and offers of help from the party, the White House and other Republicans. "Of course, Sen. [Mel] Martinez has always been there," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0067269

Asked whether this would end her criticism of the "Republican elite,'' Harris said: ``I will never be one of the beltway boys."

Bush Leads New Offensive Featuring Economy And Linking Democrats To High Taxes (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

ORLANDO, Fla., Sept. 21 — President Bush began a blistering new political offensive on Thursday, asserting that if Democrats won control of Congress from Republicans it would mean higher taxes, less money in the pockets of working families and damage to the economy.

The speech by Mr. Bush here, in which he belittled Democrats as "the party of high taxes," signaled what Republicans described as a new phase of the White House's fall campaign, as Republicans begin to combine their emphasis on national security with a tough new emphasis on the issue that unites them more than any other, taxes.

Mr. Bush's offensive was backed up by a flood of television advertisements on behalf of Republican candidates.

"If they get control of the House of Representatives, they'll raise your taxes, it will hurt our economy, and that's why we're not going to let them get control of the House of Representatives," the president said at a fund-raising event at Raymond James Stadium in Tampa for Gus Bilirakis, a Republican state representative running for Congress.

"The Democrats have made their position clear," Mr. Bush said. "I want you to remember the last time they had control of the United States Congress back in 1993, they passed a massive tax increase."

Mr. Bush's words were echoed in advertisements that have been showing up on the airwaves, in mailings to voters' homes and in e-mail sent to their computers. This new offensive reflects what Republicans have said is the power they see in the tax issue, in motivating both Republican base voters — who have seemed particularly dispirited this year — and independents.

Republican officials said they had been scouring the voting records of Democrats running for re-election, in search of ways to press the issue.

"Sherrod Brown has voted for higher taxes over 35 times," an announcer says in a television advertisement shown this week in Ohio, attacking Mr. Brown, a Democratic member of Congress who is challenging Senator Mike DeWine. Mr. Brown's face is shown amid a grid of television screens displaying the word "tax" as the announcer lists various taxes Mr. Brown supported.

"Liberal Melissa Bean has not supported making the tax cuts permanent," says a mailing attacking Representative Melissa Bean, Democrat of Illinois, that was produced by the National Republican Congressional Committee. "Can you afford this tax increase?"

"Taxes have always been a good message in ads for us," said Carl Forti, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee. "We're on the air in 18 districts now, and 8 of them are on taxes."

Many Democrats are on record calling for some or all of Mr. Bush's tax cuts to be rolled back, especially those benefiting the wealthiest taxpayers.

But Democrats said that Republicans were distorting Democratic positions on taxes affecting the middle class and that by this point, Republican attacks on tax cuts had become so familiar to voters that they would not have much effect.

"Our candidates have all announced they're for middle-class tax proposals," said Representative Rahm Emanuel, Democrat of Illinois, who is leading the Democratic effort to take back the House.

Referring to Mr. Bush's comments, Mr. Emanuel said: "This is from a guy who ran up three trillion in debt and has submitted a deficit every year for the last five years. If I were him, I wouldn't be throwing stones in a glass house."

In Pennsylvania, Chris Carney, a Democratic challenger to Representative Don Sherwood, a Republican, is running an advertisement this week pushing back on Mr. Sherwood's criticism of him as supporting tax increases.

"The truth is I'm for middle-class tax cuts," Mr. Carney says in the advertisement. "Truth is, I'm for a new-baby tax credit. These attacks are another example of Sherwood bringing Washington politics back to Pennsylvania."

After a series of presidential addresses and events meant to put Democrats on the defensive about national security this month, the speeches here and in Tampa were the second phase of an election-year plan to stave off a Democratic takeover of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0067270

Some of the pages of this White House script may seem familiar. The attack on taxes, for instance, was reminiscent of the way the White House tried to use the legislative record of Senator John Kerry in the 2004 presidential campaign, culling all possible votes to try to paint him as a serial tax raiser.

Mr. Bush on Thursday presented a new set of numbers, saying that 95 percent of House Democrats voted against his tax cuts in 2003 and that 92 percent voted against extending his tax cuts this year.

Democrats said they did not fear the new assault and welcomed a fight on economic issues.

Mr. Brown, in Ohio, responded to a Republican advertisement with his own attack posted on his Web site. He criticized Mr. DeWine as supporting "tax breaks for the rich."

In Florida, Bush Touts Tax Cuts (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

ORLANDO, Sept. 21 -- President Bush accused Democrats on Thursday of preparing to raise taxes should they take over the House, as he pivoted to a different election-year theme after several weeks of trying to draw sharp differences on fighting terrorism.

On a campaign swing through the vote-rich Interstate 4 corridor of Florida, Bush cited the tax increases approved in Congress when it was last controlled by Democrats in 1993, as well as the opposition of many House Democrats to key aspects of his tax-cutting agenda.

"If they get control of the House of Representatives, they'll raise your taxes," Bush told several hundred supporters at a fundraiser in Tampa. "It will hurt our economy, and that's why we're not going to let them get control."

Democrats scoffed at the president's assertion. "This president has added $2.7 trillion to the nation's debt, and every year he has been president, he has run a deficit," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), who is heading the Democratic campaign to regain the House.

The sharp exchange signaled the intensifying battle for control of Congress, where the Republicans face a strong Democratic challenge in both houses. It was the first time in two weeks that Bush has made public appearances on behalf of GOP candidates. Some polls have shown modest improvement in the president's anemic political standing since the fifth-anniversary commemorations of the Sept. 11 attacks.

White House aides said the president plans in the coming weeks to be heavily engaged in the midterm elections, with stops scheduled on behalf of endangered Sen. Mike DeWine and Rep. Deborah Pryce in Ohio, Senate hopeful Bob Corker in Tennessee, the Connecticut Republican Party, and the reelection bid of Alabama Gov. Bob Riley. Many of these events will be closed fundraisers, though one senior official said Bush is expected to participate in get-out-the-vote events in GOP strongholds such as southwest Missouri and eastern Iowa.

Several of Bush's recent political appearances have been focused on terrorism, with only a modest nod to the traditional GOP tax-cutting agenda. But Thursday, at separate appearances on behalf of GOP House candidate Gus Bilirakis and gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist, Bush sought to draw a sharp difference between Democrats and Republicans on taxes. A homeowner revolt over taxes and insurance costs is roiling this critical battleground state, according to Florida political analysts.

The president zeroed in on comments this week by Rep. Charles B. Rangel (N.Y.), who would take over the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee if the Democrats win back the majority. Rangel told Bloomberg News that he "cannot think of one" of Bush's first-term tax cuts that merits renewal.

Bush told the crowd in Tampa, "That's one way of saying they're going to raise your taxes, because, you see, if you don't extend the tax cuts, your taxes go up."

The reference to Rangel -- though not by name -- came with ironic timing. It was the same day that the veteran congressman called a news conference in Washington to defend the president against the attacks this week by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez at the United Nations and at a Harlem church. Those attacks, as well as jibes from the Iranian president, seem to have energized Bush's political base.

DOJ_NMG_0067271

Rangel told reporters: "I just want to make it abundantly clear to Hugo Chavez or any other president: Do not come to the United States and think because we have problems with our president that any foreigner can come to our country and not think that Americans do not feel offended when you offend our chief of state."

After the speech, Rangel said a top priority will be offering families relief from the alternative minimum tax. He also said he will review "tax breaks for the wealthy that no one has asked for and have driven our nation deeper into debt."

Republicans said the president collected about $450,000 for Bilirakis, who is aspiring to the seat held by his father, Michael, for the past 12 terms in the Tampa area. The GOP nominee is favored, but Democrat Phyllis Busansky is waging an aggressive campaign. Bush also stopped by football practice to offer a pep talk for the Tampa Bay Buccaneers, who have started the season with two losses, before moving on to Orlando for a Crist fundraiser.

Crist, the Florida attorney general, is leading in the polls against the Democratic nominee, Rep. Jim Davis of Tampa, but the race is considered competitive. At the fundraiser, Bush was joined onstage by brother Jeb Bush, the Florida governor -- ineligible for reelection because of term limits. Conspicuously not on stage, but in the audience, was another GOP statewide candidate, Senate nominee Katherine Harris, who is struggling to unseat Sen. Bill Nelson. Bush urged the Orlando crowd to support her candidacy.

Political researcher Zachary A. Goldfarb in Washington contributed to this report.

Bush Flexes Campaign Muscles (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, September 22, 2006

President Bush, politicking at full campaign speed, contended Thursday that a vote for Democrats this fall would be a vote to siphon money out of American families' budgets.

It was Bush the Politician, unleashed, seven weeks before the midterm congressional elections.

The president's campaigning to help his party win governorships and maintain control of Congress in the November voting has been kept largely under wraps of late. Most of his political appearances have been at closed fundraisers. That reflected his low approval ratings that have GOP candidates eager for Bush's ability to collect campaign cash but unwilling to be splashed across the local press at his side.

Not so on Thursday.

Racing through three venues in two Florida cities, Bush displayed his competitive streak and a love for engaging in political battle.

"I'm looking forward to reminding the American people there are significant differences in between what our party believes and what the other party believes. It's easy to tell us apart," the president said, pounding the lectern and shouting at sometimes earsplitting levels, at an open-to-the-press luncheon here that raised $450,000 for state Rep. Gus Bilirakis. He is trying to succeed his father in Congress in a safe Republican district. "And the first place you can start is looking at taxes," the president said.

Bush has repeatedly called for Congress to make permanent all the tax cuts passed at his urging earlier in his administration. GOP leaders have had little success doing so, focusing instead on extensions.

He criticized Democrats for passing what he called a "massive tax increase" in 1993 when their party last controlled the House. And he said that in the 13 years since, "they've worked hard to sustain their record as the party of high taxes," with overwhelming majorities of House Democrats voting against many of the Bush cuts.

And now, Bush said, the man poised to be chairman of the House tax-writing committee if Democrats control the chamber "can't think of one of our tax cuts that should be extended." Bush, who equates that opposition with an intention to raise taxes, was referring, though not by name, to Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y.

"There should be no doubt in anybody's mind where they stand," the president said of Democrats. "If they get control of the House of Representatives, they'll raise your taxes."

Rangel said he would seek Republicans' cooperation, but he defended a review of "tax breaks for the wealthy that no one has asked for and have driven our nation deeper into debt."

DOJ_NMG_0067272

Stacie Paxton, spokeswoman for the Democratic National Committee, said: "Under President Bush, the GOP has turned record surplus into record debt, Americans' wages are stagnant and families are taking on more and more debt just to keep up in the Republican economy. You can't trust Republicans to handle your money."

After speaking inside the Tampa Bay Buccaneers' football stadium, Bush went to the team's nearby practice field where he spent more than a half-hour, sleeves rolled up and laughing with excited players and officials. The president offered a pep talk to the team, off to a winless start this season. "I've been 0-2 before," he said to laughs. "The beginning of the season is not the end of the season."

Bush wrapped his Florida tour at an Orlando reception that scooped up $2 million for GOP gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist, Florida's attorney general, and the state Republican Party. He hadn't lost any of his enthusiasm in the four hours since the first fundraiser, and he sounded the same themes.

"We got a record of cutting taxes, and they got a record of opposing tax cuts — it's night and day," the president said.

Democrats, whom political observers give a chance of gaining a majority in the House and, less likely, the Senate, have sought to make the elections a referendum on the unpopular war in Iraq.

The president, meanwhile, has tried to shift attention to the economy, as well as to the broader war against al-Qaida terrorists and their allies. He continued that push Thursday.

"I need members of Congress who understand that you can't negotiate with these folks, you can't hope that they change their mind, that the best way to protect the American people is to defeat them overseas so we do not have to face them here at home," he said.

GOP Rep. Katherine Harris, who won the Republican nomination in this state's Senate race despite party objections to her candidacy from the White House on down, attended both fundraisers.

But Bush's help for her long-shot race to unseat Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson was limited to briefly noting her presence in Tampa, and urging support for her in Orlando. "I, too, encourage you to vote for Katherine Harris for the United States Senate. Welcome, Katherine," he said before quickly moving on.

Bush Campaigns On Tax Cuts (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

ORLANDO, Fla. — Opening a new phase in his campaigning for the midterm elections, President Bush delivered a tough attack Thursday on the Democratic Party's policy on taxes.

Bush, speaking at two political fundraisers in Florida, sought to distinguish Republicans from Democrats on a core issue that advisors believe will motivate GOP voters.

"There's a fundamental difference in this campaign and campaigns all across the country about who best to spend your money. We believe that the best people to spend your money is you," the president said at an appearance in Tampa, citing tax cuts passed by the Republican-led Congress since 2001.

Democrats responded by criticizing Bush for adding to the national debt.

"The deficit the president has run up has essentially put a $28,000 tax on every newborn, and that's not to mention the $1 billion a week we're spending in Iraq," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who leads the Democratic effort to win more House seats.

Bush spoke in Tampa at a fundraiser for Gus Bilirakis, a Republican, who is seeking the seat his father, Michael Bilirakis, has held in the House. "There's nothing wrong with a son following in his father's footsteps," said Bush, the son of a president.

The reception at a concourse of Raymond James Stadium raised $450,000.

Bush spoke later in the day in Orlando, at a fundraiser for Charlie Crist, the state attorney general who is the Republican nominee for governor.

The president's focus on taxes marked a change from his efforts over the last three weeks to highlight his administration's anti-terrorism policies.

DOJ_NMG_0067273

Challenging the Democrats' record on taxes, Bush said in Tampa: "When we first cut taxes back in 2001 to get this economy going, when we cut taxes to recover from a recession, when we cut taxes to make sure we recovered from a corporate scandal, almost 85% of the House Democrats voted against it."

He said that 95% of House Democrats had voted against a 2003 tax cut proposal. "I think you're beginning to get a drift of their philosophy about your money," he said.

Emanuel, the Democratic congressman, said in a written response: "For a guy who added $3 trillion to the nation's debt and has run a deficit five out of the last five years, George Bush should not throw such sharp stones while living in such a glass house."

The president also warned of the dangers of terrorism.

Defending his decision to launch the war against Iraq, he said: "Getting rid of Saddam Hussein was the right thing to do…. The world is more peaceful because of it."

Bush finessed a potentially difficult political moment, acknowledging the presence of the party's Senate candidate, Rep. Katherine Harris (R-Fla.), who as Florida's secretary of state was at the center of the disputed recount in the 2000 presidential election.

Republican Party leaders had tagged Harris as a likely loser and discouraged her candidacy, but she won the party's nomination nonetheless. Bush made passing references to Harris in Tampa and again in Orlando.

"I'm proud to be here with Congresswoman Katherine Harris, running for the United States Senate," he said in Tampa when he recognized the various political figures in the audience.

Democratic Win Means More Taxes, Bush Warns (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

TAMPA, Fla. -- President Bush yesterday charged that if Democrats gain control of the House in the November elections, they will try to force tax increases on Americans.

Pivoting from his recent series of speeches on the war on terrorism, which have boosted poll numbers for him and Republicans overall, Mr. Bush turned to the economy, the other issue that he thinks his party has a strong record on which to run.

"There should be no doubt in anybody's mind where we stand on cutting taxes. And the Democrats in Washington have got a record of their own, and there should be no doubt in anybody's mind where they stand," the president told 400 Republicans at campaign fundraiser here.

He came armed with a series of statistics about Democrats' records, which he said voters should remember when they head to the polls: 85 percent of House Democrats voted against his 2001 tax cut package, 95 percent voted against his 2003 tax cut package and 92 percent voted against this year's bill to extend some of those cuts.

"I think you're beginning to get a drift of their philosophy about your money," Mr. Bush said.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said she welcomed turning this election into a referendum on the economy.

"Real incomes for middle-class families have declined since the president took office," she said, pointing to increased health insurance, energy and college tuition costs.

And Rep. Rahm Emanuel, Illinois Democrat and chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said that given that the national debt has grown so quickly under Mr. Bush, he shouldn't "throw such sharp stones while living in such a glass house."

Mr. Bush, though, said Democrats have even threatened to raise taxes.

He pointed to comments by Rep. Charles B. Rangel of New York, who would become chairman of the Ways and Means Committee if Democrats won control of Congress. Mr. Rangel has said he doesn't see any Bush tax cuts worth extending.

"That's one way of saying they're going to raise your taxes because, you see, if you don't extend the tax cuts, your taxes go up," Mr. Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0067274

The president has dominated press coverage in the past few weeks with his push on terrorism, and his tax message yesterday was overshadowed by the deal his administration reached with key senators to approve a CIA interrogation program.

The talk on terrorism has been good for him.

A Los Angeles Times-Bloomberg poll released yesterday found Mr. Bush with a 44 percent approval rating. That is Mr. Bush's highest rating since January.

The number matches the 44 percent approval rating that the Gallup-USA Today poll showed earlier this week.

Still, a CBS-New York Times poll released this week found that Mr. Bush "had not improved his own or his party's standing" with his series of speeches, according to yesterday's Times.

That poll put Mr. Bush's job approval rating at 37 percent, unchanged from an August poll, as was the number -- 54 percent -- who approve of the way he is handling the war on terrorism.

Bush: Best Way To Protect Nation Is To `stay On The Offense' (MERCN)

By William E. Gibson

The San Jose Mercury News, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON - Hoping to regain his political stature, President Bush has hit the campaign trail to sound warnings about terrorism while boosting Republican candidates in this year's elections.

Returning to Florida, the state that secured his election in 2000, Bush on Thursday helped Republicans raise money in Tampa and Orlando while asserting that defending America means fighting in Iraq.

"The best way to protect the United States is to stay on the offense and bring the enemy to justice before they come here and hurt us in America," Bush told a supportive crowd in Tampa.

In political terms, Bush and fellow Republicans are playing the security card, the one that sent the president's public-approval ratings to a record high in 2001 and helped the party consolidate control of the White House and Congress in the next two elections.

The president's campaign offensive has boosted his approval ratings by a few percentage points in national polls while prompting Democrats and other critics to accuse him of playing politics with terror.

Voters in Florida and elsewhere are divided over Bush's effectiveness, depending on whether they believe the war in Iraq has made America more secure or more vulnerable. What was once Bush's strength has become another partisan quarrel.

In this conflicted environment, one big question is whether Republicans once again can ride the terror issue to victory. At stake is majority control of Congress.

"If Bush has not fanned the fires of fear, he has stood by and warmed himself near them," said Robert Watson, associate professor of political science at Florida Atlantic University. "Every speech, every warning, all the color-code alerts - he reminds people at every turn about the dangers of terrorism.

"Why? Because it's such a close race. Neither party has much to stand on, and what else does the president have to talk about? Not the price of gasoline, not the price of health care."

In his Tampa speech on Thursday, Bush touted his low-tax policies and said he had fulfilled his promise to Florida to set "reasonable limits" on offshore oil drilling. But the focus of this and nearly every recent Bush speech was terror and Iraq.

"Iraq is the central front of this war on terror," he said.

"Saddam Hussein was a threat. And don't let people rewrite the history of the way the world was. He was a state sponsor of terror. He paid families of suiciders. (sic) He attacked his neighbors. He used weapons of mass destruction."

The issue has spilled into congressional campaigns in South Florida and other communities, where unease over Iraq has sapped much of the president's popularity.

Democrats argue that Bush's policies and the war in Iraq have become a recruiting tool for terrorists and have left Americans less secure. Their campaign strategy is to depict Republican candidates, such as Rep. Clay Shaw of Fort Lauderdale, as part of a "rubber-stamp" Congress.

"Clay Shaw is not providing any kind of oversight of what is going on in Iraq," said state Sen. Ron Klein of Boca Raton, Shaw's Democratic opponent. "He's not asking the tough questions."

DOJ_NMG_0067275

Shaw contends that "most people want to stay the course" and accuses Klein of not presenting an alternative plan.

"This (Iraq war) has taken away some of the energy the president once had," Shaw conceded. "The American people do not want to support a prolonged war. We want to get in and get out and come home. Sadly we just can't do that, and we're stuck."

After taking office in the disputed 2000 election, Bush's approval ratings in The Gallup Poll had drifted down to 51 percent in September 2001. Then came the terrorist attacks and a dramatic rallying effect, which boosted Bush's approval rating to 90 percent.

It has ratcheted down ever since, reaching a low of 31 percent in The Gallup Poll in May before bouncing up to 44 percent in the most recent poll. Along the way, it was briefly buoyed by the invasion of Iraq and by terrorist incidents and red alerts. The climate of fear became a political windfall for Republicans, the party often associated with defense and security issues.

"If fear gets intensified, that pulls people toward the president," said Steven Kull, a pollster and director of the Program on International Policy Attitudes at the University of Maryland. "It makes people feel under siege. They hunker down and draw closer to the president and are less apt to criticize. But you can't keep doing that day after day."

Democrats are counting on the public separating Iraq from the larger war on terror while focusing again on domestic issues, such as health care and energy.

"They (Republicans) are going to keep this balloon floating as close as they can to November. The president is going to spend a lot of federal jet fuel flying all over the country talking about how he has protected America," said Rep. Kendrick Meek, D-Fla. "Obviously in Florida, because of Jeb Bush, he's had the bullet-proof vest on as it relates to his approval numbers.

"But there will come to a point when folks say this cycle is done, let's talk about some of these other issues that are facing Americans. People are going to say there should be a body, a chamber, that is going to bring balance to what this administration has been doing."

8 Year Old Meets President, Invites Him To Party For Hurricane Victims (BRAH)

By Melanie Marquez

The Bradenton Herald, September 22, 2006

TAMPA - A Valrico 8 year old shook hands with the president today, received a citizenship award and then invited him to a party for young victims of a hurricane.

Zach Bonner told The Herald on the tarmac at Tampa International Airport that President Bush politely declined to attend the Christmas party for Katrina victims in Louisiana in December, but said he would "send something."

For his meeting with the commander and chief, Bonner wore a dark blue blazer and a red tie that matched the president's.

Bonner was accompanied in his brief meeting with Bush by his mother, Laurie Bonner, and his brother, Matt Chesney, 17. Mom and brother stood off to the side as the president shook Zach Bonner's hand and presented him with the President's Volunteer Service Award.

Zach Bonner worked and organized relief efforts for the victims of hurricanes Charley in Florida and Katrina in Louisiana and Mississippi.

Just minutes after Air Force One touched down at TIA at 12:15 p.m. and taxied to an area near Raytheon Aircraft Services, the president descended stairs and met with the family. Media members about 45 yards away watched but could not hear what was said at the brief ceremony.

Afterward, Zach Bonner spoke to The Herald.

He said he was honored, and that he presented the president with a photograph of National Parks badges collected around the country as he has traveled to drum up support for the children affected by hurricanes in 2004 and 2005.

It was a beautiful day for the outdoor ceremony. Bush appeared energetic during his first visit to Florida since the primary elections.

After the ceremony, he entered a car as part of a motorcade. The reason for the trip was to appear at a fundraiser for State Rep. Gus Bilirakis, who is running congress.

Bush was to fly out of TIA in the early afternoon.

Valrico Boy Gets Presidential Award (SPT)

DOJ_NMG_0067276

By Letitia Stein

St. Petersburg Times, September 22, 2006

TAMPA — At 8 years old, Zach Bonner met his second U.S. president on Thursday. Although partisan types may take exception, he found both George W. Bush and Bill Clinton equally charming.

"They were both really, really nice," Bonner said. "I was really excited about both of them."

Arriving in Tampa for a fundraiser, Bush met the Valrico boy outside Air Force One.

Bonner, who had been practicing his handshake, felt nervous as the commander-in-chief walked over.

"It went so fast," he recalled. "He said congratulations, and he was proud of me."

If it weren't coming from a president, "proud" could sound like an understatement for Zach's accomplishments.

Two years ago, he heard that the victims of Hurricane Charley needed water. Zach asked his mother if he could give some. Then his neighbors. Twenty-seven pickup truckloads later, he was still helping others.

Today, Zach has his own nonprofit, the Little Red Wagon Foundation Inc., complete with a Web site at www.littleredwagonfoundation.com.

"I wanted to help other kids," he said. "Some of the organizations I wanted to help, I had to have 501(c)3. And so I started my own organization."

In his brief visit, Bush awarded Zach a lapel pin inscribed with "Presidential Call to Service Award."

As far as meeting presidents go, Zach confessed that 43 may have one-upped 42.

"It probably meant a little bit more to me from President Bush because, I mean, he's still in office," said Zach, who met Clinton after his presidency.

Welcome To My Site! (LRWF)

Little Red Wagon Foundation, September 22, 2006

My name is Zach and I am the founder of the Little Red Wagon Foundation Inc. I created a non profit so I could help kids in distressed situations. My plan is to help as many kids as I can, have fun and keep it simple. I hope you like my site and find it to be useful and informative. If you have any questions about what I am doing or how you can help, email me. Don't be shy, leave me a comment, let me know you were here. If you would like to recieve updates on what I am doing please click join this site listed above! Then I can keep you upddate on my projects and the auction! THANKS FOR STOPPING BY!!!

This is a picture of President Bush and me. He was very nice and it was an honor to meet him. He gave me the President's service award and we talked about the JR Ranger program.

AUCTION HAS BEGUN. DIFFERENT ITEMS WILL BEGIN THROUGH OUT THE EVENING.

Clicking the link above will give you the opportunity to help us. Every time you do an internet search using Good Search the Little Red Wagon will recieve a small amount of money. It is run my Yahoo so you know it can be trusted.

President Visits Bucs, Throws With QB (FWNS)

By Fred Goodall

The Fort Wayne News-Sentinel, September 22, 2006

TAMPA, Fla. - It seems like everyone has some advice these days for the winless Tampa Bay Buccaneers and struggling quarterback Chris Simms.

Even President Bush tossed the football with the former University of Texas quarterback Thursday, and offered some advice.

"Never give up," Bush said Thursday when asked what he told the Bucs during a half-hour visit to the team's training facility near Raymond James Stadium, where the president delivered a fundraising speech to about 400 people in a VIP club area.

Coach Jon Gruden wouldn't disclose what additional wisdom the president might have imparted to Simms.

"It's great, though, to get some advice from the president of the United States. It's a little different when the coach is telling you to do this or do that. You have the president come and give you some advice, that's something you gotta listen to," Gruden said.

"Hopefully it works. If it doesn't work out this week, he can call the president to see what happened."

DOJ_NMG_0067277

Bush accepted an invitation to stop by practice and was greeted on the field by Simms and teammates Derrick Brooks, Ronde Barber and Mike Alstott and Ryan Nece, as well as an appreciative Gruden.

"The president has a lot to do. For him to show up here with the SWAT team on the roof and the Secret Service guys, that's awesome," Gruden said.

The Bucs (0-2) are preparing for Sunday's game against Carolina, another winless team. Simms has been the target of criticism following subpar performances the first two weeks of the season.

Bush addressed the entire squad, coaching staff and other team officials and personnel in the middle of the field. The president mingled with players, coaches and officials, posing for pictures and signing autographs before playing catch with Simms, son of New York Giants Super Bowl-winning quarterback Phil Simms.

'Republicans Will Make History' (WSJ)

By Ken Mehlman

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Last month's narrowly averted plot to blow up airliners bound for the U.S. from Great Britain is a stark reminder that we are engaged in an extraordinary and dangerous global war. In 46 days, the American people will make an important decision about how we prosecute that war: Do we stay on the offense and use every tool available to defeat the enemy, or do we elect leaders who would weaken America and surrender key tools we need to defeat the global jihad?

This war began long before September 11, 2001. For a generation, the terrorists have attacked free nations, from the 1972 Olympic Games in Munich to the 444 days that American hostages were held in Iran; from the 1983 Beirut attacks to the bombings of the World Trade Center in 1993, Riyadh in 1995 and Khobar Towers in 1996; from the embassy attacks in 1998 to bombing of the USS Cole in 2000. Too often, free nations responded weakly, or not at all, so the enemy grew emboldened. The result was 9/11.

Now we understand that we face a radical global movement of Islamic fascists, held together by a totalitarian ideology as deadly as the ones we faced in World War II or the Cold War. This movement ebbs and flows. Its adherents meet in cyberspace instead of buildings. They gather on blogs instead of barracks. A terrorist in Syria can recruit allies in the heart of Europe and a cell leader in Asia can activate an attack in the U.S., all without leaving their homes. That makes this enemy difficult to defeat. They constantly adapt -- so we must as well.

That is why the choice we face on Nov. 7 is so critical. Democratic leaders are saying Iraq is a diversion from the war on terror, that we should be more focused on defending the homeland. But again and again, the Democrats have proposed weakening our defenses.

We learned on 9/11 the need for coordination between federal, state and local governments; yet the majority of congressional Democrats voted against re-authorization of the Patriot Act. The foiled airplane plot re-emphasized the importance of following an enemy whose command and control is often obscure; yet Democrats opposed the NSA surveillance program and praised an activist judge's attempt to shut it down.

We need to aggressively and effectively interrogate captured terrorists in order to stop their plans before they come to fruition; yet Democrats want to handcuff those efforts. Terrorists cannot build IEDs or buy weapons without funding, but when the New York Times disclosed a secret program that was tracking their financing, more than 85% of House Democrats voted against a resolution supporting the program and condemning its media disclosure. We need to stop rogue regimes like Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons; yet Democrats want to take any use of force off the table.

Even more dangerous is that Democrats truly seem to believe that Iraq is completely separate from the greater war on terror. Al Qaeda's leaders are not confused about the importance of Iraq to their goal of global jihad. Osama bin Laden's No. 2, Ayman al-Zawahiri, has said his plan is to use Iraq as a base to launch further attacks, with the goal of creating a new caliphate in the Middle East. He wants to turn Iraq into another Taliban-era Afghanistan, except one strategically located between Syria and Iran, and sitting on one of the world's largest supplies of oil. Osama bin Laden himself said that the American withdrawal from Somalia emboldened his movement before 9/11. Imagine the victory celebrations among the terrorists if we were to retreat from Iraq. Yet this is exactly what Howard Dean and a majority of Democrats would have us do. In 46 days, we must ask ourselves, would surrendering Iraq to the enemy make us safer -- or less safe?

DOJ_NMG_0067278

Here at home, we are also working to reform government. We live in a global economy, one in which it is just as easy to create jobs in India as it is in Indiana. Republicans understand this, which is why we are committed to lower taxes, less regulation and fewer lawsuits. Republicans have cut taxes every year since George W. Bush was elected president. We have streamlined regulations, reformed bankruptcy laws, offered choice to Medicare recipients, and limited class-action lawsuits. The Democrats opposed every single one of those reforms -- and they are pledging to stand in our way as we move forward.

Republicans want to eliminate the death tax once and for all. Democrats want to bring it back. Republicans want to explore new sources of energy to bring gas and heating prices down. Democrats want to block domestic exploration. Republicans want small businesses to be able to band together to provide health care to their employees at a reasonable price. Democrats don't believe entrepreneurs should have that freedom. Republicans want all parents to have the choice of where they send their kids to school. Democrats would limit that choice to the rich and powerful. The list goes on and on.

It would be foolish not to acknowledge the challenges Republicans face this election cycle. We are up against history. It has been close to a century since Republicans have held the White House and the House of Representatives for eight straight years. Winning four elections in a row doesn't happen that often.

Each election is unique, and the issues and candidates in the governor's race in Michigan are different from congressional races in California or the Senate contest in Tennessee. But there can be no doubt about the national and international import of the choice we all face as Americans. We face war and a changing global economy, and Republicans have very different strategies for victory than the Democrats. I believe the American people understand the choice of 2006, which is why I am confident that in 46 days Republicans will make history and maintain our majorities in Congress.

Mr. Mehlman is chairman of the Republican National Committee.

'Democrats Offer A New Direction' (WSJ)

By Howard Dean

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

We need a Democratic Congress to fight the war on terror -- and to end the war on America's families. Republican policies of the last five years have damaged our economy and failed Americans. Democrats believe strengthening the middle class is essential for a thriving economy that rewards work, provides economic opportunity to all and makes it easier for parents to devote time to their families. An economy that favors the top 1% at the expense of everyone else might be good for President Bush's politics, but a shrinking middle class is bad for capitalism, democracy and America. We need a new direction.

The Republican record on managing the federal budget is dismal. Republicans have turned surplus into debt, hope into lost opportunity; they have become the party of borrow-and-spend. The Joint Committee on Taxation estimates that the total cost this year of the president's tax cuts is $258 billion. This means that even with spending for wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and the response to Hurricane Katrina, the federal budget would essentially be in balance if the tax cuts had not been enacted, or if they had been offset as required under the pay-as-you-go rules that Republicans allowed to expire. These economic policies amount to a war on American families:

• Under Mr. Bush and the Republican Congress, incomes today are $1,000 less for the typical household than during Bill Clinton's final year in office; incomes for the typical working-age household have declined every year since the president took office. Black and Hispanic households have fared worse over the same period: Black household income has fallen every year, after rising every year (except for a one-year $60 dip) under Mr. Clinton. Incomes for Hispanic households are down $1,000, after rising more than $7,000 under Mr. Clinton.

• Incomes have fallen because wages -- which provide 75% of income for typical families -- are stagnant for most workers. Under Mr. Bush, wages for college-educated workers increased only 1.3% between 2000 and 2005, as compared to 11.3% during Mr. Clinton's last five years. For the nation's lowest-paid workers, the situation is even worse, as the minimum wage is worth less now than at any time in at least 50 years.

DOJ_NMG_0067279

• Health and retirement coverage have declined for most workers and their families, and workers' costs have increased. The share of Americans with job-based health coverage fell over the last five years from 62.6% in 2000 to only 59.5% in 2005, virtually erasing gains in such coverage under Mr. Clinton, when coverage rose from 57.1% in 1993 to 63.6 % in 2000. Workers are also paying more for their coverage. Between 2001 and 2005, the amount workers paid for family premiums grew more than 50%. These factors have fueled increases in the number of uninsured every year under Mr. Bush, to almost 47 million last year -- roughly one in six Americans.

• Retirement coverage has also declined. Only 19% of workers have guaranteed pensions today, compared with 39% in 1980. And under Mr. Bush, retirement coverage, including both guaranteed pensions and 401(k)s, fell almost three percentage points, to just less than 46% in 2004.

• Americans are taking on more debt just to keep up in the Republican economy. Last year, household debt was a record 132% of disposable income. Not surprisingly, home mortgage foreclosures are also up; in March of this year, the foreclosure rate was 63% higher than last year.

• While wages and incomes have slowed, health costs increased, debt increased and retirement coverage declined, the cost of sending kids to college has exploded. Between 1995 and '96 and 2005 and '06, the average costs for a four-year private college rose 32% and for a four-year public college, 42%.

• These dwindling economic fortunes have resulted partly from a decline in unionization, which has been exacerbated by the all-out assault of the Bush Republicans on workers' rights to organize and bargain. From stripping away union protections for whole classes of workers to intervening in labor-management disputes in various industries, Mr. Bush, backed by a Republican Congress, has done more to undermine workers' rights than any president in more than 70 years.

These bleak statistics explain why the overwhelming majority of Americans know our country is moving in the wrong direction -- despite the economic cheerleading of the Republicans. Americans know who has benefited in this economy -- and, for most, it isn't them.

The president's failures in Iraq are also hurting our economy, our country and our ability to fight the war on terror. We are spending $8 billion a month in Iraq -- that's $267 million a day. Consider that for what we spend in three weeks in Iraq, we could make needed improvements to secure our public transportation system; for what we spend in five days we could double the COPS program, and put more police on the streets to keep our neighborhoods safe, or we could put radiation detectors at all our ports.

Democrats offer America a new direction in fiscal policy, for the middle class, and in the war in Iraq. We believe that America should work for everyone:

We will restore honesty in government, starting with the pay-as-you-go discipline in Congress that served Mr. Clinton so well. Balancing the Federal budget will be a high priority with concurrent limitation of spending. We will ease the burdens on middle class Americans and reverse Republican cuts in college tuition aid and health care. We will ensure that a retirement with dignity is the right and expectation of every single American, including pension reform, and preventing the privatization of social security.

We will dramatically expand support of energy independence in order to generate large numbers of new American jobs and reduce our dependence on foreign oil. We will have a jobs agenda that includes good jobs that stay in America, a higher minimum wage and trade policies that benefit the global labor force, not just multinational corporations.

We will have a defense policy that is tough and smart, starting with phased redeployment of our troops in Iraq, and shore up our efforts to attack al Qaeda and fight the war on terror. We also will close the gaps in our security here at home by implementing the 9/11 Commission recommendations.

We are ready to lead with a thoughtful, fiscally responsible long-term vision. We will reach out to all Americans who value hope over fear and begin moving the country forward again.

Mr. Dean is chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

Good News For Republicans? (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

DOJ_NMG_0067280

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

In Minnesota, Amy Klobuchar looks into the camera and declares: "These days, no matter how hard you work, the price of gas, college and health care is getting out of reach."

The answer, says the Democratic candidate for the U.S. Senate, is to "bring a dose of Minnesota fairness to Washington."

In Ohio, Democrat Sherrod Brown, who is campaigning against Republican Sen. Mike DeWine, says his state's residents "work hard, they love their country, they play by the rules." But their jobs in "cars, steel and appliances" are being pushed overseas by unfair trade agreements.

The maneuvering this month for November's midterm elections is primarily about shaping the priorities that voters will carry with them to their polling places. Behind the speeches and the ads is a subtle war for position, an effort to prepare the ground for the campaign's final weeks.

The obvious battle is over whether voters on Nov. 7 will be thinking more about the violence in Iraq, which pushes them the Democrats' way, or about the broader war on terrorism.

In this skirmish, Republicans can chalk up modest but real gains. The Pew Research Center found that the proportion of voters who listed terrorism as the most important problem facing the country increased from 5 percent in May to 15 percent this month. Significantly, the share of independents who listed terrorism as the key issue rose from 5 percent to 13 percent.

The proportion of all voters listing Iraq as the most important problem went up, too, from 18 percent to 26 percent. Much of the increase was among Democrats -- 36 percent of them said Iraq was the central question. But among independents, there was virtually no change in the importance of Iraq, and the findings were similar for self-described moderates. The relative balance between terrorism and Iraq among less partisan and ideological voters has shifted in the Republicans' direction.

But the question that has received far less attention in Washington is the one joined by Klobuchar and Brown: How will voters see the economy?

Through July and August, Republicans were reeling from voter anger over what GOP pollster David Winston calls "the cost-of-living issue" dramatized every day at the pump. He uses "cost of living" instead of "inflation" because, while the formal inflation rate is relatively low, the costs important to families -- gas, health care and college tuition, as Klobuchar's ad suggests, plus housing -- have been rising.

"Over the summer, we would talk about good economic numbers -- and then people would go to the gas station," Winston says. Now falling gas prices reinforce the Republican message about economic improvement.

The GOP is still in trouble on the economy. The New York Times-CBS News poll published yesterday found that 36 percent of respondents thought the economy was getting worse, compared with 17 percent who saw it getting better.

But this is actually good news for Republicans, considering that in July the same poll found that only 12 percent saw the economy improving while 47 percent saw it declining. And in the Pew survey, the share of voters listing gas prices and the constellation of issues around energy as the country's most important problem fell from 14 percent in May to 7 percent this month.

Are these improvements in the political terrain for Republicans the beginning of a long-term shift, or are they primarily a coming home of Republican-leaning voters who were eventually going to get back to their party anyway?

Republican strategists such as Winston are simply relieved that after a very bad summer, there is at least some movement the GOP's way. Democrats concede Bush's gains in his own party but note that even after the president's recent political push on terrorism, independents are still inclined toward the Democrats. In the race for Congress, the Times-CBS poll gave Democrats a 15-point advantage, while a Los Angeles Times-Bloomberg survey, also published yesterday, put them ahead by 10. A margin of that sort at this point usually signals victory for the party running ahead.

The decisive question is whether Democrats can seize the initiative back from Bush in early October, after the Republican Congress returns home. Democrats plan to marry the themes of national and economic security -- think of their economic platform as a dose of Klobuchar and a dash of Brown -- and hope that splits among Republicans on torture, which were resolved only yesterday, will dampen GOP gains from the resurgence of the terrorism issue.

The paradox is that the survival chances of a Republican Party led by a former oilman from Texas will depend in large part on whether gas prices keep falling.

DOJ_NMG_0067281

Americans Upbeat About Economic Forecast (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

Americans have become more optimistic about the economy and they are giving President Bush some of the credit, a new Times/Bloomberg poll shows.

Republicans running for election next month could benefit from the development, as voters say the economy will influence their choices in November more than any other national issue, including the war in Iraq and terrorism.

Consumer confidence fell this summer as gas prices peaked and the housing market weakened, particularly in California. Those polled in July were almost evenly split on the state of the economy, with 49% saying the economy was doing badly.

Now, the optimists outnumber the pessimists in the poll by 10 percentage points, with 54% saying the economy is doing well.

"There's a lot of conflicting indicators but things seem to be cruising along pretty steadily," said respondent David Busch, 38, a sales executive in Redmond, Wash., who describes himself as an independent voter. "We've seen a lot of alarmist talk about housing bubbles bursting, gas prices that are going to derail the economy that haven't materialized."

Seven weeks before the midterm elections, the economy remains voters' primary focus. Among registered voters, 32% listed the economy and jobs as the most important election issue, followed by the war in Iraq (21%), immigration (17%) and healthcare (10%).

Those polled cited a variety of reasons for feeling better about the economy, including unemployment at a low 4.7% nationally, lower gas prices this month and an interest rate freeze by the Federal Reserve.

That could be good news for Republican candidates, as the GOP is the party in power in Washington and may be able to take some credit for the economy.

When the economy is rocky, voters traditionally punish the party in power, said Bruce Oppenheimer, a political science professor at Vanderbilt University. But when the economy is doing well, their reactions are more difficult to predict, he added.

"This year it's a little more complex to figure because it's clear that the objective measures of how the economy is doing are not striking everybody equally," Oppenheimer said.

For instance, pay is rising for some college-educated professionals, but most workers face wage stagnation, he said. While falling gas prices could boost Republican candidates, he said, "The question is will it be too little too late?"

The Times/Bloomberg poll interviewed 1,517 adults, including 1,347 registered voters, nationwide between Saturday and Tuesday under the supervision of Times Poll Director Susan Pinkus. The survey's margin of sampling error is plus or minus three percentage points.

Although the survey shows more than half of registered voters still disapprove of the way Bush is handling the economy, the ranks of those who approve are increasing. Among registered voters polled, 43% said they approve of the president's handling of the economy, up from 38% in July and a January low of 37%.

"Everything seems to be going all right. I don't hear a lot of people complaining that much about the economy. The Feds have kept the interest rates down, so that will probably help," said Chester "Chet" Kusmitch, 69, a retired union carpenter in Crystal Falls, Mich.

Kusmitch said the president is doing a good job handling the economy. "You can't blame everything on the president for crying out loud. A lot of things effect the economy."

Charles Gunnells, 54, a disabled diesel mechanic and registered Republican in Salyersville, Ky., said he has his doubts about the economy, but believes the president is doing "about as good a job as anybody else could be doing."

Gunnells said his opinion of the president improved in recent weeks as he watched prices at the gas pump drop. "I feel a lot better about it when I see the prices go down," Gunnells said.

Many of those polled agree with him — 26% said high oil prices are the greatest threat to the economy today, far ahead of other factors such as foreign competition (18%) and terrorism (16%).

DOJ_NMG_0067282

The average price of gas rose to $3.08 in August before dropping to $2.54 this week, according to the Department of Energy. The dip in oil and gas prices is increasing most Americans' confidence in the economy, said Chuck Williams, dean of the business school at the University of the Pacific in Stockton.

"People see the economy in terms of their daily expenses — what is it going to cost to pick up their child from day care, what does it cost to buy lunch, what does it cost to fill the tank of their car. And if someone's driving an SUV and it's 100 bucks every time you fill up, that gets your attention," Williams said. "If the price is down by 50 cents a gallon, you notice it."

He said consumers' optimism is tempered by uncertainty about fuel prices as winter approaches and by a weakening housing market on both coasts. Homes are lingering on the market in Phoenix, Philadelphia and Washington D.C., and fewer new homes are being built. Last month, new home starts were down nearly 20% since last year, 6% since July, according to a Commerce Department report Tuesday.

In the latest poll, 53% of respondents expect home prices to remain unchanged six months from now and 19% expect prices to drop. Both numbers are up four percentage points since July. A quarter of those earning $60,000 to $100,000 worry that their home will lose value during the next six months, the poll showed.

"Six or twelve months ago, pretty much everybody thought housing prices were going to go up," said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist at PNC Financial Services Group in Pittsburgh. "Clearly, people have changed their expectations. A little bit of reality has set in."

Donna Bushby, 41, a part-time office worker, said she's getting nervous about the cost of heating her home this winter in the Chicago suburb of Elmwood Park. She and her husband, a truck driver for United Parcel Service, also worry about the value of their home. Six houses on their street are not selling and one has been on the market for a year and a half.

The couple earn enough to cover expenses for a family of five but not to save, Bushby said, and consider home equity as savings. "So if you think of your house going down, that's like your nest egg going down."

Many Americans appear to be stretching to make ends meet around the house. More than half of those polled, 53%, said they have trouble keeping up with rising costs, including 30% of those earning more than $100,000.

"People's paychecks are not going up as much as the prices around us," said Bushby, who is nonetheless optimistic. "Hopefully, it's temporary."

Geoffrey Gray Sr., 56, is a registered Republican but believes the president has mismanaged the economy and worries about the future. Although Gray's house in Reading, Pa. is paid for and the local market isn't likely to collapse, he worries about poor families and "the shrinking middle class."

"People are living paycheck to paycheck," he said.

Many of those polled, especially working-class Americans, are postponing major purchases such as cars, vacations and large appliances, unsure about their finances. Of those polled, 64% said now is not a good time to make major purchases — including 81% of those earning less than $40,000, 66% of those earning $40,000 to $60,000.

"If I do make a big purchase," said Bushby, "it may be a hybrid car."

Drug Imports From Canada Set To Be Eased (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, September 22, 2006

House Republicans tentatively agreed Thursday to prohibit Customs agents from seizing prescription drugs that Americans buy in Canada and bring back into the United States.

The deal would let Americans carry up to a 90-day supply of medication back to the U.S. from Canada without being stopped by Customs agents, House and Senate Republicans said. But it would not let Americans purchase cheaper prescriptions over the Internet or by mail-order, officials said.

"This really breaks the dam, and it shows that it's only a matter of time before we pass a full-blown reimportation bill," said Sen. David Vitter, R-La., who led the fight in the Senate to prohibit the Homeland Security Department from seizing prescription drugs being carried over the border. U.S. Customs and Border Protection is an arm of the Homeland Security Department.

DOJ_NMG_0067283

Vitter acknowledged that sales of drugs though mail order or through the Internet is significant. But, he added, "I think support for that is going to continue, and going to continue to grow, no matter what this bill says or doesn't say."

Both Presidents Bush and Clinton have rejected repeated congressional efforts to lift the ban on prescription imports. Medications are generally cheaper in Canada because of government price controls.

While importing drugs into the United States is illegal, the Food and Drug Administration generally has not stopped small amounts of medicine purchased for personal use. But Customs officials began intercepting imported controlled substances two years ago and prescription drugs since last November. Since then, Customs and Border Protection agents have seized more than 34,000 packages of drugs coming into the country.

The pre-election controversy over the new rule threatened to split House GOP leadership who oppose lifting the import ban and rank-and-file Republican lawmakers who want to help elderly voters buy cheaper drugs.

However, many Customs agents already allow prescription drugs into the U.S. from Canada because they don't rigorously search people and cars for them.

Democrats who pushed for broader access to imported drugs accused Republicans of trying to "blow smoke to the voters about cheaper prescription prices when it really doesn't do much of anything," said Dan McLaughlin, spokesman for Sen. Bill Nelson, D-Fla. Earlier this year, Nelson sponsored legislation to prevent Customs agents from seizing mailed medication after he began getting complaints from seniors in his state.

"I think you could call this agreement in the House a very small advance and certainly we'll take it, but it's no place that we can stop and certainly isn't enough to be satisfied with," McLaughlin said. "It really doesn't help very many people."

Opponents said importing drugs that do not have FDA approval could be unsafe for consumers. The FDA says it cannot guarantee the safety of imported drugs.

Representatives for the pharmaceutical industry said Canadian Internet pharmacies, for example, have been known to sell fake and potentially unsafe medicines to unknowing American consumers through other countries.

"Americans should look at much safer alternatives that already exist and are proving to be incredibly effective here at home," said Ken Johnson, senior vice president for the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, or PhRMA.

According to the Congressional Budget Office, brand-name drugs cost, on average, 35 to 55 percent less in other industrialized nations than they do in the United States. Supporters of importing drugs contend that the U.S. is subsidizing the cost of medicine for the rest of the world.

The prescription drug policy shift would be included in a $33.7 billion bill to fund the Homeland Security Department next year. Lawmakers who control the department's spending levels will meet Monday to debate other last-minute changes to the legislation, which has also been stymied by proposals to give Homeland Security regulatory oversight of security measures at chemical plants.

Lawmakers were negotiating whether to let the department require some high-risk chemical facilities to use nontoxic materials that would be more expensive but safer to the public if there is a release. The chemical industry strongly opposes such a requirement, and environmentalists have been pushing for it just as vociferously.

___

Associated Press writer Kevin Freking contributed to this report.

Savings, Shakeup Seen In $4 Drug Plan (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, September 22, 2006

Wal-Mart Stores' move to offer some generic drugs for $4 a prescription could save modest amounts for some consumers. It may also draw more customers to its stores or prompt a price war with other pharmacies.

Wal-Mart, the nation's third-largest seller of prescription drugs, said Thursday that it will offer the $4 price on about 150 generic drugs to the insured and uninsured alike, starting immediately in the Tampa area. It will take the program statewide by January.

DOJ_NMG_0067284

"We intend to take it nationwide next year," says Bill Simon, Wal-Mart's executive vice president of the Professional Services Division. For uninsured consumers, the $4 price for some generics is below what they would pay at most pharmacy counters and is less than typical $10 to $15 co-payments on generics offered by many insurance plans.

Savings could be less than $1 per prescription to more than $20, depending on the drug and pharmacy where customers shop, according to information from Wal-Mart and prices of other retailers posted at MyFloridarx.com, a state-run website.

That could draw more customers to Wal-Mart, already the largest seller of groceries and toys, possibly forcing other chain drugstores to cut their prices, says Ed Kaplan of the Segal Co., a benefits consulting firm.

"Customers who take five or seven medications a month and can save $10 on each, might switch," Kaplan says.

The move caused share prices for generic drug and pharmacy companies to drop Thursday.

Wal-Mart says the price of $4 for a 30-day supply price would save customers $7.98 a month for blood-pressure drug lisinopril, $3.85 for diabetes drug metformin and 80 cents for blood-pressure drug atenolol.

Simon says the $4 generics are not expected to be a "loss leader," meaning Wal-Mart doesn't expect to lose money on the drugs in hopes of attracting more customers to buy other products.

That's because the drugs offered are longtime generics that have multiple manufacturers and that are already inexpensive on the wholesale market. Large companies such as Wal-Mart can often purchase them in bulk for less than the $4 cost.

Wal-Mart said 291 drugs will be covered, a total that includes different dosage strengths of the same drugs. When the differing dosage strengths are taken out, the list includes fewer than 150 products, including treatments for high blood pressure, infection and diabetes, along with some vitamins and painkiller ibuprofen. That's a fraction of the estimated 2,100 generic products available.

"This is a much narrower list than they're giving the impression it is," says drug-industry expert Stephen Schondelmeyer at the University of Minnesota.

Simon says the drugs chosen for the list represent 20% of the prescriptions Wal-Mart currently fills and cover a wide range of medical needs. More products may be added, he says.

The move comes as Wal-Mart works to counter critics who say the chain doesn't make health insurance affordable for many of its workers.

"Providing low-cost drugs is a good thing. But not providing affordable health care to workers is not a good thing. Why can't Wal-Mart address the serious health care crisis in its own stores?" asks Chris Kofinis, of WakeUp Walmart.com.

Some praised Wal-Mart's move.

"That's a great price for a 30-day supply of drugs and will be a tremendous boon for seniors," says Devon Herrick, economist at the National Center for Policy Analysis.

Wal-Mart Cuts Prices For Many Generic Drugs To $4 (WSJ)

By Gary Mcwilliams And Barbara Martinez

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Wal-Mart Stores Inc., long attacked by some critics for its employee health-care benefits, waded into the nation's health-care debate and its rivals' pharmacy businesses by promising to cut the price of some of its generic drugs to $4 for a 30-day supply.

The Bentonville, Ark. retailer said it will use its purchasing and distribution prowess to offer versions of about 150 different generic drugs, such as the antibiotic tetracycline, at prices on average 20% below its existing ones. The drugs are mostly older medications; the company said it plans to add more popular drugs later on. Wal-Mart implemented the price policy yesterday at 65 stores in the Tampa, Fla. area, and early next year will expand it to about 170 other Florida stores before taking the policy nationwide later next year.

The savings on some drugs will be considerable compared to rival pharmacies. For example, under the new plan, Wal-Mart will charge $4 for 850 milligrams of the diabetes treatment metformin, compared with $17.72 at other Florida stores and $28.19 at Walgreen.

DOJ_NMG_0067285

Richard Hastings, senior analyst at Bernand Sands, tells5 CNBC that even Wal-Mart's incremental moves like a $4 prescription price will have a profound effect on the competition and the economy in general.

On other drugs, however, Wal-Mart's new price still isn't below the competition. Wal-Mart's new price for the popular blood-pressure medicine atenolol is $4 for 30 pills, down from $8.62. Costco Wholesale Corp. lists a price of $3.69 for 30 pills on its Web site.

Wal-Mart's move drew praise from doctors and health-care experts but mostly shrugs from rivals who dismissed it as a publicity move. For now, the price cuts will apply to fewer than 300 formulations of 150 drugs, a fraction of the roughly 2,000 generic drugs sold in most pharmacies. The reductions are unlikely to be costly to Wal-Mart, which along with other retailers already buys many of these drugs at "pennies per pill or less," said Elliot Wilbur, a generics-industry analyst at CIBC World Markets.

Wal-Mart cast the change as a boost to the nation's uninsured and a savings even for those with health insurance. The pricing "aims to provide access and affordable health care to our customers and associates," said Bill Simon, a Wal-Mart executive vice president. Wal-Mart plans to add generic versions of widely used drugs such as cholesterol-lowering Zocor, at lower-than-existing prices "at some point in the not too distant future," he said.

If it does extend the price cuts to more popular generic drugs, Wal-Mart will put pressure on other retail pharmacies and generic drug makers to reduce their margins too, just as it has in groceries and toys, said Tim van Biesen, a Bain & Co. partner and generic-drug industry expert. "Typically when they start down this path, they don't stop," he said.

The stocks of generic-drug makers and drug-store chains tumbled yesterday as investors weighed the potential inroads of Wal-Mart on the business. In 4 p.m. trading on the New York Stock Exchange, shares of CVS were off 8%, or $2.96, at $32.47, while Walgreen Co. fell 7% or $3.67. Wal-Mart shares were off just 41 cents at $48.46.

Wal-Mart's new plan could also put pressure on big pharmacy-benefit managers, or PBMs, who administer the drug benefits for many employers and health plans and who operate their own mail-order pharmacies that compete with retail pharmacies. Like retail pharmacies, PBMs make much of their profits from the big margins on generic drugs they sell through the mail.

Bain & Co.'s Mr. van Biesen said because generic drugs carry a higher profit margin at retail than branded drugs, Wal-Mart can clip its profit on the drugs and use any increased store traffic to sell more profitable non-generic items. "It was frankly just a matter of time before someone decided to chip away at the generic-drug distribution system," he said.

He said even an expanded roster of drugs would have little impact on the nation's overall health-care costs, however. Pharmaceuticals account for just 15% of all U.S. spending on health care and generics are a fraction of all pharmaceutical revenues. "What it does is provide access to the uninsured and [Wal-Mart's] own employee base," he said.

The announcement yesterday drew politicians to a Tampa Wal-Mart where Florida Gov. Jeb Bush praised the local price drop as "good corporate citizenship," and U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson lauded it as "a pretty darn good deal for consumers."

Critics called the effort "marketing spin" and pointed to what they characterized as Wal-Mart's less-than-generous employee health-care policies, in which employees bear a big share of the costs. Partly as a result, many Wal-Mart workers don't even sign up for insurance.

WakeUpWalMart, a group financed by the United Food and Commercial Workers union that aims to force the company to change its labor policies, said in a statement: "Wal-Mart cruelly ignores the fact that it fails to provide company health care to over half (775,000) of its employees."

Wal-Mart's Mr. Simon rejected any characterizations of the pricing cuts as a marketing ploy. Mr. Simon insisted a standard pricing for common generic drugs wasn't about legislative issues, or attacks on its wage, environmental and employee health insurance policies. "We're certainly hopeful this is a positive business move ... as well as a significant social benefit," he said.Wal-Mart expects to slowly implement the price changes at its more than 3,000 stores nationwide, citing the need to hire additional pharmacists, and strike agreements with additional generic drug makers. Mr. Simon declined to disclose what impact, if any, the company expects on profits at its about $20 billion a year pharmaceuticals business, or its generic-drug market share.

DOJ_NMG_0067286

Pharmacy chains dismissed Wal-Mart's initial effort and said it would offer little competition. "A lot of the medications are very old generics," said Walgreen spokesman Michael Polzin. "I don't think the price change for a lot of these is that much." Mr. Polzin said Walgreen plans no pricing changes in response.

Almost 95% of Walgreen's prescriptions are covered by insurance, with the remainder covered by cash payments, Mr. Polzin said. The savings from a typical $5 co-payment "is not enough of a difference," to cause customers to change pharmacies, Mr. Polzin said. "Our convenience and locations have proven over the years to have a bigger effect on behavior."

Richard Hastings, senior retail analyst at Bernard Sands LLC, said those companies likely to be hurt would be "smaller prescription drug buyers, including certain supermarket chains that offer pharmacy services." In a research note, he wrote that those companies "will see some margin erosion if they are forced to compete on price."

Wal-Mart Sets $4 Price For Many Generic Drugs (WP)

By Kathleen Day

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

Retailing giant Wal-Mart Stores Inc., known for forcing prices down to dominate nearly every market it enters, said yesterday that it would sell nearly 300 generic drugs for $4 per prescription, whether or not a customer has insurance.

Using its might as the nation's largest retailer and its legendary ability to force suppliers to cut prices to the bone, the company will begin the $4 price program in its 65 stores in the Tampa area today, in all of Florida in January, and in as many other states as possible by the end of 2007. The $4 is for a typical monthly supply of medicine, and included on the Wal-Mart list are generic versions of many popular prescription drugs, including the antibiotic amoxicillin and the heart and blood-pressure treatment lisinopril, sold under the brand names Prinivil and Zestril.

Health-care industry analysts said the program has the potential to transform the $230 billion prescription-drug business the way Wal-Mart has transformed other industries, including groceries and toys, where its aggressive pricing has forced some competitors out of business and allowed it to dominate entire categories of merchandise.

Health-care costs rose an average of 9.6 percent a year from 2000 to 2004, and a large component of the increase was the price of drugs, which rose an average of 11.4 percent a year in that time. Inflation during that period was around 2.6 percent a year. Though the increase in drug prices has been slowing in recent years, largely because of the wider use of generics, it has still outpaced inflation, health-care analysts and industry trade groups say.

Wal-Mart executives, criticized by labor unions and consumer groups that say the company shortchanges its employees on pay and health care, said they started the program to help families and retirees, especially those on Medicare. They said at news conferences and in telephone calls yesterday that they see these groups struggling daily at the company's pharmacies to pay for medicine.

"This $4 program represents real savings for working families," said William S. Simon, executive vice president for professional services at Wal-Mart. "Wal-Mart's taking this step so that our customers and associates can get the medicines they need at prices they can afford. . . . Customers tell us all the time that prescription-drug costs are forcing them to make tough decisions."

Generic drugs have the same active ingredients as their brand-name counterparts but are much cheaper. Last year, they accounted for 56 percent of all prescriptions filled in the United States but only about 10 percent of total prescription-drug sales.

Wal-Mart spokesman David Tovar said the company will make money on the sales but will not disclose whether it negotiated with drugmakers, wholesale suppliers or both to make the deal profitable. "It is not a loss leader. It is something we intend to make a profit on," he said. "The way we do that is through our logistics and our technology."

Some top-selling generics are not on the list of drugs Wal-Mart will offer for $4, including the painkiller hydrocodone -- whose trade name is Vicodin -- and generic forms of the painkiller Darvon and the anti-anxiety drug Xanax. But many are.

While Wal-Mart is likely to continue to profit from generic sales, the company would not say how much the $4-per-prescription program will reduce its earnings. Some of the reductions appear to be substantial. A Wal-Mart in Alexandria, for example, was selling 30 tablets of lisinopril for $20.72.

DOJ_NMG_0067287

Analysts said the company was probably gambling that the lost revenue from lower-priced drugs will be offset by increased traffic in its stores.

Gary Claxton of the Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation said pharmacies are always placed at the back of stores in the hope customers will pick up other merchandise along the way to get their prescriptions. Wal-Mart probably hopes to benefit in overall sales, but also in drug sales because customers bringing in generic prescriptions are likely to fill their brand-name prescriptions, too, he said.

Wal-Mart's announcement roiled the retail drug industry. Shares of Walgreen Co. and CVS Corp., two large drugstore companies, fell more than 7 percent and 8 percent, respectively.

According to the Generic Pharmaceutical Association, 8,400 of the 11,167 drugs listed by the Food and Drug Administration are sold generically. The average price of a 30-day supply of a generic prescription drug was $28.71 in 2004, compared with the average price of a brand-name version at $95.54. The Congressional Budget Office has estimated that generic drugs save consumers $8 billion to $10 billion a year.

Mark McClellan, administrator of the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said he did not think the Wal-Mart offer would siphon beneficiaries from the Medicare drug benefit, known as Part D. "Remember that the drug plans in Medicare already provide excellent coverage for generics," he said. "Many of the plans have generics for a dollar or two, or even free."

What the Wal-Mart plan does provide, he said, is a way for Medicare recipients to save more money after they reach the "doughnut hole." That's the point at which an individual's yearly drug cost reaches $2,250, and Medicare ends its subsidy. After that, a beneficiary has to pay $3,600 out of pocket before government subsidies kick in again.

In that interval, or gap, the Wal-Mart program could result in significant savings, given that the average Medicare beneficiary is expected to spend about $3,081 on prescription drugs this year, McClellan said.

Tovar, the Wal-Mart spokesman, said that the $4 price is available to anyone, but that Wal-Mart will try to collect insurance on prescriptions for people with prescription-drug coverage. However, some insurance contracts stipulate that pharmacies will not be paid the full cost of a drug unless customers pay the full co-payment the insurer requires.

Tovar said Wal-Mart will still allow insured customers to pay $4 per prescription, even if that is less than the co-payment required and even if that means Wal-Mart will not be paid any money by insurance companies.

Mohit Ghose, a spokesman for America's Health Insurance Plans, which represents providers of insurance of all types, including for prescription-drug coverage, said the typical co-payment for a generic prescription is $5 to $15. He said it is unclear how the Wal-Mart plan will affect insurance coverage.

Staff writers Ylan Q. Mui and Christopher Lee contributed to this report.

Wal-Mart To Offer Discount On Drugs (WT)

By Gregory Lopes

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

Retail giant Wal-Mart said yesterday it will start selling nearly 300 generic drugs at a steep discount in Florida with the hope of expanding the discounted drug prices nationwide next year.

The move to charge $4 for 291 generic drugs in Tampa starting today puts pressure on its competitors, although other retailers said yesterday they do not currently plan to follow suit.

"At this time, $4 is not enough to drive a change in individual behavior," said Walgreens spokesman Michael Polzin. "A large percentage of our customers are insured with copayments between $5 and $6, so this will not have a big impact."

Rite Aid, which has 87 stores in the Washington area, does not plan to lower generic drug prices, said spokeswoman Jody Cook.

CVS, which has the most pharmacies in the Washington area of any of drugstore chain, did not return calls for comment.

Shares of CVS Corp. fell the most in almost five years, declining $2.96, or 8.4 percent, to $32.47 yesterday on the New York Stock Exchange. Rite Aid Corp. declined 5 percent and Walgreen Co. dropped 7.4 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0067288

Consumers are increasingly using generics, which often are made by multiple companies after the original patent on a drug expires. The average monthly cost for a generic drug prescription is $28.74, according to the National Association of Chain Drug Stores, compared with $96.01 for branded drugs.

Generic drug sales are an important part of pharmacies' business because they bring in higher profits than brand-name drugs. Pharmacies pay less for generic drugs because drug manufacturers must compete against each another for the pharmacies' business.

Independent pharmacies, unlike large drugstore chains, are not able to afford reducing the cost of drugs, they said.

"You have to be able to cover costs," Leo Mallard, who operates Calvert-Arundel CARE Pharmacy in Owings, Md. "We would maybe match those prices as long as we are not losing money and not infringing on contracts with insurers."

Said Rebecca Snead, executive director of the Virginia Pharmacists Association: "Independent pharmacies cannot sell generics at that price."

Gerson Serody, chief executive officer of CARE Pharmacies, an Arlington organization representing 60 independent pharmacies in the Washington area, left the door open for change.

"I am analyzing it to see how it shakes out. It is possible that we may have a list of generics that consumers can get for $4 ," Mr. Serody said.

The Generic Pharmaceutical Association, a trade association, said generic medicines account for 56 percent of all prescriptions dispensed in the United States, but 13 percent of all money spent on prescription drugs.

After the announcement, critics pounced on Wal-Mart, claiming the world's largest retailer will use the low-priced drugs to entice shoppers to buy other Wal-Mart products, a business tactic known as "loss leading."

But Wal-Mart spokesman David Tovar dismissed that claim.

"This program is not a loss leader for us," Mr. Tovar said. "It will be a profit creator for us."

Mr. Tovar said Wal-Mart will not charge a sign-up fee to participate in the program and consumers will not have to pay premiums or deductibles to get the $4 drugs. Wal-Mart has 19 stores in the Washington area.

The number of drugs being sold at the discount is low compared with the overall number of generic drugs Wal-Mart stocks. A company spokesman said Wal-Mart dispenses "thousands" of generic drugs but did not provide an exact number.

The drugs included in the program are widely prescribed and, for the most part, not expensive. For instance, the popular high blood pressure generic medications furosemide and hydrochlorothiazide sell for close to $4 already, pharmacists said.

But Bill Simon, executive vice president of the company's Professional Services Division, said buying a 30-day supply of the diabetes drug Metformin for $4, is nearly 50 percent cheaper than the brand-name version.

Relief For Some But Maybe Not Many In Wal-Mart Plan For $4 Generic Drugs (NYT)

By Michael Barbaro And Reed Abelson

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

At first glance, Wal-Mart's plan to sharply cut the cost of generic drugs, to $4, seems like a signal event in American health care. It could make scores of treatments affordable to the uninsured, reduce the burden on Medicaid and bring competitive pricing to the pharmacy industry.

Even company critics have praised the plan, conceding that it represents a case of the giant retailer using its size and ability to wring out costs to improve the lives of regular Americans.

But a close examination of the program, with details confirmed by the company yesterday, suggests that its impact could be blunted by several factors.

The plan, which is said to cover 300 drugs, includes only about 124 separate medicines in various dosages, like 12 versions of the popular antibiotic amoxicillin. It leaves out some popular drugs altogether, like the generic version of the cholesterol-lowering treatment Zocor.

And while uninsured people should benefit from the program, those with insurance may save only a dollar or so, making a trip to Wal-Mart not worth their while, analysts said. In Florida, where the program will have its debut, most people on Medicaid pay nothing and may have little incentive to shop around for cheaper prescription drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0067289

"It is not as significant as it first seems, in our opinion," said Joseph Agnese, an analyst at Standard & Poor's, who expressed surprise at investors' reaction to the Wal-Mart announcement, which sent shares of its competitors CVS and Walgreen down sharply yesterday.

As it has for dozens of consumer products, Wal-Mart reduced prices of generic prescription drugs by attacking the few remaining pockets of inefficiency in its operations. For example, it cut out third-party distributors that stood between the chain and drug manufacturers.

"There is a huge profit margin in the generics" for the middlemen like pharmacy benefit managers, the distributors and the pharmacies themselves, said Patricia Wilson of Associates & Wilson, a Rosemont, Pa., health care consulting firm. Wal-Mart appears to be taking some of those profits from the traditional middlemen to lower the prices it is charging for these generic drugs.

The company also introduced rapid, automated machines into its pharmacy distribution centers that had long relied on workers to fill orders. In doing so, Wal-Mart reduced the amount of time that costly drugs sat in warehouses, rather than on store shelves where they could create revenue. "It is not glamorous," said Bill Simon, an executive vice president at Wal-Mart. "It's pennies at a time."

Wal-Mart said that by covering one-fifth of the generic drugs it prescribes at its more than 3,000 United States pharmacies, the new program would make it possible for thousands of people to buy drugs they either cannot afford or currently ration, sometimes by cutting pills in half, to cut costs.

Under the plan, which will begin in the Tampa, Fla., area — and the company says will eventually expand to the rest of the country beginning next year — the $4 fee charged by Wal-Mart will be paid by a combination of consumers, insurance companies and the federal government, depending on a person's health coverage. On average, generic drugs are now sold at retail for $10 to $30 for a 30-day supply.

An insured customer will not pay more than $4, no matter what the co-payment is, the company said. Wal-Mart would bill the insurer for the difference if the co-payment was below $4. Customers whose co-payment is above $4 are unlikely to use insurance, but pay for the drug out of pocket. Where required, Medicaid users would still pay a small co-payment for a prescription drug, with the government billed the balance. In the past, Wal-Mart might have billed the government significantly more than $4 for a generic drug. "It's a tremendous savings for state Medicaid," said Mr. Simon, the Wal-Mart executive.

But Christa Calamas, secretary of the Florida Agency for Health Care Administration, said the state would probably save money only on those Medicaid consumers who already fill prescriptions at Wal-Mart. Since most Florida Medicaid users pay nothing for their prescriptions, they are likely to choose convenient pharmacy locations over lower prices, experts said.

Wal-Mart said it would not lose money on the low-cost generic drugs — and, in fact, several industry analysts predicted the company's pharmacy business would benefit from the new plan. Unlike CVS or Walgreen, which rely on prescription sales for most of their revenues, Wal-Mart's pharmacy business represents less than 10 percent of its total revenue and the company has identified it as an area that needs improvement.

By luring customers of all incomes into the store at least once a month to fill generic drug prescriptions, Wal-Mart could increase overall pharmacy and store sales, these analysts said.

Health care analysts were quick to point out that Wal-Mart has carefully chosen which drugs it will cover — 300 out of roughly 11,000 generic drugs available. Moreover, it is not offering some expensive drugs, like any of the cholesterol-lowering statins, at the $4 price. And some of the drugs covered, like generic ibuprofen, cost very little and may be currently available for less than $4. "They are not losing money on all these products," said Ms. Wilson, the health care consultant.

But she praised Wal-Mart for bringing attention to the cost savings available from generic drugs, which are significantly less expensive than their branded counterparts. Wal-Mart could also introduce much greater competition to the marketplace by pushing the concept of discounts into what has traditionally been an inefficient market. "People will begin to compare prices," she said.

Wal-Mart has come under fierce attack for its employee health benefits; critics contend the benefits are too costly, given the typical Wal-Mart worker's wages, and frequently force employees to rely on state programs or forgo coverage altogether. With the lower generic drug prices, which apply to its workers as well as customers, the company appears to be trying to address those concerns.

DOJ_NMG_0067290

Still, critics say this plan does little to confront the high costs of health care for the uninsured, including Wal-Mart employees, since they still face the expense of going to a doctor to get a prescription, for example. While the plan is a good first step, "it is clearly as much a public relations effort as a substantive change," said Ron Pollack, the executive director of Families USA, a Washington consumer group that has often criticized Wal-Mart's health care offerings.

Wal-Mart's chief executive, H. Lee Scott Jr., said that "competition and market forces have been absent from our health care system, and that has hurt working families tremendously." The company, he added, is "excited to take the lead in doing what we do best — driving costs out of the system — and passing those savings to our customers and associates," as Wal-Mart refers to its employees.

'We're OK,' Despite Drop In Factory Activity (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh And Adam Shell

USA Today, September 22, 2006

Economic jitters grew Thursday after a report showing a decline in factory activity in part of the USA became the latest piece of data to suggest the slowdown in the economy may be sharper than initially thought.

But although the economic fears sparked a sell-off on Wall Street, some economists said it is too early to panic.

"I don't see broad enough signs to indicate that the economy is really grinding to a halt," PNC Financial Services chief economist Stuart Hoffman says.

Manufacturing activity — which includes production, jobs and orders — in the Philadelphia area fell in September, the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia said. The Fed bank's index of conditions in the area, considered representative of U.S. factories, fell to -0.4 this month from an 18.5 reading in August.

Numbers below zero point to a decline in activity, while those above suggest growth. It was the first time the index was below zero since April 2003, when the start of the Iraq war shook business and consumer confidence. Orders and shipments and expectations of activity six months from now all deteriorated this month, the Philadelphia Fed said.

Wall Street reacted negatively. The Dow Jones industrial average fell 79.96 points to 11,533.23, derailing its run at a record high. The blue-chip index is now 189.75 points away from its 2000 peak.

"The Philly Fed report is a harbinger of things to come," says Stuart Schweitzer, global markets strategist at JPMorgan Asset & Wealth Management. "The developing slowdown may have further to go."

A rally in the bond market confirmed stock investors' fears, as the yield on the 10-year Treasury note, which moves in the opposite direction from prices, fell to 4.64%, its lowest since March 2. Investors tend to seek the safety of bonds when the economic outlook dims, pushing bond prices up and yields down.

Other recent data, particularly reports on housing, have come in much softer than expected, adding to economic jitters.

But Putnam chief economist David Kelly says the economy has a number of things going for it: Commercial construction is picking up, helping to absorb workers losing their housing jobs; the global economy is expanding strongly, providing a boost to U.S. exports; and falling energy prices are giving consumers and businesses more money to spend in other parts of the economy.

Such positives will keep the economy growing and out of recession territory, he says.

"We're OK," Kelly says.

Philadelphia Fed Posts Sharp Drop In Output Gauge (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-morales And Michael S. Derby

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

An index designed to measure manufacturing activity in the Mid-Atlantic states plunged in September, upsetting financial markets and raising concerns that the slowing housing market could be sapping the economy's strength at a faster pace than previously thought.

DOJ_NMG_0067291

The Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia said that its business conditions index, a gauge of the regional manufacturing sector's health, fell to a reading of negative 0.4 in September, compared with 18.5 in August. The September reading was the first negative reading since April 2003. Economists had expected the index to register 15 in September. Negative readings denote contraction.

The change in the Philadelphia index was so striking that financial markets reacted swiftly. Stock prices and the dollar sank while bond prices -- which tend to benefit from negative economic news -- rallied. The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell more than 50 points following the noon release of the report and ended the day at 11533.23, down 79.96, or 0.69%.

The Philadelphia index's weak showing "could mark the first real hard evidence that the infection from the [national] housing slump is spreading into a broader economic malaise," said Richard Iley, a senior U.S. economist with BNP Paribas in New York.

The Philadelphia Fed report is widely viewed as a proxy for national manufacturing trends, and as such its decline raises questions about the health of the broader factory sector. "Generally, the Philly data [report] has the best correlation with industrial production of all the regional indexes, so [it] needs to be treated seriously," said Alan Ruskin, a strategist with RBS Greenwich in Greenwich, Conn.

The report covers business conditions in eastern Pennsylvania, southern New Jersey, and Delaware.

Meanwhile, The Conference Board issued a separate economic report that also signaled the economy is headed toward slower growth for the remainder of the year. It reported that its composite index of leading indicators -- which attempts to forecast economic activity as much as six months into the future -- fell 0.2% in August to a reading of 137.6, following the same decline in July. The Conference Board, a nonprofit business research group, noted that the leading index has now fallen in five of the last eight months. Three of the 10 factors making up the leading index rose in August, led by stock prices and money supply. The biggest negatives were consumer expectations and building permits.

"The economy is going to remain slow" and it's likely there will be "continued modest growth this autumn" and beyond, said Ken Goldstein, a Conference Board economist. The economy, as measured by changes in inflation-adjusted gross domestic product, grew at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 5.6% in the first quarter and slowed to 2.9% in the second quarter. The consensus estimate of economists surveyed last month by The Wall Street Journal Online calls for annualized growth to slow slightly further to 2.8% during the third quarter, which ends this month. The Bureau of Economic Analysis is scheduled to release an estimate of third-quarter GDP on Oct. 27.

Separately, the Labor Department reported that initial jobless claims increased a seasonally adjusted 7,000 to 318,000 in the week ending Sept. 16. The four-week moving average of new claims, which economists use to gauge underlying labor-market trends, was unchanged at 315,000.

Write to Rafael Gerena-Morales at rafael.gerena@wsj.com3 and Michael S. Derby at michael.derby@dowjones.com4

Investors Finally Break From Calm; Dow Drops 79.96 (WSJ)

By Michael Hudson And Serena Ng

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Investors had been taking bad news in stride lately -- big troubles at a large hedge fund, political turmoil in Thailand and Hungary, a weakening U.S. housing market -- as they pushed the Dow Jones Industrial Average near a record high.

A semiobscure economic report changed that yesterday.

The Dow fell 79.96 points, or 0.69%, to 11533.23, its largest one-day decline since early August. At one point yesterday afternoon it was down more than 100 points but rallied late in the day. The tech-stock-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index dropped 15.14 points, or 0.67%, to 2237.75. The Standard & Poor's 500 index fell 7.15 points, or 0.54%, to 1318.03.

Meanwhile, Treasury bonds, a haven for worried investors, rallied. The benchmark 10-year note rose 23/32, or $7.19 for every $1,000 invested, sending its yield down to 4.644%, the lowest level since mid-March.

The catalyst for the selloff in stocks was a report by the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia, which showed business in Mid-Atlantic states was softer than many investors had anticipated. Though it covers a narrow slice of the economy, the Philadelphia Fed index sometimes grabs the attention of investors because it is one of the earliest reads available on monthly economic activity.

DOJ_NMG_0067292

"The soft Philly Fed numbers rocked the market, and there's a bit of a flight to quality into bonds," said Brian Williamson, a stock trader at Boston Company Asset Management.

The market's sharp reaction to the report marked a notable about-face from recent activity. The Dow began the day just 110 points from its record close of 11722.98, set in January 2000. That mark seemed attainable. Meanwhile, an array of risk measurements in the market had been remarkably stable, despite news about huge losses at hedge fund Amaranth Advisors and the military overthrow of Thailand's government.

For instance, the Chicago Board Options Exchange "VIX" index -- which measures how much investors are willing to pay for options that protect them from market volatility -- has declined for much of the month, though it rose yesterday. That is a sign that investors have been calm but might be changing their view.

Bond-market indicators have been sending similar signals. Turmoil abroad often raises the interest rate of debt in other countries relative to the interest rate on U.S. bonds. This difference in interest rates is known in the markets as a "spread" and reflects the risk of these assets compared with Treasurys. Despite Tuesday's coup in Thailand and protests in Hungary, the "spread" on emerging-market bonds has remained relatively stable at less than two percentage points above Treasurys.

The spreads rose to 1.96 percentage points on Thursday, from 1.83 the day before, according to a Merrill Lynch index.

"A few years back, this would be just the kind of political risk that would have driven investors out of the markets entirely," said Raja Visweswaran, a credit strategist at Bank of America in London. The lack of a "contagion" effect from events in Russia, Thailand and Hungary, he said, shows how emerging markets have matured.

In the junk-bond market, the riskiest slice of the corporate-bond world, spreads were at 3.48 percentage points over Treasurys, up from 3.33 percentage points last week but down from 3.73 percentage points at the beginning of the year.

Yesterday's activity suggested that a U.S. economic slowdown could be a bigger obstacle for the markets than these other events.

"That Philadelphia Fed survey took people a bit by surprise and just added to the general air of 'This economy is going down faster than we thought,' " said Standard & Poor's economist David Wyss.

Coupled with a housing market that is also slowing progressively, investors took advantage of the news to take profit on stocks and to move into bonds. Bond traders said expectations are emerging that the Fed, which left interest rates untouched after its policy-making meeting this week, may change course and cut rates as early as the first quarter of 2007.

The latest economic data "points to an economy that is really slowing down, meaning that the Fed may cut rates sooner rather than later," said Rick Klingman, head of Treasury trading at ABN Amro in New York. He said bond investors, "are showing no hesitation in buying now." Yields on most Treasury bills, notes and bonds are well below the current federal-funds rate of 5.25%.

In major market action:

Stocks fell. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.59 billion shares, as 1,374 stocks advanced and 1,944 fell.

Oil prices rose. Futures, which had briefly slipped below $60 a barrel on Wednesday, rose 85 cents, or 1.4%, to $61.59 on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Bond prices gained. The 10-year note rose 23/32, or $7.19 for every $1,000 invested, to yield 4.644%. The 30-year bond rose 1 1/32 to yield 4.780%.

The dollar weakened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 116.31 yen from 117.45 yen. The euro rose to $1.2792 from $1.2687.

Write to Michael Hudson at michael.hudson@wsj.com1 and Serena Ng at serena.ng@wsj.com2

Signs Of Slowing Economy Slam Stocks (USAT/BLOOM)

USA Today, September 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0067293

Stocks fell Thursday, sending the Dow Jones industrial average to its biggest loss in six weeks, as an unexpected decline in a gauge of Philadelphia-area manufacturing suggested economic growth is weakening.

Stocks retreated in afternoon trading after the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia's index shrank for the first time in three years. Earlier, the Conference Board's index of leading indicators showed that an economic slump may extend into next year (story, 1B).

The Dow retreated 79.96 points to 11,533.23, the worst decline since Aug. 9. The Standard & Poor's 500 slid 7.15 points to 1318.03. The Nasdaq composite index slid 15.14 points to 2237.75.

Stocks were within striking distance of setting new highs before the reversal. The Dow now is about 190 points away from a record following oil's decline to $60 a barrel and the Fed's decision Wednesday to leave borrowing costs unchanged for a second month after 17 consecutive increases.

"Investors are beginning to say, 'Holy cow, this is really a slowdown,' " says Barry Ritholtz, chief investment officer of Ritholtz Capital Partners in New York, which manages about $100 million. "That's bad for earnings growth and stocks."

While the Fed didn't clarify whether it will continue to refrain from raising rates after pausing Wednesday, signs the economy is slowing may leave it little choice. The Philadelphia Fed's general economic index declined to minus 0.4 from August's 18.5, which was the highest in 16 months. Readings below zero signal contraction.

"Investors are growing more concerned about the economy than the Fed," Francois Trahan, strategist at Bear, Stearns, wrote in a note released Wednesday.

Americans Remain Sour On Situation In Iraq (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

President Bush's job-approval numbers have rebounded a bit since he made a series of speeches making the case for a strong U.S. role in Iraq. But a new poll from Harris Interactive shows that Americans remain very sour on the war itself and the U.S.'s chances of success -- and remain uncertain over the whether the U.S. was right to go to war in the first place.

Harris found 61% of those polled aren't confident that U.S. policies in Iraq will be successful, vs. 20% who are confident of success. Republicans respondents showed the most confidence in the Iraq effort, with 45% seeing success, compared with 14% of independents and just 6% of Democrats.

Meanwhile, Mr. Bush's job rating on his handling of Iraq runs two-to-one negative overall. But at 64% negative to 32% positive, Mr. Bush has recovered from his ratings in May, when 68% were in the negative column vs. 29% in the positive column. In this series, Mr. Bush's positive rating peaked in April 2003 at 67%.

Harris found 44% believe it was "the wrong thing" to take military action against Iraq, vs. 39% who believe it was the "right thing" to do. However, 17% aren't sure whether it was right or wrong. That compares with 47% in the "wrong" column and 38% in the "right" column and 15% "not sure" in the May Harris survey.

The nationwide survey 2,747 adults was conducted online by Harris Interactive between Sept. 7 and Sept. 13.

Subtle Shift (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Freshman Democratic Rep. Melissa Bean of Illinois is facing the Republican Party machine in her re-election bid. Vice President Dick Cheney and House Speaker Dennis Hastert have headlined money-raising events for her opponent. The National Republican Congressional Committee has budgeted $1.5 million to attack her.

But Ms. Bean has won an unexpected ally with clout to counter the Republican heavyweights: the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. Usually a stalwart of Republicans, the chamber has run about $700,000 in advertisements defending the Democrat and plans to help get out the pro-business vote for her in the fall.

Ms. Bean is among more than a dozen Democrats in key races across the country that the chamber is backing this year. Half of them also have benefited from the chamber's first-ever television ads for Democrats. Partly, the organization is rewarding these Democrats for votes in favor of free trade and other issues it holds dear. It also is sensing possible Republican defeats in congressional elections on Nov. 7, and is hedging its bets by spreading some of the organization's wealth to the other side of the aisle.

DOJ_NMG_0067294

The chamber's move mirrors a subtle but significant shift across the business community, which has begun anticipating that the Republican majorities in Congress could shrink, if not collapse. Washington lobbying firms are balancing their Republican rosters with Democratic hires, and some companies are injecting more bipartisanship in their campaign giving.

According to campaign disclosure reports through June, half of the 10 biggest Republican givers in 2004 are sending a bigger portion of their dollars to Democrats than in past campaigns. In that period, Wal-Mart Stores Inc., of Bentonville, Ark., gave 68% of its donations to Republicans this year, down from 78% over the entire 2004 election cycle. Republican candidates received 64% of the donations from Memphis, Tenn., delivery concern FedEx Corp., compared with 70% over the whole election period two years ago.

The changes also point to an emerging rift between the Republican Party's business and social-conservative constituencies, as their interests clash over some hot-button issues. In Missouri, for example, some Republican businessmen are donating to Democrat Claire McCaskill in her challenge to incumbent Republican Sen. Jim Talent, largely because Mr. Talent opposes embryonic stem-cell research.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce is the strongest single business voice in Washington, representing thousands of trade associations and three million large and small businesses. It is the top spender on lobbying in Washington and is expected to spend $40 million on state and federal races this year. Employing an army of 36 full-time lobbyists, the chamber often takes the lead on major political issues close to the business community's heart. Its legal arm supports campaigns against elected judges perceived as unfriendly to business interests.

The chamber has backed Democrats before. But this year it is endorsing 14, up from nine in 2002, and is aiding several Democrats especially targeted by Republicans. Besides running TV ads for Democrats for the first time, the chamber chose not to attack Democrats in its ads for Republicans. That is in stark contrast to some slash-and-burn chamber-produced spots in 2004, which helped defeat Tom Daschle, then the Democratic Senate Majority Leader, in South Dakota and restore the Senate to Republican control.

The vast majority of the chamber's election efforts are still helping Republicans. But it has pushed $1.8 million of its $10 million television budget to Democrats. The move comes even though the current Congress is viewed as one of the most pro-business in decades. Tax cuts, energy legislation, trade bills and pension reform -- all longstanding priorities for much of the corporate community -- all have become law under its watch.

"Moving our agenda forward is not just about now and Nov. 7. It's about moving our agenda forward in the 110th Congress," says Bill Miller, a 43-year-old former Republican congressional aide who became director of the chamber's political program in 2002.

The chamber's decision is significant because the Republicans are struggling to maintain their grip on power. Democrats need just a handful of seats to win majorities in both houses of Congress. Illinois Republican Chairman Andy McKenna met with Mr. Miller this year to try to convince him not to back Ms. Bean. "It's hard to imagine that supporting her supports their overall agenda," he says. "It seems they've compromised themselves." North Carolina Sen. Elizabeth Dole, who heads the Republican Senate re-election committee, deadpans: "I'd rather they spend the money on Republicans."

Gerald L. Shaheen, the chamber's board chairman and a group president at Caterpillar Inc., of Peoria, Ill., acknowledges the chamber has faced pressure to stay the Republican course. But, he says, "We have to advocate for the business agenda. We'll take help wherever we can get it."

The Democrats that Mr. Miller decided to support either have a business background or are incumbents who have shown a willingness to break from their party leaders to back chamber priorities. Texas Rep. Chet Edwards became one of them, even though the chamber worked to defeat him two years ago. Mr. Edwards invited Mr. Miller to coffee on Capitol Hill in an effort to win him over.

In the past two years, Mr. Edwards had voted for overhauling bankruptcy rules, the White House's energy bill and legislation making it easier for small businesses to buy health insurance -- all chamber priorities. Meanwhile, his new Republican opponent, political newcomer Van Taylor, didn't have the strong pro-business record of Mr. Edwards's 2004 challenger. This summer the eight-term Congressman wound up with his first chamber endorsement. "I'm thrilled," Mr. Edwards says. "It raises a real credibility problem when a challenger is trying to call me a liberal Democrat."

DOJ_NMG_0067295

In Nebraska, the chamber was one of the first national organizations to endorse freshman Democratic Sen. Ben Nelson, a leading champion of small-business health-insurance relief. That hurt Republicans' hopes of recruiting a formidable challenger in the strongly Republican state. "We have no credibility if we don't stick to what we believe and support the people who show up on tough votes," says chamber President Tom Donohue. "I've heard a lot of complaining from some of my friends out there, but some of these guys have better voting records than some Republicans."

In some cases, the chamber is supporting business-friendly Democrats or Republicans against rivals in their own party, especially in districts where primaries usually decide who will win the general election.

At a recent chamber meeting, Peter Lawson, the group's director of congressional and public affairs, was surprised to learn Mr. Miller planned to weigh into Hawaii's Democratic primary for Senate, which is tomorrow. Mr. Miller is backing challenger Rep. Ed Case against Sen. Daniel Akaka -- the incumbent Democrat, and Mr. Lawson's next-door neighbor. "Look, this really isn't a good idea," Mr. Lawson recalls saying.

Mr. Case had backed small-business health insurance, limiting class-action lawsuits and making the bankruptcy code friendlier to creditors. Mr. Akaka, like most Democrats, voted against those measures. Mr. Lawson, resigned to the decision, broke the news to Mr. Akaka personally when, while walking his dog, he bumped into the senator. He ended up writing Mr. Akaka a personal $250 check for his campaign.

In March, the chamber backed Texas Democratic Rep. Henry Cuellar, a supporter of free trade, in his primary victory over former Democratic Rep. Ciro Rodriguez, who was supported by MoveOn.org, a liberal online group. Mr. Miller tried to keep the chamber's profile low, sticking to a voter-turnout effort in the belief that a television ad war between the chamber and MoveOn would hurt his candidate with Democratic primary voters. Mr. Rodriguez thinks the chamber's effort helped Mr. Cuellar prevail. "They raised a good bit of money for him," he said.

The chamber's heightened interest in Democrats has created some challenges. To produce its first Democratic TV ads, the chamber had to hire a Democratic specialist, Mullen & Co. Erick Mullen, the company's founder, calls the chamber's increased bipartisanship "sound business practice."

At the chamber's headquarters across the street from the White House, Mr. Miller last month gathered aides to hammer out what topics they would highlight in the new TV ads. For each of four issues -- energy, a prescription-drug plan for seniors, small-business health insurance and limiting medical malpractice lawsuits -- Mr. Miller would match the issue to a Democratic candidate.

They decided to create a more-customized ad for Sen. Joe Lieberman, who was defeated in the Democratic primary last month and is running as an Independent. Sen. Lieberman supported the energy bill, a vote his opponent argues shows he is too close to President Bush. Matt Haller, who manages the chamber's political team, suggested a special ad in which members of the Connecticut chamber tout Mr. Lieberman's independence.

Carol Wallace, a Republican and chief executive officer of Cooper Atkins Corp., a small Middlefield, Conn., business that makes cooking thermometers, appeared in the ad. Businesses "are looking for a more-centrist and consensus and collaborative Congress to be able to move things forward," she said in an interview.

In some cases the chamber's more bipartisan posture has come as a relief to local and state chamber officials and business leaders. Robert Batt, executive vice president of Nebraska Furniture Mart, stood beside Mr. Miller when he swept into the state to endorse Sen. Nelson. A registered Independent, Mr. Batt said partisan attacks "don't play well here. We think of it more as the person."

In Illinois, business supporters of Ms. Bean, the freshman House Democrat targeted by the Republican leadership, have felt heat. Bill Little, a chamber board member and chief executive officer of Quam-Nichols Co., an industrial audio maker in Chicago, says his personal backing of her has "required explanation a couple of times" among his Republican friends.

For Republicans in Washington, defeating Ms. Bean represents an opportunity to recapture a seat held by their party for 70 years. The founder of a high-technology consulting firm, Ms. Bean two years ago knocked off 18-term incumbent Republican

DOJ_NMG_0067296

Rep. Phil Crane in the suburban Chicago seat. Then last summer, she joined only 15 other Democrats to vote in favor of the Central American Free Trade Act.

Labor unions protested outside her office. The Northeastern Illinois Federation of Labor Council promptly canceled its plan to award her a "Person of the Year" honor. Bill Scheurer, a Democrat, will run as an Independent in November, which could split the Democratic vote. Buoyed by that prospect, House leaders have requested Republican congressmen to give $1,000 to $5,000 to former investment banker David Sweeney, the socially conservative Republican challenger.

Early last month, Melanie Bassett of the chamber's Chicago office stood among 100 local business leaders in Schaumburg, Ill., to endorse Ms. Bean for her 73% voting record on chamber priorities. Mr. Miller launched two rounds of TV commercials. Ms. Bean believes the business backing makes it harder for a Republican to attack her. As for the chamber's hefty spending on ads for her in the expensive Chicago market, she says, "That doesn't hurt at all."

Democrat Optimistic In Washington (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

BELLEVUE, Wash. -- Washington's 8th Congressional District is emblematic of this year's battle for Congress, with Democrats working their hardest to link Republicans in power to President Bush.

Darcy Burner says her chances of ousting freshman Rep. Dave Reichert -- and giving the Democrats a seat in their bid to recapture the House -- are good because state residents are weary of the president.

"George Bush has taken this country in the wrong direction, and Congress has an obligation to stand up to him and fight for the people of this district," Mrs. Burner said.

Mr. Reichert is one of the Republican centrists in Congress and reminds voters at every opportunity that he is not afraid to be an independent voice for their needs.

"He has bucked the party and leadership many times, which is no small feat for a freshman," said Carol Beaudu, Mr. Reichert's campaign spokeswoman.

For example, he voted to overturn Mr. Bush's veto of a bill authorizing embryonic-stem-cell research and has opposed drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska.

Mr. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois and many other top Republicans have come to the state to campaign for Mr. Reichert, making him an easy target for Democrats who call him "rubber-stamp Reichert."

When White House strategist Karl Rove visited on behalf of Mr. Reichert last Friday, Mrs. Burner received more than $50,000 in an online counter-fundraiser.

Sen. Maria Cantwell, a Washington Democrat facing her own re-election campaign, hosted the online drive, calling the race one of the country's most "hotly contested."

"There's a major political upset in the making here in Washington state, one that could tilt the balance of power in Congress to the Democrats," Miss Cantwell told supporters.

"They know they can't afford to lose this seat, and they are pulling out all the stops: George Bush has been here, Dick Cheney has been here, and now it's Karl Rove's turn."

Mrs. Burner isn't shy about tying Mr. Reichert to the president, and said she was not surprised to see the race generate national attention.

"We've been working hard to make it that," she said. "About nine times out of every 10, when the president tells him to do something, he gets in line and says, 'Yes, sir.'"

Mrs. Burner, 35, is a former Microsoft executive and mother to a toddler. She was raised in a Republican military family and is married to a veteran who served in Iraq. She has never run for political office.

She said Republicans have lost the ideals for which they once stood, such as fiscal responsibility.

Mr. Reichert, 56, a former sheriff who was in the Air Force Reserve, says on his Web site that he is a man of integrity who "transcends partisanship."

DOJ_NMG_0067297

Mr. Reichert garnered 52 percent of the vote when he won the open seat in 2004. His strengths are his independence and his role as chairman of the Homeland Security subcommittee on emergency preparedness, science and technology, Miss Beaudu said.

He authored the 21st Century Emergency Communications Act, which passed earlier this year by a vote of 414-2.

"The biggest issue is our security and our preparedness, and that's what's the congressman is campaigning on," she said, noting that the state is one of the closest to North Korea. "People know him and trust him."

Miss Beaudu cited an August poll showing Mr. Reichert winning by a large margin, while the Burner campaign references a poll from two weeks ago showing the Democrat with a three-point lead over the incumbent.

Each candidate has raised more than $1 million in the race, which has made the "battleground" lists used by both parties, but only Mrs. Burner is running television ads so far.

Black Republicans Run Racially Tinged Ad (AP)

By Kristen Wyatt

AP, September 22, 2006

A national black Republican group is running a radio advertisement accusing Democrats of starting the Ku Klux Klan and saying the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. was a Republican, a claim challenged by civil-rights researchers.

Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, the black Republican nominee for Maryland's open Senate seat, disavowed the ad Thursday as "insulting to Marylanders". He said his campaign asked the Washington-based National Black Republican Association to stop running it.

At an event in Baltimore, Steele said, "I don't know exactly what the intent of the ad was" but that "it's not helpful to the public discourse."

The ad does not mention Steele or his Democratic opponent, Rep. Ben Cardin.

The association's president, Frances Rice, did not return calls for comment. The group, founded a year ago, promotes the GOP to black voters.

It was not immediately clear which radio stations were airing the 60-second ad or how long it had been running. The group's Web site announced the ad's release in a statement dated two weeks ago. The Washington Post reported Thursday that the ad was running on Baltimore stations.

The spot begins with one woman telling another, "Dr. King was a real man. You know he was a Republican."

Steve Klein, a senior researcher with the Atlanta-based King Center, said Thursday that King never endorsed candidates from either party.

"I think it's highly inaccurate to say he was a Republican because there's really no evidence," Klein said.

A King biographer, Taylor Branch, also said Thursday that King was nonpartisan.

In the ad, the woman goes on to say, "Democrats passed those black codes and Jim Crow laws. Democrats started the Ku Klux Klan." Her companion replies, "The Klan? White hoods and sheets?"

The KKK, never a political party, was a racist group of white men that started in the South after the Civil War, when Republicans were almost unheard of in former Confederate states. The mainstream Democratic Party never endorsed the Klan nor claimed to have founded it.

The first woman also says, "Democrats fought all civil rights legislation from the 1860s to the 1960s. Democrats released those vicious dogs and fire hoses on blacks."

The ad asserts that "Democrats want to keep us poor while voting only Democrat" and, "Democrats want us to accept same-sex marriages, teen abortions without a parent's consent and suing the Boy Scouts for saying 'God' in their pledge."

About the GOP, the ad says: "Republicans freed us from slavery and put our right to vote in the Constitution."

The group running the ads describes itself on its Web site as "a resource for the black community on Republican ideals." It does not say how many members it has.

DOJ_NMG_0067298

Race is a prominent theme in the Maryland race for the seat held by retiring Democrat Paul Sarbanes. Steele, the first black candidate elected statewide in Maryland, faces a white Democrat in a heavily Democratic state with the highest percentage of black residents — 29 percent — of any state outside the South.

Black Democrats Pledge Backing To Steele (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Prominent black Democrats yesterday bucked their party to support Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele -- the Republican nominee in Maryland's U.S. Senate race.

"Like so many people who have come out today, I'm sick and tired of being taken for granted by the Democratic Party," said William H. "Billy" Murphy Jr., a Baltimore civil rights lawyer who hosted the "Steele Democrats" event at the Eubie Blake National Jazz Institute and Cultural Center.

"I'm sick and tired of being relied upon for support but not respected as a leader," Mr. Murphy said. "It pains me that I would stand here ... today in rejection of my party's refusal to embrace us in its leadership. But I am happy to be doing that for Michael Steele."

A surprise for Mr. Steele came from the son of Kweisi Mfume, a past president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People who lost last week's Democratic primary to U.S. Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin.

Michael Mfume, a producer of the horror film "Ax 'Em" and an active supporter of his father's campaign, told reporters at the Eubie Blake center that he did not speak for his father.

"There is a saying by Billie Holiday. It goes: 'A mother may have. A poppa may have. But God bless a child that has its own,'" he said.

A spokeswoman for Kweisi Mfume said that he did not know about his son's plans to support Mr. Steele, who is the first black elected to statewide office in Maryland.

Kweisi Mfume, who voiced support for Mr. Cardin in his concession speech but has not actively campaigned for him, has said the Democratic "bosses" shunned his campaign in favor of Mr. Cardin's.

"This is nothing new," said Baltimore lawyer A. Dwight Pettit, a black Democrat at the Steele event.

He said that state party leaders rejected his run for Baltimore state's attorney in 1978 and his nomination for U.S. attorney by President Carter in 1976 in support of white candidates.

"We are on a national stage right now in Maryland to show that if the Republican Party reaches out to African-American communities, they are not foreclosed on immediately," he said. "The question is: What has the Democratic Party done for the African-American community?"

Mr. Steele said he wanted his campaign to bridge Maryland's racial and political divide.

"I decided I wanted this campaign to be about something positive and uplifting: empowerment, opportunity, ownership," he said. "That has not changed and that will not change."

The "Steele Democrats" event followed a rally Tuesday for Mr. Cardin in Baltimore, where both candidates are vying for Mfume supporters.

Mr. Cardin's event featured endorsements from elected black Democratic officials, many of whom backed Mr. Mfume in the primary.

Mr. Cardin, who is white, defeated Mr. Mfume 43.7 percent to 40.4 percent statewide.

But Mr. Cardin lost by tens of thousands of votes in Baltimore and Prince George's County, two of the state's most populated and heavily Democratic jurisdictions -- both more than 65 percent black.

Mr. Steele's potential to break the Democratic lock on black votes has made Maryland's Senate race one of the country's most closely watched campaigns and one of the most fiercely fought between the national parties.

Racial politics took center stage again yesterday, when Mr. Steele called on the Washington-based National Black Republican Association to pull a radio ad airing in Maryland that says Democrats started the Ku Klux Klan and says that Martin Luther King was a Republican, which some historians contest.

DOJ_NMG_0067299

"It is creating a ripple of discontent, and that is not what I stand for," Mr. Steele said.

Cardin, Steele Issue Challenges For Debates (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin yesterday criticized his Republican rival Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele for ducking debates in the U.S. Senate race in Maryland.

But Mr. Steele and his campaign said Mr. Cardin is "playing games," and that his campaign manager won't return phone calls to set up a debate.

Yesterday morning, Mr. Cardin stood next to a table with two name cards on it, placed there by his staff, as he spoke to about 30 seniors at a retirement community in Catonsville. One card bore Mr. Cardin's name. The other Mr. Steele's.

"Where is Michael Steele? I wish he was here," Mr. Cardin, a Democrat, told his audience, which included some of the 2,000 residents at the Charlestown Retirement Community who watched on closed-circuit television.

Steele spokesman Doug Heye said that Ken Morley, Mr. Cardin's campaign manager, refuses to return a call from Mr. Steele's campaign manager, Michael Leavitt.

"We would like to have debates and start scheduling them. Unfortunately, Ben Cardin continues to play games," said Mr. Heye.

Mr. Cardin called that "an excuse."

The Cardin campaign has issued public challenges to Mr. Steele, the first black person elected to statewide office in Maryland, to debate Mr. Cardin at one of the 10-term congressman's previously scheduled campaign stops.

"The voters should have an opportunity to hear us in an unrehearsed, live setting, where voters can ask you questions, and you have to respond to those questions," Mr. Cardin said in an interview in Catonsville.

Mr. Cardin this week called for two debates a week until Election Day, which is Nov. 7.

So far, the two candidates are expected to meet Oct. 29 for a debate on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Mr. Leavitt called Mr. Morley about specifics for more debates, but Mr. Morley refused to respond, Mr. Heye said.

In a letter to Mr. Leavitt, Mr. Morley said, "With less than 50 days until the election, there is no time for a drawn out discussion process. Let's debate."

The letter, which was sent via e-mail at 4:16 p.m. Wednesday, challenged Mr. Steele to meet Mr. Cardin at the retirement community at 9 a.m. yesterday.

"If we wanted to do that too we could schedule a debate for when the House of Representatives has votes. But we're not doing that," Mr. Heye said.

Mr. Cardin said that his campaign has "been in constant contact with [the Steele campaign] to do whatever is reasonable in a debate forum."

But Mr. Cardin's spokesman, Oren Shur, refused to say whether campaign manager Mr. Morley had received a call from Mr. Leavitt or whether he had returned a call.

Mr. Shur said he is the contact person for scheduling debates and that he called the Steele campaign yesterday. Late in the day, Mr. Heye returned the call and invited the Cardin campaign to attend a meeting today, which he said would be attended by Steele staffers and representatives for Kevin Zeese, the Green Party candidate.

Mr. Shur would not say whether Cardin representatives plan to attend the meeting.

Mr. Heye said the Cardin campaign's actions were simply trying to distract voters.

"They are doing whatever they can to distract from the fact that their campaign is clearly stumbling from their internal scandal, and from the fact that after outspending [Kweisi] Mfume 10-to-1, they limped to the nomination," he said.

Mr. Heye was referring to Mr. Cardin's victory last week in the Democratic primary, in which Mr. Cardin defeated Mr. Mfume, the former president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Mr. Cardin spent $2.9 million on television ads to Mr. Mfume's $300,000 but defeated Mr. Mfume by less than 3 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0067300

The "scandal" to which Mr. Heye was referring was an online Web log written by a Cardin staffer that included racist and anti-Semitic comments.

The staffer, whom Mr. Cardin has refused to identify, was fired after The Washington Times first reported on the blog Sept. 15.

Top Republican Aids Lieberman Fundraiser (AP)

By Andrew Miga

AP, September 22, 2006

A prominent Republican who chairs I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's legal defense fund co-hosted a fundraiser Wednesday for Sen. Joe Lieberman, who is running for re-election as an independent after losing the Democratic primary.

Mel Sembler, a former Republican National Committee finance committee chairman, helped organize a reception that raised about a "couple hundred thousand dollars" for Lieberman, who was in attendance. Sembler said the event at his firm's office in St. Petersburg, Fla., drew a mix of Republican, Democratic and independent donors.

"He's a man of principle," Sembler, a former ambassador to Italy and Australia, said of Lieberman in a telephone interview with The Associated Press on Thursday. "Everybody crossed party lines, that's what was interesting ... He's an excellent candidate. We're happy to support him."

Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, was indicted last year on charges that he lied to FBI agents and a federal grand jury about how he learned CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity and when he subsequently told reporters.

Sembler, who is board chairman of the Sembler Company, a real estate and shopping center development company, said he has worked hard to raise money for Libby's legal defense fund.

"It's amazing to go to all this hard work when a crime never got committed," said Sembler, who also described himself as "dear friends" with Cheney.

The Libby defense fund's steering committee includes a few Democrats and several Republicans; Sembler is its chairman.

Sembler said the three-term Connecticut senator was supportive of him in 1989 when his nomination to be ambassador to Australia stalled in the Senate.

Sembler said he was bothered by what he termed distortions of Lieberman's record during the August primary, which upset him. That, coupled with Republican nominee Alan Schlesinger's low name recognition, persuaded him to back Lieberman financially in the general election.

Democrat Ned Lamont, an anti-war challenger, stunned Lieberman, the party's 2000 vice presidential nominee, in the Aug. 8 primary. Lieberman then embarked on an independent bid to hold his Senate seat.

Lieberman has stressed that he's reaching across the aisle for Republican votes. He's also reaching for GOP wallets.

Republican New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg plans to host a Nov. 1 fundraiser for Lieberman with former Democratic Mayor Ed Koch.

Bruce Bialosky, a longtime Republican fundraiser in California, said he's getting a strong response as he helps organize an Oct. 10 fundraiser in Los Angeles for Lieberman that also will be a bipartisan affair.

"It should be a smashing success," Bialosky said. "There are a lot of people across the country who are Republicans who are raising money for Joe."

Lieberman will need Republican and independent votes to prevail in November. One of his television ads shows him erasing a line between the words "Democrat" and "Republican" on a chalkboard.

Volatile Mix: Campaigning And Religions (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 21 — In one of the more awkward moments surrounding the disclosure of his Jewish heritage this week, Senator George Allen, Republican of Virginia, volunteered that his background had hardly inspired him to start keeping kosher.

DOJ_NMG_0067301

"I still had a ham sandwich for lunch," Mr. Allen told The Richmond Times-Dispatch, referring to rules against eating pork, "and my mother made great pork chops."

If Mr. Allen did not fully grasp the sensitivities at first, he did find himself in a growing group of political figures who have discovered their Jewish roots late in life.

The responses to his situation, which included bad ethnic humor and serious debates about denial and anti-Semitism, focused attention on the power of religious, ethnic and racial identities in politics, forces that may not have the power they once did. But those forces remain sufficiently alive that Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, a Mormon, will almost certainly face questions about his religion if he runs for the Republican presidential nomination.

Nowadays, political operatives say, what matters is not so much Mr. Allen's bloodlines but his handling of the news that his mother was born Jewish, a fact that both say she told him last month.

"People are always curious about the backgrounds and the attitudes that people bring into a race, and especially someone who has been touted as a potential presidential nominee," said Wesley K. Clark, a retired general and former Democratic presidential contender who learned at age 23 that his father was Jewish.

What may ultimately distinguish Mr. Allen from politicians like Madeleine K. Albright and Senator John Kerry, who both learned the full extent of their Jewish histories on the public stage, is the manner in which his narrative has unfolded. It is occupying a place in a campaign that has already left him on the defensive over racial sensitivity and his efforts to incorporate his newly discovered background into a political identity as a Christian conservative.

After initially sidestepping questions about his Jewish roots, Mr. Allen played them down and then had his campaign accuse his Democratic rival of anti-Semitism. Only on Wednesday did his mother confirm that she had hidden the family history from her son for decades.

Mr. Allen went on the offensive, declaring himself a champion for all minorities. "Now, it's personal," he said Thursday in an interview on CNN.

The development came on the heels of his "macaca" comment, a phrase he used to describe an Indian-American aide to his opponent that has become shorthand for the race and ethnicity problems that have plagued Mr. Allen's campaign for weeks.

Even some of his friends say that handled differently the news of his background could have developed into a sympathetic storyline.

Candidates like Mr. Kerry and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton handled similar developments deftly enough to appeal to the Jewish community without, in the view of their supporters, appearing exploitative or abandoning the Christian traditions in which they were raised.

In Mrs. Clinton's Senate race in 2000, The Jewish Daily Forward reported that Mrs. Clinton's step-grandfather was Jewish.

For any Democrat in a similar spot, of course, the landscape is much less complicated. The Democratic Party has long been the predominant home for most religious and ethnic minorities, including Jews.

The situation is more complex for Mr. Allen.

William Kristol, editor of The Weekly Standard, a conservative publication, said the incident especially "struck a nerve with Jewish Republicans."

"It's simply the way he handled it," Mr. Kristol said.

But in a southern state that was once a slave state, where white voters are predominant and cultural and political conservatives are a majority, Mr. Allen has seemed to struggle to find the right words to address his newfound identity.

After initially responding defensively to a television news reporter who asked him directly on Monday about his Jewish ancestry and saying it was important not to make "aspersions about people because of their religious beliefs," Mr. Allen later said his objection was to a preceding question, about whether his mother had taught him the word "macaca."

By midweek, the campaign accused its Democratic opponent, James Webb, of using "anti-Jewish ploys." Mr. Allen's campaign issued statements saying that, among other things, Mr. Webb had approved a flier in his Senate primary that had anti-Semitic overtones, an accusation that Mr. Webb has denied.

On CNN, Mr. Allen spoke forcefully about combating discrimination, saying he had recommitted to fight for tolerance.

DOJ_NMG_0067302

He also said his mother, after releasing him from a promise to keep the family secret, had started to find out who her real friends were. \

Democrats have, of course, taken delight in watching Mr. Allen confront another difficult episode.

A spokesman for Mr. Kerry said that the news "would be nothing more than a piece of trivia if it wasn't clear that George Allen is so uncomfortable with himself" and that the "Watergate principle" applied, with the cover-up worse than the news.

In an interview published on Thursday in The Washington Post, Mr. Allen's mother, whose unmarried name was Henriette Lumbroso, said she had kept the news from her son until a discussion after a report in The Forward about her family and its experience in Tunisia. She said her father had been imprisoned during the Nazi occupation of Tunis.

On CNN, Mr. Allen recounted his mother's saying: "I didn't want to tell you. Do you love me? You won't love me as much."

Mr. Allen said he responded, "I love you even more."

Kerry Urges Democrats To Fight Back (AP)

By Will Lester

AP, September 22, 2006

The Swift Boat Veterans for Truth group was Sen. John Kerry's albatross in 2004. Now, the Democrat is warning his party about suffering the same fate in a fundraising letter.

In 2004, the Swift Boat group, backed by Texas businessman Bob Perry, made unsubstantiated allegations about Kerry's Vietnam War heroism. The presidential nominee's slow and uncertain response is blamed for helping doom his White House bid.

This year, Perry has donated $5 million to the Economic Freedom Fund, a newly created California group, that is running ads, sending out mailings and using automated phone calls to criticize Democratic candidates in Georgia, West Virginia, Iowa and Indiana.

Kerry urges Democrats to fight back in a letter seeking funds for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

"Their first attack ads against Democratic House candidates are already on the air. They hope they've caught you sleeping. We have to respond quickly and in force," Kerry writes in an e-mail sent to tens of thousands of Democrats.

Kerry was widely criticized for his slow response to the Swift Boat attacks.

"You get knocked down and you can either get mad or you can get tougher," said Kerry spokesman David Wade. "Our battle cry is 'never again.'"

Since losing the White House in 2004, Kerry has raised more than $10 million for almost 200 candidates at the local, state and federal level, aides say. He is mentioned as a potential candidate in 2008.

Clear-Cut Race Shifting Into Texas-Size Free-for-All (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

HOUSTON, Sept. 21 — Finally, in the race for governor of Texas, things are getting unclear. And all the more riveting.

Will President Bush's home state stay in the Republican column, where it has been since Mr. Bush won in an upset in 1994? Or will it fall to a Democrat or independent — even a cigar-toting country music satirist touting his political virginity and running on the slogan, "How hard could it be?"

Just a few months ago, the race appeared to be a fairly conventional if well-financed match between Gov. Rick Perry, a Republican, and the state comptroller, Carole Keeton Strayhorn, a former Republican running as an independent.

In the last few weeks, though, two other candidates have gained enough traction to make it a much wider race: the humorist Kinky Friedman and Chris Bell, a former Democratic congressman. A fifth candidate, James Werner, a Libertarian, could make the difference if the Nov. 7 election becomes a squeaker.

"It's gotten a lot murkier over the last couple of months," said Cal Jillson, a professor of political science at Southern Methodist University in Dallas and a leading authority on Texas politics.

DOJ_NMG_0067303

Mired in low popularity ratings but with rivals dividing the opposition and strong backing from evangelicals, Governor Perry is still favored to win his quest to become the longest-serving chief executive in Texas history using a strategy of "running out the clock," Dr. Jillson said. Nonetheless, he cautioned that "the history of Texas is full of zany, crazy races and this could be one."

Voter disaffection is running high, fueled by anger over a long school-financing crisis, illegal immigration, a new business tax, rising crime, toll roads and the governor's plans for a vast foreign-built superhighway network that farmers and ranchers say would gobble up great swaths of Texas.

Mr. Perry, often accused of aloofness, has become the target not only of the left but also of the conservative right, blamed for rising state expenditures that both sides say have failed to remedy pressing state problems.

It is an environment in which the opposition has clearly thrived, and several statewide polls — though they use questionable and often unreliable methods — has driven a sense that the race has widened. None of the polls show Governor Perry getting much more than a third of the vote. The three other major candidates tend to fall in differing orders, depending on the poll, but each ranks in double-digit percentages in the various polls.

"This will be won by anyone getting 38 to 40 percent of the vote," Dr. Jillson said. With even 2 percent of the vote, Mr. Werner could pull enough from another candidate to make a difference, becoming the Ralph Nader of Texas, 2006.

"I would be pleased if I could cost any of my opponents the election," Mr. Werner said.

With the race in flux, the airwaves are full of television commercials; early ones showed Mr. Bell as a giant straddling the Alamo and Mr. Friedman at his animal rescue ranch in Kerrville comparing himself to the Good Shepherd.

In recent days, the cash-starved and long-invisible Mr. Bell has been buoyed by the unexpected opening of checkbooks, as some big donors have reconsidered their judgment that he could not beat Mr. Perry. One new benefactor was Frederick M. Baron of Dallas, a wealthy asbestos lawyer and former president of the Association of Trial Lawyers of America, who spent several hours recently closeted with Mr. Bell, calling Democrats for donations. "I'm now convinced he could win," Mr. Baron said.

Mr. Friedman's campaign raked in $60,000 at a Houston steakhouse fund-raiser Sept. 5 led by the socialite Carolyn Farb and featuring the guitarist Billy F. Gibbons of the Texas band ZZ Top and Dick DeGuerin, the lead lawyer defending Tom DeLay against criminal campaign finance charges. Mr. Friedman will win, Mr. DeGuerin predicted, "and then he's going to make me attorney general."

Next week, Mr. Friedman plans to begin touring Texas college campuses with his political idol, Jesse Ventura, the wrestler and former Minnesota governor who waged the kind of independent campaign Mr. Friedman is emulating, to the point of hiring Mr. Ventura's former campaign manager, Dean Barkley. They hope to take advantage of the growing discontent among Texas voters.

"The peasants are angry," Mr. Barkley said. "They're sharpening their pitchforks."

But Mr. Friedman himself narrowly escaped an impaling two weeks ago after dismissing Hurricane Katrina evacuees still in Houston as "crack heads and thugs." The remark prompted Mr. Bell to suggest that "Kinky is taking sensitivity training from Mel Gibson."

This week, the freewheeling Mr. Friedman was confronted with a year-old interview in which he said of sexual predators, "Throw them in prison and throw away the key, and make them listen to a Negro talking to himself." His staff explained the remark as a line from one of Mr. Friedman's mystery novels and said he was often politically incorrect but never racist. On Thursday, bloggers seized on a 1980 comedy skit by Mr. Friedman in which he used a slur against blacks, prompting expressions of outrage by his rivals — another sign, his campaign said, of their desperation over his gains.

Mr. Friedman, 61, a humor columnist and longtime mainstay of a Western troupe called Kinky Friedman and the Texas Jewboys, has also suggested dividing the border, putting a Mexican general in charge of each segment and subtracting money from a large bank account every time an illegal immigrant crossed over.

For much of the summer, the race was widely seen as a struggle between Governor Perry and Ms. Strayhorn, both former Democrats. Ms. Strayhorn, 67, the mother of two former officials in the Bush administration — Scott McClellan, the White House spokesman, and Mark B. McClellan, the F.D.A. director and Medicare commissioner — was the first woman to be mayor of Austin, from 1977 to 1983. She switched to the Republican Party in 1986, before an unsuccessful race for Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0067304

Mr. Perry, 56, a former Texas House member who switched to the Republican Party in 1989, was lieutenant governor in December 2000 when George W. Bush vacated the Statehouse, elevating Mr. Perry to governor. He won the post on his own in 2002. The two-term limit means no Texas governor has served more than 8 years; but if Mr. Perry wins in November and finishes out his term, he will have served 10.

With the race picking up, Mr. Perry, whose campaign turned away a reporter's request to accompany him on the hustings, spent several recent days visiting public schools to deliver checks for teacher merit bonuses, up to $2,800, and give children blue plastic bracelets stamped "Reach your goal — graduate." A recent survey by Education Week ranked Texas below average in high school graduation rates.

"We can't pay you enough, but we try," Mr. Perry told Monica Ferguson, a fourth-grade teacher at Oleson Elementary school in north Houston last week.

Ms. Strayhorn, who gave up any hope of challenging the governor in the Republican primary, has also been promising higher teacher pay, which has earned her endorsements from teacher unions. Education has been ignored in the state for too long, she has said on the stump, and students and teachers have seen no benefit from record state spending.

Mr. Bell, a former Houston councilman who filed an early ethics complaint against Mr. DeLay, the former House Republican leader, drew cheers at a recent Democratic forum by dismissing Mr. Perry and Ms. Strayhorn as "two sleeves of the same empty suit" and professing a lack of concern over their television campaigns. "Their problem is not that people don't know them," he said, "it's that they do."

At his Sept. 5 fund-raiser in Houston, Mr. Friedman, wearing his trademark black cowboy hat and clutching his ever-present unlit cigar, said he sensed victory.

"I can tell by the people who think we can't win," he said.

He thanked his donors — "it's been a financial pleasure" — and demanded refreshment: "The governor needs a drink!" he bellowed. "May I have a drink of Jameson's, please?"

Kinky Friedman Defends 1980 Racial Slur (AP)

By Kelley Shannon

AP, September 22, 2006

Comedian and independent gubernatorial candidate Kinky Friedman on Thursday defended his use of a racial slur during a performance at Houston nightclub 26 years ago after an audio clip of the standup routine was posted on the Internet.

Friedman, 61, said he has tried to expose and lampoon racism, and was making fun of bigots when he used the n-word twice in a joke.

"They're attacking me for something that Richard Pryor did, that Lenny Bruce did, which is to have the freedom to poke fun at anybody that you want. The whole show is satirizing racism," Friedman said at a fundraiser in New York.

But State Rep. Garnet Coleman, former chairman of the Texas Legislative Black Caucus, said it was difficult to find the humor in his joke after his remarks about Katrina evacuees in Houston in which he referred to them as "crackheads and thugs."

Coleman said nobody would have scrutinized his 1980 joke before the comments about Katrina evacuees, most of whom are black.

"It makes it more relevant because people then look to see, is this part of your character," Coleman said. He said Friedman "needs to change his tune or get out of the race."

A staffer for Coleman posted the audio on the left-leaning political Web site Burnt Orange Report. Phillip Martin said he did the posting in his off time after getting it from an old fan of Friedman's.

Other Friedman comments criticized recently include a television interview from a year ago in which he said sexual predators should be thrown in prison "and make them listen to a Negro talking to himself," Friedman said. He also called "Negro" a "charming word."

Friedman's campaign has said the CNBC interview in which he made the "Negro" remark was a reference to a book he wrote in the 1980s.

DOJ_NMG_0067305

Gov. Rick Perry, a Republican seeking re-election, Democratic candidate Chris Bell and independent candidate Carole Keeton Strayhorn said Friedman's language was unacceptable.

LETTERS (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

As Harvard Bows Out, Others Should Step In

Arthur C. Brooks's Sept. 14 editorial-page commentary "Early Admissions" has got it exactly right that Harvard's early-admissions reversal need not, and indeed ought not, discourage top-tier public universities from more aggressively marketing it. Public universities such as my own, the University of Michigan, now have an unparalleled opportunity to attract the best students from both the lowest and highest socio-economic tiers.

Our best in-state students most in need of an opportunity to attend college can, through early admissions, continue to have security about their academic future. And our best out-of-state students who are assured, but not guaranteed, access to an elite private institution can now better weigh the uncertainty of a private education against the certainty of a public one. Given the excess demand for admission to private universities, it is a wonder that all public universities don't ramp up early admissions in the wake of Harvard's decision.

Derek Collins

Department of Classical Studies

University of Michigan

Ann Arbor, Mich.

(The author is an associate professor of Greek and Latin, and serves on the College of LS&A's Advisory Board to the Office of Undergraduate Admissions at the University of Michigan.)

The reason "minorities and low-income applicants" do not "show up in the early admittance pool" is because the schools' financial aid decisions are made in April/May, not because minorities and low-income applicants do not have the motivation to "show up," as Mr. Brooks outrageously suggests.

My "low-income" three children applied to 10 schools each (talk about motivation!) and ended up going to the schools that provided them with the most financial aid and were the best fit for their academic credentials. But they didn't find out until May of the following year because it is not until that time that schools release their financial aid decisions. To suggest that low-income and minorities exhibit "suboptimal personal behaviors" is an expression of ignorance of how the other half lives.

Associate Professor

Master's Couple and Family Counseling

Counselor Education Department

Northeastern Illinois University

Lincolnshire, Ill.

The early admission system may seem logical for students who are "positive" of their college decision; however I disagree with Arthur Brooks. To students, parents and college counselors, the early decision process appears flawless as it often allows them a better chance at gaining admission to their college of choice, typically one on their so-called "stretch" list. This process does not necessarily allocate students to the college that will suit them best.

As a white, private-school student in the Northeast, I like most of my fellow classmates had aspirations of attending only the most elite colleges. My hopes were dashed when I was rejected by all but my "safety school." Though I could not see it at the time, my admission to Hobart College was the single best thing that had happened to me in my life. There I was able to participate in sports, clubs and organizations that I would never had the opportunity to join had I gained admission to a school where I was accepted early under more favorable acceptance parameters.

Ryan C. Wilson

Boston

Unions Support Politicians Who Care About Workers

DOJ_NMG_0067306

In your Sept. 19 editorial "Fun Union Facts" you continue your crusade against unions by picking and choosing facts so carefully that your page needs a "reader beware" sign.

Unions pool their resources through the AFL-CIO so working people's voices can be heard in the political and legislative process and to support one another in organizing; these are big budget items. At a time when median household income is sinking, 45 million Americans don't have health care and poverty is rising, we would be neglecting our duties if we didn't do everything possible to elect working-family-friendly candidates and pass laws that will improve workers' lives.

What the LM-2s [newly expanded disclosure reports for unions' budgets] label "representational activities" is not just for collective bargaining; it includes organizing, research and education, international work, training and more. And as an umbrella organization of unions, the AFL-CIO doesn't bargain any contracts at all; our member unions do.

Unions are now reporting more information than any other type of organization in the nation -- more than business, more than churches, more than non-profits. The AFL-CIO's LM-2 forms alone were 863 pages, and we're one of 5,000 national and local labor organizations required to turn in these forms.

John J. Sweeney
President
AFL-CIO
Washington

An Insufferable Smear Of Our Staff Officers

The Sept. 19 Letter to the Editor defending an academic physician who failed to disclose his financial ties ("Needless Furor Harms Outstanding Psychiatrist") is naïve and misguided. Particularly offensive is the allegation that staff members of the American College of Neuropsychopharmacology were responsible for the nondisclosure "due to a regrettable oversight at the level of administrative publication." To the contrary, the ACNP policy on disclosure explicitly requires that information on financial conflict of interest be included in the acknowledgements section of the manuscript at the time of submission. As lead author, Dr. Charles Nemeroff was required to conform to that policy. As editor in chief of the journal, he can't claim ignorance of the policy that he was being paid to enforce. To now have his supporters issue such a smear on ACNP's administration of the journal is insufferable. The responsibility was Dr. Nemeroff's and his alone.

Department of Psychiatry and Biobehavioral Sciences
University of California at Los Angeles
Chief, Psychiatry and Mental Health
Veterans Affairs Greater Los Angeles Healthcare System
Los Angeles
(Drs. Carroll and Rubin are Fellows of the American College of Neuropsychopharmacology.)

Tons of Animal Manure Are Public Health Threat

Marc Siegel nailed it ("Eat Your Spinach," editorial page, Sept. 18): E. coli is an intestinal bug and plants don't have intestines. Diseases that make their way to the human body via produce most likely came from contamination with farm animal fecal material.

In a single year in this country, our industrialized animal agriculture's intensive confinement system produces more than a billion tons of manure -- as heavy as 10,000 Nimitz-class aircraft carriers. Billions of farm animals are overcrowded in stressful, unsanitary sheds, pens, cages and stalls; no wonder we are increasingly plagued with infectious food-borne diseases. Animal factories are a public health threat. We shouldn't have to cook the crap out of our food.

Innovator Devises Way Around Electoral College (NYT)

By Rick Lyman

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

LOS ALTOS HILLS, Calif., Sept. 21 — In his early 20's, John R. Koza and fellow graduate students invented a brutally complicated board game based on the Electoral College that became a brief cult hit and recently fetched $100 for an antique version on eBay.

DOJ_NMG_0067307

By his 30's, Dr. Koza was a co-inventor of the scratch-off lottery ticket and found it one of the few sure ways to find fortune with the lottery.

Now, a 63-year-old eminence among computer scientists who teaches genetic programming at Stanford, Dr. Koza has decided to top off things with an end run on the Constitution. He has concocted a plan for states to skirt the Electoral College system legally to insure the election of whichever presidential candidate receives the most votes nationwide.

"When people complain that it's an end run," Dr. Koza said, "I just tell them, 'Hey, an end run is a legal play in football.' "

The first fruit of his effort, a bill approved by the California legislature that would allocate the state's 55 electoral votes to the winner of the national popular vote, sits on Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's desk. The governor has to decide by Sept. 30 whether to sign it, a decision that may well determine whether Dr. Koza's scheme takes flight or becomes another relic in the history of efforts to kill the Electoral College.

"It would be a major development if California enacts this thing," said Tim Storey, an analyst for the National Conference of State Legislatures. "It will definitely transform it from a smoldering thing into a fire."

There have been many efforts over the decades to kill the Electoral College, the little-known and widely misunderstood body that actually elects the president based on the individual states that a candidate wins. Most recently, former Representative John B. Anderson of Illinois and former Senator Birch Bayh of Indiana spearheaded a drive, Fair Vote, for a constitutional amendment to abolish the Electoral College.

The brainstorm behind Dr. Koza's effort, led by a seven-month-old group, National Popular Vote, was to abandon that approach and focus on creating interstate compacts. Those are contracts that bind states over issues like nuclear waste and port authorities.

Dr. Koza's compact, if approved by enough legislatures, would commit a state's electors to vote for the candidate who wins the most national votes, even if the candidate loses in that state.

Robert Hardaway, a professor of law at the University of Denver who wrote "The Electoral College and the Constitution: The Case for Preserving Federalism" (1994), has counted 704 efforts to change or abolish the Electoral College. Most, he said, were ill advised, including this one.

"It's legal, but it would be a terrible idea," Professor Hardaway said. "Look at the trauma the country went through having a recount in Florida. Suppose what would happen, in the face of a close national election, if we had to have a recount in every little hamlet."

Dr. Koza, whose dissertation at the University of Michigan was titled "On Inducing a Nontrivial, Parsimonious Grammar for a Given Sample of Sentences," said the idea came to him in early 2004, although he and Barry Fadem did not go public with it until February. Working with state lotteries as chief executive of Scientific Games in Atlanta, he had learned how interstate compacts work. Multistate lotteries like Powerball are based on such compacts. What, he wondered, if a similar agreement bound states together to thwart the Electoral College?

"The bottom line is that the system has outlived its usefulness," said Assemblyman Thomas J. Umberg, the Anaheim Democrat who sponsored the bill here. "It's past time that Americans should elect their president by direct vote of the people."

Mr. Umberg and his staff met some of Mr. Schwarzenegger's top staff members on Wednesday and came away encouraged about the prospects of the legislation. Although they received no commitment, it was clear that the governor, a Republican, was seriously considering the question and had not made up his mind about it, Mr. Umberg said.

"It's anybody's guess which way he'll go," Assemblyman Chuck DeVore, an Irvine Republican who opposes the bill, said. "He's not your normal partisan politician."

National Popular Vote bills were proposed in six legislatures this year. California's was the only one to pass it, though the Colorado Senate voted for a version. The group has found sponsors for bills in 22 states next year.

"And we fully expect that by Jan. 1 we will be able to say that we have sponsors in all 50 states," said Mr. Fadem, an East Bay lawyer who specializes in referendums and initiatives and is president of National Popular Vote.

The goal is to create a snowball effect. The measures may be unlikely to pass in time for the 2008 presidential race, Mr. Fadem said, but the idea could find enough traction as an issue for candidates to address.

DOJ_NMG_0067308

As attractive as it is to guarantee the White House to the winner of the national vote, Dr. Koza said, he has other goals in mind.

"More important,'' he said, "is changing the way presidential campaigns are conducted in this country. Now, the candidates spend almost all of their time in a handful of battleground states like Ohio and Florida and ignore the rest of the country. This would force candidates to campaign nationally for every vote."

Mr. Storey said he remained skeptical that the idea would pass in enough legislatures to take effect. Almost certainly, he said, the states that are usually highly contested will oppose it, fearing the loss of attention and campaign spending. Also, Mr. Storey said, the battle might become partisan, as it did in California, where just one Republican legislator ended up supporting the bill.

Mr. DeVore said, "I just took a look at who was behind the movement, and they were left-wing partisans."

Dr. Koza acknowledged that he had been a Democratic elector, twice, and his living room is festooned with photographs of him beside former Vice President Al. Gore and former President Bill Clinton.

He insisted, however, that the movement was fundamentally nonpartisan, and he pointed to the many Republicans who had agreed to co-sponsor bills on his plan. In New York, five lawmakers, all Republican, sponsored the bill this year.

Jerry F. Hough, a professor of political science at Duke, said that he was "an enthusiastic supporter of a popular vote for president," but that he had problems with Dr. Koza's plan. Professor Hough said he would like runoff provisions, for instance.

He also agreed conservatives could see the effort as a liberal stealth move to regain lost power, comparing it to the Republicans' successful effort, after Franklin D. Roosevelt won four terms, to limit presidents to two.

"The two-term limit was clearly in the face of F.D.R.," Professor Hough said. "And I would say this is clearly in the face of Al Gore's loss in 2000."

States Spin Their Spare Stuff Into Gold (USAT)

By Ben Jones

USA Today, September 22, 2006

MADISON, Wis. — State governments are putting more of their surplus goods on sale rather than in the dump. That's giving bargain hunters the opportunity to pick up everything from computers and desks to a car crusher and a statue of Smokey Bear.

South Dakota unloaded the car crusher for $95,000 on the Internet, according to Rick Voorhes, the state's surplus property manager. Alabama got about $30 for the "life-size" Smokey Bear statue, says Shane Bailey, director of that state's surplus property agency.

The officials in charge of selling such items say tighter state budgets and a desire to reduce the amount of stuff deposited into landfills have bolstered their sales efforts.

"There has been a big push for it," says Dick Graves, president of the National Association of State Agencies for Surplus Property and director of federal and state surplus for Indiana.

"You need more money everywhere," Graves says. "There is wealth sitting here with some of this stuff."

At least 11 states, including Georgia, Arkansas, South Dakota, Washington and South Carolina, are using online auctions to sell surplus goods, according to a survey by the National Association of State Chief Administrators.

Tim Sell, who manages Wisconsin's sales, says state governments have long had surplus property on their hands. What has changed is how it's dealt with.

"In the past, normally good old boys were in the (surplus) department, and nobody cared as long as it disappeared," Sell says. "Now people's taxes are going up, and people want more accountability on these things. (People say) 'Where's my stuff going, and how's it being handled?' "

South Dakota also holds a series of public auctions each year, and several hundred people attend. Total sales come to about $1.5 million annually. "There is a lot of stuff (we sell) that should go to a landfill, but one man's junk is another man's treasure," Voorhes says.

In Kansas, state spokesman Gavin Young says it all goes on sale. "You can get everything from an in-and-out tray from the top of a desk all the way up to a dump truck. … There is a little bit of everything," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0067309

Gayleen Wyant, surplus property manager for Wyoming, says the only thing her state throws away is “absolute trash.” She says she has sold everything from used tire rims to an old wringer washing machine. “I am the queen of sales,” she says. “Guys tell me, ‘It won't sell,' and I turn around and sell it.”

New Hampshire's surplus items include big things such as police cruisers as well as the hundreds of pocketknives and small tools seized by airport security. The seized airport items alone bring in $26,000 a year.

“It's not big money, but it helps pay the bills,” says Robert Stowell, who runs that state's surplus program.

Wisconsin operates a sales warehouse in Madison that unloads property from state agencies and Wisconsin's state university system. It's filled with used computers starting at less than $100 and battered dorm furniture. Regular shoppers can find the unexpected.

Jenny White of Madison regularly combs the aisles for craft supplies.

Once, she says, she ran into a gynecological exam table. She didn't buy it. “That was probably the weirdest … thing I've seen,” White says. “But with some of the stuff, I don't have any idea what I am looking at.”

Sell, who runs the warehouse, says he has “seen everything from rat guillotines to human skulls to things from the governor's mansion. Everything.”

Past surplus sales also have featured doors and windows that were replaced during a Wisconsin Capitol renovation and gear that game wardens seized from illegal fishermen.

Sell says the sales have helped the state keep hundreds of tons of junk out of landfills. They also bring in $1.4 million annually, more than four times the amount the states collected a decade ago. “There has been a dramatic increase,” Sell says.

The Super-Rich Get Richer: Forbes 400 Are All Billionaires (WP)

By Frank Ahrens

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

It's not news that Bill Gates is the richest person in America, according to Forbes magazine's annual list of the nation's 400 richest people, released yesterday. He has been for 13 years. Barring a second Stone Age in which computers are good only for hurling at other cavemen, Gates will always be rich.

The news is: On this list, $999 million is chump change.

For the first time, all 400 Gotbucks on the Forbes tally are billionaires, from Gates (worth $53 billion) down to the bottom, Los Angeles semiconductor magnate Sehat Sutardja ($1 billion).

It's not just the accumulated wealth that draws attention to the list; it's the eye-popping numbers that show the speed with which wealth is gained -- and lost -- at the dawn of this millennium. For instance, according to Forbes:

Â· Casino mogul Sheldon Adelson (No. 3, $20.5 billion) has made $1 million per hour over the past two years.

Â· Google Inc. founders Sergey Brin (No. 12, $14.1 billion) and Larry Page (No. 13, $14 billion) have each made $13 million per day over the past two years.

Â· Martha Stewart dropped off the list after losing nearly $400 million over the past year.

Forbes has been publishing the much-ballyhooed list -- which relies on research and estimates and rounds net worth to the nearest $100 million -- since 1982. The inaugural list contained only 13 billionaires. Even after the technology crash at the beginning of the century, a three-year war and a jumpy economy, the wealth accumulation among the richest Americans continues unabated and has risen to historic proportions, even if measured by an arbitrarily arrived-at number (400, the number of swells who could fit into the Victorian New York ballroom of Caroline Astor).

"It is a really big deal that it's all billionaires," said Forbes associate editor Matthew Miller, who edited the list and led the team that spent a year compiling it. "It shows economic growth and, as this magazine is a fan of capitalism, it shows progress."

The list of D.C. billionaires is topped by Danaher Corp. founder Mitchell P. Rales (No. 107, $2.6 billion), followed by his brother, Steven M. Rales (No. 117, $2.5 billion), new Washington Nationals owner and real estate mogul Theodore N. Lerner (No. 242, $1.5 billion), and Black Entertainment Television founder Robert L. Johnson (No. 374, $1 billion). McLean candy czar Forrest E. Mars Jr. is Virginia's top billionaire (No. 21, $10.5 billion), while Richard E. Marriott is Maryland's wealthiest man (No. 197, $1.8 billion).

DOJ_NMG_0067310

The enormous sums spur the natural question: Is it good, bad or neither that wealth is accumulating so fast that numbers begin to lose their meaning? (Requisite illustration: A stack of 1 billion $1 bills would reach a height of 80 miles.)

On the one hand, the fortunes have spawned a new age of philanthropy, by which private individuals can try to effect change with the power and reach of a government but without the bureaucratic shackles that often thwart aid efforts.

Bill and Melinda Gates, for instance, created a foundation with assets of $30 billion that focuses much of its effort on improving health for the world's poor. Warren E. Buffett (No. 2, $46 billion), a director of The Washington Post Co. along with Melinda Gates, said in June that he would give away much of his fortune to charity, most of it to the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation. The gestures recall the large-scale largesse of 19th-century capitalists named Vanderbilt and Rockefeller.

Yet not everyone finds the billionaire boom beneficial.

"I think it's very bad," said Dean Baker, a macroeconomist at the Center for Economic and Policy Research in Washington. "If the U.S. had experienced really extraordinary growth, then maybe that would be the reason" for all the billionaires. Baker pointed out that U.S. economic growth in the past 25 years -- the period that hatched this crop of billionaires -- is actually slower than in the preceding quarter-century, which produced only 13 billionaires.

"If these people pull away so much wealth," he said, "that means everyone else has less."

The growth in the number of billionaires has been significantly aided by cuts in U.S. tax rates that allow the wealthy to keep more of their money, said Harvard University economics professor Larry Katz. Today's marginal tax rate for the richest Americans is 35 percent, down from more than 60 percent 25 years ago.

"We could do a lot more with the tax system and with policies . . . to help out those who are less fortunate," Katz said. On the other hand, "not every dollar that goes to a rich person is taken away from someone else."

Katz is of mixed mind about the billionaire boom.

"At one level, it leads to the possibility of great philanthropy," he said. "On the other level, it is a great concentration of wealth and power that can subvert other people's interests."

One-third of the Forbes 400 is concentrated in two places: California, which has 89 billionaires, and New York City, with 44.

The billionaire-free states are West Virginia, Vermont, Alaska, Maine, Delaware, Mississippi, Iowa, New Mexico, Kentucky and North Dakota. (South Dakota has one.) Even Wyoming, the least populous state, has a billionaire -- Christy Walton (No. 7, $15.6 billion), one of eight Wal-Mart family members on the list, four of whom are in the top 10.

In Embracing Islam, Ex-Catholic Seeks To Strengthen Cultural Ties (WP)

By Caryle Murphy

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

Chris Moore was an aspiring rock musician with earrings and a shaved head when he walked into a Northern Virginia mosque a dozen years ago and began asking questions about Islam.

A month later, the Christian-raised son of a U.S. Navy man became a Muslim. His conversion initiated a spiritual odyssey that took him to several Muslim countries, including Saudi Arabia, where he adopted and then rejected the ultraconservative Wahhabi approach to Islam.

Moore's faith journey ultimately brought the Annandale resident home, and today he is pursing a master's degree at St. John's College in Annapolis, a university noted for its demanding curriculum based on reading classic works of Western civilization.

Like many other young Muslims in the United States, Moore is seeking to fashion an Islamic identity that flourishes in American society and influences it for the better. He feels a responsibility, he said, to contribute to a more harmonious relationship between Islam and the West -- a task that is on his mind as he observes this year's Islamic holy month of Ramadan, a period of daytime fasting and spiritual introspection that starts at sundown today.

"I'll be doing a lot of reflecting on how I can make a difference in the state of affairs of Muslims -- in the West, specifically," said Moore, 31, who attends the Mustafa Center in Annandale.

DOJ_NMG_0067311

Fluent in Arabic, Moore said he hopes to foster understanding between Muslims and non-Muslims by translating some of the "beautiful, deep wisdom that I've found in Arabic literature. . . . There's a lot in the Islamic tradition that people in this country . . . would love."

But first, he wants to better understand his own culture, which is why St. John's was a logical choice. "What better way to understand the West," he said, "than by going directly to the foundational texts and books and works that helped create that civilization?"

Ramadan, believed to be the period when God revealed the first verses of the Koran to the prophet Muhammad, is the most important month of the Islamic religious calendar. During this time, which is dedicated to spiritual growth, Muslims must refrain from eating, drinking and having sexual relations between dawn and sunset. It is also customary for Muslims to spend part of the days during Ramadan studying the Koran.

The daily fast is broken with an evening meal called the iftar , after which many Muslims attend special nightly prayers, known as taraweeh , at their mosques. Ramadan evenings are often festive, with visits among relatives and friends. The month ends with one of Islam's major holidays, Eid al-Fitr.

The arc of Moore's personal journey from a very conservative to a more moderate expression of his faith echoes the spiritual path of many Muslim American converts. For Moore, the story began in 1994, a year after graduating from Annandale High School.

An only child, he became close friends with Aaron Sellars, another young aspiring musician. The two also shared a yearning for spiritual fulfillment, which led them to Dar al Hijra Islamic Center in Falls Church. They walked in one day and began asking one of the members about Islam. Sellars converted that day; Moore, raised Catholic, did so shortly afterward.

He took to his new faith with an intensity typical of converts. He adopted the Arabic name Khalil, which means intimate friend, and gave up his beloved music, because a Saudi spiritual adviser convinced him that it was a sinful waste of time.

Moore also enrolled in the Saudi-run Institute of Islamic and Arabic Sciences in Fairfax to learn Arabic, because he wanted to read Islam's scriptures in their original language.

Sellars, 35, who works as an audiovisual artist at the California-based Zaytuna Institute, an Islamic educational center, said he was not surprised that his longtime friend threw himself into studying Arabic after his conversion, since that was his approach to everything.

"All of a sudden, there's all these Post-It notes of Arabic all over the wall [of his bedroom]," Sellars recalled. "It was pretty amazing for me to see that quality of doing everything right transferred to his approach to Islamic studies."

Sellars said that Moore displayed the principles of Ramadan even as he moved to accept Islam. "Ramadan is about stopping, cutting off certain aspects of your normal life to think about that which is higher and that which is deep within yourself," Sellars said.

As Moore began to seriously consider converting, "there were certain aspects of his life that he put aside, people who had negative influences . . . who were just about partying, getting high, getting drunk," Sellars said. "The core principle of Ramadan, of doing without and looking within, he was already manifesting some of those qualities . . . in his journey for the truth."

When the Fairfax institute offered Moore a scholarship to study in Medina, Saudi Arabia, he grabbed it -- because to live in the town that Muhammad called home for several years is "the dream of every Muslim," Moore said.

He arrived in Medina in 1996. "When I first got there, I was pretty much in awe. I truly, honestly believed . . . that the only scholars on the face of the Earth that had anything to truly say about Islam were . . . Saudi-related in some way," he said. Theirs, he thought, was "the true Islam."

But in his third year of studies, he started having doubts about the Wahhabi version of Islam taught at Medina. He saw "inconsistencies" in some of his professors' teachings, he said, and was perplexed by the way they selectively chose scriptural stories to back up their ideas but left out others that contradicted them.

Determined to explore Islam on his own, Moore began reading respected ancient Muslim scholars whose views were contrary to the Wahhabi outlook. He also listened to a taped lecture by Hamza Yusuf, the founder of the Zaytuna Institute and a leading figure in the American Muslim community.

DOJ_NMG_0067312

"Sparks started to go off, like maybe [his Saudi professors were] pulling the wool over my eyes," Moore recalled thinking. "Maybe there is another version of Islamic history and another version of Islam."

When he started pulling away from the Wahhabi approach, some of his fellow students, including American and British colleagues, called Moore an unbeliever and an "innovator" -- a sin in Wahhabi thought.

In 1999, he decided to study Islam elsewhere and traveled to Mauritania, Morocco, Yemen and Egypt. He worked at an Islamic educational center in Abu Dhabi for a while. During his travels, he returned in the summer to study English and religious studies at George Mason University, where obtained a bachelor's degree in 2001.

To develop "a truly Muslim identity within the American context," Moore said, Muslims in the United States need to combine what is best from their Islamic traditions and their American culture.

Moore, who no longer shuns music, is looking forward to the rigors of Ramadan. Although his current reading assignments from St. John's include "King Lear" and "The Canterbury Tales," he said he will strive to complete the traditional Ramadan practice of reading the Koran, a book of more than 6,000 verses, "from cover to cover" over the next 30 days.

He also, of course, will be fasting from dawn to sunset, a sacrifice that the Koran teaches is prescribed for Muslims "in order that you should become God-conscious," Moore said.

"Ramadan is a very personal affair," he added, noting that no one but God knows if you are truly fasting or sneaking a bite to eat. "Everyone can see that you're praying," he said. "But fasting -- how can you tell?"

Emotional Wounds Require Focus, Too (USAT)

By James Key

USA Today, September 22, 2006

A few years ago, I experienced a very painful divorce. If it weren't for my faith and support of family and friends, I would still be an emotional wreck.

The past few years, I've tried to help military couples avoid some of the pitfalls I experienced during my marriage. But military couples, unlike their civilian counterparts, face added stresses. Constant military moves are tough enough, but when you add long-term and multiple deployments to the mix, even the strongest marriages can be tested.

Last April, when my Army unit was redeployed from Baghdad, military officials thought that the number of combat brigades in Iraq might be reduced later in the year. But President Bush's decision to increase the number of U.S. troops in war-torn Baghdad seems to have dashed any hopes for large, immediate withdrawals of American forces this year.

While our servicemen and women will continue to serve with distinction, these military uncertainties and separations can have an emotional impact on families. According to the U.S. Army, 6% of married officers and 3.5% of enlisted soldier got divorces in 2004. It is important to point out that the Army's overall divorce rate for 2000, before the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, was 2.2%.

To help ease the divorce problem, the Army has improved existing programs and introduced new ones:

•A two-day program followed by a retreat that helps couples develop better communication skills.

•A marriage education program that focuses specifically on issues that affect Reserve and National Guard couples.

•A family support group system that provides practical and emotional support for spouses of deployed soldiers.

•A program that includes briefings for soldiers on how their absence might affect their family relationships and how they can deal with changes that might have occurred during their deployment.

While daily U.S. troop deaths and political skirmishes over the direction of the Iraq war capture most of the headlines, it is incumbent upon our political leaders to remain cognizant of the emotional wounds soldiers could also be suffering in their marriages.

In the meantime, military chaplains, family-support groups and mental-health counselors will fill the gap to assist the spouses and children who have been left behind.

Spreading democracy in Iraq or any other hot spot must not come at the expense of military marriages. Helping our troops maintain healthy families is a human imperative that none of us can afford to ignore.

Capt. James Key, chaplain, is a brigade unit ministry trainer at Fort Irwin in California.

DOJ_NMG_0067313

Insurance Horror Stories (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

"When Steve and Leslie Shaeffer's daughter, Selah, was diagnosed at age 4 with a potentially fatal tumor in her jaw, they figured their health insurance would cover the bulk of her treatment costs." But "shortly after Selah's medical bills hit $20,000, Blue Cross stopped covering them and eventually canceled her coverage retroactively."

So begins a recent report in The Los Angeles Times titled "Sick but Insured? Think Again," which offers a series of similar horror stories, and suggests that these stories represent a growing trend: more and more health insurers are finding ways to yank your insurance when you get sick.

This trend helps explain something that has been puzzling me: why is the health insurance industry growing rapidly, even as it covers fewer Americans?

Between 2000 and 2005, the number of Americans with private health insurance coverage fell by 1 percent. But over the same period, employment at health insurance companies rose a remarkable 32 percent. What are all those extra employees doing?

Now we know at least part of the answer: they're working harder than ever at identifying people who really need medical care, and ensuring that they don't get it. In the past, they mainly concentrated on screening out applicants likely to get sick. Now, it seems, they're also devoting a lot of effort to finding pretexts for revoking insurance after they've already granted it. They typically do this by claiming that they weren't notified about some pre-existing condition, even if the insured wasn't aware of that condition when he or she bought the policy.

Welcome to the ugly world of American health care economics.

Health care is poised to become America's largest industry. Employment in manufacturing, which once dominated the economy, has fallen 18 percent since 2000, to 14.2 million. Meanwhile, employment in the private health services industry has risen 16 percent, to 12.6 million. Another 1.3 million people are employed at government hospitals. So we're quickly approaching the point at which more Americans will be employed delivering health care than are employed producing manufactured goods.

Yet even as health care becomes the core of the American economy, our system of paying for health care remains sick, and is getting sicker.

Because everyone faces some risk of incurring huge medical costs, only the superrich can afford to be without health insurance. Yet private insurers try to refuse coverage to those most likely to need it, and deny payment whenever they can get away with it.

The point isn't that they're evil or greedy (although you do wonder how the people who cut off the Schaeffers can look themselves in the mirror). The fact is that cruelty and injustice are the inevitable result of the current rules of the game. Blue Shield of California is a nonprofit insurance provider, yet as a spokesman put it, if his organization doesn't follow the for-profit practice of selectively covering only the healthiest people, "we will end up with all the high-risk people."

Now, before you panic about the state of your own coverage, you should know that the horror stories in The Los Angeles Times article all involve individual insurance; if your coverage comes via your employer, you're reasonably secure against sudden cancellation.

But employment-based insurance is in rapid decline, as employers balk at the cost and more and more companies adopt Wal-Mart-style minimal-benefit policies. That's why many people are turning to individual insurance — only to find out, in some cases, that they didn't get what they thought they paid for.

And here's the thing: it's all unnecessary.

Every other wealthy nation manages to provide almost all its citizens with guaranteed health insurance, while spending less on health care than we do. And there's no mystery why: we're paying the price for pointless, destructive reliance on private insurers. Medicare, which is a universal health insurance program for older Americans, spends less than 2 cents of every dollar on administrative costs, leaving 98 cents to pay for medical care. By contrast, private insurance companies spend only around 80 cents of each dollar in premiums on medical care; much of the remaining 20 cents is spent denying insurance to those who need it.

DOJ_NMG_0067314

If we had a universal system — Medicare for everyone — there would be no more horror stories like those reported by The Los Angeles Times. And we'd almost certainly spend less on health care than we do now.

Cars As Global Warming's Causes (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

THE CHARITABLE SPIN ON Bill Lockyer's lawsuit against major auto manufacturers is that it's a politically inspired, headline-grabbing stunt by a state attorney general running for state treasurer. The alternative — that he might actually believe this suit has legal merit — may be more frightening.

Lockyer's suit against the Big Six auto companies alleges that because vehicle exhaust contributes to global warming, the companies should be held financially liable for everything from wildfires to a bad ski season.

The suit is the latest salvo fired in the struggle between the state and the auto industry, which has separately sued the state over its attempts to curb global warming. But California shouldn't be in the business of filing meritless suits to gain leverage in other cases.

For Lockyer, this is hardly a first. He joined several other states two years ago to file an almost identical lawsuit over the emission of greenhouse gases by power companies. That suit was rejected by the courts; the states are appealing. The judge zeroed in neatly on the problem at hand: Fighting global warming is a complex regulatory job that belongs to the legislative and executive branches. Once laws are in place, companies that break those laws should be made to pay. But holding law-abiding companies liable for the government's past failures is another matter.

It's true that Congress and the Bush administration have irresponsibly shirked their responsibility on this matter, and a separate, legitimate lawsuit before the U.S. Supreme Court brought by California and several other states is seeking to force the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency to regulate carbon dioxide emissions. The federal government's lack of action was also a major factor in the Legislature's recent passage of AB 32, which sets the stage for reducing greenhouse gases 25% by 2020. These responses to federal inaction are appropriate; frivolous, extortion-style lawsuits against car makers are not. Lockyer's new lawsuit against auto makers is akin to suing fishermen for depleting the ocean, even when they stick scrupulously to fishing quotas.

Lockyer contends that vehicle emissions — even legal emissions — are an illegal public nuisance partly responsible for a lower snowpack, wildfires and a host of other ills, current and potential. But liability here is a dicey thing to prove. Studies link warming to worsening Western drought, but that says little about any individual fire. If an arsonist sets a match to dry brush, who is at fault, the criminal or the Camry?

Global warming is, well, global. If the ocean level rises or trees die in the forest, how much of the responsibility belongs to a car sold in the U.S. and how much to the dirty Chinese coal plant or deforestation in South America? Presumably, the driver of a Hummer is more liable than the driver of an electric vehicle — as long as the battery isn't recharged using energy produced by a polluting power plant.

Lockyer is right about the threat posed by climate change and our society's responsibility to stem the trend. But in this case, he has mounted a silly legal battle that trivializes a serious problem.

Mr. Ehrlich's Paper Chase (WP)

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

PROBLEMS IN voting on Maryland's primary day presented Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) with a choice: show the leadership expected of the state's top executive or succumb to the political motives of a candidate running for reelection. Unfortunately, it is Mr. Ehrlich the candidate who emerged with proposals certain to confuse the public and undermine confidence in voting for the Nov. 7 general election.

Mr. Ehrlich says he doesn't trust the state's electronic voting system, and so he wants to junk it. First he suggested paper ballots; when more level-headed officials pointed out there was no way, even if desired, to make that switch by Nov. 7, he proposed having everyone cast absentee ballots. Coming from someone who vetoed a bill that would expand the use of absentee ballots, the suggestion would be laughable if it were not so infuriating.

DOJ_NMG_0067315

Mr. Ehrlich's imagined connection between the problems experienced on primary day and the integrity of voting machines is simply wrong. Most of the problems on Sept. 12 resulted from human error: officials forgetting to deliver cards to operate machines, judges not showing up, workers failing to remove memory cards. The one big equipment problem had to do with the electronic poll books (used by poll workers to check voters off as they come in) and not, as Mr. Ehrlich might have you believe, with the machines voters use to cast their ballots.

In fact, not only did the touch-screen voting machines work largely without incident across the state in the recent primary, but this was not the first time they have been employed. In the 2002 election, when Mr. Ehrlich became governor, four counties -- including the state's largest, Montgomery -- used these units. In the 2004 presidential election, every locality except Baltimore City used them. So why is this an issue now?

Aides to Mr. Ehrlich explain that in recent years new information about the vulnerability of electronic voting to fraud has become available and that the governor is responding to those worries. We, too, have argued for a paper trail for machine voting, but this is hardly the time for dramatic reform. Democrats counter that Mr. Ehrlich wants to help his reelection by suppressing voter turnout in a largely Democratic state.

We have no way of knowing Mr. Ehrlich's intent, but we do believe that his words and actions are creating a sense of confusion that could discourage voting. Instead of setting up hypothetical problems and appealing to people's fears, Mr. Ehrlich should focus on identifying and fixing actual problems.

Iran Open To A Break In Nuclear Program (WP)

By Colum Lynch, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

But Ahmadinejad Demands 'Fair, Just' Conditions for Talks

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 22 -- Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Thursday that his government is prepared to consider suspending its controversial uranium-enrichment program if Western governments meet unspecified conditions.

The Iranian leader did not spell out Tehran's demands. But his remarks indicated that he is prepared to move ahead with preliminary discussions with European powers aimed at heading off a confrontation with the West.

"Our position on suspension is very clear," he told reporters at U.N. headquarters, where he is attending the United Nations' annual meeting of world leaders. "We have said that under fair conditions and just conditions, we will negotiate about it -- under fair and just conditions, I repeat."

The statement comes two days after the United States and five other key powers authorized the European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, to continue sessions with Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani. The two negotiators have been seeking to set the terms of formal talks on Iran's nuclear program that would place the United States and Iran at the same negotiating table.

The Iranian leader denied U.S. claims that he is pursuing a covert nuclear weapons program, saying that Iran's spiritual leader has issued a decree prohibiting such a development. He said Iran is simply exercising its rights, under the 1970 Non-Proliferation Treaty, to develop nuclear power to meet the country's growing energy needs.

"The bottom line is, we do not need a bomb," he said.

The United States, Britain, France, Germany, China and Russia have urged Iran to provide verifiable assurances that its nuclear program is peaceful. They pledged in June to offer Iran a broad range of commercial and political rewards in exchange for subjecting its nuclear program to greater international scrutiny.

The Security Council subsequently passed a resolution demanding that Iran suspend its enrichment of uranium and reprocessing of nuclear fuel by the end of August or face sanctions. Iran ignored the demand.

But U.S. efforts to impose sanctions stalled in the face of opposition from Russia, China and France. The Europeans, meanwhile, agreed to resume talks with Iran to break the impasse.

Ahmadinejad said the latest round of talks is "moving on the right track, unless . . . hopefully, others will not disrupt the work in small ways, perhaps. We think that it is a constructive path to take."

DOJ_NMG_0067316

But he also accused the West of reneging on previous agreements to support Iran's efforts to develop a nuclear power program. He said Tehran is now seeking assurances that the United States and its European partners will provide enforceable guarantees that they will abide by any agreements they ultimately make in formal negotiations. "We need to know who the parties to the negotiations are, and what the prerogatives and the responsibilities of each are, and what guarantees there are on enforcement measures," Ahmadinejad said.

Iran Won't Be Forced Into Talks Over Nuclear Plans, Leader Says (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

UNITED NATIONS -- Iran's president continued to dodge questions about his country's nuclear ambitions, saying Tehran is willing to negotiate over -- and maybe even suspend -- its uranium-enrichment program, but not under pressure and only under "fair conditions."

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's remarks during a rambling news conference added further uncertainty to a challenge that has stymied the U.S., Europe, Russia and China all summer: how to nudge Iran into talks over the future of its nuclear program, or punish it if it refuses to go along.

Once again Iran appears to have offered just enough encouragement to keep the threat of sanctions at bay, but not enough to make it clear when or if actual talks might begin.

For now, the decision is to give Iran more time. After resolving in July to give Iran until Aug. 31 to stop its enrichment work, the U.S., France, Britain, Russia, China and Germany have set a new deadline of sometime in early October, though without clear agreement on a fixed date.

Meanwhile, European Union officials say that EU foreign-policy chief Javier Solana is prepared to travel anywhere in the world to sit down with his Iranian counterpart, Ali Larijani, to discuss conditions for these talks. Mr. Larijani declined to come to New York this week for talks with Mr. Solana.

U.S. officials say the patience of Washington and other key capitals will wear out within a few weeks. It is unclear what will happen once the patience runs out.

British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett underscored that lack of clear consequence when she told reporters Wednesday that "if things just drag on as they have been, then as I say, there are concerns and constraints about how long that can continue."

Signs are emerging, however, that some countries in Europe may be willing to allow Iran to keep at least some enrichment activity, a move that the U.S. has opposed in the past.

After meeting yesterday with Mr. Ahmadinejad, Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi said in a statement that "Ahmadinejad insisted on Iran's right to go ahead in research in the nuclear field, and I insisted on the need for a complete halt in the military aspect of the research," indicating that the EU is prepared to allow Iran to continue on strictly scientific research.

In remarks to reporters, Mr. Ahmadinejad also warned that any pressure could derail recent talks between Europe and Iran over commencing more-formal negotiations. "Hopefully others will not disrupt the work -- in small ways perhaps," he said, apparently alluding to U.S. threats to move ahead on U.N. sanctions.

The Iranian leader said his nation was ready for talks "under fair conditions and just conditions." Above all, he said he wanted there to be "guarantees of enforcement" for whatever might be agreed on.

He insisted again that his country had no aims to make a nuclear weapon and urged the U.S. to give up its nuclear arsenal. He also laughed at all the talk of uranium enrichment. "It would seem that this enrichment word has become the lingua franca of our day," he said, arguing that the U.S. wants to stop this work largely to impede Iran's scientific development.

The U.S. and its partners suspect that Iran is pursuing the technology involved in enriching uranium in order to make a nuclear bomb. They want Iran to set that work aside and agree to supply any future nuclear plants with fuel acquired from outside sources such as Russia.

Iranian President In Spotlight (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel

DOJ_NMG_0067317

McClatchy Newspapers, September 22, 2006

UNITED NATIONS - Grinning and giving brisk little salutes, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad denied Thursday that Iran wants a nuclear bomb and said it might discuss suspending uranium enrichment if the conditions are fair.

During an hour-long press conference here, Ahmadinejad declined to repeat his threat that Israel should be "wiped off the map." But he railed against Zionists and suggested that several thousand mainly Jewish protesters who demonstrated against his presence in New York City might have been paid to attend. He also called for a referendum on the future of the land that constitutes Israel and the Palestinian areas.

Smiling from the start, Ahmadinejad quoted the Quran and apologized to New York's residents for the inconvenience his and other leaders' motorcades caused during the annual U.N. General Assembly.

At one point, he called America "a great nation."

With his face on the cover of Time magazine and his every word and movement followed by hordes of journalists, this has clearly been Ahmadinejad's week.

His combination of breezy confidence and sometimes slippery answers underscored the challenge President Bush faces in trying to halt Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program.

Ahmadinejad was just one of the world leaders who denounced Bush's foreign policies from the rostrum in the General Assembly hall this week.

But Iran poses a special challenge. It has vast oil and gas deposits, possesses an advanced nuclear research program, supports terrorist groups such as Hezbollah and can threaten U.S. troops across its borders in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The United States, European nations, Russia and China this week set another deadline - the first week of October - for Iran to respond on whether it will stop enriching uranium, which, if made pure enough, could fuel an atomic bomb.

A previous deadline, Aug. 31, came and went. But with Iran dangling the possibility of talks, Bush had little choice but to submit to other nations' desire to give diplomacy every last chance, U.S. officials said privately.

"We're in extra innings," Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, the State Department's point man on Iran, said this week.

But Ahmadinejad didn't seem to be in any hurry to deliver the final pitch.

Asked repeatedly whether Iran would suspend uranium enrichment, he complained: "I don't see why so many people are so sensitive about this `enrichment' word.

"We have said under fair conditions and just conditions, we will negotiate about it," he said.

At another point, he said flatly: "The bottom line is, we do not need a bomb, unlike what others think."

A senior U.S. official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said there appeared to be growing divisions within the Iranian government about whether to accept a European-U.S. offer. In turn for the enrichment freeze, Iran would get talks on a package of economic and security incentives. The United States has promised to join the talks for the first time.

But if Ahmadinejad's performance here was any indication, even if Tehran agrees to join negotiations, the talks could be frustrating, torturous and maybe unfruitful.

The Iranian leader spent 15 minutes answering the first question at the press conference.

Asked what guarantees he could provide that Iran didn't seek Israel's destruction or a nuclear bomb, the Iranian leader boomeranged the question back at the United States. He embarked on a lengthy review of how Washington has sought to strangle Iran's Islamic revolution since its 1979 birth.

"Today, the pretext happens to be the nuclear issue," he said.

As for proof that Iran isn't interested in nuclear weapons, he said: "I am at a loss to understand what else we need to do to provide guarantees."

Ahmadinejad, 49, was little known outside of Iran when he was elected president last year. He quickly shocked much of the world by questioning whether the Holocaust took place and calling for Israel's destruction.

But while some early commentators portrayed him as an amateur who might not stay in power long, he's proved so far to be a shrewd politician.

Several thousand supporters of Israel rallied Wednesday to protest his presence and call for the release of two Israeli reserve soldiers kidnapped in mid-July by Iranian-backed Hezbollah.

DOJ_NMG_0067318

Ahmadinejad pondered out loud whether "some of these people were paid."

He insisted he wasn't "anti-Jew." As for the question of a future country for the Palestinians, he said, "It's wrong to think this is a problem with me, with Ahmadinejad as a humble person. No, it is a global problem."

He was asked three times whether Iran would halt arms shipments to Hezbollah, which the U.N. Security Council called for to cement the cease-fire in Lebanon. He never gave a clear answer.

Iran Leader Uses U.N. To Improve Image (AP)

By Scheherezade Faramarzi

AP, September 22, 2006

Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad seems to be enjoying the spotlight at this year's U.N. General Assembly, easing his way into the international arena and trying to improve his image amid the controversy over his nuclear program and remarks about Israel and the Holocaust.

When an Israeli reporter challenged him into answering a question at a news conference Thursday, Ahmadinejad at first stalled, whispered in Farsi to an adviser to skip the reporter, but then reluctantly gave his response.

He showed no such courtesy to an Israeli reporter during a news briefing here last year, his first appearance at the annual ministerial meetings after he was elected in June 2005.

On Thursday, he explained that when he called for the destruction of Israel and dismissed the Holocaust as a myth, his issue was not with the Jewish people but with Zionists, "who are not Jews."

"We love everyone in the world — Jews, Christians, Muslims, non-Muslims, non-Jews, non-Christians," he said, adding "we are against ugly acts."

"Everyone is respected. But I repeat, we are against aggression, occupation, killings. ... We declare this in a loud voice," he said.

But Yaniv Halily, a reporter with Israel's Yediot Ahronot was not impressed.

"He's trying to portray an image of a nice guy after all the things he said about Israel. Now he knows everyone thinks he's a bad guy," said Halily.

"He may sound nicer on the surface, but on the inside he's the same," said Kamran Dadkhah, an economics professor at Northeastern University in Boston.

Ahmadinejad was vague when asked if Iran would stop arming Hezbollah and comply with a U.N. Security Council resolution to disarm the Lebanese guerrilla group, which fought a 34-day war with Israel this summer. He said Iran gives only spiritual and cultural support to the Shiite Muslim group.

"We support ... peace and permanent stability in Lebanon, and we will fall short of no measure in promoting this goal. Whether it's in the cultural or spiritual support that we can render or whether it is the role that we can play in the international arena, we will do our best. And this is the fundamental principle of our foreign policy, and it does not preclude Lebanon," he said.

At the news conference, Ahmadinejad also expressed love and affection for the American people, just as President Bush reached out to the Iranian people in his General Assembly speech on Tuesday. Ahmadinejad said he wished he had more time here to spend with them in person.

"The people of the United States are highly respected by us," he said. "Many people in the United States believe in God and believe in justice." He thanked the New York City police and security forces for protecting him during his stay here and apologized to New Yorkers for traffic disruptions from the arrival of world leaders to attend the U.N. General Assembly session.

He reserved his harsh words for the U.S. government, which is pushing to impose diplomatic and economic sanctions against Iran if it does not suspend uranium enrichment.

"It's not the nuclear bomb that the American government is worried about, for there are countries in our region that are armed with a nuclear bomb and are incidentally supported by the U.S. government. Now, how is this?" said Ahmadinejad.

Using a Persian expression to demonstrate U.S. double-standard, the Iranian leader said:

"In Iran, we say there are two skies over a roof, or two kinds of wind running over the same ceiling. It doesn't seem plausible.

DOJ_NMG_0067319

"We say if fuel cycle for peaceful purposes is something good, then it should be good for everyone. If it's a bad thing, it's bad for everyone," he said.

Ahmadinejad said the United States' objection to Iran's nuclear program — which he claims is for peacefully purposes only — was essentially aimed at aborting his country's progress. And he said if the world stops treating his country as a subordinate, then things might be different.

"If they recognize that we too, as a nation, have rights ... the concerns too will be removed," he said.

He said his country was ready to negotiate a suspension of uranium enrichment.

"We have said that under fair conditions and just conditions, we will negotiate about it," he said.

But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Iran must suspend its uranium enrichment and reprocessing before any full-fledged negotiations.

"Iran has been told by the international community ... that they should suspend and if they suspend the negotiations can begin. It's as simple as that. I don't think we need any further conditionality," she told reporters after a Security Council meeting on Mideast peace.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov was guardedly optimistic.

"The chance is there, and the chance is not too slim. But for this chance to be realized in practical terms we need efforts on both sides, and we need good will," he told The Associated Press in an interview.

He also said he hoped a meeting between Iran's top nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani and European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana would take place soon. But he rejected the idea of imposing a new deadline after the Iranians missed the Aug. 31 U.N.-imposed deadline to stop enriching uranium, which can be used in producing nuclear energy or weapons.

"I think that artificial timeframes do not work," he said. "The quality of the agreement is much more important, and especially in this particular case there is no objective reason for any ultra-rush if you wish."

Although the Iranian president seemed to tone down his rhetoric about Israel, he did not retract his earlier remarks. He said he was even puzzled by the controversy.

"It seems to me that I face this question wherever I go," he said. "And I have always been ready to answer."

Iran's Leader Skirts Issue Of Disbanding Hezbollah (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 21 — Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the Iranian president, refused to say Thursday whether he would comply with a Security Council demand for the disarmament and disbanding of Hezbollah, the Tehran-backed guerrilla group that fought a 34-day war with Israel.

"I'd like to say that Lebanon's affairs are its own affairs, and we don't want to interfere," he said, when asked about the resolution that ended the combat in Lebanon last month.

He was also evasive about whether Iran would comply with the resolution's call for an arms embargo to keep Hezbollah from rearming.

He said that the United Nations Charter gave people the right to defend themselves and that "we give spiritual support to all those who want to uphold their rights."

Mr. Ahmadinejad spoke at a wide-ranging news conference in a packed United Nations conference hall in which he also reiterated Iran's denial that it was pursuing a nuclear weapon and chastised Western countries for trying to curb Iran's right to pursue nuclear energy. "Iran considers the nuclear issue a political one," he said. "They're not concerned about the bomb, they want to stop the development of our country."

Asked about his threat to wipe Israel off the map, he argued that his criticism of Israel had been misinterpreted as a rejection of Jews. "These Zionists are not Jews," he said. "This is the biggest deception we have faced. They are a power group, a power party. We oppose any group that seeks raw power."

He said Iran "loves everyone around the world, Jews, Christians, Muslims." But, returning to Israel, he said, "We announce and declare loudly that you will be condemned by the rest of the world if you displace people from their homes."

DOJ_NMG_0067320

His attitude was less belligerent than it had been in his speech to the General Assembly on Tuesday evening. He was dressed in what has become his signature light gray jacket over open-necked pink shirt. He smiled frequently, alluding to universal desires for love, justice, peace and happiness, and even apologizing to New Yorkers whom he had seen out his car window having to wait for his motorcade to pass before they could cross the street.

As in his General Assembly address, he depicted Iran as a growing country impatient with the current United Nations order that, he said, gave undeserved authority to the nations that won World War II and limited respect to the countries like Iran that had arisen since.

"When you look at the Security Council, we see that some members of the Council are in fact party to many conflicts around the world," he said. Even though these countries created the problems, he said, under current arrangements "they nevertheless sit in judgment of world affairs."

Bill Clinton: U.S. Should Talk To Iran (AP)

AP, September 22, 2006

Former President Clinton said Thursday the U.S. should try talking to Iran about its nuclear weapons ambitions without imposing a lot of conditions.

"If you think you might have trouble with somebody, and God forbid if you think it could lead to a military confrontation, then there needs to be the maximum amount of contact beforehand," Clinton said in an interview with NBC's "Today" show.

The Bush administration has refused to hold direct talks with Iran until it agrees to suspend enrichment of uranium, which the U.S. fears will be used to build nuclear weapons.

"The United States should not be afraid to talk to anyone. They should not be reluctant and shouldn't have too many conditions," said Clinton, who said his own offer to meet with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's predecessor had been rebuffed.

The U.S. and allies have offered Iran a package of incentives in return for its agreement to stop uranium enrichment. But Iran has given no definitive response and missed an Aug. 31 U.N. Security Council deadline to halt uranium enrichment, which Iran says is for generating electricity.

Iran and the United States have had no direct diplomatic relations since 1979. That's when Iranian students stormed the U.S. Embassy in Tehran and held its occupants hostage for 444 days to protest Washington's refusal to hand over the toppled shah, Mohammad Reza Pahlavi.

President Bush and Ahmadinejad used separate appearances at the U.N. General Assembly in New York this week to spar over Tehran's nuclear program, but they avoided any personal contact.

In May, Ahmadinejad sent a letter seeking a debate with Bush, but it was laced with old grievances against America and included a long list of Iranian demands.

Clinton said although he would like to see more negotiation with Iran, Bush's reluctance to personally meet with Ahmadinejad was understandable.

"I think we should have some contacts with them," Clinton said. "I'm not sure the president is the place to start."

In an interview broadcast Thursday on National Public Radio, Clinton said, " ... I still believe that, based on all my Iranian friends in America, what they say is that the vast majority of Iranian citizens want to have good relationships with the United States and the West and do not want to be at odds."

"But they all believe basically that if any other country has a right to nuclear power, they do too, so we have to work through that and I, I hope we can do it in a peaceful way," he said.

US Cautions Europe On Iran Investment (CSM)

By Mark Rice-oxley

The Christian Science Monitor, September 22, 2006

American attempts to persuade Europe to think again about financial involvement in Iran may be starting to bear fruit, according to European banking officials. Whether such "back-door sanctions" will work is far less apparent, experts say.

DOJ_NMG_0067321

Troubled by a lack of speedy progress in the UN toward imposing economic sanctions on Iran over its suspect nuclear program, the US has stepped up efforts this month to persuade allies to shun Iran's financial system, claiming that Iran may tap banks to illicitly finance terror operations or the purchase of materials for nuclear weapons.

Already, the US has blacklisted the Iranian Bank Saderat. And last week, Stuart Levey, undersecretary of the Treasury for terrorism and financial intelligence, hopped through Britain, France, Switzerland, Italy, and Germany to urge Europeans to be wary in Iran, a message underscored by Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson at the recent G-7 meeting in Singapore.

"We wanted to provide our counterparts and financial leaders with information about how Iran uses and abuses the financial system in support of terrorism and proliferation, and wanted to hear of the risk they were hearing," says Molly Millerwise, a spokeswoman for Mr. Levey, adding that he found a receptive audience in Europe.

Europe has long taken a softer line toward Iran than the US, and has essayed a soft-power approach to its nuclear program, persisting with negotiations. Its companies, particularly German and French, rack up billions of euros' worth of exports each year, with a considerable presence in the oil, automotive, retail, and telecommunication sectors.

And while the EU is spearheading a delicate mission in southern Lebanon that might aggravate relations with Hizbullah and its Iranian backers, experts say the experience is unlikely to change its geopolitical strategy in the region.

"Europe will do what is in its own interest," says Hossein Askari, an Iran expert at George Washington University. "In the long run, Europe is going to have to import gas, and apart from Russia, the most competitive gas will come from Iran," Professor Askari adds.

Yet some European bankers are growing wary of the risk of doing business in Iran. Two of Europe's largest banks have recently decided to ramp down decisively their involvement in Iran. UBS canceled business with individuals, companies, and banks in the country earlier this year; Credit Suisse is conducting a "controlled withdrawal" by refusing new business.

Both banks are firm that they took their decisions independently, though UBS, fined by Congress two years ago for its dealings with Iran and other blacklisted countries, says it pays close attention to the US. "Of course banks listen to what the US says, because for most banks the US is an important partner," says Serge Steiner, a spokesman. "Most European banks wouldn't react like this - the US says something and they implement it. But that doesn't mean we don't listen. "

Although bankers say they are governed by business calculations, not US political pressure, the two may not be unconnected. Growing qualms about Iran's nuclear program and financial support for Hizbullah mean there are greater risks for firms doing business there. As Georg Soentgerath of Credit Suisse says: "It was our decision, made in the light of the increase in political, financial, and reputational risk."

Levey says this is what the US is trying to get at. Recently, he noted that even financial institutions not formally bound to follow US law closely observe US financial measures directed at individuals, key regime members, front companies, financial institutions, and corrupt charities.

"Keeping a few customers that we have identified as terrorists or proliferators is not worth the risk of facing public scrutiny or a regulatory action that may impact on their ability to do business with the United States or the responsible international financial community," he said.

But however many Europeans the US manages to enlist to its "coalition of the shilling," it may not be enough. Iranian leaders have begun moving assets away from European banks to alternative repositories in the Gulf, experts note.

Ali Ansari, with London's Chatham House think tank, argues that the only way to make financial sanctions bite "is if you have much greater international coordination, including with other countries in the Middle East and Asia."

"The Americans talk about economic and financial sanctions a lot because they don't have much at stake" in Iran, he adds. "EU countries are more anxious not to lose that business. And the Iranians are saying, 'You are more scared than we are because of our oil. We guarantee you will lose more than we will lose.' "

Experts say international sanctions have never really had the desired impact. "They have almost never been very successful in getting governments to change behavior," says Geoffrey Underhill, of Amsterdam University. South Africa was an exception, he says, as it was a partial democracy with a business community sensitive to outside pressure. But in Iran, "you are talking about an authoritarian regime that is very good at diverting the effects of sanctions so that the regime doesn't pay."

"If the Europeans are not convinced, any sanctions are going to be less effective," he adds.

DOJ_NMG_0067322

"If you can get the whole world against Iran, then you have a chance," says Professor Askari. But persuading even allies like Germany and Japan, with formidable investments in Iran, will be tough. Then, there is the wider Muslim world, through which Iran is thought to be funneling its petrobillions. "I don't think you'll get a Muslim coalition. Everyone knows this, so they'll be reluctant to join sanctions they know are going to be ineffective."

U.N. Charades (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Hugo Chávez and Mahmoud Ahmadinejad put on quite a show at the United Nations this week, and it's tempting to dismiss it all as mere bombast. Except that their assertiveness can't be separated from the more important U.N. story this week, which is its continuing failure to come to grips with Iran's open defiance of the Security Council's demand that it suspend uranium enrichment.

At issue is whether the U.N. can have any role in enforcing collective security -- and the mystery is why the very nations that say the U.N. must do so are doing the most to undermine it. Consider the behavior of Russia, France and China -- all veto-wielding members of the Security Council -- in squaring up to the Iranian threat.

In July, the Council adopted Resolution 1696, which noted "with serious concern that . . . Iran has not taken the steps required of it by the [International Atomic Energy Agency] Board of Governors." The Council went on to express "its intention . . . to adopt appropriate measures under Article 41 of Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations to persuade Iran to comply with this resolution. . . ." Article 41 refers to all legally binding measures short of war -- sanctions, that is -- to bring states into compliance with U.N. resolutions. The Resolution said Iran must cease enriching uranium by August 31, a deadline Tehran has openly flouted.

So, serious consequences? Not quite. Chinese Middle East envoy Sun Bigan has rejected sanctions on Iran as "detrimental not only to the region but also to ourselves" -- the latter a reference to China's oil imports from Iran, up 56% from last year. Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov -- who is selling Iran a $700 million air-defense system -- also says sanctions won't work. That sentiment was echoed earlier this week by France's Jacques Chirac, whom the Bush Administration has claimed is a stalwart ally in stopping Iran. "I am never favorable to sanctions," said the French President, adding that, if they are unavoidable, they should be "moderate and adapted."

In other words, it has taken less than a month for the deadline set by Resolution 1696 to prove to be absolutely meaningless, something Mr. Ahmadinejad predicted in April. Why then would the Permanent Five risk their credibility as an institution by setting a deadline in the first place? Why threaten sanctions if they have no intention of imposing them?

The answer may be that U.N. diplomacy has come to serve as a deterrent not against Iran but against any American effort to do anything about Iran's rush to acquire the bomb. Iran's nuclear programs are accelerating under this diplomatic cover, as its inauguration of a heavy-water nuclear plant late last month shows. Heavy-water reactors are the kind that throw off more weapons-usable fuel. The Iranian newspaper Siyasat-e Ruz underlined that event as evidence of the "worthlessness of this American resolution."

Meanwhile, the "cowboy" American President looks increasingly like the one who's been lassoed by the U.N., not vice versa. In 2003, the U.S. agreed to downplay clear evidence that Iran was cheating on its nuclear nonproliferation treaty commitments in order to give European diplomacy a chance. The U.S. continued to do so even after it became clear that the Iranians continued to cheat well into 2004.

Later that year, the Administration went along with another European negotiation, which collapsed after six months. Earlier this year, President Bush agreed in principle to negotiate directly with Tehran, provided it suspend enrichment. He has also repeatedly underlined the point, most recently in this week's speech to the General Assembly, that the U.S. does not oppose Iran's bid to develop civilian nuclear power sources.

Throughout all this, the Administration has consistently deferred, both in timing and tactics, to Europe, Russia, the IAEA, and now the Security Council. Its single insistence is that the international community demonstrate good faith in its ostensible commitment to prevent Iran from developing a nuclear weapon. But that good faith has been conspicuously absent, raising the question about who is really serious about giving the U.N. a chance to show its "relevance."

DOJ_NMG_0067323

The conclusion is hard to resist that the U.N. effort is really about persuading America that it can "live with" an Iranian bomb, just as it lives with a Pakistani bomb, because the costs of economic sanctions or military strikes are supposedly prohibitive. But a glimpse of what the world will look like if Iran succeeds was provided on Tuesday by Gamal Mubarak, the son of Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak. Cairo's heir apparent floated a proposal for Egypt to develop its own nuclear programs, clearly a signal that the largest Sunni Arab country will go nuclear itself to prevent Shiite Iran from dominating the region. And where Egypt goes, Saudi Arabia and Turkey cannot be far behind. Is the international system really prepared to live with five, maybe six, nuclear powers in the Middle East?

The media portrayed this week's U.N. speeches as a soap opera showdown between Mr. Bush and his adversaries. But in the matter of Iran's nuclear ambitions, it is not only the Middle East that is at risk, but the U.N., which is why Messrs. Chávez and Ahmadinejad felt so free to mock its evident failures.

Anti-Americanism Is Providing A Glue (LAT)

By Paul Richter, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

The rhetoric from the leaders of Iran, Sudan and Venezuela at the U.N. shared a theme of outrage at the U.S., despite their differences.

WASHINGTON — The outpouring of anti-American rhetoric at the United Nations this week is demonstrating how anger at the United States is uniting the developing world in a way not seen since the 1980s, U.S. officials and analysts say.

Leaders such as Venezuela's Hugo Chavez, Sudan's Omar Hassan Ahmed Bashir and Iran's Mahmoud Ahmadinejad are divided by background and political philosophies, but they spoke as one at the General Assembly regarding perceived U.S. bullying and misdeeds.

Chavez denounced the "imperialist empire," Ahmadinejad railed against U.S. officials' pretensions to be the "rulers of the world," and Bashir complained about powerful intruders trampling his country's sovereignty.

"There's a new sense of the oppressed versus the oppressor," said a senior U.S. official, who asked to remain unnamed. "What they have in common is their hatred of the U.S., and it's created this solidarity across Third World lines."

That solidarity hasn't been seen in the developing world since leftist liberation movements faded after the collapse of the Soviet Union, he said.

The fallout from the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq and other Bush administration policies may be particularly visible in the new bonds between many Muslim nations and populist regimes of South America, an alliance that some call the "axis of the south."

Chavez has become a hero among Muslims, flattered with huge posters in Beirut and given lavish coverage in the news media from Morocco to Pakistan.

Anti-Americanism was the overarching theme last week in Havana at a 118-nation summit of the Non-Aligned Movement, whose headliners included Ahmadinejad, Chavez and Bolivian President Evo Morales. The leaders embodied a burgeoning spirit of defiance toward "the worldwide dictatorship by the United States," declared Cuban Vice President Carlos Lage Davila.

There is little doubt of the deepening unpopularity of the United States, even among longtime allies. Though the U.S. government has doubled its spending on public diplomacy, a poll this year by the Pew Charitable Trusts showed wide dissatisfaction with a central pillar of U.S. foreign policy, the "war against terrorism."

When people in largely Muslim nations were asked whether they approved of "U.S.-led efforts to fight terrorism," 82% in Egypt said no, as did 74% in Jordan, 77% in Turkey and 50% in Pakistan. The results in some European countries were similar. In Spain, 76% of those surveyed said they did not approve; in France, it was 57%.

U.S. officials say they don't believe the growing Third World solidarity constitutes a strategic threat.

Though Chavez visits Iran and Syria, and talks about defense ties, oil sales and economic deals with these countries, North Korea and others, administration officials take the view that the Venezuelan's declarations are mostly posturing to create an impression at home that he has stature as a world leader.

DOJ_NMG_0067324

The administration acknowledges that such contacts reinforce anti-Americanism and add to the already sobering public diplomacy challenge. "It creates this impression that everybody is rising up against the Americans, and that's a problem," said the senior U.S. official.

Some outsiders say these new bonds are more than an image problem.

Chavez, for example, has won substantial support from Latin American governments for his bid to win a nonpermanent seat on the U.N. Security Council, even as the Bush administration has campaigned to have the seat go to the friendlier Guatemala. If Venezuela wins, the United States, in addition to facing a barrage of rhetoric, will have a harder time collecting the votes it needs on the council.

This Third World solidarity also has made it easier for Bashir to block a U.N. peacekeeping deployment in the Darfur region of his country, said Lee Feinstein of the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington.

Bashir "has succeeded in interfering with the U.N. deployment by depicting this as an old-fashioned 'us versus the United States,' " said Feinstein, a senior State Department official during the Clinton administration. "The American ability to credibly rally the international community on behalf of the vulnerable in Darfur has been eroded by this unpopularity."

Feinstein said that in drawing together these parts of the world, U.S. unpopularity "has created real diplomatic problems for the country, many of them second-order, but also some big ones."

The State Department has sought to not overreact to the efforts of Chavez and others to forge such alliances, but domestic pressure has been building from conservatives for U.S. diplomats to do more about the situation.

Prominent Republican lawmakers regularly ask State Department officials what more diplomacy can do about Chavez's efforts to build power alliances. And it is clear that this week's outpouring of anger in New York has spread alarm in some quarters and will bring more pressure for the administration to react.

"The Non-Aligned Movement threw down the gauntlet to U.S. global power this week," said Nile Gardiner, a foreign policy analyst at the conservative Heritage Foundation in Washington. "This is a huge public diplomacy challenge, but also a strategic threat." He said Chavez's words were "the strongest attack from any foreign leader on U.S. soil in decades."

Still, analysts and U.S. officials point out that though the shared anti-Americanism of these countries is striking, so too are their differences.

Although advocates of this "axis of the south" describe it as similar to the leftist liberation movements of 20 years ago and earlier, Arab leaders and Africans do not generally share their leftist leanings. And Chavez has yet to win the leadership role in Latin America he craves.

Feinstein said that even though the withering denunciations by Chavez and Ahmadinejad drew applause this week, overall, members of the United Nations were much more united behind American-style views of democracy and economics than they had ever been.

"Opposition has hardened into anti-Americanism and shifted government policy in many places around the world, but the U.N.'s membership is much more in sync with traditional U.S. foreign policy goals and ideals than at any time since the U.N.'s founding," he said. "The tragedy is, the Bush administration hasn't been able to take advantage of that fact."

Chavez To Double Energy Subsidies To Needy In U.S. (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

NEW YORK — A day after he called President Bush "the devil" from the podium at the United Nations, Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez stood at the altar of a Harlem church and presented himself as an angel, offering 100 million gallons of subsidized heating oil to needy Americans.

"It makes us feel good to give," he said to a crowd of mostly Harlem residents and Latin American immigrants waving Venezuelan flags and chanting his name.

The move more than doubles the 40 million gallons of heating oil Chavez donated to eight northeastern states last year after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita devastated refineries and caused the price of oil to soar. This winter, the program should reach about 1.2 million people in nine additional states, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0067325

Chavez, speaking at the Mount Olivet Baptist Church, acknowledged that it might seem odd for a developing country to send charity to one of the world's wealthiest nations.

"Some Venezuelans criticize me…. Some say I should be in the barrios of Caracas," he said. "Apparently I am giving away all over the world what belongs to Venezuela."

But the public relations value of tweaking his nemesis, President Bush? Priceless.

"We are afraid we won't be able to heat our building this winter, and someone told me about this guy," said Arthur Rena McDowell, a florist. "Somebody has got to make it better. It should start with our president, but it is starting with the president of Venezuela."

Harlem is the latest place where Venezuelan oil has created warm feelings toward the outspoken leftist leader. Venezuela already exports 1.5 million barrels a day to the United States.

It is able to use its oil wealth to bolster ties and influence in other countries in the region, especially to gain their favor. That could prove useful in the current U.N. contest between Venezuela and Guatemala to represent Latin America in the Security Council for the next two years. Washington, suspecting that Chavez would use the U.N. bully pulpit to rally opposition to U.S. interests, has been lobbying for Guatemala.

Chavez boasted of "walking around the world" to build ties and barter oil, describing what he got in exchange: pregnant cows from Bolivia, medical equipment from Argentina and 20,000 doctors from Cuba.

In Harlem, he received not only a warm welcome but the symbolic echo of Cuban President Fidel Castro's visits to the same neighborhood in 1960 and 1965, signaling that he is taking on Castro's mantle of anti-Americanism as the aging Cuban leader's health falters.

Wearing his signature red shirt, Chavez spoke for more than an hour at the altar next to a screen flashing the logo of Citgo, a Venezuelan-owned oil company based in Houston. Citgo is partnering with Citizens Energy Corp., a program run by former Rep. Joseph P. Kennedy II, which sells and distributes discounted home heating oil to low-income families.

Kennedy did not attend the event Thursday.

Chavez, encouraged by a rousing response after he made another reference to Bush as the devil, played to the crowd, calling the president "an alcoholic and a sick man," and imitating what he called Bush's cowboy swagger.

Chavez repeated threats to suspend oil exports to the United States, its biggest customer, if the U.S. government tried to oust him from power.

"One day, the people of the United States will choose a president with whom we can talk," he said. "You don't know how much I would like to have as a friend the president of the United States."

Chávez Courts U.S. Poor, Offers To Expand Heating Oil Program (MH)

By Pablo Bachelet

The Miami Herald, September 22, 2006

NEW YORK - Chávez offers more

low-cost oil to poor

Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez convened New York's underprivileged in Harlem on Thursday to tout a discounted oil program, a day after he triggered an uproar with his speech attacking President Bush at the United Nations.

The leftist populist leader visited Harlem to announce an expansion of his discounted heating oil program for U.S. poor and elderly. More than 450,000 households will be offered 100 million gallons of heating oil at a 40 percent discount, Chávez told a cheering crowd. Last year, 40 million gallons were offered to states, mostly in the Northeast.

Chávez said the program would benefit residents in 17 states, including Massachusetts, New York, Virginia and Indiana. Native Americans throughout the country will also benefit, Chávez said.

Inside the neo-roman styled Mount Olivet Baptist Church, a large screen flashed the logo of CITGO Petroleum, which is controlled by the Venezuelan government. Activists in red T-shirts with the words "Democracy in Revolution" emblazoned in front handed out Venezuelan flags and Chávez presidential campaign posters promising ``seven more years, for now."

Outside, a small group of protesters denounced Chávez as the "new pet" of Cuban leader Fidel Castro.

DOJ_NMG_0067326

This was Chávez's second visit to a low-income area of New York. Last year, Chávez visited the Bronx, in what was an echo of Castro's visit there decades before. In 1960, Castro spoke at the U.N. and stayed in Harlem.

But if Chavez's visit last year passed largely unnoticed, Mount Olivet was teeming with U.S. media on Thursday, prepped by Chávez's now infamous U.N. reference to Bush as ``the devil."

In his speech, Chávez said he received death threats but said his destiny was ``in God's hands."

"Some say I am a tyrant," he said, ``but what we are doing in Venezuela is transferring power to the people."

Chávez had few allies after his U.N. speech. House Democratic leader Rep. Nancy Pelosi, one of Bush's sharpest critics, called the Venezuelan leader ``an everyday thug."

The Democrat who represents Harlem, Rep. Charles Rangel, told journalists, ``You don't come into my country, you don't come into my congressional district, and you don't condemn my president."

Chávez did not moderate his tone, although the first hour of his 90-minute address meandered from praise for genetically modified Argentine cows to the "genocide" wrought by European descendants on indigenous groups and the contributions of Cuban doctors to Venezuela's health system.

Then he lashed out at Bush again, calling him an alcoholic. "It pains me to say it," he said, ``but it is the truth."

Bush says he stopped drinking in 1986.

There was plenty of praise for Chávez at the Harlem event. Actor Danny Glover introduced Chávez as ``a very visionary man."

Ian Erlich, a youthful co-chairman of the Alaska Inter-Tribal Council, which struck a cheap oil deal with CITGO, says his tribe -- located in the Aleutian Ranges above the Arctic Circle -- pays up to $7 for a gallon of oil.

"Where are the oil executives from Alaska? Where are the politicians?'' he asked.

Some people, such as Barbara Heard, did not come for politics. She will retire from her postal job in February and will depend more on her two-unit building she rents out for income. She was wondering if the CITGO program will reduce the $5,000 heating bill she paid last winter.

The Bush administration has called the CITGO program a positive gesture by a U.S. corporation, although State Department spokesman Eric Watnik pointed out that the U.S. government handed out "hundreds of millions of dollars to a much larger group of Americans" through federal programs.

CITGO CEO Félix Rodríguez told the Harlem gathering that the company was not acting out of political motivation. It was a sincere gesture of help and "a small grain of sand" that he hoped would motivate other oil companies to do the same.

Many who attended the event came driven by their opposition to Bush. Eliseo Colón, a cook, said Chávez was trying to help the poor in a way ``Bush isn't trying to do."

Arvetta Taylor, who came with a large group from the Harlem Addicts Rehabilitation Center, said she wished the United States had a president like Chávez. "I love sharing," she said of the heating oil programs.

Among the protesters outside stood Anabel Vidal, a Venezuelan consultant on vacation in New York.

"He has forgotten the poor of my country," she said, adding that Chávez thrives on stirring up controversies.

She shrugged off taunts by Chávez supporters, who called her a "thief" and ``elitist."

"Everything I have, I have earned by working for it," she said. Chávez faces a unified opposition in the December elections, but polls show him well ahead.

Why The Firebrands Get Heard (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

My but the lesser nations are getting uppity.

I do love that word, uppity. Once upon a time, it was used to describe a black person who didn't know his place. The word came back to me this week as I heard all that impertinent oratory at the United Nations, most of it aimed at the United States in general and George W. Bush in particular.

DOJ_NMG_0067327

Did Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez actually call Bush the devil? And then ostentatiously cross himself? And then complain that the podium, where Bush had spoken a day earlier, still smelled of sulfur? That's exactly what he did.

And as Chavez continued his monologue, calling Bush a "world dictator" who "looks at your color, and he says, 'Oh, there's an extremist,' " his audience of world leaders laughed and applauded. Clearly, Chavez had ignored the flashing yellow lights and crashed straight through the guardrails of diplomatic propriety. Clearly, this was no way to speak about the president of the United States. But Chavez, who hosts his own weekly talk show back home in Caracas, had his audience in the palm of his hand.

Afterward, U.N. Ambassador John Bolton did what the diplomatic playbook said he had to do and refused to dignify Chavez's tirade with a response. But while his words were measured, it was hard to look at the anger in his eyes and not think of Yosemite Sam wishing he could blow that varmint to smithereens.

Chavez was so arch in manner and so extreme in his personal attacks on Bush that it's tempting to write him off as crazy, although I tend to think he's crazy like a fox. Can anyone name the last president of Venezuela, or remember when a speech by any president of Venezuela made such news? Still, Chavez may have gone so far that he hurt his chances of securing a temporary seat on the U.N. Security Council, where he would be harder to ignore.

But the uppity leader who spoke Tuesday evening, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran, is another story. Like Chavez (his new best friend), Ahmadinejad controls a sizable fraction of the world's oil supply. Unlike Chavez, he has advanced nuclear technology and almost surely is working to build nuclear weapons. And also unlike Chavez -- perhaps because he is on the verge of having a very big stick -- he speaks softly, at least in the tone of his voice.

Ahmadinejad's was actually the more uppity speech, because what he seeks is nothing less than to remake the world.

"The prevailing order of contemporary global interaction is such that certain powers equate themselves with the international community and consider their decisions superseding that of over 180 countries," he said. "They consider themselves the masters and rulers of the entire world and other nations as only second-class in the world order. . . . Is it appropriate to expect this generation to submit to the decisions and arrangements established over half a century ago?"

That's pretty clear. Ahmadinejad, a Holocaust denier who presides over one of the world's most repressive and misogynistic regimes, is determined to rearrange the furniture. Since the Soviet bloc collapsed, the West -- led by the United States -- has pretty much had its way. Ahmadinejad is determined to create an alternative focus of power and influence, and he has the faith of the fanatical true believer in his ability to succeed.

Really, this should be no contest. Given a choice between a manifestly imperfect but open and dynamic society such as ours and a retrograde theocracy such as Iran, where free thought is stifled and repressive laws have the imprimatur of unimpeachable holy writ, who would freely choose the latter?

Yet Ahmadinejad is being listened to, and not only because of Iran's oil. When I travel outside the country, I'm struck by the decline in America's moral standing in the world. The Iraq war is the main reason, but not the only one. For all its talk about public diplomacy and spreading the U.S. gospel throughout the world, the Bush administration does an appallingly lousy job of it. Even our government's genuine good deeds -- vastly increased funding to fight AIDS in Africa, for example, which has saved countless lives -- go largely unrecognized.

Our policy of not even talking to governments we don't like has proved counterproductive -- pushing Syria closer to Iran, for example, and needlessly prolonging the Israel-Hezbollah war, to no one's benefit except perhaps Ahmadinejad's. Our arrogance has turned us into the neighborhood bully and made our adversaries look like more sympathetic figures than they really are.

We have to do better. Hugo Chavez shouldn't be received as the new Dave Chappelle.

Rangel Rebukes Chavez On Bush (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

NEW YORK -- Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez took his Bush-bashing to Harlem yesterday and earned a stiff rebuke from the New York district's congressman, Rep. Charles B. Rangel, who is no fan of President Bush.

"You don't come into my country, you don't come into my congressional district and criticize my president," Mr. Rangel, a Democrat, told stunned reporters on Capitol Hill.

DOJ_NMG_0067328

Mr. Rangel, who is one of Mr. Bush's harshest critics, said no foreign official should assume that "Americans do not feel offended when you offend our chief of state."

At Harlem's Mount Olivet Baptist Church yesterday, Mr. Chavez referred to the insults that he delivered at the United Nations' General Assembly a day earlier.

"They told me that I should be careful after I called [Mr. Bush] the devil -- and I think he is the devil -- because he might kill me" Mr. Chavez told an overflow crowd.

He also called Mr. Bush "an alcoholic and a very sick man."

In his remarks to the annual U.N. General Assembly debate Wednesday, the Venezuelan president first called Mr. Bush the devil and said "it still smells of sulfur" at the podium, where Mr. Bush had spoken a day earlier.

Mr. Chavez repeated his devil remarks for reporters later Wednesday and also called Mr. Bush "the genocide president."

He spoke at the Harlem church yesterday for nearly two hours, in which he mocked Mr. Bush by mimicking a cowboy's gun-slinging stance.

Mr. Chavez's performance in New York this week also offended several prominent Democrats on Capitol Hill, including House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California.

"Hugo Chavez fancies himself a modern-day Simon Bolivar, but all he is an everyday thug," Mrs. Pelosi said.

She added that Mr. Chavez had "demeaned himself, and he demeaned Venezuela."

Rep. Chaka Fattah, Pennsylvania Democrat, said, "His personal attacks and ridicule directed at the president of the United States are unacceptable."

Sen. Tom Harkin, Iowa Democrat, defended Mr. Chavez in an interview with Radio Iowa.

Though the remarks were "incendiary," Mr. Harkin said, "I can understand the frustration, and the anger of certain people around the world because of George Bush's policies."

Bush administration officials have refused to be drawn into a name-calling exchange with Mr. Chavez.

"I think it's not becoming for a head of state," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, when asked about Mr. Chavez's speech at the General Assembly.

Mr. Chavez went to Harlem yesterday to announce a doubling of the amount of discounted heating oil that his country will distribute to poor Americans this winter.

He said that Citgo, the U.S. arm of Venezuela's state-owned oil monopoly, will distribute 100 million gallons to people in 18 states.

The program began last year to aid Hurricane Katrina victims.

The Venezuelan president repeated his threats to halt oil sales to the United States if Washington attacked Venezuela or Iran.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, asked about Mr. Chavez's support at a press conference yesterday, spoke in only general terms.

"We do not seek to represent a threat to any country," Mr. Ahmadinejad told reporters.

The Iranian president recently visited Venezuela and joined Mr. Chavez at the Non-Aligned Movement summit last week in Havana.

At his press conference yesterday, Mr. Ahmadinejad repeated that Iran's nuclear program is for peaceful purposes.

"I don't see why so many people are so sensitive about this 'enrichment' word," he said. "We have said under fair conditions and just conditions, we will negotiate about it."

Iran is in the early stages of making enriched uranium, which can be used for atomic bombs or nuclear power plants.

Shocked! By Chavez (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Hugo Chávez isn't used to criticism from Congressional Democrats, some of whom have actually welcomed his blatant attempts to buy U.S. political influence with cut-price Venezuelan oil. So it must have shocked the South American strongman when two prominent Democrats took public offense at his anti-American tirade before the U.N. General Assembly this week.

DOJ_NMG_0067329

"Hugo Chávez fancies himself a modern day Simon Bolivar but he is an everyday thug," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, referring to the 19th-century fighter against Spanish colonial rule. Meanwhile, New York Representative Charlie Rangel blasted Mr. Chávez for coming into "my Congressional district" and condemning "my President" -- words we've rarely heard any Democrat use in reference to George W. Bush.

The Venezuelan dictator provoked this burst of bipartisanship by repeatedly referring to President Bush as "the devil." More broadly, his speech amounted to a justification of terrorism against the U.S., and in fact he is one of the world's most outspoken defenders of such terrorist state sponsors as Iran. However, none of this is a revelation to anyone who's watched Mr. Chávez in action in recent years.

Ms. Pelosi's and Mr. Rangel's remarks were politically shrewd if nothing else. Even smarter would be for the two of them to follow up by having a word with their Massachusetts delegation. Only last November, Congressmen William Delahunt and Ed Markey spoke of their "debt" to Venezuela after arranging to buy 12 million gallons of Venezuelan home heating oil at a 40% discount for the Bay State. Mr. Delahunt has called the dictator his "excellent friend," and yesterday the Boston Globe quoted him as blaming the dictator's outburst on "what low esteem the United States is held, not just in the Islamic world, but all over."

After Mr. Chávez's U.N. performance, you can bet Democratic leaders don't want another sweetheart oil deal this November.

No Hugo Award For Security Council (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

VENEZUELAN PRESIDENT Hugo Chavez took his stand-up act to New York on Wednesday and just killed 'em, waking up a sleepy General Assembly crowd with zinging one-liners likening President Bush to the devil. It was the crowning stop in a comedy world tour that has been busting up audiences from Iran to China, fitting for a man running against a comedian in Venezuela's upcoming presidential election.

Chavez's anti-American tirades may be a hit in much of the developing world, but few sane people will be laughing if he achieves his appallingly realistic goal of winning a rotating seat on the U.N. Security Council.

Venezuela is seeking a two-year slot on the 15-member council. Such seats are awarded on a regional basis; the other Latin American candidate, Guatemala, is heavily backed by the United States. Chavez over the last several months has made beating Guatemala his major foreign policy goal, traveling the world (mostly to drum up support from staunch U.S. foes such as Iran and Syria) and signing oil deals to buy votes. It seems to have paid off; Venezuela is believed to have the majority of the General Assembly on its side, though it will need a two-thirds vote to prevail.

Having Venezuela on the Security Council wouldn't recast the U.N. in Chavez's image, nor would it seriously impede the democratic world. Rotating members don't have the veto power of permanent Security Council fixtures Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States. But it would provide an international forum for Chavez's diatribes, one that he plans to take advantage of personally, and he could delay important initiatives like curbing Iran's nuclear ambitions or deploying U.N. troops in Darfur.

Chavez has been generous in spreading his oil wealth to his neighbors, and tweaking Uncle Sam is a cheap way to win political support in Latin America. But Wednesday's performance should make more moderate heads of state, such as Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva, wonder if they really want to be represented in a critical international body by the clown prince of Caracas. And a nuclear-armed Iran or North Korea is not in the interest of anybody.

If Latin America doesn't have a consensus choice for the U.N. seat by Oct. 16, it will come down to a secret ballot by the General Assembly. In case of deadlock, which seems probable, a third country may well emerge as the winner. Uruguay and the Dominican Republic are considered the two most likely candidates, and either would be better than Venezuela. Chavez might seem like a laugh riot today, but after two years of gridlock and shenanigans on the Security Council, the joke would wear pretty thin.

In Chávez's Crosshairs (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0067330

Fidel Castro is not far from death. That's one conclusion to draw from his failure to get out of bed for the summit of the non-aligned nations held in Havana last week.

The other telling sign that the long-winded tyrant is not coming back, despite Cuban claims that he is on the mend, was Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez's performance at the United Nations on Wednesday. Clearly the revolutionary baton has been passed to the kook from Caracas, Castro's wealthiest and keenest protégé.

After this week, Americans are likely to be focused on the nexus between Venezuela and Iran, whose president rivaled Mr. Chávez as the scariest speaker at the General Assembly. Yet there is an equally pressing threat from Venezuela right in the U.S. backyard. The battleground is Bolivia, which Mr. Chávez badly wants to control so he can seize that country's natural-gas reserves and become the sole energy supplier in the Southern Cone. In doing so, he hopes to seriously damage the Brazilian economy and crush Brazil's geopolitical ambitions as the leader in South America. In its place he wants to plant the flag of Venezuelan hegemony. If he gets away with it, Argentine and Chilean sovereignty would also be diminished and continental stability lost.

To avoid this grim outcome and preserve Bolivian democracy, the U.S. could start by studying Mr. Chávez's path to power, which included help, both passive and active, from Washington.

Theatrics aside, the Venezuelan's verbal assault this week against the U.S. was hardly a news flash. Mr. Chávez has been spouting this stuff for eight years while Venezuelan democrats have been begging the world to take note of it. Democratic Congressman William Delahunt, former Republican Congressman Jack Kemp and the Washington law firm of Patton Boggs all worked to give Mr. Chávez an image makeover in the U.S. so that Venezuelan cries for help might be ignored even as the aspiring dictator was consolidating power.

It seems to have worked too. Let's not forget what happened when Venezuelans tried to remove Mr. Chávez in a 2004 recall referendum. The European Union refused to act as an observer, citing lack of transparency. But that didn't stop Jimmy Carter or the Organization of American States, both of which went along to "observe" a vote cloaked in state secrets. When OAS mission director Fernando Jaramillo cried foul at the many government pre-referendum pranks and Mr. Chávez complained about him, OAS chief César Gaviria yanked Mr. Jaramillo from the country just ahead of the vote.

Exit polls showed that the Venezuelan president was badly beaten in the contest but the chavista-stacked electoral council declared him the winner. Mr. Chávez refused to allow independent auditing of voting machine software or a count of paper ballots against machine tallies. Mr. Carter together with U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for the Western Hemisphere Roger Noriega and the OAS, rushed to endorse the vote despite the lack of transparency and many testimonies to state-sponsored intimidation and dirty tricks. In the heat of the battle, the National Endowment for Democracy cruelly threatened the country's most important independent electoral watchdog that if it didn't accept Mr. Chávez's victory, NED would pull its support.

Mr. Chávez now boasts that he was democratically elected and foments hatred against his neighbors, including the U.S. Wednesday's Castro-esque message claimed that the "non-aligned" movement intent on going nuclear has only pure motives, while the U.S. president is the devil.

Still Hugo knows that rhetorical bullying from the U.N. pulpit can take him only so far. Both Mexico and Peru rejected Chávez proxies this year in presidential elections. While he might still get a foothold in Nicaragua if Daniel Ortega wins there in November, what he really wants to do is knock Brazil down a few notches. And there is no better way to do that than to hit its energy supply. This explains the blitz the chavistas are now putting on in Bolivia to make that country a (hydro) carbon copy of Venezuela.

Mr. Morales rose to executive power by first using violence to bring down two constitutional presidents and then forcing a new election, which he won. He dreams of an indigenous, collectivist Bolivian economy under the thumb of an authoritarian government. Never mind that most native Bolivians are highly entrepreneurial.

His power is boosted by his support for Bolivian coca growers against U.S.-mandated eradication efforts. He is also being coached by Mr. Chávez. He has nationalized investments in the natural-gas industry and he ruled that agricultural land be redistributed to peasants. He has purged the military of its highest ranking professionals and he has arrested or threatened to arrest some 150 of his political opponents. Bolivia is now blanketed with Cuban doctors and teachers. Cuban security detail protect the president while Venezuelan energy advisers are said to be setting policy in the natural-gas sector.

DOJ_NMG_0067331

Yet there is serious resistance in the eastern states and some admission from La Paz that the country is too poor to cut itself off from the world. Last week Mr. Morales had to fire his energy minister after Brazil threatened to exit the country when the minister announced the seizure of two more Brazilian owned refineries.

Such acquiescence toward Brazil has to be frustrating Mr. Chávez and any chance to defeat those in his way now lies with the rewriting of the Bolivian constitution. But there is a problem there too. Mr. Morales's party has just over 50% of the constitutional assembly seats. That means that in order to steamroll the opposition the government must force a change in the approval requirement to a simple majority from a two-thirds vote, which is now the law.

Seven of the nine state governors have objected to this but Evo's side is again threatening violence. Bolivia could use some help from the international community. One thing the U.S. could do to weaken Evo is end insistence on coca eradication, which while failing to reduce drug use has alienated peasants. What is clear is that doing nothing while Mr. Chávez seizes power on the continent is not an option.

Five Palestinians Killed In Gaza; Rockets Fired Into Israel (WP)

By Scott Wilson, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

JERUSALEM, Sept. 21 -- Israeli forces killed at least five Palestinians on Thursday in the Gaza Strip, while gunmen there fired rockets into Israel during the day.

The spate of violence ended a few weeks of relative calm between Palestinian gunmen and Israeli forces that began after Israeli tanks and troops withdrew from a volatile area east of Gaza City early this month. Israel's military has maintained intensive operations in Gaza since June 25, when Palestinian gunmen captured an Israeli soldier in a cross-border raid.

A conflict between rival Palestinian factions has sharpened at the same time, and rocket fire into Israel appears to be on the rise again. The Israeli military said four rockets landed in southern Israel over the course of the day, hitting a college classroom and rupturing a water pipe in the city of Sderot. No injuries were reported.

The Palestinians were killed in two separate incidents at far ends of the strip.

Early Thursday, Israeli army and border police units surrounded a house in Rafah, the largest city in southern Gaza, during what military officials described as an arrest operation.

The Israeli military said Palestinian gunmen inside the house attacked the Israeli forces with rifle fire and grenades. The soldiers directed small-arms and tank fire at the house, military officials said. Later, soldiers also fired on a man outside the house who military officials said was armed.

Palestinian health officials reported that a 35-year-old mother was killed by a tank round in the Rafah fighting and that a man was killed by gunfire.

Later in the day, three Palestinians who witnesses said were tending goats near the Jabalya refugee camp in northern Gaza were killed by Israeli fire. Israeli military officials confirmed that artillery fire had been directed at three men, whom Palestinian witnesses described as teenagers. Israeli military officials said the men were handling launchers used to fire rockets earlier in the day at Sderot.

Palestinian gunmen flee quickly after firing the crude, erratic rockets, often hiding in the labyrinths of Gaza's crowded residential neighborhoods. Many Palestinians have been killed by Israeli fire after wandering into those staging areas soon after a rocket is launched.

An Israeli army spokeswoman said Thursday, "If the launcher was left on the ground, then these people were victims of those who left it there."

With N. Korea Talks Stalled, U.S. Tries New Approach (WP)

By Glenn Kessler, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 21 -- With North Korea refusing to return to the six-nation disarmament talks, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Thursday convened a meeting of a new group of nations that will focus on Northeast Asian security concerns. Diplomats have dubbed the group "Five Plus Five" to refer to the 10 countries involved, but North Korea declined an invitation and China and Russia did not send representatives.

DOJ_NMG_0067332

"It turned out to be the Six Minus One Plus Two Plus Three Minus Two," quipped Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, the administration's point man on North Korea.

Few issues have proven as vexing as the impasse over North Korea's nuclear ambitions. In some ways, the gathering is the diplomatic equivalent of throwing spaghetti against the wall -- an effort to try something just to see what sticks.

"We had the three-party talks, the four-party and the six-party, and now the 10-party," said Kongdan Oh, an expert on the North Korean nuclear program at the Institute for Defense Analyses in Alexandria. "As the number of parties has gone up, the speed of the failure has gone faster."

A year ago this week, in what was hailed as a breakthrough, Hill and diplomats from North Korea, China, Russia, South Korea and Japan agreed to guidelines for negotiating the dismantling of North Korea's weapons programs in exchange for economic and political incentives. But the negotiations never got started in earnest.

Four days before the agreement was reached, the Treasury Department had designated Macao's Banco Delta Asia as acting as a front for North Korean counterfeiting operations. The Treasury action had wide repercussions, leading many banks around the world to curtail dealings with North Korea. North Korea declared that the action amounted to "financial sanctions," and refused to return to the six-party talks.

North Korea further rattled nerves with a ballistic missile test in July.

Now, with little prospect of restarting the six-party talks, the United States has decided to try to broaden the circle, bringing in nations such as New Zealand, Canada and Indonesia. The first meeting of the larger group was held on the sidelines of a July gathering of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN), after the missile test. Thursday's meeting, at New York's Waldorf-Astoria hotel, was the second, and Hill said a third is planned for Hanoi in November, when heads of state gather for an annual Asia-Pacific summit.

"In Northeast Asia, we need a stronger dialogue on security issues," Hill said. "It's not to change the six-party talks. It's not to have an immediate sort of actionable outcome or something. It's simply to have information exchange."

But there is a broader subtext to the gathering. The Bush administration wants China to do more to bring North Korea back to the table, and Hill pointedly noted that several ministers present said China should do more.

Moreover, as a result of the U.N. Security Council resolution passed after the North Korea missile test, the United States has prepared a new package of sanctions. But the administration wants a number of other countries to sanction North Korea first, before it announces its own sanctions, so it will not look like the heavy.

At Thursday's meeting, representatives of Japan and Australia described the sanctions their governments recently imposed on Pyongyang, and Rice urged other countries to follow suit.

Finally, some of Rice's aides, such as counselor Philip D. Zelikow, have long been interested in reshaping the security framework of Northeast Asia. The region has no organization similar to NATO or ASEAN, in part because relations between China, Japan and South Korea are so tense. So when crises occur, diplomatic initiatives must be cobbled together from scratch. Some experts believe the new effort is an attempt to provide the building blocks for such an entity.

"I'm not going to make predictions at this point whether this is the protoplasm of a new OSCE," Hill said, referring to the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, a regional group that some see as a model for Northeast Asia. "I just at this point can't speculate that far ahead."

Russia, China Stay Away From N. Korea Session (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

NEW YORK -- China and Russia, key nations in six-party talks on North Korea's nuclear weapons, skipped an expanded session yesterday, in which countries from the Philippines to Canada sought to address Pyongyang's refusal to negotiate.

The session, hosted by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, was an attempt to involve Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Indonesia and the Philippines in an expanded forum on regional security.

DOJ_NMG_0067333

"Several participants commented that they thought China should be doing more" to bring North Korea back to the six-party talks, said Christopher R. Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs.

Officials from other countries at the meeting, who asked not to be identified, confirmed that many of those present expressed disappointment with Beijing.

They also said that the Chinese had made a conscious decision not to attend, questioning Mr. Hill's suggestion that the reason had to do with scheduling.

Mr. Hill played down the absence of both China and Russia, saying that their foreign ministers had met with Miss Rice several times this week and "we kind of know where they are on these issues."

The six-party talks consist of the United States, Japan, China, North and South Korea and Russia. A year ago, all parties signed a joint statement that they are committed to the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula.

Since then, Pyongyang has boycotted the process, blaming Washington for imposing financial sanctions aimed at stopping suspected money-laundering and North Korean counterfeiting of U.S. $100 bills.

Briefing reporters at yesterday's meeting on the sidelines of the U.N. General Assembly session in New York, Mr. Hill said that all participants made it clear that the meeting was not a substitute for the six-party talks.

"We are not in any way trying to change that," Mr. Hill said. "It's simply an informal forum whose purpose is to discuss the security situation in Northeast Asia and to support the six-party process."

Still, he said, the expanded format is designed to make it clear that Pyongyang's refusal to negotiate does not preclude other international venues from discussing the nuclear issue.

"The effect of it will be to show North Korea that there is a broader concern in the broader region about its nuclear programs," Mr Hill said.

"It also, I think, demonstrates clearly to North Korea the fact that, while they may boycott the six-party process, they are not going to veto multilateral discussions in Northeast Asia."

Mr. Hill, who returned from a trip to the region last week, said that several ministers yesterday "expressed concern" about a possible North Korean nuclear test and "emphasized the need to dissuade the North Koreans by all means possible."

North Korea claims it has produced atomic bombs, but it has never conducted a nuclear test.

Earlier this week, Japan and Australia imposed financial sanctions on North Korea because of its ballistic missile program. Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Qin Gang criticized the move Tuesday.

"The Chinese government has always advocated that this issue should be resolved by dialogue, and we are opposed to sanctions," he said. "All parties concerned should focus on how to resume the talks as soon as possible and avoid any actions that may further complicate the situation."

North Korea Avoids Meeting Of 8 Nations (AP)

AP, September 22, 2006

North Korea stayed away from a gathering of diplomats from the United States and seven other nations Thursday that focused on the specter of a nuclear North Korea.

"They don't like to talk to people," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said following the gathering on the sidelines of the annual United Nations opening session.

China and Russia also skipped the meeting, although they are members of the international coalition that reached a breakthrough disarmament bargain with Pyongyang a year ago. That agreement has never taken effect and North Korea is boycotting further talks in protest of what it calls unfair U.S. financial sanctions.

Hill called the North Korean complaint a pretext for ignoring its responsibilities to give up nuclear weapons ambitions under the 2005 agreement. He said the original coalition of the United States, China, Japan, Russia and South Korea remains ready to resume negotiations with the North.

Thursday's meeting involved foreign ministers from Australia, Indonesia, New Zealand, Canada and the Philippines, in addition to the United States, Japan and South Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0067334

Hill said several participants criticized China for failing to do enough to bring North Korea back to talks, but he said the United States was not among them. China is the North's closest ally and has served as an intermediary.

North Korea seeks to normalize its relations with the U.S. but also says its nuclear program is a deterrent to fend off a possible U.S. invasion.

U.S. Sets Conditions For N. Korea Visit (AP)

AP, September 22, 2006

The main U.S. nuclear envoy could visit Pyongyang if North Korea ends its boycott of international nuclear talks, the U.S. ambassador to South Korea said in an interview Thursday.

"I think that possibility has never been excluded," Ambassador Alexander Vershbow told Yonhap news agency in remarks that were confirmed by the U.S. Embassy.

The North has in the past invited the U.S. envoy, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, who expressed willingness to make such a trip last year after the communist nation agreed at the arms talks to abandon its nuclear program in exchange for security guarantees and aid.

The North immediately threw cold water on the deal and demanded a nuclear reactor for power generation — and the trip was put off.

"Unfortunately it was impossible because North Koreans were unwilling to even suspend their production of plutonium in the Yongbyon reactor," Vershbow said, referring to the North's main nuclear facility. "So the opportunity was missed."

Vershbow also said that Hill "is prepared to enter into bilateral talks in a constructive spirit if North Korea is committed to return to the six-party talks," according to the embassy.

North Korea has stayed away from the six-nation nuclear talks — which include China, Japan, Russia, South Korea and the U.S. — since last year in anger over U.S. financial restrictions against the North for its alleged complicity in counterfeiting and money laundering.

Japan and Australia earlier this week enacted similar restrictions on a group of North Korean firms allegedly involved in suspect transactions.

Vershbow said Thursday that the United States didn't have any immediate plans for more sanctions of its own on the North.

"We are still considering what additional steps may be necessary. On our own part, we are proceeding in a deliberate manner. We are not rushing to any decisions," he said. "There is still time for North Korea to pull back from the brink. I hope they do."

North Korea has insisted it won't return to the talks unless the U.S. drops its sanctions. Pyongyang claims to have nuclear weapons and further stoked regional tension in July by test-firing a series of missiles over international objections, drawing condemnation from the U.N. Security Council.

Despite Plea, Indonesia Executes 3 Christians (NYT)

By Raymond Bonner

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

JAKARTA, Friday, Sept. 22 — In the early morning hours on Friday, an Indonesian firing squad executed three Christian men who had been convicted in connection with the violence that has wracked the province of Central Sulawesi. The government ignored a last-minute appeal from the European Union to declare a moratorium on the death penalty.

No evidence directly linked any of the condemned to killings, but two were found to be ringleaders of a Christian militia that killed 200 Muslims in 2000, and the third to have instructed Christians in the use of arrows, according to trial observers.

The European Union appeal did not specifically mention the case of the Christians. Its plea was aimed at halting all executions, including those of three Bali bombers who are on death row for their role in the attacks on nightclubs in 2002, which killed 202 people, European diplomats said.

“The European Union, along with many other like-minded countries, opposes the use of the death penalty in all circumstances,” the Finnish ambassador, Markko Niinioga, representing the presidency of the European Union, said in a letter that was delivered Wednesday to the Indonesian president, Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono. "The E.U. finds this punishment cruel and inhuman."

DOJ_NMG_0067335

The letter was read to The New York Times by a European diplomat, who did so on the condition of anonymity because the letter had not been released publicly. An aide to Mr. Yudhoyono confirmed that it had been received. Mr. Yudhoyono is considered a leading contender for the Nobel Peace Prize because of his work in bringing about an end to the separatist war in the western province of Aceh, and European diplomats said that this could hurt his chances, given the strong anti-death penalty sentiments among European governments.

About 80 men are on Indonesia's death row, all but a handful convicted of murder or drug trafficking, according to a human rights group here, the Committee for the Disappeared and Victims of Violence.

In its letter to Mr. Yudhoyono, the European Union wrote, "Besides respecting the value of human life," a moratorium would "in our opinion strengthen the international position and prestige of Indonesia."

The three men executed Friday morning in the town of Palu were Fabianus Tibo, 60, Marinus Riwu, 48, and Dominggus da Silva, 42. They were convicted in connection with killings in the Central Sulawesi town of Poso in May 2000, including more than 70 men, women and children who had sought refuge in a school.

At their trial in 2001, no witnesses testified seeing any of them kill anyone, Dave McRae, a specialist in the Poso conflict at the Australian National University, wrote in The Jakarta Post on Wednesday. Even if they were leaders, "Their death sentence is excessive," Mr. McRae wrote. More than 150 men have been tried in connection with the Poso violence, but the longest sentence, except for these three men, has been 15 years, Mr. McRae wrote.

The executions of the three men had become entangled with the case of the Bali bombers. In this overwhelmingly Muslim country, the government considers that the risk of political protests would be too great if it executed the Bali bombers and not the Christians.

"We're going to execute the Bali bombers," said a senior government official, who was willing to discuss the government's plans and its response to the European Union appeal only on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak for attribution. The Bali bombers were scheduled to have been executed last month, but the executions were postponed. They will not happen for at least a month, until after Ramadan, which begins Sunday. Many Indonesian political analysts and foreign diplomats doubt that the men will be executed.

Three Christians Executed In Fatal Attack On Muslims (WT/AP)

By Irwan Firdaus

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

PALU, Indonesia -- Three Christian militants were executed by firing squad early today for leading attacks on Muslims six years ago that left 70 persons dead, a police official and local news media said.

The men were taken before the firing squad at 12:15 a.m., said a senior police officer, who asked not to be identified because he wasn't authorized to speak to the media. Metro TV and SCTV had similar reports, but did not identify their sources.

The case against them has heightened tensions in the world's most populous Muslim nation and raised questions about the role religion played in punishing those behind the violence that swept Sulawesi province from 1998 to 2002, killing more than 1,000 people of both religions.

Only a small number of Muslims were convicted in the violence, all for 15 years in prison or less.

In carrying out the death sentence, Indonesia ignored an appeal last month by Pope Benedict XVI to spare the men. A Vatican spokesman, the Rev. Federico Lombardi, told the Italian news agency ANSA that news of the execution "was very sad and painful."

Fabianus Tibo, 60, Marinus Riwu, 48, and Dominggus da Silva, 42, were found guilty of leading a Christian militia that launched a series of attacks in May 2000 -- including a machete and gun assault on an Islamic school where dozens of men were seeking shelter.

Security forces braced for sectarian violence, with thousands of police blocking roads leading to the prison where the inmates had been held.

DOJ_NMG_0067336

"I understand they have been killed," said Roy Rening, their attorney, adding that he was still awaiting confirmation from the prosecutor's office.

Jeremy Sewall, a policy analyst for the Silver Spring, Md.-based International Christian Concern (ICC), told The Washington Times that the three men were denied the opportunity to attend Mass before they died.

"The Indonesian government is sacrificing true justice to provide judicial 'balance' by executing these three Christians to appease Muslims who are upset that three Islamic terrorists are also set to be executed for their part in the Bali bombings," he said. "This is not justice. This is deception, coverup, and appeasement."

The ICC, which investigated the violence in Indonesia, said that entire Christian villages were attacked with government munitions and burned down using Indonesian government fuel trucks. Christian adults and children were beheaded.

Human rights workers say the men's 2001 trial was a sham, and that while it was possible the men took part in some of the violence, they almost certainly were not the masterminds.

The executed men told relatives and a priest during final prayers at their jail yesterday that they were innocent but ready to die.

The condemned men had said they hoped investigations into the clashes would continue, noting that they had provided authorities with the names of 16 Christians who they said instigated some of the worst bloodshed.

The government said its investigation is complete.

"My father told me he was not afraid to die, he is not afraid to face his destiny," said Tibo's son, Robert. "But he wants the real killers to be caught."

Thousands of Christians rallied peacefully in at least seven towns yesterday. Muslim protesters also have taken to the streets in recent weeks, demanding the men be killed following two last-minute stays, the most recent just more than a month ago.

Fearing violence timed to the executions, Indonesia deployed more than 2,000 police and soldiers in Palu, some guarding churches that dot the city.

Security was also stepped up on the island of Flores, where the three men were born, said Lt. Col. Endang Syafrudin, the island's police chief.

Was Thai Coup Pre-Emptive? (WSJ)

By James Hookway

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Impending Military Reshuffle Could Have Strengthened Thaksin

When Thailand's military high command decided to overthrow Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra in a coup, they were up against a tight deadline: a fast-approaching military shuffle that could have promoted Mr. Thaksin's supporters into key posts and strengthened the billionaire businessman's grip on power.

After months of sparring between Mr. Thaksin and political opponents had pushed Thailand into a leadership crisis, the premier was preparing a strike to regain the upper hand, people familiar with the situation say. Mr. Thaksin planned to replace Thailand's senior commanders -- including the coup's leader, Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin, the army's commander in chief -- with new generals friendly to his government before a parliamentary election then scheduled for October. Mr. Thaksin's Thai Rak Thai party, which came to power in 2001, was expected to win that vote handily.

The pending shuffle at least partially drove the army's decision to stage this week's coup, people familiar with the events say. The coup, while peaceful, and popular among many Thais alienated by Mr. Thaksin's strong-willed rule during his five years in power, has prompted criticism abroad as a setback to Thailand's efforts to nurture and sustain a democratic political system.

The coup, which the military says has been endorsed by Thailand's influential King Bhumibol Adulyadej, has left 59-year-old Gen. Sondhi and other military leaders with the task of restoring a credible government in one of Southeast Asia's linchpin economies and a key ally of the U.S.

Paving the Way to Power

DOJ_NMG_0067337

Thailand's new military rulers have promised to put a civilian government in place within two weeks and hold new elections by October 2007. They have also cracked down on political activities and curtailed some civil liberties. A small group of demonstrators was detained Wednesday for protesting the army's declaration of martial law, and the military has detained four cabinet members of Mr. Thaksin's government.

"During the transition period, every country does this in order for the situation to return to normalcy quickly," said a spokesman for the ruling military council. He didn't say why the men -- who include Deputy Prime Minister Chitchai Wannasathit -- were arrested.

The military government has banned gatherings of more than five people, and prohibited political meetings and the establishment of new political parties. It also said it is taking over the functions of Thailand's legislative branch.

The military also has introduced restrictions on Thailand's once free-wheeling media.

At the same time, the coupmakers appear to be preparing to move more directly against Mr. Thaksin, who was in the U.S. at the time of the coup and is now in London. In a step widely seen as a bid to build a criminal case against the ousted premier and help justify the coup, the military council has empowered Thailand's top graft investigator, Auditor-General Jaruvan Maintaka, to investigate allegations of corruption in Mr. Thaksin's government. It isn't clear whether Mr. Thaksin, who said Thursday he was "resting" in the United Kingdom, intends to return to Thailand.

The military hasn't said whom it will recruit to head an interim civilian government. People familiar with the negotiations say front-runners include central-bank governor Pridiyathorn Devakula, a respected banker who stood up to Mr. Thaksin on financial-policy issues and clamped down on lending at state-owned Krung Thai Bank that in 2004 was beginning to undermine the bank's financial stability.

Another possible candidate is Palakorn Suwanarath, a former deputy permanent secretary at Thailand's interior ministry who now serves as one of a panel of advisers to King Bhumibol.

Unless a credible stop-gap leader is picked soon and political and civil restrictions are eased, the generally warm popular welcome accorded the coup in Bangkok could begin to fade into criticism, political analysts suggest.

"Judging from past experience, people here will put up with military government, but only if its agenda and a timetable for return to democratic rule is clear," says Thitinan Pongsudhirak, a political-science professor at Bangkok's Chulalongkorn University.

Meanwhile, Thailand's financial markets reflected the hopeful view that the military will fulfill its commitment to gradually restore democracy. After falling more than 4% in the first hour of trading since Tuesday's coup, the Bangkok stock exchange's key index recovered to close 1.4% lower on Thursday, down 9.99 points at 692.57.

The conflict between Mr. Thaksin and his conservative military opponents had been building for months, if not years, as the brash telecommunications tycoon-turned-politician tightened his hold on government institutions after coming to power in 2001 and winning re-election in 2005.

A former police officer who trained with the army cadets as a young man, Mr. Thaksin promoted many of his former classmates above more senior officers after he became prime minister. At one point he elevated his cousin, Gen. Chaiyasit Shinawatra, to the job of army commander -- the post that Gen. Sondhi now holds.

Conflicts between powerful military and civilian leaders over promotions are a recurring feature of politics in Thailand, an economically vibrant country of 65 million people.

Mr. Thaksin's efforts to place his supporters and classmates in positions of power led to back-biting and resentment in the armed forces. The tensions crystallized into two distinct factions: Mr. Thaksin's supporters -- including business backers and rural politicians -- and an older, more conservative group of military officers and bureaucrats who align themselves closely with Thailand's royal family and King Bhumibol's chief adviser, Prem Tinsulanonda, a retired general and former prime minister.

Mr. Thaksin also appointed his supporters to key positions in Thailand's judiciary and election commission as well as the military. Despite thinly veiled warnings from King Bhumibol that he was becoming too arrogant, Mr. Thaksin continued to expand his authority, filing libel suits against his critics and buying a television network that had been critical of his policies.

DOJ_NMG_0067338

The prime minister also was skilled at finding loopholes in laws and regulations and using them to his advantage, swelling the ranks of his party and, despite enjoying a parliamentary majority, frequently opting to rule by executive decree instead, making himself the center of power in the country.

Many military officers grew increasingly uneasy about Mr. Thaksin's expanding influence, particularly when he began promoting his own supporters within the armed forces.

A Rift Deepens

Signs of a rift between Mr. Thaksin and his supporters and the palace and the military became apparent late last year when, in an exercise of a seldom-used royal power, Gen. Sondhi was appointed to the top post after Gen. Prem and another royal adviser vetoed Mr. Thaksin's choice for the job.

The tensions grew acute in January, after Mr. Thaksin's family sold its controlling stake in Shin Corp. to a group of investors led by Singapore's state investment company Temasek Holdings Pte. Ltd. for $1.9 billion, in a deal that was constructed in such a way that the seller paid no taxes on the proceeds. Although the transaction illustrated Mr. Thaksin's business acumen, it also revealed his occasional inability to read the political pulse in Bangkok, even as he remained popular in rural Thailand. Within weeks, tens of thousands of people were regularly demonstrating for his resignation.

To ease the pressure, Mr. Thaksin called a snap election, which the opposition parties boycotted and the Thai courts later voided.

In June, Mr. Thaksin complained in a speech that a "charismatic figure" was trying to force him from office -- a reference many Thais considered to be directed at either King Bhumibol or his close adviser, Gen. Prem.

With many Thais now taking to the streets to demand that Mr. Thaksin be charged for insulting the monarchy under Thailand's strict lèse-majesté laws, Gen. Sondhi and his supporters started to limit Mr. Thaksin's authority within the military. His first step to rein in Mr. Thaksin was an apparent warning shot, military analysts say. Gen. Sondhi in July transferred 129 midlevel commanders with strong ties to Mr. Thaksin's supporters to remote outposts or desk jobs. That cut the chain of command between generals sympathetic to Mr. Thaksin and the rank and file, military analysts say.

People familiar with the tensions in the military say Mr. Thaksin was preparing to retaliate by ensuring that a close ally, such as Gen. Pornchai Kranlert, succeed Gen. Sondhi as the army chief in an annual military shuffle scheduled for October. He also intended to appoint other key supporters to be responsible for security in and around Bangkok.

Mr. Thaksin and his advisers couldn't immediately be reached for comment.

Military analysts say that if Gen. Sondhi didn't act when he did, he might have found himself promoted to the mostly ceremonial job of supreme commander of the armed forces.

Had the plan proceeded, Mr. Thaksin would have been well placed to reclaim full power after a parliamentary election initially scheduled for Oct. 15 without the threat of a hostile military high command to stop him.

On Sept. 17, Gen. Sondhi and several other top generals decided to proceed with a coup to remove Mr. Thaksin from office, Gen. Sondhi said Wednesday at his first news conference as Thailand's interim leader.

Once the decision to remove Mr. Thaksin was made, Gen. Sondhi's earlier maneuver to transfer the 129 middle-ranking officers loyal to Mr. Thaksin was pivotal. Military analysts say that without commanders in the field, there was no way the prime minister could have predicted he would soon be deposed.

Thai Junta Imposes Curbs On News Media (NYT)

By Thomas Fuller, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

BANGKOK, Sept. 21 — The first signs of trouble for Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra emerged on Tuesday when he called an early-morning teleconference with the country's top army general.

The general, Sonthi Boonyaratglin, did not show up.

"Sonthi was absent," said Rongpol Charoenphan, the cabinet secretary. "He asked his aide to inform everyone at the meeting that he was busy in the south."

DOJ_NMG_0067339

Actually, General Sonthi, the chief of the army, was organizing a coup that he would begin 14 hours later, sending tanks into the streets and — with a televised announcement — rescinding the Constitution and dissolving Parliament.

On Thursday, General Sonthi sought to strengthen the grip of his junta, banning political gatherings and "activities" and summoning Thai media executives to army headquarters to warn them against publishing "expressions of public opinion" — possibly a reference to opinion polls but perhaps also including commentaries. The junta also summoned Mr. Thaksin's closest political allies.

Mr. Thaksin was in New York when the army took over. On Thursday, he issued a statement from London, saying that he would take a "well-deserved rest" and that he hoped for national reconciliation.

"We won't just stay in London,'' Pansak Vinyaratn, Mr. Thaksin's chief policy adviser, said by telephone from there. "We will probably go to Europe to have a rest."

Many questions remain about how the military will carry out its stated intention to return democracy to Thailand, which before a political crisis erupted in January was a sort of beacon of democracy for its neighbors.

But a more immediate question is what will happen to Mr. Thaksin and his fortune of more than $2 billion. The Thai news media speculated on Thursday that to appear more legitimate, the junta might open investigations against Mr. Thaksin. Showing financial malfeasance could justify the coup in the eyes of disapproving foreign governments.

The junta retained the country's auditor general, Jaruvan Maintaka, who had sparred with Mr. Thaksin, and increased her power to investigate government corruption.

Mr. Thaksin, one of Thailand's richest men, made his fortune in the technology business, initially by selling IBM computers to the police force.

He cashed out of his business empire in January, selling his conglomerate, consisting of telecommunications, airlines and satellite businesses, to an investment company owned by the Singapore government. The sale netted $1.9 billion for his family, an amount so large that the Thai baht appreciated against the dollar as the money was being brought into the country.

In a briefing on Wednesday, the leaders of the junta told reporters that there were no plans to freeze Mr. Thaksin's assets but that investigations were possible.

"It depends on the information we have at hand," Kowit Wattana, the country's national police chief, said at the briefing. "At present, he already has many lawsuits, so we might look into them again and see what to do."

If Mr. Thaksin's money is still in Thailand, he may find it difficult to transfer it out. The Central Bank limits personal remittances to $1 million a year per person, unless special permission has been granted for more. If the money is for investment purposes, however, an individual is allowed to wire $10 million without the permission of the Central Bank.

Vichit Supinij, a former governor of the Central Bank and a former adviser to the Thaksin government, said he believed that Mr. Thaksin's fortune was still in the country. "The money is probably still in the banks at the moment," Mr. Vichit said.

But Klanarong Chantik, the former director of the National Countercorruption Commission, said it would also be difficult to investigate Mr. Thaksin's finances.

"The current situation isn't normal," Mr. Klanarong said. "All the laws were revoked, and the committee of the National Countercorruption Commission no longer exists."

"The problem is everything now depends on the council's interpretation of the law," he said, referring to the name the junta has chosen for itself, the Administrative Reform Council.

"Right now, the council is the law," he said.

Thai Coup Leaders Tighten Controls (AP)

By Alisa Tang, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 22, 2006

Thailand's new military rulers tightened their grip Thursday, restricting political activities, assuming legislative powers and detaining some allies of the deposed prime minister.

DOJ_NMG_0067340

In announcements broadcast on all television stations, the military said it was banning all meetings by political parties and the creation of new parties. It said it was taking over the duties and responsibilities of parliament, which was dissolved when the coup leaders threw out the 1997 constitution.

The Thai ruling council has also imposed media restrictions, including stationing soldiers at television and radio stations, and ordering the information ministry to stop the distribution of information "deemed harmful" to its agenda.

The moves seemed likely to increase criticism from Western nations and human rights groups, which described Tuesday night's ouster of an elected but unpopular civilian government as a setback to democracy.

In a region where democracies are fragile in the best of times, the coup has also unleashed worries about nearby nations where political unrest is common. Political analysts said images of tanks rolling through Bangkok's streets sent an unfortunate message, but that the chances of a spillover effect appeared remote.

"At a time when many countries are struggling to consolidate their democracy, this is a bad example," and raises questions about stability in the region, said political analyst Dewi Fortuna Anwar of the Indonesian Institute of Sciences.

There was no challenge to the Thai military's authority from the ousted prime minister, Thaksin Shinawatra, who issued his first statement since the coup. The billionaire tycoon said from London that he planned to take a "deserved rest" from politics, and hoped to carry out "possible charitable work for Thailand."

The coup group empowered an auditor to investigate government corruption, which could lead to the confiscation of Thaksin's wealth. Analysts said that proving Thaksin's alleged corruption was necessary to legitimize the coup.

Pasuk Phongpaichit, one of Thailand's most respected political economists, alleged that corruption was "blatant" under the Thaksin government but said a coup was not the best way to handle it.

"A democratic country must have a constitution and adhere to the rule of law," she said. "If the prime minister has done something wrong, he must be tried and he should be judged."

Although Thaksin handily won three general elections, opponents accused him of emasculating democratic institutions, including packing the state Election Commission with cronies and stifling media that were once among Asia's freest.

Bottleneck traffic returned to the streets and Thais went back to work Thursday, with many in Bangkok describing the military takeover the most "friendly" coup this country has seen.

Aside from some soldiers on street corners and tanks at strategic points in and around the city, Thursday was like any other day in the congested Thai capital. Commuters crammed the subways, vendors lined shopping streets hawking handicrafts and grilled kebabs, shops were open and tourists were out.

"It feels like a normal day. Nothing is different," said Nuttawee Chotsawat, 25, who works at a 7-11 store in the downtown business district. "There's nothing to be scared of."

Many Thais appeared relieved at the resolution of political tensions festering since the beginning of the year, when street demonstrations demanding Thaksin step down started growing in size and vehemence. Thailand has had no working legislature and only a caretaker government since February, when Thaksin dissolved Parliament to hold new elections in an effort to reaffirm his mandate.

The coup leader, army commander Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin, has said he would serve as de facto prime minister for two weeks and then the ruling military council will choose a civilian to replace him. A constitution is to be drawn up and elections held in one year's time.

Many Thais view the new regime as a good chance to resolve a Muslim insurgency in the south that has killed more than 1,700 people.

An exiled Muslim rebel leader on Thursday welcomed Thaksin's overthrow by Sondhi, a 59-year-old Muslim in a predominantly Buddhist country.

Thaksin, who used an iron-fisted policy in trying to suppress the insurgency, was widely detested in southern Thailand and many moderate Muslims said the conflict could never be resolved while he was in power.

Sondhi is the "only one who knows the real problems" of the Muslim-dominated south, said Lukman B. Lima, a leader of one of several groups fighting for a separate Islamic state in southern Thailand, and currently in exile in Sweden. Lukman was responding to e-mailed questions from The Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0067341

Sondhi had proposed several weeks ago opening talks with the separatists, but Thaksin's government vehemently opposed such a move.

Meanwhile, a spokesman for the new military leadership — which Thursday released the official English translation of its name, the Council for Democratic Reform under Constitutional Monarchy — confirmed that four of Thaksin's close associates were being kept in custody.

Office Minister Newin Chidchob and Environment Minister Yongyut Tiyapairat turned themselves in Thursday, while Deputy Prime Minister Chitchai Wannasathit and Thaksin's top aide, Prommin Lertsuridej, were detained earlier.

"During the transition period, every country does this in order for the situation to return to normalcy quickly," said Lt. Gen. Palanggoon Klaharn, a spokesman for the military rulers.

Military Rulers Limit Politicians And Press (WT/AP)

By Alisa Tang

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

BANGKOK -- Thailand's new military rulers tightened their grip yesterday, restricting political activities, assuming legislative powers and detaining some allies of the deposed prime minister.

In announcements broadcast on all television stations, the military said it was banning all meetings by political parties and the creation of new parties. It said it was taking over the duties and responsibilities of parliament, which was dissolved when the coup leaders threw out the 1997 constitution.

At the United Nations in New York, a senior U.S. official said the coup marked a setback for democracy in the Southeast Asian nation.

"We consider this military move to be a step backward for Thai democracy, a very sad development for Thai democracy," said Christopher R. Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs.

"We are also reviewing our assistance to Thailand," Mr. Hill said.

The Thai ruling council also has imposed restrictions on press and broadcast outlets. It has stationed soldiers at television and radio stations and ordered the information ministry to stop the distribution of information "deemed harmful" to its agenda.

In a region where democracies are fragile in the best of times, the coup also has unleashed worries about nearby nations where political unrest is common.

Political analysts said images of tanks rolling through Bangkok's streets sent an unfortunate message, but that the chances of a spillover effect appeared remote.

"At a time when many countries are struggling to consolidate their democracy, this is a bad example," and raises questions about stability in the region, said political analyst Dewi Fortuna Anwar of the Indonesian Institute of Sciences.

The ousted prime minister, Thaksin Shinawatra, issued his first statement since the coup and did not challenge the Thai military's authority.

The billionaire tycoon said from London that he planned to take a "deserved rest" from politics, and hoped to carry out "possible charitable work for Thailand."

The coup group empowered an auditor to investigate government corruption, which could lead to the confiscation of Mr. Thaksin's wealth. Analysts said that proving Thaksin's purported corruption was necessary to legitimize the coup.

Pasuk Phongpaichit, one of Thailand's most respected political economists, said corruption was "blatant" under the Thaksin government but that a coup was not the best way to handle it.

"A democratic country must have a constitution and adhere to the rule of law," she said. "If the prime minister has done something wrong, he must be tried and he should be judged."

• Nicholas Kralev contributed to this report from New York.

From King Down, Thais Accept Coup (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman And Ratchada Chitrada

USA Today, September 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0067342

AYUDHAYA, Thailand — Poj Ketsuma knows he can't compete with tanks and machine guns or even with elite opinion in Bangkok, 50 miles south of here.

Poj, 41, was left feeling powerless by the bloodless military coup that on Tuesday overthrew the elected government of Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra. “I cannot fight with the mighty people,” Poj said. “I feel angry about the coup, but what can I do?

Last year, it was different. Poj and millions of other rural Thais surged to the polls 19 months ago to re-elect Thaksin's party, Thais Love Thais, in a landslide. They saw Thaksin as a can-do leader who cared about Thailand's poor. He offered them cheap medical care and provided low-interest loans to support their farms and businesses. Poj took out a $420 government loan to buy a motorbike three years ago; he has been running a taxi service ever since.

The ballot box verdict was overturned Tuesday night by men in military uniform, backed by urban elites who considered Thaksin high-handed and corrupt. Thaksin's rural supporters have remained mostly silent in the face of a coup that has been endorsed by Thailand's revered king. Many, in fact, appear to support the military takeover, if only because it ended a standoff between Thaksin and his opponents that had paralyzed the government all year.

“It's justifiable,” said factory worker Sangla Namthai, 48, over lunch at a roadside noodle shop in Ayudhaya, an ancient Thai capital in farm country north of Bangkok where Thaksin is popular. Sangla is a Thaksin supporter who grew tired of political gridlock. The coup, she said, is “reasonable and necessary to clean up the mess.”

A survey of 2,019 people for the Bangkok Post newspaper, published Thursday, found support for the coup ran higher outside the capital (86.4% approval) than inside (81.6%). Those findings were odd because Bangkok has been the center of anti-Thaksin sentiment and rural Thailand has been his stronghold. Neil Englehart, a political scientist at Ohio's Bowling Green State University who has studied Thai democracy extensively, offered a possible explanation: Rural Thais traditionally support the military. Also, predominantly Muslim parts of southern Thailand oppose Thaksin because of his strong-arm tactics in dealing with a low-grade Islamic insurgency there.

Thaksin, who was at the United Nations General Assembly in New York when the army moved against him, appeared resigned to his political fate. “I left Thailand as the prime minister, and now I am a jobless man,” he told reporters on a flight to London from New York. “Never mind. I can still keep in touch with my family.”

Thailand is being run by a six-man junta of military and police officials called the Council for Democratic Reform Under a Constitutional Monarchy. The coup organizer and army chief, Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin, 59, promised to turn power over to a technocratic prime minister in two weeks, rewrite the constitution and hold elections around October 2007.

Thai media call the takeover the “Yellow Ribbon Coup.” Soldiers have been wearing patches of yellow cloth on their uniforms, a symbol of King Bhumibol Adulyadej. The king, who is close to coup organizer Sondhi, told Thais on Wednesday to follow orders from the council.

On Thursday, the military assumed the duties of the parliament, which was dissolved when the government was ousted. It banned meetings of existing political parties and the establishment of new ones. It also has limited public meetings and ordered Thai media not to reprint or broadcast political messages submitted from the public through cellphone text messages. Thaksin's family owns Thailand's biggest cellphone company.

The army has placed tanks and Humvees on a highway on the northern outskirts of Bangkok, their guns pointed toward traffic coming from Thaksin strongholds in the rural north. No one has challenged the military's authority, said army Pvt. Puriwat Manutjam, 22.

Thaksin's political opponents have accused him of undermining democratic institutions by, for instance, stacking the election commission with cronies and intimidating the traditionally independent media. The junta detained four top members of Thaksin's administration Thursday. “Democracy is more than ballot boxes,” said Thitinan Pongsudhiarak, a political scientist at Bangkok's Chulalongkorn University.

“We will keep an eye on the (military) council,” vowed Suriyasai Katasila, coordinator of the People's Alliance for Democracy, a coalition that had sought Thaksin's resignation. “We want to make sure they are careful with the power they have.”

No one, he said, wants to see a repeat of the military coup in 1991 that led to bloody street clashes before democracy was restored.

DOJ_NMG_0067343

In Ayudhaya, insurance salesman Nipon Klaipradit, 45, worried that the damage has been done. “Thaksin's own army betrayed him,” he said. “If they can do it this time, they can do it again.”

In Somalia, A Boot Camp For Islam (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia — Beginning as a teenager, militiaman Abduallahi Mohammed Nur rarely ventured into the Mogadishu streets without an AK-47, which he often used to harass civilians and extort money at checkpoints.

But the 27-year-old hasn't held his weapon since June, when it was pointed at invading fighters with the Islamic Courts Union. The militia, now known as the Conservative Council of Islamic Courts, drove away the warlord he worked for and confiscated his gun.

Now Nur calls himself a reformed man. Under the watchful eye of Islamist commanders, Nur says he prays five times a day, studies the Koran and is learning to defend Somalia against foreign threats.

"Most of all," he said, "they are teaching me how to be good to other people."

Nur is one of about 3,000 former warlord militiamen sent to Islamist-run "rehabilitation camps" on the outskirts of the nation's capital. It's an ambitious resocialization program designed to wean the young fighters off drugs, instill religious values and, eventually, reverse loyalties so they can be integrated into the Muslim fundamentalist forces.

"It's a difficult job," said Mohammed Ibrahim Bilal, chairman of one of the new Islamic courts in Mogadishu. "We want to welcome them back. But they have been living with violence for 16 years."

In Washington, there is concern that increasingly Islamist Somalia could end up with a Taliban-style government and serve as a terrorist training area.

Amid allegations that Islamists are using military advisors from Pakistan and Afghanistan to train soldiers, officials recently began permitting journalists to visit the camps. But they denied access to weapons stockpiles and insisted on selecting the militiamen to be interviewed, and carefully monitored what they said.

About 12 miles north of the capital is the largest of the camps, called Hilwayne, which was a national army base before the collapse of Mohamed Siad Barre's regime in 1991. After that, rival warlords carved up the Horn of Africa country and largely held sway until an alliance of local religious courts seized control of Mogadishu in June.

The Islamist forces that took the barren compound have cleared the trash, built tin barracks and a makeshift mosque, and use the facility to stockpile weapons and retrain about 700 defeated militiamen.

On a recent afternoon, the mood was largely casual and relaxed, with former fighters milling around in the shade. Security and the atmosphere appeared more reminiscent of that of a drug rehab facility or a tough-love teen reform school rather than a Soviet- or Cambodian-style reeducation camp.

Guarded by a few armed Islamist soldiers, the men start their day with prayers at 4:30 a.m. Attendance is voluntary, camp leaders say, but they take note of those who don't show up. Smoking cigarettes or chewing khat leaves, a stimulant, are banned, a challenge considering most fighters were addicted to khat.

The rest of the day is filled with military exercises, religious lectures and self-defense classes, though the fighters don't practice with real weapons.

"Our goal is to upgrade their morals," said Abudulkhadir Yusuf Osman, a frequent guest lecturer at the camp and an Islamic studies professor at a Mogadishu university.

This week, during a lecture to several hundred former militiamen under the shade of a thorny tree, Osman preached that the young men could be rich in morals even if their pockets were empty. He also urged the fighters to think about their "next life," and promised paradise to those who lived a life of piety.

Religion permeates the program. Guards kneel and pray with rifles slung over their shoulders. Trainees chant Islamic verse to keep time while marching in unison across dusty plains.

"Allahu akbar! Allahu akbar," the men shouted during a recent military exercise. The phrase, which means "God is great," is a foundation of Islamic prayer.

DOJ_NMG_0067344

Islamist leaders, however, insisted that religious indoctrination was not their goal.

"We are rehabilitating their behavior, not their religion," said Sheik Mukhtar Robow Ali, the deputy security chief for the courts. "Most of them were already religious, but they weren't using their faith. Religion doesn't permit you to oppress other people, and that's what these people were doing."

Camp leaders say participation is voluntary and the men are free to leave. But they acknowledge that the camps provide a good opportunity to keep an eye on the former enemy fighters.

After Islamists chased out nearly a dozen warlords who had carved up control of Mogadishu, fighters left behind were given the option of handing in their weapons and returning home, or moving to the camps to be retrained.

In the face of pressure to prove they are "reformed," about half of the fighters agreed to go to the camps. Most were young, unemployed men who had been acting as mercenaries. Few had any education or job training that would enable them to find work.

During a recent pep talk to the former militiamen, most of them 18 to 30 years old, Robow Ali promised that the Islamic courts would take care of their needs.

"The youth are the cornerstone of every country in the world," he said. "You are the youth of Somalia, and we urge you to join us."

To sweeten the deal, the Islamists promised to continue paying the men's salaries. After some delays, militiamen in the camps received about $100 each last month. Islamists said the money came from taxes at the recently reopened airport and sea port, though critics allege that funding is coming from Middle East countries and Eritrea.

The task of transforming the fighters falls to former Somalian Army Col. Muhyadin Haji Ali, a husky, smiling man who always sports a pair of Ray-Ban sunglasses, even indoors. New recruits arrive every week, he said, including fighters who initially fled the city in fear, and defectors from forces controlled by Somalia's transitional government, based in Baidoa.

To become good Muslim soldiers, Haji Ali said, the former militiamen require heavy training. "The only thing they learned from the warlords was how to kill and loot," he said.

After spending nearly three months at the camp, Nur, a former bodyguard for Mogadishu warlord Muse Sudi Yalahow, said he had been taught to be ashamed of his past actions. He recalled times when he was ordered to shoot or fire mortars at unarmed civilians.

"We couldn't disobey, but I knew what we were doing was wrong," he said. "I knew the warlords were abusing the people. They destroyed the country."

A second former militiaman, also selected by camp leaders to be interviewed, said he defected in July from the transitional government, which is seeking to negotiate a power-sharing arrangement with the Islamic courts. Tensions have been high between the Islamists and the transitional government over which side is best suited to lead Somalia.

"I came here to fight for my religion," said Abdul Aziz Adan Mohammed, 25, a former government soldier based in Baidoa. "I'm here to fight Ethiopia."

Nationalism and anti-Ethiopian rhetoric are common themes of the retraining program.

A long-standing rivalry has been reignited by Ethiopia's support and influence over Somalia's fragile transitional government in Baidoa.

Islamists in Mogadishu say that if Ethiopian troops enter Somalia, either at the invitation of the Baidoa administration or as part of an international peacekeeping force, they will invade Ethiopia.

"Do you want Ethiopia in your country?" Robow Ali shouted at the fighters during his pep talk.

"No!" the men screamed back.

"Will you defend your country and your religion?"

"Yes!"

"Will you die for your country?"

"Yes!"

Islamist leaders said the rehabilitation program was already a success. But they said none of the former militia fighters had graduated from the program or been integrated into their forces.

DOJ_NMG_0067345

"We haven't given them their guns back," Robow Ali said. "Their spirits are good, and I would trust them now with my own children. Our fight was never with them. It was between us and the warlords. Just as they have trusted us by giving us their weapons, we will trust them."

When will the Islamists feel confident enough to rearm the men?

"I don't know," Robow Ali said. "We'll see."

Paulson To Press Hu On Flexible Currency (FT)

By Krishna Guha

Financial Times, September 22, 2006

Hank Paulson, the US Treasury secretary, will urge Hu Jintao, China's president, to allow the renminbi to appreciate more rapidly when the two meet on Friday in Beijing.

Mr Paulson will tell both Mr Hu and Wen Jiabao, the prime minister, that greater currency flexibility is in China's national interest and would remove one of the main obstacles to a strategic relationship with the US.

He will say he wants the US and China to work together on a wide range of issues through the US-China strategic economic dialogue announced on Wednesday.

But he will tell them that pressing short-term problems, including the currency, need to be dealt with if this dialogue is to fulfil its potential.

In an interview conducted on Thursday in the Jin dynasty gardens of the Diaoyutai state guest house, Mr Paulson said he would compliment Mr Hu on reforms under way and "encourage him to move forward even more quickly".

He would also thank Mr Hu for putting his authority behind the new dialogue, which the US believes will help it produce results. The former Goldman Sachs chairman said that while the dialogue would have a "bilateral focus" it would invariably touch on "global issues", including global economic imbalances.

"When you talk about global imbalances, China and the US are two big players," he said.

Asked what other nations should make of such plans, Mr Paulson said: "The rest of the world should welcome this . . . it is in no one's interest for there to be a big economic problem between the US and China."

The new mechanism would allow the US to discuss with China how and when it implemented promised reforms to rebalance its economy, including moving towards a more flexible currency. "The Chinese have already agreed to all the principles," he said. "The differences are over timing and implementation." Mr Paulson said he was too busy with the final phase of his meetings with China's top leadership to track reports of how the dialogue was being received in the US.

He would contact senior congressmen on his return to explain why the dialogue with China was in the US national interest. "Members of Congress are my clients," he said. "I need to engage with key people up there."

He said that the night before he left for Beijing he had spoken to senators Chuck Schumer and Lindsey Graham, authors of a bill threatening punitive sanctions on China's imports if it failed to revalue its currency.

Answering questions at Beijing's Tsinghua University, he called for patience while the dialogue with China got going, saying "anything worthwhile in life" was achieved over a long period.

Treasury Secretary Banks On His Long Relationship With China (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, September 22, 2006

BEIJING — As an investment banker, Henry Paulson has been coming here for more than 15 years to make deals with the Chinese. This week, in his first visit as Treasury secretary, he made another one.

But unlike the lucrative commercial agreements Paulson negotiated as chief executive of Goldman Sachs, the value of his latest deal is uncertain.

Paulson says China's agreement to participate in a new "Strategic Economic Dialogue" will place the "most important economic relationship in the world" on a solid long-term footing. Critics on Capitol Hill and among manufacturers say it's only the most recent in a long line of fruitless talks. They want a crackdown on what they say are Beijing's unfair trade practices, including a currency policy that effectively subsidizes Chinese exports, and widespread piracy of American software and movies.

DOJ_NMG_0067346

As Paulson prepares today to return to Washington after a four-day visit, the combination of stubborn commercial disputes and an increasingly protectionist Congress shadow his bid for a radically different Sino-American commercial relationship.

"I'm not discounting the challenge, not discounting it at all. … China is still in transition to a market-driven economy, but they're so big and powerful economically, they are a global economic leader, and I think they gotta move faster," Paulson told USA TODAY in an interview Thursday. "They've got things they need to do. I'm going to need to persuade them to move faster."

He's already demonstrated unusual speed in winning President Bush's approval to launch the new set of talks. One key: Paulson lined up backing from top White House aides and Cabinet colleagues before approaching the president this summer, says White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten, another former Goldman Sachs executive.

"This was his brainchild," says Bolten. "He has the full confidence of the president, and other Cabinet members know that. The president is sufficiently interested in it that I think Hank (Paulson) will be able to attract the kind of time and attention he's envisioned. … This will turn out to be a substantial initiative."

The 60-year-old Treasury secretary brings an impressive track record to the task of reorienting U.S.-China economic ties. On his watch, Goldman Sachs led several major initial public offerings of state-owned Chinese companies. In 2000, it helped underwrite the IPO of PetroChina, then the largest Chinese share offering. Two years ago, it became the first foreign firm to win approval to establish a joint venture investment bank.

Paulson says he succeeded in China by cultivating relationships with Chinese decision-makers and by making roughly 70 visits since 1990. Providing advice for a Tsinghua University business school and performing conservation work in Yunnan province helped convinced the Chinese that he was interested in more than just their money.

Some say Paulson's China savvy might improve the effectiveness of American economic diplomacy toward a country that is both the USA's fastest-growing export market and the object of mounting resentment.

"One thing about successful investment bankers: They usually have a very good idea what's real and what's not, and who can write checks and who can't," says Bill Overholt, head of the Rand Center for Asia Pacific Policy in Santa Monica, Calif.

However, Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., a frequent critic of the Bush administration's China trade policies, says Paulson needs to deliver more than additional talk with the Chinese. "Everyone knows the Chinese are flouting the rules," he says. "We need action."

In his public statements this week, Paulson took care to couple any criticism of Chinese policy shortcomings with demonstrations of respect for China and its accomplishments. That deft balancing act is more than mere courtesy. The Chinese, still nursing grievances from their treatment by foreigners in the past century and a half, are hypersensitive about being accorded what they see as due deference.

Public hammering of Beijing in recent years, especially over its policy of intervening in currency markets to keep the value of the yuan stable, has paid few dividends. The United States has urged China to allow the market to set the yuan's value, and last year, China abandoned the policy of keeping its currency fixed against the dollar. But the government has allowed only a roughly 4% appreciation from the yuan's original level, a sliver of what U.S. exporters say is fair.

Whether more tangible gains will follow from the new Sino-U.S. talks won't be clear for months. Paulson, who has deliberately discouraged expectations of immediate benefits, worries that Chinese and American timetables may be out of sync.

"We may be hearing what they say they're going to do, and we're thinking a year and they're thinking 10 to 20 years. Who knows? It's all about pace and timing," he said.

Paulson's more nuanced tactics, whether meeting a provincial leader in the southern city of Hangzhou or appearing before business students at Tsinghua University, won him plaudits this week.

"The new secretary of the Treasury has quite a good reputation in China. … His statements about China are quite positive," said Shi Yinhong, a professor of international relations at People's University in Beijing.

Today, Paulson is scheduled to see both Chinese President Hu Jintao and Premier Wen Jiabao.

Still, the new Treasury secretary is a capital markets specialist with significant experience in China, not a genuine China expert. Before going to work in the Nixon White House, then Goldman Sachs, he graduated from Dartmouth with a bachelor's degree in English and earned an MBA from Harvard.

DOJ_NMG_0067347

The Bush administration's new point man on China also does not speak Mandarin. Paulson says his lack of language skills hasn't been a handicap, as many Chinese officials speak English, and "with a good interpreter, you (can) develop a very good relationship."

Beijing Mayor Wang Qishan and central bank chief Zhou Xiaochuan are among his closer contacts.

The Treasury chief's plain-spoken conversations with Chinese officials are littered with football references befitting a former Dartmouth College offensive lineman. After meeting Zhejiang Party Secretary Xi Jinping on Wednesday, Paulson pronounced him "the kind of guy who knows how to get things over the goal line." Of feisty Vice Premier Wu Yi, he said: "She comes to play every day."

Apart from his numerous trips here on Goldman's executive jet, Paulson says the greatest influences upon his knowledge of China were conversations with Lee Kuan Yew, the former prime minister of Singapore, conservative Hong Kong billionaire Li Ka-Shing and Goldman's Chinese-born employees, some of whom survived the tumultuous Cultural Revolution of the 1960s. "If you're traveling with them and have any intellectual curiosity, you can learn a lot," he said.

Earlier, speaking at a forum for Tsinghua business students, he recalled his first visit to China in 1990. Driving in from Beijing airport, his taxi weaved between horse-drawn wagons and fleets of pedaling bicyclists.

Today, a multilane highway clogged with Audis and Buicks has supplanted the road Paulson traveled. A subway line is under construction alongside it in preparation for the 2008 Olympic Games. Hefting a hand-held microphone and pacing like a talk show host, Paulson told the students he had concluded early on that economic reforms were more than a passing fad because of a comment by then-president Jiang Zemin. Speaking in English, Jiang told Paulson: "I'm going to have to learn more about U.S. accounting. … Assets equals liabilities plus equities!"

In the interview with USA TODAY, Paulson refused to discuss prospects for China to develop a more democratic political system, beyond repeating the conventional wisdom that an open economy eventually will produce more open politics. That has seemed less assured under Hu, who has jailed reporters, tightened Internet censorship and chilled academic discussion during his three years at China's helm.

On Capitol Hill, China is often portrayed as a trade cheat, manipulating its currency to make its exports irresistibly inexpensive, blatantly copying American software and movies and delaying the opening of its markets to U.S. goods.

Paulson intends to pursue those issues with Chinese officials, but he rejects the view of China as a chronically unfair trade partner. "I always found that at the level I worked, when you had a deal, you had a deal," he said in an interview. "I found the Chinese very honorable in terms of standing by commitments and respecting a commitment from others."

It's unclear whether Paulson, who seemed sure-footed this week in China, will be equally adept navigating the complex political terrain back home. After seven years as a CEO, Paulson tolerates skeptical questioning with difficulty and can sometimes appear impatient with political realities.

Asked at a U.S. Embassy news conference whether lawmakers would buy his plan to refocus trade complaints with China into the new long-term dialogue, he replied brusquely: "I don't think I have a need to sell this thing to Congress."

Likewise, in the interview Paulson demonstrated a deep sympathy for the Chinese and an understanding of the difficult transition the country is navigating from an economy based on central planning to one driven by the market. But beyond calling for thinking "creatively" about ways to help Americans who lose their jobs as trade barriers fall, Paulson, in his short tenure at Treasury, has offered nothing to ease U.S. public anxiety about globalization's costs.

His well-founded insistence upon taking a long-term approach to relations with China also is complicated by this inescapable fact: The Bush administration leaves office in 28 months.

Hungarian Leader Defends Comments: 'I Did Not Lie' (WP)

By Craig Whitlock, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

Protests Calling for His Ouster Stretch Into 4th Day

DOJ_NMG_0067348

BUDAPEST, Sept. 21 -- With protesters massed outside the gates of the stately Hungarian parliament for a fourth straight day, Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany sat in his wood-paneled office inside and tried to explain why he had admitted on tape that his party had done a "boneheaded" job of running the country and that he had lied to voters to win reelection.

Looking weary and with his legs crossed, Gyurcsany said he was merely exaggerating for dramatic effect when he told a private meeting of party loyalists in May that "we lied in the morning, the night and the evening" to the public.

"It's important to emphasize that I did not lie," he said in an interview. "It's like you are arguing with your girlfriend, after four years of living together, saying to her, 'My darling, don't you understand? Our life is nothing! We screwed up our life!' It doesn't mean your four years were nothing. It doesn't mean that you don't like her. It means that you would like to change and improve your relations."

Gyurcsany repeated that he would not resign despite the sometimes violent protests that have rattled Budapest since local news outlets on Sunday broadcast excerpts of a leaked tape recording of his comments, made to a closed meeting of Socialist supporters shortly after he won reelection in April.

Demonstrators have been encouraged by opposition leaders who smell a chance to topple the government. Protests on Monday and Tuesday nights deteriorated into riots that caused hundreds of injuries, the worst political violence in Hungary since Soviet troops brutally ended an uprising against a Communist government in 1956.

According to a transcript of his remarks, Gyurcsany used raw language to confess that he and his party had done a miserable job of governing and had covered up the seriousness of Hungary's economic problems so they could stay in power.

"I almost died while I had to pretend for one and a half years as if we were governing," he is heard saying on the tape. "We screwed it up. Not a bit, but a lot. No other country in Europe has done something as boneheaded as we have."

On Thursday, Gyurcsany did not apologize for his statements, nor did he express any embarrassment or regret. Instead, he said a close reading of his words shows that he is one of the few Hungarian politicians to admit the country's finances are a wreck and to try to do something about it.

"It just shows one thing: This guy would like to change, and he's the first to admit it," he said in the interview. "You cannot say that there's been anyone else in the Hungarian elite in the last 60 years who was brave enough to pass reform."

For now, there are few signs that the political pressure building against Gyurcsany, 45, a communist bureaucrat turned millionaire, will end anytime soon.

Police used tear gas again early Thursday to disperse demonstrators after about 15,000 people turned out overnight to call on Gyurcsany to quit. The level of violence, however, was far less than the riots of the previous two days.

The main opposition party, the Hungarian Civic Union, said it would cancel a major rally it had scheduled for Saturday, after government officials said they had received bomb threats and could not ensure security for the event.

Although Gyurcsany and his ruling Socialist Party won another four-year term in April, municipal elections are scheduled for Oct. 1, and opposition groups said they expected that protests against the prime minister would continue at least until then.

"He's been lying for years and there's no guarantee that he will not lie in the future," said Andras Kelemen, a member of parliament for the Civic Union. "He admitted that he is not fit to be prime minister. And his ministers are not fit for their jobs either. Of course he should resign."

The Civic Union, known as Fidesz, has called for the creation of a new government consisting of independent economic experts. Its leader, Viktor Orban, said the prime minister "should be brought to court" for allegedly falsifying government financial data.

Hungary is struggling to solve deep-seated economic problems that have grown worse since it joined the European Union in 2004. Its budget deficit is projected to reach 10 percent of gross domestic product this year, the highest level in Europe. The fiscal straits have delayed for years Hungary's bid to adopt the euro as its currency, further weakening its prospects in global markets.

During this year's national campaign, Gyurcsany and his party -- as well as their main opposition rivals -- promised to slash taxes and spend more on social programs. But soon after winning reelection, the prime minister began pushing through a series of tax increases and spending cuts, charging Hungarians more to go to the doctor, attend college and receive other benefits.

DOJ_NMG_0067349

Istvan Stumpf, a political analyst and former government minister who served with the Civic Union opposition, said it's possible that the prime minister could face a revolt from within if the Socialists feel it would be necessary to sacrifice him for the good of the party.

"It will be tough for him to keep his job" if the Civic Union and other opposition parties win the Oct. 1 local elections in a landslide, Stumpf said. "There's a general dissatisfaction with the performance of the prime minister and his inner circle."

But Gyurcsany said he was undaunted and would not waver on his plan for further spending cuts. He noted that he had predicted months ago in his tape-recorded speech that people would take to the streets when they realized he would break his campaign promises.

"There will be conflicts, I can tell you folks," he said in May, according to a transcript of his remarks. "Yes, there will be demonstrations, no doubt about it. One can demonstrate in front of the parliament. Sooner or later, they would get bored and leave for home."

Blood Money Murdered Regulator In Russia Made Plenty Of Enemies (WSJ)

By Guy Chazan

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Targeting Illegal Cash Flows, Andrei Kozlov Became The Bane of Shady Bankers Corruption Fight May Suffer

MOSCOW -- In the spring of 2004, Russia's central bank began a crackdown on money laundering by yanking the license of a Moscow bank it suspected of a slew of financial crimes. But when a team of regulators tried to take control of its headquarters, the bank's dark-suited security force wouldn't let them in.

More resistance followed. Protests by depositors blocked one of Moscow's busiest thoroughfares, paralyzing traffic. The target of their wrath was Andrei Kozlov, Russia's top banking regulator. To make their point, two protesters dropped their trousers to reveal the word "Kozlov" written on their backsides.

It was the first skirmish in a high-stakes crusade to clamp down on Russia's murky and criminalized banking system, a project that lay at the heart of President Vladimir Putin's ambition to modernize Russia's economy. Mr. Kozlov, a 41-year-old career central banker, spearheaded the campaign.

Last week, his ambitions were cut short by an assassin's bullet. Mr. Kozlov was shot outside a Moscow sports stadium after playing soccer with fellow bankers. He later died of his wounds.

Mr. Kozlov was one of the most senior Russian officials to be murdered since the end of communist rule, and his death stunned the country's elite. Contract-style killings of businessmen were commonplace in the early 1990s, when capitalism was in its infancy here, but most thought they had become a thing of the past.

The attack exposed the fragility of Mr. Putin's claims to have ushered in a new era of stability. It also showed that despite the gradual removal of political challenges to Kremlin power, crime and corruption still menace the authority of the state. Indeed, Mr. Putin himself admitted this month that the lack of progress against corruption was one of the major failures of his presidency.

Though investigators say they have few leads in the Kozlov murder, Mr. Putin already has drawn his own conclusions. In a hastily called meeting of top officials last Friday, he said it showed Russian banking was riddled with crime. Banks continue to be used to channel billions of rubles in cash payments used for tax evasion, "huge bribes," terrorism and the "narcomafia," he said.

Mr. Kozlov was leading a crackdown on money laundering, where criminals use complex financial transactions to conceal the source of illegally obtained money. Yet he wasn't concerned just with the dirty money being pumped into the system, but also with the cash that was being pumped out and used for criminal purposes.

In the West, most business payments are made by bank transfer, and cash withdrawals of even a few thousand dollars can raise eyebrows. In Russia, cash is king. Companies -- both criminal and outwardly legitimate -- often use it to pay salaries, and so avoid onerous payroll taxes; to grease the palms of corrupt bureaucrats; and to buy real estate.

To get their hands on that money, businesses must navigate strict rules barring banks from dispensing large amounts of cash. Luckily for them there are dozens of small, fly-by-night banks ready to use legal loopholes -- and a panoply of complex financial scams -- to get around the rules. For the banks, which charge fees of as much as 5% for customers to withdraw cash, it is a lucrative business.

DOJ_NMG_0067350

To measure the scale of the problem, take Arat, a tiny bank registered in a village near the Mongolian border whose license was withdrawn by Mr. Kozlov in August 2005. Regulators said the bank, which had just $320,000 in assets, had dispensed $1.34 billion in cash in June and July of last year alone. Owners of the bank, which was liquidated last October, couldn't be reached for comment.

Untraceable cash oils the wheels of corruption and tax evasion in Russia. It is the lifeblood of a system that links government, business and organized crime in a web of graft and financial impropriety. Russian officials, policemen and bankers believe it was Mr. Kozlov's attack on this system that cost him his life.

Many thought Mr. Kozlov's campaign was futile -- that black cash is such a feature of life in Russia that the economy can't function without it. "He said he knew that," said Richard Hainsworth, head of a local credit-rating company, RusRating, and a friend of Mr. Kozlov. "But he wanted to force the issue out of the banking system and into the political arena."

Mr. Kozlov's was a lonely struggle. After pulling a bank's license, his department would regularly pass on evidence of its illegal cash schemes and money laundering to prosecutors and police. In most cases, the evidence was ignored. That could change: Among the measures Mr. Putin ordered Friday was the creation of a task force to handle crime in the banking system. For the first time, the panel will include police and prosecutors, in addition to regulators -- suggesting a much tougher stance on dodgy banks.

Yesterday, Gennady Melikyan, a deputy chairman of the Central Bank of Russia, was named Mr. Kozlov's successor as Russia's top regulator. A Soviet-trained economist, Mr. Melikyan previously was in charge of on-site inspections of Russia's banks.

When Mr. Kozlov joined the central bank in 2002, Russia's financial-services industry was a mess. For a decade, international agencies such as the World Bank had been urging an overhaul. The economy, they said, would remain weak without healthy, well-run banks capable of channeling private savings into investment in industry, rather than just spiriting cash offshore.

Amid the political and economic chaos of the Boris Yeltsin years, little was done. Banking still was recovering from Russia's 1998 financial meltdown, when some of the country's biggest institutions collapsed under a heap of debt.

Of the nearly 2,000 banks that were left, many did little more than launder the proceeds of organized crime, according to World Bank experts. Others were just the treasury departments for post-communist tycoons unwilling or unable to service the wider economy. State-owned OAO Sberbank dominated the landscape, with the lion's share of retail deposits. Most others were tiny and undercapitalized, with inflated balance sheets and murky ownership structures.

A veteran central banker who had switched to a private-sector bank after the 1998 crash, Mr. Kozlov was brought in by Sergei Ignatiev, a respected economist whom Mr. Putin appointed head of the central bank in March 2002 with a mandate to clean up the system. "Andrei had the president's full support," says Arkady Dvorkovich, Mr. Putin's economic adviser. Mr. Putin had come to power in 2000 promising to rebuild Russia's economy, and financial services were to be a key part of the revival.

'Dirty Attacks'

From the start, Mr. Kozlov was aware he could earn enemies, both inside and outside the central bank. "I'm being watched very closely right now," he said in an interview in June 2002 with The Wall Street Journal. Seven "dirty attacks" had appeared in the local press, he said, accusing him of taking bribes. "They are weighing every word I say," he added.

Western bankers regularly took visiting top executives to drop by his office in the central bank. "It was always a pleasure to introduce people to him, because he was so clearly someone who symbolized the progress that Russia is making," said Mark Robinson, head of Citibank Inc.'s Russian operations.

Though trained in the Soviet system, Mr. Kozlov, married with three children, was more Western-oriented than most Russian officials. A keen soccer player, he studied international economic relations at one of the Soviet Union's most prestigious colleges, the Moscow Finance Institute. Some of his classmates went on to become Russia's richest businessmen and most powerful bankers.

In 2001 he was made Moscow head of the Financial Services Volunteer Corps, a U.S.-government-funded not-for-profit group set up by the first President Bush in 1990 to aid banking overhauls in transition economies. While there he consulted with U.S. Treasury officials in Moscow and drafted a comprehensive plan for a banking overhaul. Those ideas formed the core of his agenda when he joined the central bank a year later. They also shaped his liberal position on allowing foreign banks to compete on largely the same terms as Russian ones. That philosophy didn't win him many friends in the Russian banking industry, but it has helped turn Russia into a key target for foreign giants such as Citibank.

DOJ_NMG_0067351

Installed as Russia's top regulator, Mr. Kozlov set to work restoring confidence in the country's banks by pushing through a deposit-insurance law. The measure, which had languished in Parliament for years, would compensate depositors if their bank crashed.

To be admitted into the program and earn the right to work with retail customers, banks had to provide much more information to the authorities than before. They were forced to disclose who their real owners were and to present a detailed business plan, and those that qualified were subject to rigorous monitoring.

Tense Time

It was a tense time. Mr. Kozlov headed the committee that decided who qualified, and he used the process to weed out Russia's dodgiest banks. The law gave him wide discretion. In the end, 343 of 1,270 applicants failed to make the grade. That provoked fury in the market. Articles in the Russian press claimed banks had to pay bribes of $150,000 to be allowed into the program.

Mr. Kozlov brushed off the criticism. Anatoly Aksakov, a member of the Russian Parliament's banking committee, saw him late one evening after a day spent screening banks for the new system. "He was walking past the Bolshoi Theater, on his way from the central bank, and I asked him: 'How come you don't have a bodyguard?' " Mr. Aksakov said. "He just laughed and said, 'Why should I? I'm a law-abiding citizen.' "

In 2004, Mr. Kozlov embarked on the next stage of his crusade -- a crackdown on criminal banks. In May, he hastily summoned reporters to the central bank's elegant 19th-century headquarters to announce he had yanked the license of Sodbiznesbank, a midsize institution based in Moscow. It was a historic moment: the first time the authorities had used a newly adopted antimoney-laundering law to close down a bank. He had the Kremlin's full support, according to Mr. Dvorkovich.

Regulators accused Sodbiznesbank of a host of financial irregularities. They said it had knowingly handled ransom money during an infamous kidnapping, and in 2003 had dispensed more than $1 billion in cash -- about 9% of all such transactions in the banking system for that year. The bank, Mr. Kozlov told journalists, combined "dubious operations with an active campaign to attract depositors."

Sodbiznesbank fought back. Its chairman, Roman Petrov, called Mr. Kozlov's move "utterly arbitrary" and challenged it in court. For two weeks, security guards barred central bank-appointed administrators from entering the premises. They ultimately needed a police escort to break in.

Meanwhile, Sodbiznesbank's management mobilized hundreds of customers to protest outside the bank. They blocked off one of Moscow's busiest streets, accusing Mr. Kozlov of trying to steal their savings. A vicious attack was launched in the Russian media against the banker.

A finance official hinted that other banks might soon have their licenses pulled. Panicked, banks stopped lending to each other, provoking a liquidity squeeze. Anxious customers lined up at cash machines to withdraw their savings, and some banks ran out of money. One big institution, Guta Bank, was forced to close its doors after a run by depositors and eventually was taken over by one of Russia's big state banks.

Mr. Kozlov claimed the banking crisis had been deliberately engineered to discredit the government. Many in the banking sector demanded he resign. Mr. Ignatiev and the Kremlin stood by him. "It was clear the trouble was due to fundamental problems in the banking system," Mr. Dvorkovich said. "There was no point blaming one individual."

Investigators continued to probe Sodbiznesbank. They alleged that in the months before Mr. Kozlov pulled its license, management had stripped out billions of rubles of assets and falsified the bank's accounts to cover up the holes. Last year, prosecutors opened a criminal case into "premeditated bankruptcy," though no individuals have been charged.

The Sodbiznesbank scandal had a grisly coda in October last year when Alexander Slesarev, a businessman widely thought to be the bank's true owner, was slain. Gunmen armed with a Kalashnikov rifle drew level with his speeding Mercedes outside Moscow and riddled it with bullets, killing the businessman, his wife and elder daughter.

DOJ_NMG_0067352

Mr. Kozlov's campaign against outfits like Sodbiznesbank left him highly vulnerable. Finance Minister Alexei Kudrin said the banker had "frequently encroached on the interests of unscrupulous financiers" and criminal groups. With his department closing about two banks a month, Mr. Kozlov had no shortage of enemies. Colleagues say he received numerous death threats.

"He could have been killed by the commercial organizations that were trying to launder their money through the banks, not necessarily by the banks themselves," said Viktor Gerashchenko, a former head of the central bank.

Despite the dangers, Mr. Kozlov persevered. He stopped Russian banks from using financial scams to inflate their balance sheets. And he increased capital requirements, prompting a wave of mergers and consolidation.

Some of his other plans, if implemented, would have earned him yet more enemies. "The last thing Andrei said to me before he died was that his next major project was to find ways to reform the central bank itself," said Mr. Hainsworth of RusRating. There was plenty of scope: Bankers say corruption is rife in some of the central bank's regional branches, that it requires huge bribes to get routine things done such as registering an increase in capital. With his death, those plans may well be shelved.

A central bank official declined to comment on allegations of corruption. He said Mr. Kozlov had never publicly discussed plans to clean up the central bank and he couldn't comment on the banker's private conversations.

Last Saturday, thousands of mourners turned out for Mr. Kozlov's funeral. It was a roll call of Russia's great and good: Ministers, central bankers, diplomats and business tycoons lined up to pay their respects. Huge wreathes and bouquets of red roses were piled up against the open casket.

Speaker after speaker eulogized the banker and slammed the government for failing to protect him. "The state has shown itself incapable of defending those that stand up for its interests," said Andrei Kazmin, head of Sberbank.

--Jeanne Whalen and Gregory L. White contributed to this article.

Net Gains (NYT)

By Jessie Stone

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

Kyabirwa, Uganda

TO many of us in the malaria-control business, it came as no great surprise last week when the World Health Organization recommended wider use of DDT in Africa to combat the mosquitoes that cause the disease, which kills more than a million people a year, most of them children in Africa.

The W.H.O.'s endorsement of DDT for spraying inside houses has the support of Congress and the Bush administration. With the W.H.O.'s encouragement, several African nations have approved DDT for use in indoor residual spraying (that is, spraying the walls of huts to kill the mosquitoes that wait there until dark). Uganda's Ministry of Health and National Malaria Control Program, for example, have embraced this approach. Newspaper articles across Africa have assured readers that DDT has gotten a bad rap and is, in fact, safe for use.

But people have short memories. Doesn't anyone remember the American bald eagle? DDT brought it to the brink of extinction. In part because of that, the use of DDT was banned in 1972. (The Department of Health and Human Services, the International Agency for Research on Cancer and the Environmental Protection Agency have all listed DDT and its breakdown products, DDE and DDD, as possible carcinogens.) DDT is a persistent organic compound and can remain in the environment long after its initial use, entering the food chain and accumulating in fatty tissue. Even when the United States instituted spraying in 2000 to kill the mosquitoes that carry West Nile virus, it didn't use DDT.

Although DDT helped eliminate malarial mosquitoes in South Africa, the case was unique — that type of malaria was directly related to the length and intensity of the rainy season, when malarial mosquitoes are active — and we still don't know the broader impact of its use there. In the African countries where the burden of malaria is greatest, the disease is endemic. Uganda, where it rains throughout the year, could not be more different from South Africa in terms of malaria, and it is a mistake to apply the same formula here. The use of DDT for indoor residual spraying will not produce the same results and will almost certainly have dire consequences.

DOJ_NMG_0067353

And spraying is costly. This year in Kabale, in southwestern Uganda, 100,000 huts were sprayed as part of an indoor spraying project. A permethrin derivative, not DDT, was used and the spraying was controlled and safe. The cost was close to $2 million.

Uganda has a population of 28 million, with 7 people on average to a hut. Any comprehensive, nationwide spraying effort would have to reach some four million huts, costing more than $80 million, and that's only for the first of several rounds of spraying. With Uganda's resources already overburdened, it makes little sense to embrace an approach that is exceedingly costly from fiscal, human and environmental standpoints.

In Uganda, where I run a malaria education, prevention and treatment program, the most effective weapon against the disease is basic education about how people contract it and how they can protect themselves.

For instance, insecticide-treated bed nets can reduce the incidence of malaria by at least 50 percent and perhaps as much as 90 percent. Combination-drug therapy along with targeted non-DDT spraying inside huts will also be effective in controlling malaria.

DDT is not the magic bullet that will eradicate malaria. We need to refocus resources and attention on something most Africans do not have: basic malaria education, and prevention with insecticide-treated bed nets. A mosquito net costs $6.50 and can last up to five years. An average of three people can sleep under it, and the only harmful effect we have heard about, after having distributed 11,000 nets in the Kamuli, Jinja and Kayung districts over the last two years, is people being hot at night.

We do not have to reinvent the wheel here. We just have to help educate people — even those with the best intentions.

Anyone, Anything, Anywhere (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

Montevideo, Uruguay

The New Yorker once ran a cartoon by Peter Steiner of two dogs, with one sitting at a computer keyboard saying to the other, "On the Internet, nobody knows you're a dog."

Nobody also knows you're Uruguay.

A tiny country of three million people, wedged between Brazil and Argentina, Uruguay has come from nowhere to partner with India's biggest technology company, Tata Consultancy Services, to create in just four years one of the largest outsourcing operations in Latin America.

Yes, when Tata's Indian employees in Mumbai are asleep, its 650 Uruguayan engineers and programmers now pick up the work and help run the computers and backroom operations for the likes of American Express, Procter & Gamble and some major U.S. banks — all from Montevideo.

How did this happen? One of the most interesting features of this era of globalization is how any entrepreneur — with the right imagination, Internet bandwidth and a small amount of capital — can assemble a global company by matching workers and customers from anywhere to do anything for anyone. Maybe the most important rule in today's increasingly flat world is this: Whatever can be done, will be done — because so many people now have access to the tools of innovation and connectivity. The only question is: Will it be done by you or to you?

Gabriel Rozman decided it was going to be done by him. A retired partner from Ernst & Young who was raised in Uruguay, he hatched the idea of partnering with Tata to make Montevideo a global outsourcing hub. He did not have a single client or employee when he approached Tata. He had just two things: a gut instinct that Uruguay's quality education system had produced plenty of good, low-cost engineers and a gut desire to do something good for Uruguay — the country that gave his Hungarian parents sanctuary from Hitler.

Four years later, TCS Iberoamerica can't hire workers fast enough. When I visited its head office, people were working on computers in hallways and stairwells. (Mr. Rozman also oversees 1,300 employees in Brazil and 1,200 in Chile.) It turns out that many multinationals like the idea of spreading out their risks and not having all their outsourcing done from India — especially after one big U.S. bank nearly had to shut down last year when a flood in Mumbai paralyzed its India data center the same day a hurricane paralyzed its Florida operation. And there is no risk of nuclear war with Pakistan here.

DOJ_NMG_0067354

"When I first approached this big U.S. bank to outsource some of its services to Montevideo, instead of India," recalled Mr. Rozman, "the guy I was speaking with said, 'I don't even know where Montevideo is.' So I said to him, 'That's the point!' "

Another factor, added Mr. Rozman, was that multinationals that were depending on Indian firms alone to run their backrooms 24 hours a day were getting the third team for eight hours, since the best Indian engineers didn't want to work the late-night shift — the heart of America's day. By creating an outsourcing center in Montevideo, Tata could offer its clients its best Indian engineers during India's day (America's night) and its best Uruguayan engineers during America's day (India's night).

Most employees here are Uruguayans, but there are also lots of Indians sent over by Tata. It produces both a culture shock — Montevideo doesn't even have an Indian restaurant — and a cultural cacophony.

The firm runs on strict Tata principles, as if it were in Mumbai, so to see Uruguayans pretending to be Indians serving Americans is quite a scene. Said Rosina Marmion, 27, an Uruguayan manager, "Our customers expect us to behave like Indians — to react the same way."

Also, Latin culture, unlike Indian, is very nonhierarchical. "The Indians were not used to someone who says 'no,' " explained Ricardo Zengin, 34, a systems analyst. But eventually, "they understand that you are not saying it to challenge their authority but because you think it can be done better another way. ... In Latin culture, everything involves a discussion."

Uruguayans tell a joke about themselves that goes: If you get diagnosed with a terminal illness, move to Uruguay immediately because everything happens 20 years later here.

In outsourcing, though, Uruguay has leapt ahead of its neighbors by being the first to understand what could be done — that in today's world having an Indian company led by a Hungarian-Uruguayan servicing American banks with Montevidean engineers managed by Indian technologists who have learned to eat Uruguayan veggie is just the new normal.

Hosni Mubarak Should Call Benedict XVI (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Who says the world lacks leaders? After again expressing his "respect" for Islam, Pope Benedict XVI at his weekly Vatican audience two days ago moved one of his knights forward on the global chessboard of Islamic politics.

Amid amped-up security in St. Peter's Square, the pope said: "I trust that after the initial reaction, my words at the University of Regensburg can constitute an impulse and encouragement toward positive, even self-critical dialogue both among religions and between modern reason and Christian faith."

Setting aside the impeccable understatement of "the initial reaction" -- churches torched world-wide -- it is close to thrilling in a world of persistent confusion about the intentions of contemporary Islam to see the pope step forward, not back, and speak without apology on behalf of "modern reason."

It is being widely said, mainly among his expectable Western critics, that the quotation from Manuel II Paleologus was a "mistake." Really? I'd say Benedict is right about where he hoped to be after Regensburg: The whole world saying that a serious conversation between the pope and Islam is necessary. My guess is Benedict would clear his calendar if the Muslim Arab leadership said it is ready to talk. And the talk won't be about who meant what in the 14th century. It will be about the here and now.

The pope has a Muslim problem alright. It is the hammering that Christian communities have been taking for years and are getting now in Islamic countries all over the world, but especially in the Middle East.

Across the region (with some exceptions), non-Islamic minorities -- which by and large means Christian minorities -- are being driven out through physical abuse, legal discrimination, murder and the destruction or confiscation of homes, businesses and churches. Call it religious cleansing. It is a political strategy that would eventually give Iran, Iraq, Egypt and the Holy Lands of Palestine a cultural homogeneity that has never existed in human history, before or after Christ.

Chairing a congressional hearing on this subject in July, GOP Rep. Chris Smith of New Jersey described the problem in historic terms that are acutely immediate to Benedict XVI: "There are dozens of Christian groups with rich histories, ranging from the ancient Syriac and Syro-Chaldean churches which still speak the (Aramaic) language of Jesus Christ, and Coptic churches in Egypt who preserve the language of the pharaohs. . . . There are followers of John the Baptist in Iraq and Iran. The Zoroastrians of Iran go back perhaps 3,000 years. It was under their power and influence that the great king of Persia, Cyrus, ended the Babylonian captivity of the children of Israel." Fundamentalist Islam is pressuring all of these. Many simply leave.

DOJ_NMG_0067355

Iran's population has doubled since the revolution of 1979, but its Christian population has fallen to 100,000 from 300,000. The war in Iraq (Mesopotamia was evangelized by St. Thomas) has accelerated the emigration of Chaldo-Assyrian Christians, but non-Muslims were leaving even before the U.S. invasion. In 2000, the U.N. estimated that Iraq was Europe's second source of refugees, after Yugoslavia.

The oppression of Egypt's Coptic Christians, who are 10% of the population, is brutal. During Easter Week this April, knife-wielding Muslims in Alexandria attacked worshipers at several Coptic churches. Afterward, Copts shouted: "Hosni Mubarak, where are you?" Good question. Typically, local Egyptian officials prevent the Copts from rebuilding their churches. In August, a Coptic woman named Hala Helmy Botros started a blog to draw attention to such incidents. She was shut down and her father beaten: "This is a present from your daughter." In the holy land, the Christian populations of Bethlehem, Nazareth and Jerusalem have emigrated under duress in past decades. The U.S. State Department says the Palestinian government has colluded to extort property there from Christian landowners.

The exodus (and falling birth rates) of Christians in the Middle East is a well-documented, much-analyzed phenomenon extending back into the last century. After Vatican II, Pope Paul VI created the Secretariat for the Non-Christian Religions to address these matters. In a dramatic attempt to heighten awareness, Pope John Paul II made a historic pilgrimage to Syria in 2001 and held some 60 meetings with Muslims. Observably little sustainable progress has resulted. If anything, Islamic fundamentalists have ramped up their anti-minority aggression and spread it -- to Sudan, Somalia, Nigeria, Indonesia and Pakistan (where members of the Ahmadi Muslim minority have been gunned down as apostates).

And so Pope Benedict has decided it is time to act, no matter that it may hurt the sensibilities of Islamic believers or Western elites ever alert to the delicacies of language. In this Benedict deserves the world's political support. The Middle East is being purged of a historically enriching diversity that will surely kill its ability to thrive. What will remain is a homogenous, self-proclaimed threat to the rest of the world. As Nina Shea of the Center for Religious Freedom argues, the pathologies and methods directed against unprotected minorities will be used next against other Muslims and governments. It is no exaggeration to suggest that the maltreatment of these local Christians is rightly seen as a proxy for the world.

The world's standard political institutions have proven unable to address this problem. The U.N. is compromised and hapless. The U.S. is distrusted, Europe is supine, China is cynical. There would be no better venue for seeking a way out than the Vatican.

The Vatican doesn't want oil. Hegemony is long gone from its vocabulary. The Vatican's only brief is a modus vivendi, a global reality Islam must eventually acknowledge. The governments of Egypt, Iraq and Saudi Arabia should open the dialogue Benedict XVI is seeking. In March, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak met with Benedict at the Vatican. He would be the obvious choice to take the lead. More than these Arab governments realize, their future could use the support of the pope's famous divisions.

Tolerance: A Two-Way Street (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

Religious fanatics, regardless of what name they give their jealous god, invariably have one thing in common: no sense of humor. Particularly about themselves. It's hard to imagine Torquemada taking a joke well.

Today's Islamists seem to have not even a sense of irony. They fail to see the richness of the following sequence. The pope makes a reference to a 14th-century Byzantine emperor's remark about Islam imposing itself by the sword, and to protest this linking of Islam and violence:

· In the West Bank and Gaza, Muslims attack seven churches.

· In London, the ever-dependable radical Anjem Choudary tells demonstrators at Westminster Cathedral that the pope is now condemned to death.

DOJ_NMG_0067356

· In Mogadishu, Somali religious leader Abubukar Hassan Malin calls on Muslims to "hunt down" the pope. The pope not being quite at hand, they do the next best thing: shoot dead, execution-style, an Italian nun who worked in a children's hospital.

"How dare you say Islam is a violent religion? I'll kill you for it" is not exactly the best way to go about refuting the charge. But of course, refuting is not the point here. The point is intimidation.

First Salman Rushdie. Then the false Newsweek report about Koran-flushing at Guantanamo Bay. Then the Danish cartoons. And now a line from a scholarly disquisition on rationalism and faith given in German at a German university by the pope.

And the intimidation succeeds: politicians bowing and scraping to the mob over the cartoons; Saturday's craven New York Times editorial telling the pope to apologize; the plague of self-censorship about anything remotely controversial about Islam -- this in a culture in which a half-naked pop star blithely stages a mock crucifixion as the highlight of her latest concert tour.

In today's world, religious sensitivity is a one-way street. The rules of the road are enforced by Islamic mobs and abjectly followed by Western media, politicians and religious leaders.

The fact is that all three monotheistic religions have in their long histories wielded the sword. The Book of Joshua is knee-deep in blood. The real Hanukkah story, so absurdly twinned (by calendric accident) with the Christian festival of peace, is about a savage insurgency and civil war.

Christianity more than matched that lurid history with the Crusades, an ecumenical blood bath that began with the slaughter of Jews in the Rhineland, a kind of preseason warm-up to the featured massacres to come against the Muslims, with the sacking of the capital of Byzantium (the Fourth Crusade) thrown in for good measure.

And Islam, of course, spread with great speed from Arabia across the Mediterranean and into Europe. It was not all benign persuasion. After all, what were Islamic armies doing at Poitiers in 732 and the gates of Vienna in 1683? Tourism?

However, the inconvenient truth is that after centuries of religious wars, Christendom long ago gave it up. It is a simple and undeniable fact that the violent purveyors of monotheistic religion today are self-proclaimed warriors for Islam who shout "God is great" as they slit the throats of infidels -- such as those of the flight crews on Sept. 11, 2001 -- and are then celebrated as heroes and martyrs.

Just one month ago, two journalists were kidnapped in Gaza and were released only after their forced conversion to Islam. Where were the protests in the Islamic world at that act -- rather than the charge -- of forced conversion?

Where is the protest over the constant stream of vilification of Christianity and Judaism issuing from the official newspapers, mosques and religious authorities of Arab nations? When Sheik 'Atiyyah Saqr issues a fatwa declaring Jews "apes and pigs"? When Sheik Abd al-Aziz Fawzan al-Fawzan, professor of Islamic law, says on Saudi TV that "someone who denies Allah, worships Christ, son of Mary, and claims that God is one-third of a trinity. . . . Don't you hate the faith of such a polytheist?"

Where are the demonstrations, where are the parliamentary resolutions, where are the demands for retraction when the Mufti Sheik Ali Gum'a incites readers of al-Ahram, the Egyptian government daily, against "the true and hideous face of the blood-suckers . . . who prepare [Passover] matzos from human blood"?

The pope gives offense and the Mujaheddin al-Shura Council in Iraq declares that it "will break up the cross, spill the liquor and impose the 'jizya' [head] tax; then the only thing acceptable is conversion or the sword." This to protest the accusation that Islam might be spread by the sword.

As I said. No sense of irony.

Finished But Not Gone (NYT)

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

For nearly a decade, a confident, sure-footed Tony Blair dominated British politics. He not only pushed his own Labor Party into the 21st century, but spurred the opposition Conservatives to revitalize themselves as well. Their new leader, David Cameron, strikingly resembles the early Tony Blair — nimble, persuasive, telegenic and popular.

But those words no longer describe the prime minister himself. His luster has faded, a victim of too many years in the spotlight and too many egregious misrepresentations over Iraq. His hold over the electorate, the Labor Party and even his own cabinet colleagues is slipping fast. It is time for Mr. Blair to move on, preferably before the end of this year.

DOJ_NMG_0067357

And it is time for his presumed successor, Gordon Brown, to recognize that the job he has wanted so badly for so long is not merely a reward for tight-lipped endurance. Mr. Brown needs to start talking about the domestic and foreign policies he would work for if the Labor Party chose him as the next prime minister. But so long as Mr. Blair talks about staying on for almost another year, Mr. Brown, as a serving cabinet member, is constrained from doing so. That is reason enough for Mr. Blair, already a lame duck, to speed his departure.

In recent weeks, with Mr. Blair maneuvering to extend his tenure and Mr. Brown to shorten it, tensions between the two men have flared into the open. Labor politicians have grouped themselves into Blairite and Brownite camps. Until the succession is completed, Labor members of Parliament will be reluctant to go out on a limb for controversial reforms.

That is bad for Britain, bad for Mr. Blair's legacy and bad for Mr. Brown's political inheritance. It would be far better to silence the rivalry and begin the succession.

DOJ_NMG_0067358

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Bush, GOP Rebels Agree On Detainee Bill (AP) 4
White House, Senators Near Pact On Interrogation Rules (WP) .. 5
Deal On Suspects Closes GOP Rift (USAT) 6
Accord Is Reached On Framework For Detainee Bill (WSJ)..... 7
GOP Compromises On Terror Detainees (WT) 8
Bush Bows To Senators On Detainees (LAT) 9
Republicans Reach Deal On Detainee Bill (NYT)..... 11
White House In Deal On CIA Prisons (FT) 12
Bush, Senators Reach Agreement On Detainee Interrogation Legislation (MCT)..... 13
A Bad Bargain (NYT) 14
The Abuse Can Continue (WP) 15
Gonzales Revisits Deportation Remarks (WP)..... 15
State Asks Court To Dismiss Suit Over Phone Company Records (AP) 16
Bush Administration Asks Appeals Court To Quickly Dismiss Eavesdropping Case (FINDLAW/AP)..... 17
Claim 9/11 Terrorists Were Identified Is Rejected (NYT) 17
FBI Says Its Agents Did Not Visit Puerto Rican Independence Activist (AP) 18
Inside The Ring (WT)..... 19
Britain Makes Modest Relaxation In Carry-on Rules (USAT)..... 20
Woman Sentenced To Death For Role In Jordan Hotel Bombings (WP/AP)..... 21
Inside The Beltway (WT)..... 21
The Trials Of The Century (NYT)..... 22

Homeland Response:

Chief Defends Terror Arrests (MH)..... 23
Deal Is Reached On Plants And Terrorism (NYT)..... 24
ID Program Will Cost States $11 Billion, Report Says (WP) 24
Ex-Pan Am Workers Finally Will Get Paid (WT/AP)..... 25
An Agreement Is Formalized On Rebuilding At Ground Zero (NYT) 26
Pact May Mean Rebuilding Delay At Ground Zero (WSJ) 27

War News:

Bush To Meet Presidents Of Pakistan And Afghanistan (CHIT) . 28
Bush To Press Afghan, Pakistani Leaders On Terror Issues (MCT)..... 29
Pakistan Official Defends Truce (WT) 30
Congress Stalls On Minimum Wage, Tribunals And Other Key Issues (WSJ)..... 31
Taliban's Gains Forestall U.S. Troop Reductions In Afghanistan (WP)..... 32
Pakistani Leader Says Armitage Made Bomb Threat (USAT/AP)32
$70B OK'd For Iraq And Afghan War Funds (AP-Y) 33
House-Senate Panel Approves Defense Budget (WSJ) 34
GOP Leaders Work Out Deal On Defense Spending (LAT) 35
Democrats: War Forces Army To Cut Back On Base Operations (MCT)..... 36
Casey: Iraq War Becoming Internal Fight (AP-Y)..... 36
U.N. Expert: Iraq Torture May Be Worse (AP) 37
Antiwar Push Starts Near White House; 34 Arrested (WP)..... 38
Army Meets Recruiting Goal (AP)..... 39
Strained, Army Looks To Guard For More Relief (NYT) 39

DOJ:

Office Of U.S. Attorney 'stressed' (SEAPI) 41

Corporate Scandals:

H-P's Hurd Likely To Testify Before House Panel (WSJ)..... 42
Focus Turns To The Chief Of H.P.; Stock Falls (NYT)..... 43
Hewlett-Packard Receives SEC Request For Information (Update2) (BLOOM) 45
Plot Thickens In HP's News-leak Probe (USAT) 47
HP Stock Falters In Spying Scandal (WP)..... 48
Hewlett-Packard, Wilson Sonsini Part Ways In Calif. Probe (LAW)..... 49
Brosnahan: Don't Blame HP Chair, She's Not A Lawyer (LAW) . 50
HP's Dunn Toasted At Gala Dinner (CNET)..... 51
Senators Press Probe Of Gemstar Ex-CEO (LAT/BLOOM) 52
Cablevision Gave Backdated Grant To Dead Official (WSJ) 52
SEC Tightens Hedge Fund Scrutiny (FT)..... 54

Criminal Law:

Fitzgerald Given Way Out Of Libby CIA Leak Case (MSNBC) ... 54
Judge Rules For Cheney Aide (NYT/AP) 55
Limits Used In Terror Cases Are Imposed On A Mob Figure (NYT) 56
Defense: Reputed Mobster Used Santeria Ritual (NEWSDAY).. 56
Attorneys Deny Allegations Client Plotted To Kill Judge (LAW) .. 57
FBI Raid Targets County Job Files (CHIT)..... 58
FBI Raids Cook County Office (CHIST)..... 59

FBI Raids Cook County HR Office (WMAQ-TV) 60
FBI Agents Raid Cook County Office (WP/AP) 60
Ex-N.O. Prosecutor Gets Life In Federal Civil Rights Rape Case (AP) 61
Former Orange Beach Mayor's Wife Pleads To Obstruction Count (AP) 61
Another Gamble For Online Betting (WSJ) 61
Feds Charge WTC Painter In $1 Million Ripoff From Sept. 11 Fund (NEWSDAY) 63
Prosecutors Say Map-stealing Collector Motivated By Resentment (AP) 63
Credit Card Companies Pledge Help In Fighting Child Pornography (NYT) 64
Data Retention Bill Expected Next Week (CNET) 64

Civil Law:

Federal Officials Scrutinizing Company Payments To Doctors (NYT) 65
Pediatrix Finalizes $25.1M Settlement (AP-YBIZ) 66
IRS To Pay Former Workers Whose Jobs Were Outsourced (WP) 66

Civil Rights:

Chastang Appointment To Be Reviewed By Department Of Justice (MR) 67
Chronicle, Job-fair Firm Called Biased Against Noncitizens (SFC) 68
Library's Ban On Prayer Service Upheld On Appeal (SFC) 68

Antitrust:

Samsung Exec Guilty Of Price-Fixing (AP) 69
Samsung US Executive Gets 8 Months For Price-fixing (SJBIZ) 70
Samsung Executive Agrees To Jail Term For Chip Conspiracy (AFP-Y) 70
Wright Deal Tweaked To Address Antitrust Concerns (DMN) 71
NYSE-Euronext: One, But Two (WSJ) 72

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Interior Official Says She Will Not Try To Recoup Lease Money (NYT) 72
At E. Coli Hunt's End, A Safety Standards Gap (WP) 73
Top E.P.A. Official Rejects Recommendations On Soot (NYT) .. 75
EPA Cuts Soot Level Allowable Daily In Air (WP) 76
Confirmation Likely For Parks Nominee (AP) 77

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Judge Suspends Jail Time For BALCO Journalists, Pending Appeal (CCT) 77
Reporters Get Jail In Steroids Inquiry, But Ruling Is Stayed (NYT/AP) 78
San Francisco Reporters Sentenced To Jail In Bonds Steroids Case (CCT) 79
Judge: BALCO Reporters Face Prison If They Lose Appeals (SFC) 80
Jailing The Messenger (LAT) 81
Contempt On Steroids In S.F. (DENP) 81
Outcome For Chronicle Reporters Means We All Lose (ESPN) . 82
NFL, Union Meet To Discuss Drug Tests (NYT/AP) 83
Goodell, Upshaw Discuss Drug Testing Program (WP) 83
Ex-city Worker Admits Heroin Dealing (CHIT) 84
Feds Break Up Alleged Coke Ring (BOSH) 85
Huge Coke Bust (DI) 85
Worker On New Las Vegas FBI Office Nabbed On Old Murder Warrant (AP) 86
Judge In Nightclub Fire Case Upbraids Prosecution Over Leak (NYT) 86

Immigration:

U.S. Prosecutors Indict 15 In Alleged Commercial Driver's License Conspiracy For Unqualified Immigrants (FINDLAW/AP) 87
House Bills Make Illegal U.S. Entry Tougher (LAT) 88
House Passes 3 Bills On Border Security (USAT) 89
House Passes Border Security Bills (AP) 89
Bush Ready To OK Border Barrier (WT) 90
Immigration Ugliness (WP) 91
U.S. Project To Secure Borders Will Begin In Arizona Desert (NYT) 91
U.S. To Closely Watch Boeing's Border Plan (WP) 92
Pickers Are Few, And Growers Blame Congress (NYT) 93
Illegal Workers Supplant U.S. Ones, Report Says (NYT) 95

Tax:

I.R.S. Inquiry Into Sermon Is Challenged By Church (NYT) 95
IRS Probe Of Cal Church Could Reverberate In Political Season (AP) 96
All Saints Episcopal Church Won't Comply With IRS Probe (LAT) 97

Congress-Administration:

Rare Judicial Impeachment Hearing Ends With Little Action Taken (LAW) 99
Tony Snow (CSM) 100
Presidential Ratings Rise With New Message Man (WT) 101
Probe Finds Jackson Urged Favoritism In HUD Contracts (WP)102
HUD Chief's Remarks Aside, Study Finds No Favoritism (NYT)103
Don't Let Him Near The Checkbook (WP) 103
Payment To Lewis Aide Is Cleared (LAT) 104
The President, Up Close And Personal (WP) 105
Census Data On Some Of 1,100 Missing Laptops (USAT) 105
1,100 Laptops Missing From Commerce Dept. (WP) 106
Commerce Department Has Lost 1,137 Laptops Since 2001 (WSJ/AP) 107
Capitol Police Revise Details On Intruder (WP) 107
Pro-marriage Bill Seeks $4 Million Budget Add (WT) 108
U.S. Recommends Routine Testing For The AIDS Virus (WP) 109
U.S. Urges H.I.V. Tests For Adults And Teenagers (NYT) 110
CDC Recommends AIDS Tests For Most People (USAT) 112
Report Recommends Change In Medicare (NYT/AP) 112
Medicare Drug Costs Debated (AP) 113
Luring Customers From Medicare (NYT) 114
White House Willing To Deal To Get GSE Bill, Paulson Says (WSJ) 116

DOJ_NMG_0067360

GOP Games At The FDA (WSJ) 116
Back On Track In Space (NYT) 117

Other News:

Bush Talks Taxes In Tampa (SPT)..... 117
President's Visit Pads GOP's War Chests (TT)..... 119
President Pitches Crist To Party Faithful (MH)..... 120
Bush Leads New Offensive Featuring Economy And Linking Democrats To High Taxes (NYT) 121
In Florida, Bush Touts Tax Cuts (WP) 122
Bush Flexes Campaign Muscles (AP) 123
Bush Campaigns On Tax Cuts (LAT) 124
Democratic Win Means More Taxes, Bush Warns (WT) 125
Bush: Best Way To Protect Nation Is To `stay On The Offense' (MERCN) 125
8 Year Old Meets President, Invites Him To Party For Hurricane Victims (BRAH)..... 126
Valrico Boy Gets Presidential Award (SPT)..... 127
Welcome To My Site! (LRWF)..... 127
President Visits Bucs, Throws With QB (FWNS)..... 128
'Republicans Will Make History' (WSJ)..... 128
'Democrats Offer A New Direction' (WSJ) 129
Good News For Republicans? (WP)..... 130
Americans Upbeat About Economic Forecast (LAT)..... 131
Drug Imports From Canada Set To Be Eased (AP) 133
Savings, Shakeup Seen In $4 Drug Plan (USAT) 134
Wal-Mart Cuts Prices For Many Generic Drugs To $4 (WSJ)... 134
Wal-Mart Sets $4 Price For Many Generic Drugs (WP)..... 136
Wal-Mart To Offer Discount On Drugs (WT) 137
Relief For Some But Maybe Not Many In Wal-Mart Plan For $4 Generic Drugs (NYT)..... 138
'We're OK,' Despite Drop In Factory Activity (USAT) 139
Philadelphia Fed Posts Sharp Drop In Output Gauge (WSJ).... 140
Investors Finally Break From Calm; Dow Drops 79.96 (WSJ) .. 141
Signs Of Slowing Economy Slam Stocks (USAT/BLOOM)..... 142
Americans Remain Sour On Situation In Iraq (WSJ)..... 142
Subtle Shift (WSJ)..... 142
Democrat Optimistic In Washington (WT) 144
Black Republicans Run Racially Tinged Ad (AP) 145
Black Democrats Pledge Backing To Steele (WT)..... 146
Cardin, Steele Issue Challenges For Debates (WT) 147
Top Republican Aids Lieberman Fundraiser (AP)..... 148
Volatile Mix: Campaigning And Religions (NYT) 148
Kerry Urges Democrats To Fight Back (AP)..... 150
Clear-Cut Race Shifting Into Texas-Size Free-for-All (NYT) 150
Kinky Friedman Defends 1980 Racial Slur (AP)..... 151
LETTERS (WSJ)..... 152
Innovator Devises Way Around Electoral College (NYT)..... 153
States Spin Their Spare Stuff Into Gold (USAT) 155
The Super-Rich Get Richer: Forbes 400 Are All Billionaires (WP)156
In Embracing Islam, Ex-Catholic Seeks To Strengthen Cultural Ties (WP)..... 157
Emotional Wounds Require Focus, Too (USAT)..... 158
Insurance Horror Stories (NYT) 159
Cars As Global Warming's Causes (LAT) 160
Mr. Ehrlich's Paper Chase (WP)..... 160
Iran Open To A Break In Nuclear Program (WP) 161
Iran Won't Be Forced Into Talks Over Nuclear Plans, Leader Says (WSJ)..... 162
Iranian President In Spotlight (MCT)..... 162
Iran Leader Uses U.N. To Improve Image (AP) 163
Iran's Leader Skirts Issue Of Disbanding Hezbollah (NYT)..... 165
Bill Clinton: U.S. Should Talk To Iran (AP) 165
US Cautions Europe On Iran Investment (CSM)..... 166
U.N. Charades (WSJ) 167
Anti-Americanism Is Providing A Glue (LAT)..... 168
Chavez To Double Energy Subsidies To Needy In U.S. (LAT). 169
Chávez Courts U.S. Poor, Offers To Expand Heating Oil Program (MH) 170
Why The Firebrands Get Heard (WP) 171
Rangel Rebukes Chavez On Bush (WT)..... 172
Shocked! By Chavez (WSJ) 173
No Hugo Award For Security Council (LAT)..... 173
In Chávez's Crosshairs (WSJ)..... 174
Five Palestinians Killed In Gaza; Rockets Fired Into Israel (WP)175
With N. Korea Talks Stalled, U.S. Tries New Approach (WP)... 175
Russia, China Stay Away From N. Korea Session (WT)..... 176
North Korea Avoids Meeting Of 8 Nations (AP) 177
U.S. Sets Conditions For N. Korea Visit (AP)..... 177
Despite Plea, Indonesia Executes 3 Christians (NYT) 178
Three Christians Executed In Fatal Attack On Muslims (WT/AP)179
Was Thai Coup Pre-Emptive? (WSJ)..... 179
Thai Junta Imposes Curbs On News Media (NYT) 181
Thai Coup Leaders Tighten Controls (AP)..... 182
Military Rulers Limit Politicians And Press (WT/AP)..... 183
From King Down, Thais Accept Coup (USAT) 184
In Somalia, A Boot Camp For Islam (LAT) 185
Paulson To Press Hu On Flexible Currency (FT)..... 187
Treasury Secretary Banks On His Long Relationship With China (USAT)..... 187
Hungarian Leader Defends Comments: 'I Did Not Lie' (WP) 189
Blood Money Murdered Regulator In Russia Made Plenty Of Enemies (WSJ)..... 190
Net Gains (NYT)..... 193
Anyone, Anything, Anywhere (NYT)..... 194
Hosni Mubarak Should Call Benedict XVI (WSJ) 195
Tolerance: A Two-Way Street (WP) 196
Finished But Not Gone (NYT)..... 197

DOJ_NMG_0067361

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush, GOP Rebels Agree On Detainee Bill (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

The AP, September 21, 2006

The White House and rebellious Senate Republicans announced agreement Thursday on rules for the interrogation and trial of suspects in the war on terror. President Bush urged Congress to put it into law before adjourning for the midterm elections.

"I'm pleased to say that this agreement preserves the single most potent tool we have in protecting America and foiling terrorist attacks," the president said, shortly after administration officials and key lawmakers announced agreement following a week of high-profile intraparty disagreement.

Sen. John McCain of Arizona, one of three GOP lawmakers who told Bush he couldn't have the legislation the way he initially asked for it, said, "The agreement that we've entered into gives the president the tools he needs to continue to fight the war on terror and bring these evil people to justice."

"There's no doubt that the integrity and letter and spirit of the Geneva Conventions have been preserved," McCain said, referring to the international treaties covering the treatment of prisoners in wartime.

The central sticking point had been a demand from McCain, Sen. John Warner of Virginia and Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina that there be no attempt to redefine U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions.

The agreement contains key concessions by the White House, including dropping a provision that would have interpreted Geneva Convention obligations and another allowing a defendant to be convicted on evidence he never sees if it is classified. The legislation, however, makes clear the president has the authority to enforce the treaty.

CIA Director Michael Hayden has said the agency needed to be confident that its interrogation program for high-value terror suspects is legal.

"Much remains in the legislative process," he said in a written statement to the agency personnel. But "if this language becomes law, the Congress will have given us the clarity and the support that we need to move forward with a detention and interrogation program that allows us to continue to defend the homeland, attack al-Qaida and protect American and allied lives."

Added Stephen Hadley, the president's national security adviser, on CIA interrogations: "The good news is the program will go forward."

Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., who opposed such a measure, indicated he was not satisfied with the piece on classified information: "We're going to look at it closely. And we have some recommendations with respect to classified information."

Hadley said the bar would be "very high" and that classified information would not be automatically shared with terrorists.

"Our view is we think it's a good approach because the likelihood of that occurring would be very remote," Hadley said.

Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said he wouldn't consider the agreement sealed until Bush signed on.

That happened within an hour, when the president stepped before microphones in Orlando, Fla., where he was campaigning for Republican candidates in the fall.

The agreement "clears the way to do what the American people expect us to do — to capture terrorists, to detain terrorists, to question terrorists and then to try them," he said.

The accord was sealed in a 90-minute session in the office of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, who had earlier in the day told Warner, McCain and Graham it was time to close the deal. The four lawmakers were joined by Hadley, as well as other administration officials, for the final session.

If it survives scrutiny, the accord would fulfill a Republican political and legislative imperative — pre-election party unity on an issue related to the war on terror, and possible enactment of one of Bush's top remaining priorities of the year.

The evident compromise came less than a week after Bush emphatically warned lawmakers at a news conference he would shut down the interrogation of terror suspects unless legislation was sent to his desk. "Time's running out," he said.

The White House shifted its tone from combative to compromising within 48 hours, though, and officials began talking of a need for an agreement that all sides would be comfortable with.

Whatever the outcome, the controversy has handed critics of the president's conduct of the war on terror election-year ammunition.

Bush's former secretary of state, Colin Powell, dismayed the administration when he sided with Warner, McCain and Graham. He said Bush's plan, which would have formally changed the U.S. view of the Geneva Conventions on rules of warfare, would cause the world "to doubt the moral basis" of the fight against terror and "put our own troops at risk."

The handling of suspects is one of two administration priorities relating to the war on terror.

The other involves the president's request for legislation to explicitly allow wiretapping without a court warrant on international calls and e-mails between suspected terrorists in the United States and abroad. One official said Republicans had narrowed their differences with the White House over that issue, as well, and hoped for an agreement soon.

Republican leaders have said they intend to adjourn Congress by the end of the month to give lawmakers time to campaign for re-election.

The Supreme Court ruled in June that Bush's plan for trying terrorism suspects before military tribunals violated the Geneva Conventions and U.S. law.

The court, in a 5-3 ruling, found that Congress had not given Bush the authority to create the special type of military trial and that the president did not provide a valid reason for the new system. The justices also said the proposed trials did not provide for minimum legal protections under international law.

About 450 terrorism suspects, most of them captured in Afghanistan and none of them in the U.S., are being held by military authorities at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Ten have been charged with crimes.

White House, Senators Near Pact On Interrogation Rules (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith And Charles Babington, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

President Would Have a Voice in How Detainees Are Questioned

The White House and dissident Senate Republicans reached a tentative accord yesterday on legislation that President Bush said would provide for continued tough interrogations of terrorism suspects by the CIA at secret detention sites.

The accord, which includes a plan for future military trials of alleged terrorists, also spells out rules for the use of classified evidence as well as information obtained through coercion of some detainees.

While the deal is subject to further discussion with House Republican leaders, it resolved the most contentious issues in the Bush administration's high-profile drive to gain congressional backing for its detainee policies before Congress adjourns next week. It also could help settle an intraparty fracas that worried GOP leaders in the run-up to the November elections.

Both sides declared that they had achieved their aims. Bush hailed the accord in a brief televised appearance from Orlando. He said the deal preserved "the CIA program to question the world's most dangerous terrorists and to get their secrets." CIA Director Michael V. Hayden told the agency in a statement that "if this language becomes law, the Congress will have given us the clarity and the support that we need to move forward with a detention and interrogation program."

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a prisoner during the Vietnam War who led the Senate rebellion against the administration's proposals, said, "The agreement that we've entered into gives the president the tools that he needs to continue to fight the war on terror and bring these evil people to justice." But he added: "There is no doubt that the integrity and letter and spirit of the Geneva Conventions have been preserved."

On the key issue of detainee treatment that had caused the impasse between the White House and the dissident Republicans, the two sides agreed on a list of specified crimes that would provoke prosecution of CIA interrogators and others. They also agreed that past violations of the Geneva Conventions, an international treaty barring degrading and humiliating treatment of detainees, would not result in criminal or civil legal action.

The White House, for its part, yielded in its demand to adopt, with congressional approval, a restricted definition of its obligations under Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions. That article requires humane treatment of detainees and bars "violence to life and person," such as death and mutilation, as well as cruel treatment and "outrages upon personal dignity."

The compromise language gives the president a dominant -- but not exclusive -- role in deciding which interrogation methods are permitted by that provision of the treaty. It also prohibits detainees from using the Geneva Conventions to challenge their imprisonment or seek civil damages for mistreatment, as the administration sought.

Subsidiary legal disputes will probably be hammered out in coming days, Sen. Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said at a crowded news conference outside his office.

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), a key McCain ally, said that "we struck a great balance" by agreeing that in future military trials, known as "commissions," classified materials must be provided to defendants in summary or redacted form. The administration had sought the right to use such evidence without disclosing it to defendants in any form, but Graham said the legislation would instead let defendants "confront the evidence."

The administration envisions using the new rules in military trials that may involve some of the 14 key terrorism suspects whom Bush this month ordered transferred from secret CIA prisons to the detention facility in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Yesterday's final marathon talks occurred in Vice President Cheney's little-known office on the second floor of the Dirksen Senate Office Building. McCain, Graham and Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.), plus

DOJ_NMG_0067363

Hadley and Steven G. Bradbury, acting head of the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel, met almost continuously from 9:30 a.m. to 2 p.m., the sources said, and then moved to Frist's office around 3 p.m. to announce their breakthrough.

The White House has pressed for the legislation partly to obtain immunity from prosecution for government officials, including CIA interrogators, for past acts that degraded and humiliated detainees. Its impetus was a Supreme Court ruling in June, in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld , that declared some aspects of the administration's past interrogation and trial policies illegal.

Officials' anxieties were provoked by a 10-year-old U.S. law, the War Crimes Act, that makes violations of the Geneva Conventions' prohibitions on degrading and humiliating detainees, as well as actions that amount to "outrages upon personal dignity," subject to felony prosecution. Senior military officials have told Congress those prohibitions were violated.

The agreement coalesced around two crucial issues: the GOP senators' insistence that Bush not be allowed to reinterpret the meaning of the Geneva Conventions, and the White House's insistence that CIA agents not be subject to prosecution for aggressive interrogation techniques -- tactics that did not constitute torture but were more aggressive than "simple assault."

The biggest hurdle, Senate sources said, was convincing administration officials that lawmakers would never accept language that allowed Bush to appear to be reinterpreting the Geneva Conventions. Once that was settled, they said, the White House poured most of its energy into defining "cruel or inhuman treatment" that would constitute a crime under the War Crimes Act. The administration wanted the term to describe techniques resulting in "severe" physical or mental pain, but the senators insisted on the word "serious."

Negotiations then turned to the amount of time that a detainee's suffering must last before the treatment amounts to a war crime. Administration officials preferred designating "prolonged" mental or physical symptoms, while the senators wanted something milder. They settled on "serious and non-transitory mental harm, which need not be prolonged."

These definitions appear in a section of the legislation that specifically lists "grave breaches" of the Geneva Conventions that might bring criminal penalties.

For lesser offenses barred by the Geneva Conventions -- those lying between cruelty and minor abuse, putting them at the heart of the intraparty dispute -- the draft legislation would give the president explicit authority to interpret "the meaning and application" of the relevant provisions in Common Article 3. It also requires that such interpretations be considered as "authoritative" as other U.S. regulations.

But the language also requires that such interpretations be published, rather than described in secret to a restricted number of lawmakers. That provision was demanded by the dissident lawmakers, who resented the administration's past efforts to curtail the number of members who were told of its policies. The provision also affirms that Congress and the judiciary can play their customary roles in reviewing the interpretations, a statement that Senate sources say the White House vigorously resisted.

A senior administration official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said in an interview that Bush essentially got what he asked for in a different formulation that allows both sides to maintain that their concerns were addressed. "We kind of take the scenic route, but we get there," the official said.

Democrats sounded a cautious note about the Republican accord, calling attention to the past Republican division rather than taking a position on the compromise.

Staff writer Peter Baker contributed to this report.

Deal On Suspects Closes GOP Rift (USAT)

By David Jackson And Kathy Kiely

USA Today, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush and Senate Republicans reached a deal Thursday on rules for secret CIA interrogations and military trials for terrorism suspects, defusing a fight over national security that divided the GOP less than seven weeks before Election Day.

Bush said the new proposal preserves a CIA interrogation program that he called the “most potent tool we have in protecting America and foiling terrorist attacks.” If approved next week by the House and Senate, it would pave the way for trials of 9/11 and other “high value” terrorism suspects being held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Senate Republicans who opposed Bush's original proposal said new language preserves U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions, which require humane treatment for prisoners of war, and defines for the CIA what is not acceptable.

“We're going to do it in a way that won't come back to haunt us if our troops fall into enemy hands in the next war,” said Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C.

At issue are how CIA agents can get information from terrorism suspects without violating prisoner-treatment rules under the Geneva Conventions and how evidence gathered from those interrogations can be used at trial.

DOJ_NMG_0067364

Graham, Senate Armed Services Chairman John Warner of Virginia and Sen. John McCain of Arizona, the key GOP dissidents, said the compromise upholds the Geneva Conventions as they wanted. Bush national security adviser Stephen Hadley said the CIA got the guidelines it needs to continue interrogations, as Bush sought. The president also wanted to allow secret evidence in trials of terrorism suspects, but the deal limits its use, as the senators had insisted.

At least one key Republican, House Armed Services Chairman Duncan Hunter of California, expressed reservations about the restrictions on secret evidence. He said he fears the government won't be able to convict terrorism suspects without it.

Hadley reached the agreement after day-long negotiations with Warner, McCain, Graham and other Republicans. Bush's military trial plan was a response to a decision by the Supreme Court in June that struck down an earlier version.

The deal comes as campaigns heat up for the Nov. 7 elections to decide control of Congress. Bush and GOP candidates are stressing their party's handling of national security and wanted to get the dispute behind them.

"It's good news for the Republicans to have that issue, at least for a while, off the political radar screen," said Sherry Bebitch Jeffe, a political scientist at the University of Southern California.

Democrats appeared likely to back the compromise. "It is time to make the tough and smart decisions to give the American people the real security they deserve," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada.

Accord Is Reached On Framework For Detainee Bill (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck And David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Ending weeks of division, the White House and Senate Republicans agreed on a framework for legislation defining the tribunal structure and rules of evidence for trying enemy combatants in the war on terror.

The compromise must still be reviewed by House leaders and final details were sketchy. But if the pact holds, it removes a major obstacle for the administration and all but assures that Congress can complete action on an emotional issue that has engaged all three branches of the government.

Going into the fall elections, the compromise also is crucial for Republicans, who have been embarrassed by the party split just when they had wanted to present a united front against Democrats on national-security issues. Even now, the White House faces resistance to a second legislative request, authorizing warrantless surveillance of communications in and out of the U.S. And privately, Republicans admit that completing the second measure before lawmakers go home for the elections will be difficult.

The Supreme Court set the stage in June when it struck down the tribunal system set up by the administration, saying that defendants were being denied fundamental rights and that the system violated both the Uniform Code of Military Justice and the Geneva Conventions. The White House turned to Congress seeking specific authority for the alternative legal system it says it needs to try enemy combatants. But lawmakers were clearly troubled by what changes they should permit, especially in regard to Geneva Convention protections of prisoners and coerced testimony.

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner (R., Va.) played a central role in challenging the White House, but the fight inevitably focused on resistance mounted by Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.), a former prisoner of war in Vietnam. The Geneva Conventions have huge importance for Mr. McCain, and though some observers said it may have hurt his ambitions to seek the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, he stood against Mr. Bush with Mr. Warner and Sen. Lindsey Graham (R., S.C), a third member of the Armed Services panel and an experienced military attorney.

Yesterday, after a meeting to finalize the compromise, the three senators appeared in a show of Republican unity with National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) and others. "There's no doubt that the integrity and letter and spirit of the Geneva Convention have been preserved," Mr. McCain said. He brushed off any talk about who prevailed politically in the showdown. "We're all winners because we've been able to come to an agreement through a process of negotiations and consensus."

President Bush said the compromise met his test: that the Central Intelligence Agency would be able to continue its covert interrogation program targeted at high-level terrorist detainees. "I'm pleased to say that this agreement preserves the single most potent tool we have in protecting America and foiling terrorist attacks..." he said.

Under the compromise, Congress would rewrite a portion of the War Crimes Act to specify what actions by interrogators amount to a felony war crime. Torture and causing serious bodily injury are among the actions on the list, in line with what the negotiators said is required under U.S. treaty obligations. The definitions would apply retroactively to 1997, to protect U.S. officials from what Mr. Graham said was a vague earlier law. "You don't want to trivialize war crimes. They should be a serious violation of law," Mr. Graham said.

DOJ_NMG_0067365

The president, meanwhile, would get the authority to set policies regarding interrogation techniques that fall short of being classified as war crimes. That provision already is drawing criticism from the American Civil Liberties Union, which said it would give the president "unilateral authority to declare certain torture and abuse legal and sound."

On the uses of coerced and classified evidence, the compromise took much the same approach as the legislation proposed by Sens. Warner, McCain and Graham. In the military trials of terror suspects, coerced evidence could be used if a judge decides it is reliable, illuminates the facts and is in the best interest of justice, Mr. Graham said.

Defendants wouldn't automatically be able to see classified evidence, but they would be able to rebut anything shared with the jury. Mr. Graham said that was critical to protect U.S. troops in future wars from possible unfair jurisdiction abroad. But treatment of classified evidence may yet be a sticking point with the House, where leaders have emphasized the need to fight terrorism.

"You're playing trial lawyer with this thing and you have American lives you have to think about," said House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.).

Write to Sarah Lueck at sarah.lueck@wsj.com1 and David Rogers at david.rogers@wsj.com2

GOP Compromises On Terror Detainees (WT)

By Charles Hurt And Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

Dissident Senate Republicans and the White House reached a deal yesterday on legislation for how to handle the terror suspects held at Guantanamo Bay, allowing them to turn their attention to differences they might have with Democrats.

"The agreement that we've entered into gives the president the tools that he needs to continue to fight the war on terror and bring these evil people to justice," said Sen. John McCain of Arizona, who was among the Republicans who objected to the original White House proposals because they wanted the detainees granted broader civil rights, especially in terms of guaranteeing a fair trial.

"I also believe that it's consistent with the standards under the detainee treatment act, and there is no doubt that the integrity and letter and spirit of the Geneva Conventions have been preserved," said Mr. McCain, a veteran who was held prisoner and tortured in northern Vietnam.

Mr. McCain announced his support for the deal at a Capitol press conference accompanied by fellow Republican defectors Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and John W. Warner of Virginia.

President Bush said his only concern about the legislation was whether CIA interrogators could operate with enough freedom to glean information "to protect the American people."

"I'm pleased to say that this agreement preserves the single most potent tool we have in protecting America and foiling terrorist attacks, and that is the CIA program to question the world's most dangerous terrorists and to get their secrets," he said during a campaign stop in Florida.

"The measure also creates military commissions that will bring these ruthless killers to justice," he said. "In short, the agreement clears the way to do what the American people expect us to do: to capture terrorists, to detain terrorists, to question terrorists, and then to try them."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said the final deal must still be shared with Senate and House Republicans as well as Senate Democratic leaders. But he hopes to have the bill on the Senate floor early next week for a vote before Congress recesses at the end of this month for the November elections.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, praised the deal for allowing the administration's CIA interrogation program to go forward and quickly shifted the focus from Republican opposition to Democratic opposition.

"The Democrats have a choice," he said. "They can either work with Republicans to preserve this crucial program or move to shut it down and continue to oppose every responsible effort to provide President Bush with the tools he needs to keep America safe."

Democrats late yesterday remained silent on the deal, telling reporters that they would not comment until after studying the deal more closely.

But Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said Democrats are united behind bringing terrorists to justice "in a manner consistent with our laws, our values and our national security."

"Hopefully, today's press conference means that President Bush and the congressional Republican leadership have changed course and listened to numerous national security experts such as General Colin Powell," he added.

Under the deal, Republicans said, defendants in the terror trials could see any information given to a jury but classified material could be redacted.

DOJ_NMG_0067366

House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter, California Republican, was critical of this White House concession.

"Classified information, we feel, should still be allowed to be used for a conviction," he said, arguing that the Senate deal leaves the U.S. military two choices -- either declassify the information or dismiss the case if no other evidence can be found.

Under the deal, hearsay evidence and coerced testimony can be used in some circumstances. The deal also prohibits "grave breaches" of the Geneva Conventions, described as acts such as torture, rape, or cruel and inhuman treatment. Mr. Bush can define anything short of "grave breaches."

Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, called the compromise "a big win in the continuing war on terror."

"The president was very clear that any legislation on terrorist detainees must ensure that our intelligence-gathering interrogation program can continue," he said. "As the president said, this valuable program has saved innocent American lives and is preventing future terrorist attacks. The legislation we will soon consider on the Senate floor meets the president's criteria."

Bush Bows To Senators On Detainees (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes And Richard Simon, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

The White House agrees to new rules banning the most controversial CIA tactics but allowing a secret interrogation program to continue.

WASHINGTON — President Bush acceded to dissident Senate Republicans on Thursday, agreeing to new rules for interrogating and prosecuting suspected terrorists that leave intact international treaty protections against torture.

In a major concession to Arizona Sen. John McCain and other Republicans, the administration dropped its efforts to have Congress redefine U.S. obligations under the Geneva Convention. The compromise bill in effect bans the most controversial CIA interrogation tactics, including water boarding, a form of simulated drowning, said those involved in the negotiations.

At the same time, the agreement gives Bush the legal protections he said were needed to preserve a secret CIA interrogation program. The compromise bill would allow Bush the latitude to employ interrogation tactics which go beyond legal limits set for the U.S. military.

Both McCain and Bush hailed the agreement, saying their most important priorities had been met.

"There is no doubt that the integrity and letter and spirit of the Geneva Conventions have been preserved," McCain said after hours of closed-door, often tense negotiations.

Bush, campaigning for GOP candidates in Florida, said the agreement would achieve his goal of preserving a critical CIA interrogation program that "will help us crack the terror network and to save American lives."

But many human rights advocates involved in the debate expressed satisfaction that the White House had been forced to drop its demands that Congress redefine U.S. treaty obligations.

"The administration did not achieve its goal of having the Geneva Convention redefined," said Elisa Massimino, the Washington director of Human Rights First. "The agreement makes clear that the president can't downgrade the humane treatment standards of the Geneva Conventions, and that Congress is unwilling to do that."

While at least a partial setback for Bush, the deal heads off a politically embarrassing intra-party showdown in an election year and also paves the way for trials of terrorism suspects held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The compromise followed weeks of wrenching debate in which Bush's proposal was criticized by leading members of his own party, including McCain and former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) said the legislation would permit aggressive interrogation techniques that will "get us good information" but would "put boundaries around conduct that would not represent American values."

The compromise sets the stage for expected Senate approval next week of legislation authorizing military tribunals to try the suspects at Guantanamo Bay. The House also is expected to take up the bill. The interrogation provisions are part of the military tribunal measure.

Senate GOP leaders and the White House also were moving toward a compromise Thursday on legislation authorizing the president's warrantless domestic surveillance, a sign of the heightened anxiety among Republicans over the need to complete work on national security legislation before recessing next week.

The compromise came together after Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) — worried about time running out — called administration officials and the dissident GOP senators together.

The tribunal legislation was necessitated by a Supreme Court ruling in June that struck down the administration's earlier rules for detaining and prosecuting accused terrorists. Among those who are expected to be put on trial, once the legislation becomes law, are self-proclaimed Sept. 11 planner Khalid Shaikh Mohammed and 13 other suspected leaders of Al Qaeda who are now at the U.S. detention facility in Guantanamo Bay.

DOJ_NMG_0067367

At issue was the meaning of Common Article 3, a provision of the Geneva Convention of 1949. The provision bans torture and cruel treatment and is considered a minimum level of protection for those taken prisoner in armed conflicts. But the Bush administration considers parts of Common Article 3 too vague, including its prohibition on "outrages upon personal dignity."

McCain, a former POW, along with Graham and Republican Sen. John Warner of Virginia, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, had resisted the administration's efforts to redefine U.S. obligations under the Geneva Convention. They contended it would lead other nations to reinterpret their treaty obligations and put captured Americans at risk.

The compromise lists nine violations of Common Article 3 that are considered war crimes. It bans cruel and inhuman treatment, as McCain wanted. But it does not classify "degrading" treatment as a war crime, a concession by the Senate Republicans to Bush.

Under Thursday's deal, the administration dropped its opposition to making the infliction of "serious mental pain or suffering" a war crime. The compromise also bans shorter-term "non-transitory" suffering.

A Senate staffer involved in negotiations said that would ban the most outrageous of CIA methods, including water boarding — a tactic in which detainees are made to feel as if they're drowning — and mock executions.

"That was designed so that water boarding will never again be allowed," said the staffer. "Everyone was nodding their heads. This was out on the table. Sen. McCain said: 'We are not going to be water-boarding people. We are not going to be firing guns next to their heads. We will not be threatening them with death.' "

Although the bill allows the president to issue interpretations of the Geneva Convention, it also requires that any such executive interpretation be published in the Federal Register. Regulations and orders published in the Federal Register may be reviewed — and overridden — by Congress. Human rights organizations said they could accept that compromise because it would keep the administration's actions public, and thus subject to review.

"The important part of the compromise is that Congress and the judiciary will retain their oversight role," said Tom Malinowski, the Washington advocacy director for Human Rights Watch. "The administration will say what it says, but it is no more binding than any regulation and subject to judicial review."

In a statement, the CIA director, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, said he was happy with the compromise.

"If this language becomes law, the Congress will have given us the clarity and the support that we need to move forward with a detention and interrogation program that allows us to continue to defend the homeland, attack Al Qaeda and protect American and Allied lives," Hayden said.

Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-El Cajon), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, expressed concern that the Senate compromise would allow suspects to gain access to classified evidence.

"There's still work to do on this bill," he said, but added, "We're very close."

Graham said the compromise would shield methods and sources of intelligence from being disclosed but would not allow a suspect to be convicted without seeing the evidence.

"It boils down to: If it goes to the jury, it goes to the defendant," said the Senate staffer.

Originally the Bush administration wanted to be able to use classified information and keep it secret from the defendant. But Hadley said the administration was satisfied with the compromise because it prohibited defendants from using the legal process of discovery or other mechanisms to get access to classified information.

A final sticking point between the Republican senators and the administration was the use of coerced evidence. For trials of suspects captured in the future, the compromise excluded evidence that was gathered by torture and methods that violated prohibitions on cruel treatment.

For detainees now in custody, including the 14 suspected terrorists recently transferred to Guantanamo, it will be up to military judges to decide what coerced evidence can be used.

McCain, a possible 2008 presidential candidate, refused to say who came out ahead in the fight over detainees.

"In this business, people say, 'Who's the winners and who's the losers?' There's none," he said. "We're all winners because we've been able to come to an agreement through a process of negotiation and consensus."

richard.simon@latimes.com
julian.barnes@latimes.com

Times staff writer Richard B. Schmitt in Washington contributed to this report.

*

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

The new rules

DOJ_NMG_0067368

Highlights of the agreement between the White House and Senate Republicans dealing with the treatment of terrorist suspects:

· Requires that a defendant being tried by military commission have access to any evidence given to a jury.

· Drops a section of the administration's previous proposal that stated an existing ban on cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment satisfies the nation's obligations under the Geneva Convention.

· Prohibits "grave breaches" of the Geneva Convention. Defines grave breaches as acts such as torture, rape, biological experiments, and cruel and inhuman treatment.

· Notes the president has the authority to interpret "the meaning and application" of the Geneva Convention.

· Allows hearsay evidence.

· Allows coerced testimony if the statement was acquired before a 2005 ban on cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment and a judge finds it to be reliable. Bans coerced statements taken after the 2005 ban went into effect if constitutional definitions of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment were violated.

· Bars individuals from protesting violations of Geneva Convention standards in court.

Source: Associated Press

Republicans Reach Deal On Detainee Bill (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 21 — The Bush administration and Congressional Republicans reached agreement Thursday on legislation governing the treatment and interrogation of terror suspects after weeks of debate that divided Republicans heading into the midterm elections.

Under the deal, President Bush dropped his demand that Congress redefine the nation's obligations under the Geneva Conventions, handing a victory to a group of Republicans, including Senator John McCain of Arizona, whose opposition had created a showdown over a fundamental aspect of the rules for battling terrorism.

The administration's original stance had run into fierce resistance from former and current military lawyers and Mr. Bush's former secretary of state, Colin L. Powell, a former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They argued, as did Mr. McCain and the other two senators leading the resistance, that any redefinition would invite other nations to alter their obligations and endanger American troops captured abroad.

"There is no doubt that the integrity and the letter and the spirit of the Geneva Conventions have been preserved," said Mr. McCain, who was tortured during more than five years as a prisoner in North Vietnam.

Members of Congress and administration officials announced the deal after emerging from a tense and intricate all-day meeting in Vice President Dick Cheney's office in a Senate building, saying they would try to push it through in the five days Congress is scheduled to meet before lawmakers leave to campaign.

The White House moved quickly to assert that it had not surrendered. Administration officials characterized the negotiations as cooperative and the result as a victory for all sides.

"The agreement clears the way to do what the American people expect us to do: to capture terrorists, to detain terrorists, to question terrorists, and then to try them," Mr. Bush said in Orlando, Fla., where he was attending fund-raisers for several Republican candidates.

The dispute revolved around how to define the rules governing the interrogations of terror suspects and providing legal protection to C.I.A. officers conducting interrogations. Under the deal, Congress would seek to codify the limits by outlining in the War Crimes Act, a domestic law, several "grave breaches" of the relevant provision of the Geneva Conventions, known as Common Article 3. The deal would eliminate a legislative provision in the original White House proposal saying that compliance with the Detainee Treatment Act, which Congress passed last year and which bans "cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment," would by itself satisfy the obligations of the United States under the conventions.

"Everybody agreed we ought to try and do it in a way that did not involve modifying or amending our international obligations," said Stephen J. Hadley, the president's national security adviser. "That was the objective we all came to here in the last week. The goal was whether we could find language mutually agreed between the Senate and the White House that would achieve those objectives."

Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president, said: "We proposed a more direct approach to bringing clarification. This one is more of the scenic route, but it gets us there."

The agreement says the executive branch is responsible for upholding the nations' commitment to the Geneva Conventions, leaving it to the president to establish through executive rule any violations for the handling of terror suspects that fall short of a "grave breach." Significantly, Senate aides said, those rules would have to be published in the Federal Register.

DOJ_NMG_0067369

The agreement provides several pages describing "grave breaches" that would not be allowed, starting with torture and including other forms of assault and mental stress. But it does not lay out specific interrogation techniques that would be prohibited.

The adjustment to the War Crimes Act, "will put the C.I.A. on notice of what they can and can't do," said Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, who, along with Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, joined Mr. McCain in leading resistance to the White House approach. "It would take off the table things that are not within American values."

Asked about one of the most controversial interrogation techniques, a simulated drowning known as water-boarding, Mr. Graham said, "It is a technique that we need to let the world know we are no longer engaging in."

Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the C.I.A. director, issued a statement to employees, saying, "If this language becomes law, the Congress will have given us the clarity and the support that we need to move forward with a detention and interrogation program that allows us to continue to defend the homeland, attack Al Qaeda and protect American and allied lives."

The senators were careful not to characterize winners and losers. "This was a give-and-take," Mr. Graham said.

The senators agreed to a White House proposal to make the standard on interrogation treatment retroactive to 1997, so C.I.A. and military personnel could not be prosecuted for past treatment under standards the administration considers vague.

Senators Graham McCain and Warner said the agreement met the three goals they set from the beginning: to preserve the Geneva Conventions, to allow the C.I.A. to continue interrogations and to set up a program that would pass court review.

On another point of contention, the use of classified evidence in prosecutions of terror suspects, the senators won agreement that suspects would be allowed to see any evidence the jury sees, which the senators say is in keeping with 200 years of American judicial tradition. But the agreement includes procedures that would strip the evidence of the most sensitive details that lawmakers have worried could be used to plan more attacks.

The agreement would not allow any evidence obtained by techniques that violate the Detainee Treatment Act, and would not allow hearsay evidence that the defense successfully argues is not reliable or probative.

The Supreme Court had thrown the issue to Congress in June, when it struck down the tribunals the president established shortly after the terror attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, saying they violated constitutional and international law.

After weeks of standoff over proposed legislation, the two sides had begun to negotiate in earnest in the last few days, after Mr. Hadley said on the Sunday morning news programs that he believed they could reach consensus without modifying international agreements.

Thursday morning, Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, who has supported the president's approach, told Mr. Warner that with just a week left before the Senate is to adjourn, they needed a deal by evening.

Mr. Frist said he would send the bill to the floor. In the House, Representative Duncan Hunter of California, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said he had some concerns about the use of classified evidence, but added, "I think we're very close."

Democrats have put their trust in Senators Graham, McCain and Warner to push back against the White House, and Thursday they signaled that they intended to continue cooperating. "Five years after Sept. 11, it is time to make the tough and smart decisions to give the American people the real security they deserve," said the Democratic leader, Harry Reid of Nevada.

Still, Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the senior Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, said he would press to change a provision in the proposal that would deny detainees a right to challenge their captivity in court.

White House In Deal On CIA Prisons (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, September 22, 2006

The White House on Thursday ended the impasse over its interrogation and detention policies when it agreed to compromise with a group of influential Republican senators, and said it would not seek to amend the terms of the Geneva Conventions.

President George W. Bush hailed the deal as meeting his goal of allowing the tougher interrogation of terrorist suspects at secret prisons run by the Central Intelligence Agency, and prosecution of them using a new form of military tribunals.

"I'm pleased to say that this agreement preserves the most potent tool we have in protecting America and foiling terrorist attacks, and that is the CIA programme to question the world's most dangerous terrorists and to get their secrets."

However, the compromise, struck on Thursday after six hours of intense negotiations, marks a second moral victory for Senator John McCain, who last year took on the White House over the Detainee Treatment Act, which prohibits cruel or inhumane treatment of prisoners, and Senator Lindsey Graham and Senator John Warner.

"The agreement that we've entered into gives the president the tools he needs to continue to fight the war on terror and bring these evil people to justice," said Mr McCain, who has made interrogations a signature issue and who has earned credibility on the issue after his years of being tortured in Vietnam. “There’s no doubt that the integrity and letter and spirit of the Geneva Conventions have been preserved.”

The battle had threatened to undermine both the Republican effort to show unity on national security issues and make that a cornerstone of party re-election efforts.

White House negotiators had also faced heavy criticism that they were undermining the Geneva Conventions, governing the rights of wartime detainees, by their insistence that they wanted to clarify the terms of Article 3. Although the new language was not made public, it did not now include changes to the convention, officials said.

The compromise language will be introduced as an amendment next week, when the bill could be brought to the Senate floor. Mr Bush on Thursday urged Congress to send him legislation before it wraps up business next week.

If the bill passes, it will also allow the creation of controversial military tribunals.

“The agreement clears the way to do what the American people expect us to do, to capture terrorists, to detain terrorists, to question terrorists, and then to try them,” said Mr Bush.

Bush, Senators Reach Agreement On Detainee Interrogation Legislation (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON - The White House and dissident Republican senators reached an agreement Thursday that would allow the CIA's controversial terrorist interrogation program to continue and trials of suspected Islamic terrorists to begin but preserve the Geneva Conventions' prohibitions against mistreating wartime prisoners.

President Bush began asking Congress for new authority to question and try suspected terrorists after the Supreme Court ruled 5-3 in June that his plan for special military tribunals violated both U.S. law and the Geneva Conventions.

If it's approved by the full Senate and the House of Representatives before the end of next week, when Congress is set to recess, Thursday's agreement also could end a weeks-long intra-party rift and unite Republicans around their core national security message as they head into crucial midterm elections.

Final passage of the compromise is likely, but hurdles remain. Most Democrats and Republicans didn't yet know the terms of the agreement Thursday, and House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., said he had some concerns about detainees gaining too much access to classified information. The White House and CIA voiced no such concerns, however.

President Bush, speaking from a Republican fund-raiser in Orlando, Fla., said the accord "preserves the . . . most potent tool we have in protecting America and foiling terrorist attacks, and that is the CIA program to question the world's most dangerous terrorists and to get their secrets."

CIA Director Michael Hayden told his staff in a memo that the agreement would give his operatives "the clarity and the support that we need to move forward . . . ."

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., one of three Republican senators who forced the administration to compromise, said he was satisfied with the agreement.

"There is no doubt that the integrity and sprit of the Geneva Conventions have been preserved," he said at a news conference with other senators and administration officials.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., who'd joined McCain and Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner, R-Va., in forcing the White House to temper its original proposal, said he believed the compromise would prohibit simulated drowning, or "water-boarding" as a CIA interrogation technique.

But Graham didn't rule out other aggressive techniques such as sleep deprivation or playing loud music. He said the legislation wouldn't spell out which "alternative interrogation techniques" are permitted and which are prohibited.

Specifics were sketchy, as negotiators didn't immediately release details in writing.

As outlined by lawmakers and administration officials, the deal provides CIA interrogators with protection, retroactive to 2001, against being prosecuted as war criminals for most interrogation methods on high-value detainees.

But the administration appeared to bow to demands from McCain, Graham and Warner, who'd voiced concerns raised by dozens of current and former high ranking military and diplomatic officials, including five former chairmen of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and Republican Secretaries of State Colin Powell and George Shultz.

The administration had sought to more narrowly define the U.S. obligations under Common Article 3 of the international Geneva Conventions of 1949, which govern the treatment of prisoners of war. Critics said that Bush's approach could allow interrogation tactics too close to torture, invite other nations to back out of their treaty obligations and possibly lead to torture of U.S. soldiers in future wars. They also said it would damage the nation's international reputation by lowering the moral standards America observes in war.

DOJ_NMG_0067371

Under the compromise, the administration would agree not to reinterpret the Geneva Conventions. Instead, the U.S. War Crimes Act would be revised to define "grave breaches" of Common Article 3, including murder, torture, biological experiments, rape and other acts.

The CIA would be instructed that it must abide by the Detainee Treatment Act, which was championed last year by McCain and rules out degrading treatment of detainees. But Congress would give the executive branch the power to define a lower category of mid-range felonies under the War Crimes Act.

The administration appeared to accept the senators' demand that classified information couldn't be used to convict a detainee unless the detainee was given at least a sense of what information was being used against him. The sources and methods of U.S. intelligence would be protected.

The senators also appeared to get most of what they wanted in terms of allowing a judge to throw out evidence that appeared to have been gleaned in violation of humane treatment standards.

The American Civil Liberties Union, however, urged lawmakers to reject the deal, saying it didn't protect due process and was "a compromise of America's commitment to the rule of law."

"The proposal . . . deliberately provides a `get out of jail free card' to the administration's top torture officials, " Caroline Fredrickson, director of the ACLU Washington Legislative Office, said in a written statement. ". . .The president would have the authority to declare what is - and what is not - a grave breach of the War Crimes Act, making the president his own judge and jury. . . . These are tactics expected of repressive regimes, not the American government."

But one prominent independent human-rights group hailed the deal.

"Today's agreement makes clear that the president cannot unilaterally downgrade the humane treatment standards of the Geneva Conventions," said Elisa Massimino, the Washington Director of Human Rights First, in a prepared statement. "The administration failed in its attempt to get around the prohibitions against torture and cruelty by arguing that the standards are `flexible.' "

In addition, Massimino said, the agreement "makes clear that `alternative interrogation procedures,' such as stress positions, induced hypothermia and water-boarding are not only prohibited by the treaty, they are war crimes."

However, she added, "concerns remain," including whether the administration's interpretation of the Geneva standards comports with the law, and whether alleged abuses in secret CIA prisons will ever be aired in courts.

Eugene Fidell, the president of the National Association of Military Justice, which serves as a watchdog over military prosecutions, said details of the deal were too scant to render an analysis. He sharply criticized the closed-door negotiations, saying the terms should have been the subject of public Senate hearings.

McClatchy Newspapers correspondents William Douglas, Greg Gordon and Jonathan S. Landay contributed to this report.

A Bad Bargain (NYT)

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

Here is a way to measure how seriously President Bush was willing to compromise on the military tribunals bill: Less than an hour after an agreement was announced yesterday with three leading Republican senators, the White House was already laying a path to wiggle out of its one real concession.

About the only thing that Senators John Warner, John McCain and Lindsey Graham had to show for their defiance was Mr. Bush's agreement to drop his insistence on allowing prosecutors of suspected terrorists to introduce classified evidence kept secret from the defendant. The White House agreed to abide by the rules of courts-martial, which bar secret evidence. (Although the administration's supporters continually claim this means giving classified information to terrorists, the rules actually provide for reviewing, editing and summarizing classified material. Evidence that cannot be safely declassified cannot be introduced.)

This is a critical point. As Senator Graham keeps noting, the United States would never stand for any other country's convicting an American citizen with undisclosed, secret evidence. So it seemed like a significant concession — until Stephen Hadley, the national security adviser, briefed reporters yesterday evening. He said that while the White House wants to honor this deal, the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, Duncan Hunter, still wants to permit secret evidence and should certainly have his say. To accept this spin requires believing that Mr. Hunter, who railroaded Mr. Bush's original bill through his committee, is going to take any action not blessed by the White House.

On other issues, the three rebel senators achieved only modest improvements on the White House's original positions. They wanted to bar evidence obtained through coercion. Now, they have agreed to allow it if a judge finds it reliable (which coerced evidence hardly can be) and relevant to guilt or innocence. The way coercion is measured in the bill, even those protections would not apply to the prisoners at Guantánamo Bay.

The deal does next to nothing to stop the president from reinterpreting the Geneva Conventions. While the White House agreed to a list of "grave breaches" of the conventions that could be prosecuted as war crimes, it stipulated that the president could decide on his own what actions might be a lesser breach of the Geneva Conventions and what interrogation techniques he considered permissible. It's not clear how much the public will ultimately learn about those decisions. They will be contained in an executive order that is supposed to be made public, but Mr. Hadley reiterated that specific interrogation techniques will remain secret.

Even before the compromises began to emerge, the overall bill prepared by the three senators had fatal flaws. It allows the president to declare any foreigner, anywhere, an "illegal enemy combatant" using a dangerously broad definition, and detain him without any trial. It not only fails to deal with the fact that many of the Guantánamo detainees are not terrorists and will never be charged, but it also chokes off any judicial review.

The Democrats have largely stood silent and allowed the trio of Republicans to do the lifting. It's time for them to either try to fix this bill or delay it until after the election. The American people expect their leaders to clean up this mess without endangering U.S. troops, eviscerating American standards of justice, or further harming the nation's severely damaged reputation.

The Abuse Can Continue (WP)

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

THE GOOD NEWS about the agreement reached yesterday between the Bush administration and Republican senators on the detention, interrogation and trial of accused terrorists is that Congress will not -- as President Bush had demanded -- pass legislation that formally reinterprets U.S. compliance with the Geneva Conventions. Nor will the Senate explicitly endorse the administration's use of interrogation techniques that most of the world regards as cruel and inhumane, if not as outright torture. Trials of accused terrorists will be fairer than the commission system outlawed in June by the Supreme Court.

The bad news is that Mr. Bush, as he made clear yesterday, intends to continue using the CIA to secretly detain and abuse certain terrorist suspects. He will do so by issuing his own interpretation of the Geneva Conventions in an executive order and by relying on questionable Justice Department opinions that authorize such practices as exposing prisoners to hypothermia and prolonged sleep deprivation. Under the compromise agreed to yesterday, Congress would recognize his authority to take these steps and prevent prisoners from appealing them to U.S. courts. The bill would also immunize CIA personnel from prosecution for all but the most serious abuses and protect those who in the past violated U.S. law against war crimes.

In short, it's hard to credit the statement by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) yesterday that "there's no doubt that the integrity and letter and spirit of the Geneva Conventions have been preserved." In effect, the agreement means that U.S. violations of international human rights law can continue as long as Mr. Bush is president, with Congress's tacit assent. If they do, America's standing in the world will continue to suffer, as will the fight against terrorism.

For now, the administration says it is not holding anyone in secret CIA facilities. The detention of those being held by the U.S. military at Guantanamo Bay clearly conforms with international law. If suspects are routed into the CIA program in the future, the administration has pledged to consult with Congress about the interrogation techniques that will be permitted. In theory, Congress could override Mr. Bush's regulations governing treatment if it judges that they are being used to authorize unacceptable practices.

But the senators who have fought to rein in the administration's excesses -- led by Sens. McCain, Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) and John W. Warner (R-Va.) -- failed to break Mr. Bush's commitment to "alternative" methods that virtually every senior officer of the U.S. military regards as unreliable, counterproductive and dangerous for Americans who may be captured by hostile governments.

Mr. Bush wanted Congress to formally approve these practices and to declare them consistent with the Geneva Conventions. It will not. But it will not stop him either, if the legislation is passed in the form agreed on yesterday. Mr. Bush will go down in history for his embrace of torture and bear responsibility for the enormous damage that has caused.

Gonzales Revisits Deportation Remarks (WP)

By Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales's claim this week that the Justice Department was not responsible for sending Canadian software engineer Maher Arar to a Syrian prison in 2002 was the result of imprecise wording by Gonzales and a misunderstanding by those who reported his remarks, according to a Justice Department spokeswoman.

The matter turns on the meaning of the word "we."

On Tuesday, a day after a Canadian government commission concluded that the Syrian-born Arar was "interrogated, tortured and held in degrading and inhumane conditions" for 10 months after being falsely accused of terrorist ties, Gonzales was asked whether the department owed him "an apology."

DOJ_NMG_0067373

"Well, we were not responsible for his removal to Syria," Gonzales replied. "I'm not aware that he was tortured, and I haven't read the commission report."

Gonzales was aware that in 2002 the Immigration and Naturalization Service arranged Arar's removal from the United States and his delivery to Syria after he was accused of ties to al-Qaeda, spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said. The INS has since been transferred from the Justice Department to the new Department of Homeland Security and is known as U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services.

Since Arar was officially deported, Scolinos said, his case was "an immigration-related issue." She said Gonzales was trying to "make that point" because "immigration matters are no longer handled by the [Justice] Department."

On the question of torture, Scolinos said, "My understanding is that the U.S. government received what they believed to be reliable assurances that he would be treated humanely, consistent with international treaties and conventions." Gonzales, she said, was "emphasizing that point."

Arar, now 36 and living in Canada, sued the U.S. government in federal court, but the case was dismissed on national security grounds. He filed a notice of appeal Sept. 12, according to the Center for Constitutional Rights, a legal group that is handling his case.

The possibility of further litigation may have limited what the Justice Department is prepared to say on the matter, said some U.S. officials who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to discuss the matter.

Canada's House of Commons unanimously agreed Wednesday that "apologies should be presented" to Arar on behalf of Canada. Prime Minister Stephen Harper, who earlier acknowledged that Arar had been done "an injustice," balked at going that far, saying it might influence negotiations with Arar's lawyers over possible compensation.

Arar's ordeal began in New York City on Sept. 26, 2002, a year after the al-Qaeda attacks there. Changing planes on his return trip to Canada after visiting Tunisia with his family, he was arrested on what the commission concluded was false information, provided to the FBI by Canadian law enforcement, that he had al-Qaeda connections. After being held for 12 days, he was flown in a government plane to Jordan and transported over land to Syria, the nation he had left as a 17-year-old.

U.S. officials later confirmed that the order to deport him was signed by then-Deputy Attorney General Larry D. Thompson. They said it would be "prejudicial to the interests of the United States" to send Arar home to Canada, despite his Canadian citizenship.

The Canadian government was not informed until he was gone.

U.S. law prohibits sending anyone, even on national security grounds, to a country where he or she is likely to be tortured. Although the State Department has long branded Syria a human rights violator, then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft responded to Canadian protests by saying the Syrian government had assured that Arar would be treated humanely.

On Tuesday, Gonzales also repeated the administration's denial that Arar's removal was part of the practice of secret "renditions" of terrorism suspects to third countries where they could be more aggressively interrogated. "That is not what happened here," he said. "It was a deportation."

Even if Arar "had been rendered to Syria," he said, "we would have sought those same kind of assurances" against torture.

Correspondent Doug Struck in Toronto and staff researcher Julie Tate in Washington contributed to this report.

State Asks Court To Dismiss Suit Over Phone Company Records (AP)

By Glenn Adams, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 22, 2006

AUGUSTA, Maine --Maine's attorney general asked a federal court Thursday to throw out the government's lawsuit against Maine officials over whether a phone company should release information about its handling of confidential records.

Attorney General G. Steven Rowe said the state's request, filed on behalf of the Public Utilities Commission, asserts the federal government has no jurisdiction in the case. The state also contends that the government is wrong to invoke "state secrets" arguments.

"There are no state secrets at issue here," Rowe said at a news briefing after the motion to dismiss was filed in U.S. District Court in Bangor.

The litigation stems from a press release issued by Verizon and information it provided to the PUC, in which the telecommunications company claims it did not provide phone records to the government for its domestic surveillance program. The company also said in a May news release that it would not discuss any relationship with the National Security Agency program.

The PUC, prompted by a complaint by 22 Mainers, ordered Verizon to provide a sworn affirmation that Verizon's statement about the phone records is true. In response, the federal government sued, saying that the PUC's attempt to force Verizon to answer raised national security concerns.

Rowe was joined by PUC commissioners Thursday in rejecting the government's national security claims in the case.

"It's not about state secrets. It's about the integrity of the Public Utilities Commission process," said Sharon Reishus, one of the regulatory agency's commissioners and a defendant in the government's suit.

PUC Chairman Kurt Adams said the commission took the complaint over the handling of phone records "very seriously," adding that the PUC's ability to carry out its administrative duties was at issue in the case.

A legislator who is deeply involved in utility issues, Rep. John Brautigam, dismissed the federal government's secrecy claim as "the kind of legalistic mumbo-jumbo that gives the administration in Washington a bad name."

"The public has a right to know that their confidential information has been safeguarded in compliance with Maine law and the contractual obligations of the phone companies," said Brautigam, D-Falmouth.

A spokesman for the U.S. Justice Department's public affairs office, Charles Miller, said there would be no comment on the motion because the case is in litigation.

Legal disputes have surfaced in other states over reports of phone company cooperation with government surveillance efforts.

In Vermont, Verizon and AT&T customers, Gov. Jim Douglas and the state's chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union are urging state utility regulators to determine whether the two phone companies violated state statutes by turning records over to the NSA.

The American Civil Liberties Union last spring filed complaints in more than 20 states over allegations that phone companies shared customer records with the NSA.

The Maine Civil Liberties Union is supporting the phone records complaint of the 22 Mainers.

Bush Administration Asks Appeals Court To Quickly Dismiss Eavesdropping Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Hope Yen, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 22, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The Bush administration asked an appeals court Thursday to step in immediately and dismiss a lawsuit over the U.S. government's warrantless wire tapping program, calling a lower judge's ruling dangerous and wrong.

The Justice Department asked the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to overturn the decision earlier this month by U.S. District Judge Garr King. Government attorneys argued the decision put the disclosure of "highly sensitive foreign intelligence information" at risk.

The lawsuit was filed by the Al-Haramain Islamic Foundation, which had a chapter that went out of business after the U.S. government labeled it a terrorist organization.

The foundation alleged that two of its lawyers and at least one official were under electronic surveillance in March and April 2004. The foundation is asking King to rule the surveillance a violation of a federal law that requires a special court to approve intelligence-related wiretapping.

Typically, appeals are filed at the conclusion of a case in trial court; however, in this case, Justice Department attorneys are asking the 9th Circuit to step in now given the sensitivity and urgency of national security.

In the Sept. 7 order, King declined to dismiss the case, saying he believed there may be a way for the lawsuit filed by a now-defunct Islamic charity to proceed without releasing information that could harm U.S. security.

The decision, the latest of several rulings on the controversial program, drew a stern rebuke this week from Vice President Dick Cheney. He called it "just plain wrong."

In Thursday's filing, Justice Department attorneys argued that King's decision is flawed because classified facts needed to evaluate the case are protected under the so-called "state secrets" privilege.

On the Net:

Justice Department: http://www.usdoj.gov/

Claim 9/11 Terrorists Were Identified Is Rejected (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 21 — The Defense Department's inspector general on Thursday dismissed claims by military officers and others who had insisted that a secret Pentagon program identified Mohamed Atta and other terrorists involved in the Sept. 11 attacks before the attacks occurred.

DOJ_NMG_0067375

The inspector general's office, which acts as the Defense Department's internal watchdog, said in a report that its investigators found no evidence to suggest that the intelligence program, known as Able Danger, had identified Mr. Atta, the Egyptian-born ringleader of the attacks, or any of the other terrorists before Sept. 11.

"We concluded that prior to Sept. 11, 2001, Able Danger team members did not identify Mohamed Atta or any other 9/11 hijackers," the report said. "While we interviewed four witnesses who claimed to have seen a chart depicting Mohamed Atta and possibly other terrorists or 'cells' involved in 9/11, we determined that their recollections were not accurate."

The claim that a secret Pentagon data-mining program had known of Mr. Atta and other hijackers before Sept. 11 created a stir when the witnesses' accounts became public last year, because it suggested that the Defense Department had information that might have helped pre-empt the attacks had it been shared outside of the Pentagon.

The inspector general's report, prepared at the request of several members of Congress, was criticized Thursday by Representative Curt Weldon, Republican of Pennsylvania, who is a member of the House Armed Services Committee and who helped bring information about Able Danger to light.

"I am appalled that the Department of Defense inspector general would expect the American people to actually consider this a full and thorough investigation," Mr. Weldon said, describing the inspector general as having "cherry-picked testimony from witnesses in an effort to minimize the historical importance of the Able Danger effort."

The report found that the recollections of most of the witnesses appeared to focus on a "single chart depicting Al Qaeda cells responsible for pre-9/11 terrorist attacks" that was produced in 1999 by a defense contractor, the Orion Scientific Corporation.

While witnesses remembered having seen Mr. Atta's photograph or name on such a chart, the inspector general said its investigation showed that the Orion chart did not list Mr. Atta or any of the other Sept. 11 terrorists, and that "testimony by witnesses who claimed to have seen such a chart varied significantly from each other."

The report says that a central witness in the investigation, an active-duty Navy captain who directed the Able Danger program, had changed his account over time, initially telling the inspector general's office last December that he was "100 percent" certain that he had seen "Mohamed Atta's image on the chart."

But in an interview this May, the report said, the officer, Scott J. Phillpott, changed his story, telling investigators that he had been confused and was now "convinced that Atta was not on that chart" but that, instead, the terrorist's photograph was reproduced on a separate document that he was shown by an intelligence analyst on the Able Danger team in June 2000.

The inspector general's report suggests that the independent federal commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks was right to dismiss Captain Phillpott's initial claims about Able Danger.

The Sept. 11 commission acknowledged last year that the Navy captain had come to its investigators in July 2004, only days before it issued its final report.

The inspector general's report also rejected claims by another of the witnesses, Lt. Col. Anthony Shaffer, a veteran military intelligence officer, that he had faced reprisals for having make disclosures about Able Danger, including revocation of his security clearance.

FBI Says Its Agents Did Not Visit Puerto Rican Independence Activist (AP)

AP, September 22, 2006

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico The FBI is investigating if people posing as bureau agents visited a shoe repair store in western Puerto Rico owned by a supporter of independence for the U.S. territory, an agency spokesman said Thursday.

Harry Rodriguez, FBI spokesman in Puerto Rico, denied that bureau agents visited Miguel Sanchez's shoe repair store in Mayaguez, though Sanchez said they did come to see him.

"They were not FBI agents who went to Sanchez's business," he said, adding that those people "were impersonating FBI agents."

Rodriguez said impersonating an agent was a crime and that the FBI was investigating.

Rodriguez's comments come three days after FBI agents returned to the homes of two Puerto Rican activists whose properties were searched in February in an investigation into a militant independence group.

FBI teams went to the residences of Liliana Laboy and Norberto Cintron Fiallo, both in the San Juan area, but neither activist was home and the agents left without entering.

Rodriguez said the agents went to the homes as part of an ongoing investigation into the Macheteros, also known as the Puerto Rican People's Army. He declined to provide details.

On Saturday, Puerto Ricans will hold a vigil to mark the one-year anniversary of the death of Filiberto Ojeda Rios, the leader of the Macheteros, which claimed responsibility for bombings and attacks in the 1970s and 1980s aimed at gaining independence for Puerto Rico.

DOJ_NMG_0067376

In August, federal investigators concluded that FBI agents were justified in killing Ojeda, who opened fire first — hitting three agents — when they came to arrest him. The militant had been convicted for his role in the 1983 robbery of US$7 million (€5.5 million) from a Wells Fargo bank depot in Connecticut, but he fled while on bond.

Inside The Ring (WT)

By Bill Gertz And Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

Terrorist hunt

We understand that U.S. commandos have developed a clever technical procedure for tracking terrorists in Iraq, and elsewhere, we presume.

The tracking is used by a special military intelligence unit within U.S. Joint Special Operations Command (JSOC), which includes Navy SEALs and the Army's Delta Force. The technique was instrumental in finding and killing al Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab Zarqawi in June and in capturing a number of his lieutenants.

President Bush paid special tribute to JSOC after a U.S. Air Force F-16 dropped the bomb that killed Zarqawi, one of al Qaeda's most ruthless killers who pledged allegiance to Osama Bin Laden.

Cuban spy damage

Ana Montes, a Cuban spy working inside the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA), caused serious damage to U.S. national security by revealing U.S. electronic intelligence-gathering secrets and also by providing a feedback mechanism for communist disinformation from the Castro regime.

The damage is outlined in a classified assessment completed several months ago by the office of the National Counterintelligence Executive, now under the new Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte. It was disclosed this week in the new book by Bill Gertz, Pentagon reporter for The Washington Times, titled, "Enemies: How America's Foes Are Stealing Our Vital Secrets — And How We Let It Happen."

According to unclassified portions of the assessment, Montes met openly with Cuban intelligence officers at restaurants in the D.C. area as often as twice a week, a rate much more frequently than other spies.

Counterintelligence officials determined that the damage caused by Montes was nearly equal to that caused by CIA turncoat Aldrich Hazen Ames and FBI traitor Robert Philip Hanssen, who both spied for Russia.

Montes had almost unlimited access to U.S. secrets, including the identities of American intelligence personnel and information that defectors provided to U.S. intelligence.

A senior U.S. counterintelligence official familiar with the damage assessment said: "As a career analyst with high-level security clearances, [Montes] had access to virtually unlimited amounts of sensitive data from a number of intelligence community organizations."

She turned down several promotion opportunities to remain as a DIA analyst and keep her access to secrets. The counterintelligence official said that Montes commented during one debriefing she viewed "just about all the information there was about Cuba."

Montes also networked extensively with other civilian and military intelligence officials and agencies, allowing her "to obtain information that was not readily available to the typical analyst," the official said. She sat with a special interagency intelligence group known as the Hard Target Committee, which would meet to discuss all the intelligence operations under way in the most difficult places, including Iran, China and North Korea. Over the years she had access to hundreds of thousands of intelligence reports, many of which she could re-create because "she had an extraordinary, almost photographic memory," according to the counterintelligence official.

The damage assessment concluded, "Montes was the first national-level analyst from the intelligence community known to have turned traitor and the most damaging Cuban spy arrested to date."

The report noted that Montes "was able to effectively inform the Cubans of the United States information gaps and served as a feedback loop for the Cubans that potentially would facilitate the formulation and execution of a robust denial and deception program at U.S. intelligence."

The counterintelligence official said: "Her damage was especially grave and affected every major intelligence community organization. She compromised numerous sensitive intelligence collection activities and provided Havana with a unique window into Washington that undoubtedly helped the Cubans chart their tactics and strategy in dealing with Washington."

U.S. officials also think that information she provided to the Cubans led to the deaths of Nicaraguan anti-communist Contra rebels and possibly of American agents as well.

Pay increase

Throw out the conventional wisdom once again.

DOJ_NMG_0067377

A Rand Corp. study has found that rather than taking a salary cut, most reservists called to active duty actual make more money.

In fact, only 17 percent of all Guard and Reserve troops suffered a pay cut compared with their civilian pay stub.

"Typically, these reservists are people in their mid-20s to mid-30s, with some college but not necessarily a bachelor's degree," Rand quoted its economist and lead study author, David Loughran, as saying. "Generally, military pay is quite good for this group. Moreover, reservists receive additional special pay when activated and their earnings are not subject to federal taxes."

Co-ed dorms

Recent accusations of rape and sexual harassment at the service academies is partly a failure of leadership and partly the fault of housing young men and women in the same dorms, say alumni with whom we have talked.

One former Naval Academy graduate tells us Bancroft Hall, the co-ed dorm at Annapolis, is a frequent site of prohibited sexual intercourse. The source said midshipmen know places for having sex where they will not be detected. Such knowledge is passed on to the next class.

Peace through strength

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld addressed the annual Keeper of the Flame award dinner Wednesday night at a black-tie affair in Union Station's East Hall.

Mr. Rumsfeld reminded the several hundred guests, including Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. Peter Pace, and NATO commander Gen. Jim Jones about Winston Churchill's remark after the successful evacuation of British troops from the continent at Dunkirk.

"Churchill said in the Parliament very simply, 'Wars are not won by evacuations.' And we need to remember that today," Mr. Rumsfeld said. "They're not won by retreat or wishful thinking. They're won by determination, they're won by understanding the nature of the enemies we face, and the consequences, I would say the dire consequences of failing to understand them or failing to defeat them."

Mr. Rumsfeld said he met recently with former British Prime Minister Lady Margaret Thatcher, who he noted had been criticized for her outspoken advocacy of "peace through strength," which was the motto for the evening's host, the Center for Security Policy.

The dinner honored Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, along with five veterans of the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan.

·Bill Gertz and Rowan Scarborough are Pentagon reporters. Mr. Gertz can be reached at 202/636-3274 or by e-mail at bgertz@washingtontimes.com. Mr. Scarborough can be reached at 202/636-3208 or by e-mail at rscarborough@washingtontimes.com.

Britain Makes Modest Relaxation In Carry-on Rules (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, September 22, 2006

LONDON — Air passengers can carry a larger bag and musical instruments on board flights leaving Britain starting today, the government announced Thursday.

The new restrictions, announced by the Department for Transport, replace tighter ones imposed after British police announced Aug. 10 that they had broken up an alleged terrorist plot to blow up passenger jets headed for the USA.

Plotters intended to carry aboard liquids and other bomb-making components, assemble them during flight and blow up the planes, police said. Fifteen people have been charged and are in custody.

A ban on carrying on cosmetics and liquids not purchased inside airports after security checkpoints remains in place. And passengers flying to the USA still cannot carry any liquids onto aircraft. To ensure they don't, passengers will continue to go through a second security check at the departure gate.

The slight relaxation in carry-on baggage restrictions comes after complaints from passengers and airlines and as the government continues to try to balance security with passenger convenience.

“Passengers should be able to travel as freely as possible, but we have no intention of putting their safety at risk,” the Transport Department said in a statement. The change, it said, would “lessen the burden on passengers, while maintaining a rigorous security regime.”

One carry-on bag now will be allowed. It can be 22 inches long, 17.7 inches wide and 9.8 inches in depth. Previously, the bag was restricted to 17.7 inches by 13.7 inches by 6.2 inches. Large musical instruments now can be carried on board rather than checked, although some airlines may require passengers to pay for an extra seat.

DOJ_NMG_0067378

The relaxation also comes as Britain, the European Union and the airline industry continue to work on adopting uniform standards for passenger security inspections and carry-on bags. Requirements vary now from country to country. The varying standards cause confusion for passengers and delays at security checkpoints, the airline industry complains.

Tighter security restrictions, including a ban on carrying on liquids, prompted the cancellation of more than 2,000 flights, hundreds of flight delays and long security lines at British airports last month.

British Airways said it lost about $75 million as a result. Discount airline Ryanair sued the government last month for $6.2 million in damages. In doing so, Ryanair chief executive Michael O'Leary ridiculed many of the restrictions as “Keystone Cops security measures” and unnecessary.

Meanwhile Thursday, EU Justice and Interior ministers met in Finland to discuss new anti-terrorism measures and technology, including better equipment to detect liquid and other explosives that could be carried onto planes.

Woman Sentenced To Death For Role In Jordan Hotel Bombings (WP/AP)

By Jamal Halaby

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

AMMAN, Jordan, Sept. 21 -- A court sentenced an Iraqi woman to death Thursday for her role in al-Qaeda-led hotel bombings that killed 60 people in Jordan's deadliest terror attack.

Sajida al-Rishawi, 35, was intended to be one of the suicide bombers in the Nov. 9 attack. She entered a hotel ballroom with her husband, both strapped with explosives belts. Her husband set off his own belt, the explosion ripping through a wedding party in the room.

Initially, Rishawi said in a televised confession that her own belt had failed to detonate and she fled. But she later told her trial that she was an unwilling participant in the attacks and never tried to set off the suicide bomb.

Rishawi was one of seven defendants in the case, but the six others were still at large and tried in absentia. Like Rishawi, the six were sentenced to death by hanging. Rishawi is the first woman to be sentenced to execution in Jordan on terrorism charges.

Jordanians are still reeling from the attacks, the worst terrorist incident in recent memory and widely labeled "Jordan's 9/11." Suicide bombers entered three Amman hotels and set off their blasts nearly simultaneously, killing 60 people -- mainly Jordanian Muslim women and children -- in an attack claimed by the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq.

"The harsh verdict today sends a clear message to all terror groups: Jordan's stability and security is a red line that can't be crossed," said Mahmoud al-Kharabsheh, a lawmaker who sits on the parliament's Legal Committee.

Ashraf al-Akhras, who was the groom in the stricken wedding party and lost his father and 16 other family members and in-laws, said, "She got her just punishment, but it won't assuage the fire inside for my great loss."

Rishawi "got what she deserved," said Mahmoud al-Akrabawi, a wedding guest who lost his wife and two children.

Rishawi sat silently in the courtroom as the verdict was read.

She later told her lawyer she had anticipated receiving the death sentence.

"She told me that she expected either to be sentenced to death or to be sent back to Iraq," said the lawyer, Hussein al-Masri. He said he planned to appeal the verdict soon.

Jordan executes by hanging after a protracted legal process that includes several appeals, including to the supreme court -- the highest judicial authority. An average of 10 people -- mostly men -- are executed each year for crimes that include terrorism and premeditated murder.

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

The French government's latest reaction to the global war on terrorism is being scrutinized all over again on Capitol Hill, where one congressman is in search of a French general named Lafayette.

"'Let them eat cake' is what Marie Antoinette said to the starving French people, showing her ignorance of the world around her," recalls freshman Rep. Ted Poe, Texas Republican. "Today it can be used to describe France's position on handling terror threats."

The lawmaker was riled by a recent remark by French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin that "against terrorism, what we need is not a war. It is, as France has done for many years, a determined fight based on vigilance at all times and effective cooperation with our partners."

DOJ_NMG_0067379

Mr. Poe, a no-nonsense federal judge in his previous life, says what France "fails to consider is we tried that. Madrid's trains have been attacked. London's buses and subways have blown up. American embassies were bombed. The USS Cole was attacked, and, of course, there was September 11. ...

"What France and free people need is the spirit of Lafayette in this war on terror, not the current ignorance of Marie Antoinette, who was talking all the way to the guillotine and lost her head because she failed to see the real world around her."

In fairness to the French prime minister, he also warned that the risk of a terrorist attack in France using conventional, chemical, biological and nuclear weapons is "real and permanent," and assured French citizens that he would beef up security, particularly after al Qaeda's threat in recent days against French interests.

Crowned prisoners

Anybody who thinks that the terror suspects detained at Guantanamo Bay are being physically mistreated will be intrigued to learn that more dollars are being spent on food for the prisoners than for the U.S. troops guarding them.

"[T]he terrorists have gained weight on the nutritious diet," reveals Rep. Joe Wilson, a South Carolina Republican and member of the Armed Services Committee who twice toured the notorious detention facility.

And apart from their rich diets, the congressman adds, the prisoners' teeth are sparkling white, and their vision is 20/20 when reading the Koran.

"These detainees received 35 teeth cleanings, 91 filled cavities and 174 pairs of glasses," he says of the prisoners he encountered on one trip.

Rush for tickets

Coming soon to Washington, live and on stage, the one, the only — Rush Limbaugh.

Chris Berry of WMAL-630 AM fame tells Inside the Beltway that the Washington radio station over which Mr. Limbaugh is heard daily is bringing the popular broadcaster to the Warner Theatre at 8 p.m. Nov. 16 for an "Evening With Rush Limbaugh."

"Rush has thousands of fans throughout the Washington area," notes Mr. Berry, WMAL's president and general manager. "This will be a unique opportunity for them to see him as they never have before, up close and in person."

The evening is sponsored by the Heritage Foundation. A portion of the proceeds (tickets are $75 and $100, and will be available through Ticketmaster starting tomorrow) will benefit the Fisher House Foundation.

Beat by the clock

The gridiron of Washington's Gallaudet University hosted a rather lopsided flag football game this week between a U.S. Capitol Police squad and Democrats and Republicans who for once sported the same uniform.

"[I]f it wasn't for the clock running out, we would have had that big comeback and overcome that score of 35-7," insists Rep. Rick Renzi, Arizona Republican.

Doing his best to coach the bipartisan bunch while helping to raise $80,000 for the families of law-enforcement officers was none other than Rep. Tom Osborne, a Republican who during a quarter-century as head coach of the Nebraska Cornhuskers football team, garnered an outstanding 255-49-3 record.

·John McCaslin, whose column is nationally syndicated, can be reached at 202/636-3284 or jmccaslin@washingtontimes.com.

The Trials Of The Century (NYT)

By Lawrence Wright

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

Austin, Tex.

THE fifth anniversary of 9/11 has come and gone, but there was a conspicuous figure missing from the retrospectives and commentaries: Osama bin Laden.

Al Qaeda's founder has clearly been marginalized even in his own movement, as other jihadist spokesmen, Ayman al-Zawahri and an American, Adam Gadahn, issued threats and demanded that Americans convert to Islam. Meantime, Pakistan has negotiated a truce with tribal chiefs promising to keep troops out of the Waziristan districts, where the leadership of Al Qaeda may be hiding, and the C.I.A. has closed Alec Station, the unit devoted to finding Mr. bin Laden. He is the forgotten man.

Fortunately, there are still some members of the American intelligence community who are interested in the terrorist's whereabouts. Not long ago one of them approached me — not because of my reporting on Al Qaeda but because of my experience as a Hollywood screenwriter, a talent pool the C.I.A. occasionally draws on for futurist thinking. The official asked me to envision what we would do with Mr. bin Laden if we caught him. I said that I didn't feel comfortable, as a reporter, writing a script for the C.I.A.

DOJ_NMG_0067380

I have given the idea some thought, however. Osama bin Laden is arguably the most famous man alive, and his name will resound through history. If we do have the good fortune of actually capturing him, the manner in which we bring him to justice will make a critical difference in the way in which his legacy will unfold. Here is my scenario for how this movie could end.

First, don't kill him. He'd become a martyr instantly, which is of course his goal. His death at the hands of Americans would be the ideal finale from a Qaeda perspective. Deny him that victory at all costs.

And, please, don't send him to Guantánamo or torture him in an undisclosed location. That route leads to his becoming a symbol of resistance to the erosion of the American legal system. The world will want to know what happens to him, and if he is hidden away, or subjected to a secret trial, then his reputation will soar as ours plummets. He has to be accorded the civilized treatment that he and his movement would never offer their enemies.

But don't bring him to the United States to answer for his crimes, at least not at the beginning. His followers would never accept the verdict of an American court. And, more to the point, neither would hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, of Muslims who sympathize with him and his cause. It's that audience that we have to address in our attempt to roll back Mr. bin Laden's awful legacy.

Moreover, if he were tried in an American court, one can easily envision wide-scale attacks on American holdings and Americans being held for ransom in exchange for the terrorist leader. Placing him in the dock of the World Court would involve similar risks, and could lead to the sort of prolonged trial that sees him dying of natural causes, as in the case of Slobodan Milosevic.

We should, instead, offer him to the authorities in Kenya, where, on Aug. 7, 1998, a Qaeda suicide bomber murdered 213 people in the attack on the American Embassy. More than 150 people were blinded by flying glass in the attack — most of them Africans who were in or near the embassy or the secretarial school across the street, which was flattened by the blast. Let Mr. bin Laden sit in a courtroom in Nairobi and explain to those blind Africans that he was aiming only at an icon of American power.

Then take him to Tanzania, where on the same August morning Al Qaeda hit another American Embassy, killing 11 people, most of them Muslims. The terrorists excused the murder of their co-religionists by saying that the bombing took place on a Friday, when good Muslims should have been in a mosque. That would be an excellent venue to pose the question of what Islam really stands for.

Thus exposed as a mass murderer of Africans who had no part in his quarrel with America, Mr. bin Laden would be ready to stand trial for the bombing of the American destroyer Cole and, of course, 9/11. By treating him as a criminal defendant instead of a enemy combatant, we could underline the differences between a civil society and the Taliban-like rule he seeks to impose on Muslim countries and eventually the entire world.

Mr. bin Laden could go on to many other venues to answer for his crimes — Istanbul, Casablanca, Madrid, London, Islamabad — but in my opinion there is an obvious last stop on his tour of justice: his homeland, Saudi Arabia, where hundreds of his countrymen and expatriate workers have died at the hands of Al Qaeda. There he would be tried in a Shariah court, the only law he would ever recognize.

If he were found guilty, he would be taken to a park in the middle of downtown Riyadh known as "Chop Chop Square." There, the executioner would greet him with his long, heavy sword at his side. It is a Saudi tradition that the executioner personally beseeches the audience, composed of the victims of the condemned man's crimes, to forgive the condemned. If they cannot, the executioner will carry out his task. After that, Osama bin Laden's body would be taken to an unmarked tomb in a Wahhabi graveyard, as he would have wanted.

There are other ways this movie could end, and as a screenwriter I can't say that any of them are "happy" in the conventional Hollywood sense. But drama demands resolution, in real life as well as fiction. Since the Greeks, dramatists have known that a good ending is one that acknowledges the longing of the audience for justice and the sense that order has been restored.

I think the American intelligence community would be wise to pay attention to those ancient artistic dictates. The role that Osama bin Laden has cast himself in is that of the hero to Muslims who feel slighted by history and victimized by the West. It is a legend that could last for hundreds of years and inspire many generations of future terrorists. By turning his actions in other parts of the world against him, we can justly put that legend to rest.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chief Defends Terror Arrests (MH)

By Lesley Clark

The Miami Herald, September 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0067381

WASHINGTON - Miami Police Chief John Timoney defended the arrest of the Miami Seven to a House homeland security committee Thursday, telling the panel that not all terrorists look like Sept. 11 ringleader Mohamed Atta.

Timoney, who testified about "local strategies in the war on terror" before a House homeland security subcommittee, acknowledged there had been skepticism about the June arrest of the seven men in Liberty City. Some community groups were troubled that the men appeared to lack the means to conduct an attack -- no weapons or bomb-making materials.

The seven defendants who have been charged with conspiring to support al Qaeda in an alleged plot to blow up FBI buildings are to go on trial in March.

"I was skeptical, as was the FBI, but not once did [the suspects] back off," Timoney said. ``Suffice it to say there were enough overt acts that we had to take it seriously."

Timoney's remarks came after Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, R-Miami, asked Timoney about the case, noting that the arrest of the seven men, to some observers, ``hardly passed the smile test."

Timoney suggested the same questions might have been asked if British police had arrested the men responsible for the July 2005 subway bombing in London before they carried it out.

'I can guarantee you if Scotland Yard had arrested them two weeks earlier, people would have said, `That guy's not a terrorist, he's Jamaican,' " Timoney said. ``We all had this perception of a terrorist looking like Mohamed Atta, walking through the airport. Now we know that's not so."

Timoney told the panel that progress has been made since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in terms of local police working with the FBI.

But he noted that it's still not clear ``who has the ultimate responsibility for intelligence gathering."

Deal Is Reached On Plants And Terrorism (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 21 — The Republican Congressional leaders who oversee Department of Homeland Security operations reached agreement Thursday on a plan that would give federal officials the power to shut down high-risk chemical plants that do not comply with proposed new anti-terrorism measures for that industry.

The proposal is more stringent than an industry-backed plan that many other Republican senators had already endorsed.

Under the agreement reached Thursday by Senator Susan Collins of Maine and Representative Peter T. King of New York, the regulations would apply to all high-risk plants, instead of just those defined as highest risk.

The regulations would also give the Department of Homeland Security the power to review and approve plans devised by plant owners, to inspect facilities to determine compliance and to shut any noncompliant plants, according to a statement by Ms. Collins and Mr. King. To encourage Congress to enact more comprehensive regulations, they would expire after three years.

It is not yet clear that this language — which may be considered too stern by some Republicans and too relaxed by many Democrats — will be approved by the full conference committee, which is scheduled to meet Monday evening on the department's budget. The provisions on chemical plant regulations are supposed to be inserted in that bill, with the goal of final approval of the measure next week.

ID Program Will Cost States $11 Billion, Report Says (WP)

By Darryl Fears

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

The cost to consumers for helping to secure America became clearer yesterday as a coalition of state groups tallied the bill for implementing the Real ID Act and federal officials divulged the price that some of its workers must pay for new smart cards.

In a report released by the National Governors Association, the National Conference of State Legislatures and the American Association of Motor Vehicle Administrators, state motor vehicle officials estimated it would cost more than $11 billion over five years to implement the technology required by the Real ID Act.

Under the law, states must start to re-enroll about 250 million holders of U.S. driver's licenses after May 2008. The states must train workers to verify copies of original birth certificates, Social Security cards, marriage certificates and various identification documents.

"The days of going to the DMV and getting your license on the same day are probably over," said David Quam, director of federal relations for the National Governors Association. "You'll have to take all your documents as if you were applying for the first time. What this comes down to is that more people will be in DMV offices spending more time to get an ID."

DOJ_NMG_0067382

The Real ID Act was passed last year to protect against terrorist infiltration and crack down on illegal immigration. Without the new identification, citizens will be barred from airplanes, sections of airports, and military bases and other federal facilities, unless they have another form of federally issued identification, such as a passport.

The report, "The Real ID Act: National Impact Analysis," does not say whether the cost of implementation will be passed on to drivers and holders of state identification cards. But Homeland Security officials said the price of similar new smart cards for 750,000 workers at ports and other transportation facilities will be about $140 each.

The State Department recently raised passport fees for adults to $97 to incorporate security into new e-passports, and a smart ID card for federal workers is expected to cost $100 to $150.

State officials have complained about the costs of Real ID since the law was passed. Re-enrolling drivers and other cardholders alone will cost about $8.5 billion, according to the report. An additional $2.5 billion will be spent to vet applicant information through various agencies, store the data and design new cards.

House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), who introduced the Real ID Act, strongly disagreed with a similar cost estimate presented by the groups last year, saying it was bloated. The chairman cited a Congressional Budget Office report that estimated the cost of implementation at $100 million between 2005 and 2010.

According to the budget office report, the federal government would reimburse $20 million to states for implementing Real ID. State officials scoffed at that amount.

"Congress has not appropriated anywhere close to the money it takes to implement this law," Quam said.

In the report, DMV officials said the two-year timetable for issuing the new licenses was unrealistic. The report recommended that Congress extend the May 2008 deadline, create a 10-year schedule for ID re-enrollment and give states more money.

Yesterday's revelations about costs came as the House passed three more border security measures aimed at terrorist infiltrators and immigrants who sneak across the southern border in search of jobs.

The proposals would authorize federal prison time for those caught building or financing border tunnels, create tough new penalties for illegal-immigrant gang members and criminals, and grant explicit authority to local police officers to enforce federal immigration laws.

The final bill would also allow the immediate deportation of undocumented Salvadoran workers, who are currently protected under court decisions on asylum dating to El Salvador's civil war in the 1980s. The Washington area has one of the nation's highest populations of Salvadorans.

Staff writers Jonathan Weisman and Spencer Hsu contributed to this report.

Ex-Pan Am Workers Finally Will Get Paid (WT/AP)

By Vinnee Tong

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

NEW YORK -- In the 15 years since Pan American World Airways shut down, Anthony La Pera had assumed he would never get paid his leftover wages and accrued vacation. But Mr. La Pera and another 15,000 former employees can expect to open their mailboxes one day in December and find that a check has arrived, marking the end of the liquidation of an iconic airline.

In July, a federal bankruptcy judge authorized the Pan Am Corp. to distribute the money it had secured in a settlement with the government of Libya. Sending out those checks marks the end of a long process of winding down Pan Am.

"This is about as final as it can get," said Walter Curchack of the law firm Loeb & Loeb, which helped negotiate the settlement agreement on behalf of Pan Am.

The defunct Pan Am, which started in 1927 and helped create what was then a new industry, shut down on Dec. 4, 1991, after declaring bankruptcy that January. Among the last, fatal blows it suffered was the 1988 bombing of Flight 103, a now-infamous attack that ended with 270 dead when a bomb exploded on board as the plane flew over Lockerbie, Scotland.

In 2003, Libya accepted responsibility for the bombing and agreed to pay restitution to the victims. Pan Am's payments come from a separate settlement of a lawsuit its insurers brought against the Libyan government.

Mr. La Pera, 68, and other former employees recently received notices from Wells Fargo & Co., which is coordinating the distribution of about 43 percent of Pan Am's settlement money to former employees. Those who are eligible will get between 5 percent and 6 percent of what they were owed when the airline shut down in 1991.

For Mr. La Pera, that means he will get a check in the range of $1,250 to $1,800, because he was owed between $25,000 and $30,000 for accrued vacation and back pay.

"It's like found money, in effect, because nobody expected anything to come out of this," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0067383

Richard Vieta, another former employee, remembers well the day the airline shut down: It was his birthday. And after the company folded, he was one of a small group of employees who remained to catalog and sell off pieces of the airline.

Mr. Vieta had worked at the airline nearly 30 years scheduling maintenance and tracking aircraft parts. His last year was spent at New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport's jet center and hangar No. 19, helping an auctioneer sell off parts from the disassembled planes.

"What I think Pan Am demonstrates is that these are the unrecognized victims of the industry's problems -- people that did dedicate themselves to an employer for a long time and basically got left out," Mr. Curchack said.

Since the bankruptcy filing in late 1991, Mr. Curchack and others, including former Pan Am lawyer Paul Rendich, have worked to secure a settlement.

"This case has been literally, for the last 10 years, a sort of a matter of honor to many of the people involved in it," Mr. Curchack said. "It's a vindication in that there's some resolution for Pan Am and some of its employees, who felt they were personally attacked by the bombing of Flight 103."

Flight 103 was partially insured for $32 million in damage from acts of war or terror; the entire plane was valued at $67 million. The insurers paid $32 million to Pan Am, then pursued a civil case to recover damages from the Libyan government on behalf of the airline.

But because the civil lawsuit could not proceed until a related criminal one was resolved, there was little movement in the case for about a decade.

In the meantime, two Libyan agents, Abdel Basset Ali al-Megrahi and Lamen Khalifa Fhimah, were prosecuted under Scottish law through a court at The Hague for carrying out the bombing. In 2001, Mr. Fhimah was acquitted and al Megrahi convicted of murder.

As al-Megrahi's appeals wound down, representatives of the insurers and Pan Am began speaking to Libyan negotiators and their French lawyers about a settlement. The discussions intensified in 2004 and continued into 2005 by phone and at meetings in London, Paris and Tripoli.

Mr. Rendich, who had worked as a lawyer for Pan Am since the 1980s, said that at one point, the Libyans tried to pit Pan Am against its insurer and tried to blame the airline's closure on economic factors unrelated to the bombing.

The two sides finally reached a deal on Feb. 18, 2005, and the bankruptcy judge overseeing the case approved the deal a month later.

Minus certain fees and the portion of the settlement that goes to the insurers, Pan Am Corp. will have about $31 million to distribute among former employees, ticketholders, bank lenders, commercial vendors and other creditors.

An Agreement Is Formalized On Rebuilding At Ground Zero (NYT)

By Charles V. Bagli

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

Now, at long last, finally, for sure, the new framework for rebuilding at ground zero is in place. A firm deal was approved yesterday. Really. The developer Larry A. Silverstein is out of the Freedom Tower; the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey is in. The rent disputes are settled.

It took months to get to this point, after a tentative agreement was front-page news in April. Along the way, and with the diligent help of legions of lawyers, the 12-page “conceptual framework” of April mushroomed into 12 thick volumes.

Of course, no agreement or news conference at ground zero would be complete without some last-minute wrangling between Mr. Silverstein and, in this case, city officials.

They worked out their differences through clenched teeth yesterday afternoon, even if it was 90 minutes after the Port Authority board formally voted on the plan, described as a “global realignment” at ground zero.

That was followed by a celebratory, semi-secret news conference at the World Trade Center site with Gov. George E. Pataki, Deputy Mayor Daniel L. Doctoroff, Mr. Silverstein and members of the Port Authority. Most of the press missed it because the announcement went out minutes before it started.

The point of it all was to ratify the tentative April agreement. It ensures that four new office towers, including the $2.2 billion Freedom Tower, are to be built by 2012, along with a shopping mall, a $2.2 billion transit center and the $500 million memorial.

“The time has come to build this,” said Anthony R. Coscia, the authority’s chairman.

After all the delays, squabbling and security concerns of the past five years, there is progress. The Port Authority is building the transit center. Workers are excavating for the footings and foundations of the Freedom Tower and for the memorial.

Under this agreement, the Port Authority has taken responsibility for the Freedom Tower and a second development site a block away. Mr. Silverstein, who leased the trade center complex from the Port Authority six weeks before it was destroyed, has responsibility for building three towers on the east side of the 16-acre site, along Church Street, by 2012.

DOJ_NMG_0067384

The authority has agreed to excavate the sites for two towers by the end of 2007. It must provide the third site to Mr. Silverstein by mid-2008. If the authority, which plans to start running two 10-hour shifts at ground zero, fails to meet the schedule, it must pay him a $300,000-a-day penalty.

If Mr. Silverstein falls behind on even one of the towers, he risks losing them all.

The Port Authority agreed yesterday to lease 600,000 square feet in Tower 4 at $59 a square foot, not the $78 that Mr. Silverstein wanted. After hours of tense negotiations Wednesday night and yesterday morning, the city agreed to rent the same amount of space on lower floors for $56.50 a square foot. Mr. Silverstein also has the option of leasing it to corporate tenants at higher rates, if he can get them.

Last week, the federal and New York State governments tentatively agreed to lease 1 million square feet in the Freedom Tower, the tallest, most symbolic and most widely criticized skyscraper planned for ground zero.

Critics have questioned the decision to build 8.8 million square feet of office space in such a short time, and then to fill these expensive towers with public employees.

But officials praised the deal yesterday. “This is a historic event that details a specific financial plan for this massive rebuilding project, commits to deadlines for various milestones and moves us forward toward a swift completion date,” Governor Pataki said. “I’m extremely proud of the progress we have made so far.”

Mr. Silverstein said: “We need to keep building on this partnership so that together we can get the World Trade Center rebuilt.”

This doesn’t mean all the arguments and debates are over, or even that the Freedom Tower will be built.

As Mr. Coscia said yesterday, the actual plan for the tower “is not part of the agreement we’re executing today.” The Port Authority committed to building the Freedom Tower providing it has a viable financial plan that includes 1 million square feet of leases to anchor the building.

The tentative agreements with the state and federal government, Mr. Coscia said, are a significant step toward an “irrevocable contract.” But a lot can happen before a contract is signed.

There is also outstanding litigation with insurers over the $4.6 billion in insurance proceeds at ground zero. The money, including $973 million for the Freedom Tower, is needed for construction. So far, the insurers have paid only about $2.2 billion, and $1.6 billion has been spent.

The plan for the memorial has not been finished, nor has all the money been raised.

Still, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, who was in California yesterday, told reporters there: “It’s really a very good deal for everybody.”

Pact May Mean Rebuilding Delay At Ground Zero (WSJ)

By Alex Frangos

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Several buildings at Ground Zero may not be completed for another seven years -- a year longer than previously promised -- under terms of an agreement approved yesterday to rebuild the World Trade Center.

The pact between developer Larry Silverstein and the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the site, is the most definitive rebuilding blueprint to date. It divides control of development rights for the five planned towers at the site between Mr. Silverstein and the Port Authority. Mr. Silverstein will build three office skyscrapers on the east side of the site. The Port Authority will own the signature Freedom Tower, one other tower, and a shopping mall.

Amid the din of earth-moving equipment in the 90-foot-deep pit where the Twin Towers stood, New York Gov. George E. Pataki hailed the deal as "the last major hurdle toward the completed redevelopment of the World Trade Center site."

1 THE FOUR TOWERS

See a slideshow2 of architect's plans for three office towers to be built alongside the Freedom Tower.

Details of the pact show, however, that completion of Mr. Silverstein's three office towers may take longer than previously anticipated. He received a one-year "grace period" beyond the 2012 deadline earlier agreed upon, according to Port Authority Chairman Anthony Coscia. Should Mr. Silverstein fail to deliver the three skyscrapers by the new deadline, around the end of 2013, he could lose the properties entirely.

A Port Authority official said Mr. Silverstein's potential construction lenders were uncomfortable with the more-aggressive timeframe.

Construction of the Freedom Tower also remains uncertain. Tentative commitments with federal and state agencies to take space in the Freedom Tower must become actual leases, and Congress needs to approve the federal lease. Preliminary work on the Freedom Tower's foundation is continuing, and the lack of signed leases isn't likely to halt the project right away, but could affect its long-term prospects.

DOJ_NMG_0067385

The City of New York agreed to take 581,000 square feet of office space in Mr. Silverstein's Tower 4, for a starting rent of $56.50 a square foot. The city's rent is 5% lower than a deal struck by the Port Authority for the same building because the city is taking lower floors. Mr. Silverstein has an option to cancel the city's lease over the next two years if he finds higher-paying tenants.

Some issues that could halt development remain unresolved, most notably several lawsuits against the Twin Towers' insurers.

WAR NEWS:

Bush To Meet Presidents Of Pakistan And Afghanistan (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The survival of Afghanistan's fragile government in the face of a resurgent Taliban threat will be high on the agenda for President Bush and the presidents of Pakistan and Afghanistan in a series of White House meetings starting Friday.

While the White House credits Pakistan for helping to capture or kill more Al Qaeda operatives than any other country since the attacks of Sept. 11, it worries about support that Pakistan's unruly regions provide for Taliban fighters intent on unseating the government of Afghan President Hamid Karzai.

The White House is counting on Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf to prevail upon tribal leaders to prevent foreign fighters from crossing into Afghanistan.

The White House sessions, starting with a meeting between Bush and Musharraf on Friday, could serve to underscore what one analyst calls a "sweet and sour" relationship between their two countries, once at odds over Pakistani nuclear ambitions but now allies in a war against terrorism. After Bush plays host to Karzai on Tuesday, the administration plans a meeting of all three leaders Wednesday.

"Afghanistan is the issue that is of the greatest danger for the U.S.-Pakistan relationship," says Teresita Schaffer, director for South Asia at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "Because we have been working at cross-purposes. Afghanistan is the one place where you could have Pakistani-supported forces coming into conflict with U.S. soldiers."

Although Musharraf has called the Taliban a greater threat to security than Al Qaeda because of the popular support it enjoys, the Pakistani leader— whose government once supported the Taliban — has made accommodations with its operatives based along the border within his own country.

The White House is counting on Musharraf to work with tribal leaders to prevent foreign fighters from crossing the border, to make those tribal leaders "part of the solution rather than part of the problem" and get them "to put pressure on people to lay down arms and behave," spokesman Tony Snow said Thursday. "That's going to be something which is going to be under discussion" Friday.

Analysts say it is imperative that this message is underscored in the meetings among Bush, Musharraf and Karzai.

"If they do things right, they will use the Bush-Musharraf meeting to set up the trilateral [meeting] to make it real clear that the U.S. is very concerned about what Pakistan is doing in Afghanistan," said Schaffer, a former assistant secretary of state for South Asia who served in several U.S. embassies there.

Noting the troubling "relationship between the Pakistani government and the extremist organizations," Schaffer said, "I am quite convinced that the policy of the Pakistani government is to manage these organizations, rather than put them out of business. And I am not sure that that's a balancing act that's sustainable."

U.S. and NATO forces are attempting to protect the Afghan government against a violent uprising of the Taliban, who were toppled in a U.S.-led invasion in 2002 but whose key ally, Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, was not captured.

Since then, bin Laden and other Al Qaeda leaders are believed to have secured refuge in Pakistan, which also has harbored other terrorists, including some of those believed responsible for a recently thwarted plot to hijack several airliners bound from Britain to the U.S.

While Musharraf has been praised for democratic reforms since taking control of Pakistan in a military coup in 1999, including election of a parliament that has confirmed his presidency and promises new elections next year, he also has been faulted for failing to secure a vast and violent border region whose rebels threaten not only him but also his neighbor.

"The unfortunate history of our region has placed Pakistan in the front line of the global campaign against terrorism," Musharraf said in an address to the United Nations this week.

DOJ_NMG_0067386

"Afghanistan confronts complex security, political and economic challenges, including a resurgent Taliban, who also threaten Pakistan's efforts against extremism and terrorism," Musharraf told the UN. "Problems along the bordering regions of Pakistan and Afghanistan are compounded by the continuing presence in Pakistan of over 3 million Afghan refugees, some of them sympathetic to the Taliban."

Bush credited Pakistan with capturing or killing "hundreds of Al Qaeda terrorists" when he met with Musharraf earlier this year in Islamabad, and the two leaders spent "a good while" talking about "the work that needs to be done."

The president is confident, Snow said, that Musharraf will "complete the job" in going after Al Qaeda operatives "and people sympathetic to the Taliban."

Yet the Bush administration remains concerned about nuclear technology that a network once run by A.Q. Khan, the mastermind of Pakistan's own nuclear bomb development, has provided for Iran, Libya and other nations. The U.S. had imposed sanctions against Pakistan after discovering its clandestine nuclear program in 1990 and tightened sanctions after Pakistan tested a nuclear bomb in 1998 in response to India's bomb testing and the Pakistani military coup of October 1999.

John Bolton, U.S. ambassador to the UN, this week cited blueprints for uranium hemispheres that Khan's network provided for Iran as evidence that Iran's nuclear enrichment program is aimed at bomb-building rather than civilian nuclear power. The casting of uranium into hemispheric shapes forms the core of a nuclear bomb.

"There's only one use of uranium metal formed in the hemisphere, and that's to form a nuclear weapon," Bolton told CNN. "Nothing to do with peaceful uses of nuclear power."

The U.S. lifted its sanctions against Pakistan and resumed military assistance — $3 billion promised over five years — after Musharraf's show of U.S. support after 9/11.

Bush To Press Afghan, Pakistani Leaders On Terror Issues (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON - Faced with a bloody Taliban resurgence in Afghanistan, President Bush over the next several days will be prodding leaders from Afghanistan and Pakistan to work together against Islamic extremists.

The diplomatic arm-twisting comes at a particularly challenging time in a region that remains a spawning ground for international terrorism. In Afghanistan, a Taliban military offensive is testing the viability of the U.S.-backed government in Kabul. Neighboring Pakistan continues to serve as a haven for Taliban operatives and al-Qaida terrorists.

"The real war on terror is going on in Afghanistan, and, frankly, it's not at all clear that we're winning," said William Milam, a former U.S. ambassador to Pakistan. "Pakistan could help by keeping the Taliban out of there."

Bush is sure to deliver a similar message to Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf when they meet in the Oval Office on Friday. He'll also press Musharraf for information on the search for Osama bin Laden, the al-Qaida leader who's believed to be operating in the Afghanistan-Pakistan border region.

Engaging in shuttle diplomacy from the comfort of the White House, Bush will meet Tuesday with Afghan President Hamid Karzai before welcoming both leaders to a three-way summit over dinner on Wednesday. It could be a heartburn-inducing meal.

"Karzai and Musharraf do not like each other," said Stephen Cohen, a South Asia specialist at the Brookings Institution. "Our influence with both is declining."

Barnett Rubin, a South Asia expert at New York University's Center on International Cooperation, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee Thursday that Pakistan has become "the global center of terrorism." He said Bush should use a "big diplomatic stick" to force Musharraf to shut down the Taliban's headquarters in Quetta, a provincial capital.

"The government of Pakistan has done virtually nothing to disrupt the command and control of the Taliban, which is based in Pakistan," Rubin told the Senate panel. "The destabilization of Afghanistan, insofar as it's coming from abroad, is coming from Pakistan, regardless of the fact that President Musharraf speaks good English, wears a suit and says things that we like to hear."

Karzai has complained repeatedly that Musharraf isn't doing enough to keep Islamic extremists from using Pakistan as a base for attacks in Afghanistan. Pakistan was one of three countries, along with Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, that recognized the Taliban regime when it served as al-Qaida's government sponsor in Afghanistan.

Musharraf switched sides after the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, but critics say he's been a less-than-stalwart ally in the war on terrorism - despite an infusion of more than $3 billion in U.S. aid to Pakistan since his conversion.

Although Pakistan has captured some well-known al-Qaida members, including Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged Sept. 11 mastermind, it hasn't arrested a single Taliban leader.

On Thursday, Marine Gen. James Jones, NATO's top military commander, confirmed that the Taliban leadership is directing the insurgency from Quetta, the capital of a Pakistani province.

DOJ_NMG_0067387

Musharraf recently pulled his troops back into their barracks in the border region for what he said were promises from separatists to halt infiltration into Afghanistan. But Western diplomats in Kabul said the deal has effectively ceded the region to the militants.

Musharraf, who has survived multiple assassination attempts, bristles at suggestions that he's soft on terrorism. During a visit to the United Nations earlier this week, he suggested that Afghanistan is exporting extremists to his country.

Musharraf said Pakistan has been burdened with 3 million Afghan refugees, "some of them sympathetic to the Taliban." He blamed the Taliban's resurgence on home-grown Afghan extremists.

"Where were they from, Pakistan?" he asked sarcastically. "Certainly they were from Afghanistan. They were the people of Afghanistan who took over Afghanistan under (Taliban leader) Mullah Omar."

Bush has tussled with both leaders over military operations in their countries. He rebuffed Karzai's efforts last year to assert more Afghan control over U.S. military operations. Bush and Musharraf differed publicly this week over whether the United States could attack bin Laden in Pakistan without involving the Pakistani military.

Bush told CNN on Wednesday that he "absolutely" would send U.S. forces into Pakistan if he had good information on bin Laden's whereabouts. When asked for his reaction, Musharraf told reporters, "We wouldn't like to allow that at all. We will do it ourselves."

Pakistan Official Defends Truce (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

Pakistan's point man on a truce with tribal elders along the country's restive border with Afghanistan yesterday rejected charges that the agreement would undermine the fight against Islamic extremists.

Gov. Ali Muhammad Jan Aurakzai of North West Frontier Province also criticized the United States for being slow to deliver on critical military equipment and support needed to combat Taliban fighters.

Mr. Aurakzai, who was a corps commander in the border region when the United States invaded Afghanistan, said the agreement he had helped hammer out with tribal leaders of North Waziristan was part of a broader strategy to keep terrorists out.

"It's not just a peace agreement. It is a larger strategy with a military arm, a political arm and a reconstruction arm," Mr. Aurakzai told editors and reporters at The Washington Times yesterday. The government planned to pump $2 billion into the tribal areas over the next nine years for "massive development," he said.

Top officials in both Afghanistan and the United States are skeptical of the deal and of Islamabad's overall commitment to the war on terror. The officials fear that Taliban fighters will continue to use Pakistan as a safe haven, harbored by tribal leaders.

The Taliban rulers of Afghanistan gave refuge to Osama bin Laden and other al Qaeda leaders until the September 11, 2001, attacks, and Pakistan was one of the regime's closest allies. Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf said he decided to cooperate with Washington in the war on terror following a U.S. threat to bomb his country.

In an interview with the CBS news magazine show "60 Minutes" that will air Sunday, Gen. Musharraf said then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage had conveyed the U.S. threat to Pakistan's intelligence chief.

"The intelligence director told me that [Mr. Armitage] said, 'Be prepared to be bombed. Be prepared to go back to the Stone Age,'" Gen. Musharraf said. "One has to think and take actions in the interests of the nation, and that's what I did."

Mr. Armitage was not immediately available for comment. A Bush administration official said there would be no comment on a "reported conversation between Mr. Armitage and a Pakistani official."

But the official said, "After 9/11, Pakistan made a strategic decision to join the war on terror and has since been a steadfast partner in that effort. Pakistan's commitment to this important endeavor has not wavered and our partnership has widened as a result."

Mr. Aurakzai said that despite having 80,000 Pakistani troops currently deployed along 375 miles of border with Afghanistan, there were still areas that people could crawl through.

"You cannot rule out the possibility of infiltration through the gaps and those have to be monitored through electronic intelligence and that [should come] from our friends -- we don't have the means," Mr. Aurakzai said.

He accused the United States of dragging its feet on Pakistan's requests for more help in trying to control the treacherous border terrain, including night-vision equipment, sensors and attack helicopters.

"There is an urgency when we are asked to do something -- then it is the day before yesterday." But Washington's response "is terribly slow, there is no urgency," he said.

The governor acknowledged Taliban members were an integral part of the tribal society of Pakistan and that foreign fighters from the 1979-89 war against the Soviet Union were still living in the area.

DOJ_NMG_0067388

But he insisted they would conform to the terms of the Sept. 5 agreement which bans all cross-border movement except for "easement" rights for tribes divided by the border.

If successful, the agreement with the tribes in North Waziristan could be replicated in the more restive South Waziristan, and even Afghanistan, Mr. Aurakzai said.

President Bush in a television interview Wednesday expressed his wariness about the Pakistan deal, and said he would send forces into Pakistan to capture or kill al Qaeda leaders if intelligence tracked them into that country.

"We have made it clear that [Gen. Musharraf] should not provide an environment that enables people to go from his country into Afghanistan," Mr. Bush said.

Mr. Bush is to meet with Gen. Musharraf in Washington today, and hold a joint meeting with Gen. Musharraf and Afghan President Hamid Karzai on Tuesday to discuss Taliban and al Qaeda activities on the border areas.

Mr. Aurakzai rejected suggestions that his country was providing refuge to insurgents.

"The trouble started in Afghanistan. They have been exaggerating things out of proportion. They have been covering their own mistakes," he said.

Congress Stalls On Minimum Wage, Tribunals And Other Key Issues (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

CONGRESS FALTERS on resolving critical issues.

Even amid progress on military tribunals, chances fade for granting Bush more leeway on wiretaps. Prospects wane for pairing minimum-wage increase with incentives for small-business health coverage.

Despite calls from vulnerable House Republicans -- and paltry congressional job-approval ratings -- lawmakers are unlikely to raise Medicare payments to physicians since financing possibilities rankle "whoever's ox is gored," a Republican aide says.

Promoting book on Congress,"The Broken Branch," co-author Norm Ornstein calls gridlock a "gift that keeps on giving."

LACKLUSTER FUND RAISING clouds Republican Senate hopes.

Though Democrats face uphill climb for six-seat gain, Republican strategists fear opposing campaign committee's $12 million cash edge heightens chances of an upset. Defenders of Sen. Dole, who heads up Republican committee, cite cash competition from 2008 presidential wannabes Frist and McCain.

Democrats believe Menendez of New Jersey is their only incumbent at risk, though they dismiss talk of replacing him on ballot with Rep. Andrews. After scare from antiwar left, incumbent Cantwell in Washington leads Republican challenger McGavick. In Maryland, Democrats grudgingly credit Republican Steele for effective, offbeat ads, but count on state's blue tint to elect moderate Rep. Cardin to succeed retiring Sarbanes.

WHITE HOUSE FRETS about Afghanistan before Bush meets with Karzai.

The president praises Afghan counterpart, but senior officials worry Karzai isn't strong enough to quell Taliban threat. He hasn't wrested power from warlords or extended his reach much beyond Kabul.

Karzai blames Pakistan, straining relations with its President Musharraf. Administration officials were surprised by Pakistan's cease-fire agreement with Taliban-linked militants; they privately share Karzai's belief that Muslim extremist groups are using Pakistan as a base.

White House won't press Pakistan publicly now, fearing further reduction in Musharraf's antiterror cooperation.

ZOELLICK'S EXIT from State Department gives Paulson more running room on international economics, since Zoellick had previously been trade representative. Though predecessor Snow traveled to Ohio battleground during 2004 campaign, Paulson swears off political travel, saying, "The president wants me to be secretary of the Treasury."

UNITED? Though most countries agree U.N. Security Council needs more than five countries with veto, three of those with that power dissent for different reasons. U.S. wants Japan to join that club, but only after U.N. reforms. Russia and China fear their prestige would be diluted in larger group.

SPITZER WILL JOIN actor Martin Sheen for October fund-raising clambake at Kennedy family compound in Hyannis Port, Mass. Event will swell coffers of Ted Kennedy son Patrick, a Rhode Island House member occupied lately with recovery from prescription-drug addiction.

GENERATION GAP? Democratic insiders worry about age of those slated for important chairmanships if House changes hands. Dingell of Energy and Commerce is 80 years old, Conyers of Judiciary is 77, and Rangel of Ways and Means is 76 -- each more than a decade older than Republican chairman. But attempts to leapfrog veterans would trigger infighting and look unlikely.

ADMINISTRATION FACES congressional resistance to Vietnam trade pact.

DOJ_NMG_0067389

Textile-friendly Republican Sens. Dole of North Carolina and Graham of South Carolina resist letting Vietnam join WTO. They warn trade representative Schwab of "large-scale job losses in both our states" and seek limits on Vietnamese apparel exports to U.S.

"We're looking for some way for the industry to defend itself," says industry advocate Cass Johnson. To soothe domestic companies, Commerce Department official Lavin visits North Carolina textile executives.

After returning from China, Paulson will meet with Sen. Schumer, who may seek floor action on tariff bill.

MINOR MEMOS: Former NFL quarterback Heath Shuler, battling Republican Rep. Taylor in North Carolina, says he's happy his children aren't old enough to understand negative TV ads. ... Brad Meltzer, author of best-selling terror-themed novel "The Book of Fate," says Americans crave politicians like reluctant-hero Spider-Man to battle al Qaeda.

Taliban's Gains Forestall U.S. Troop Reductions In Afghanistan (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

The U.S. military plans no troop cuts in Afghanistan before March, as fighting intensifies against Taliban forces that have gained influence in a political and security "vacuum" in the southern part of the country, according to a senior U.S. commander.

"Our troop levels in Afghanistan will remain about steady through . . . February," said Lt. Gen. Karl W. Eikenberry, who leads the Combined Forces Command in Afghanistan. There are approximately 20,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan, the highest number since the U.S.-led invasion in October 2001 to overthrow the Taliban government.

Eikenberry said Taliban fighters and extremists have grown more numerous, organized and determined in some parts of the south and southeast, where foreign troops were limited and the Afghan government was weak.

"You do have challenges where Taliban has moved into an area you could perhaps call a vacuum, or at least very weak governance," Eikenberry said at a Pentagon news conference. "In some areas there are more Taliban extremists than there were at this point last year. And within some areas they . . . demonstrated better command-and-control and they're fighting harder."

Yet a more robust Taliban is still no match for U.S. and NATO troops and 76,000 Afghan security forces, Eikenberry said. "Wherever our forces go, wherever NATO forces go, increasingly wherever the ANA, the Afghan National Army, goes, then the enemy is defeated and they disappear," he said.

The primary challenge in Afghanistan is not military but rather one of extending the reach of the central government and bolstering economic development, Eikenberry said.

Nevertheless, he said, Afghanistan's burgeoning drug trade presents a fundamental threat that could ultimately undermine both the U.S. military mission and the nation's government. The sheer scale of the drug trafficking and the money involved creates "the prospect of absolute corruption of the government," he said, as well as the likelihood that drug money will fund terrorism.

The contingent of U.S. troops in Afghanistan has swelled in recent years partly because far more American soldiers -- about 5,000 now -- are in the country training Afghan security forces. An additional 2,000 are doing logistical work or providing manpower for12 Provincial Reconstruction Teams (PRTs) that are assisting local Afghan officials with rebuilding, he said.

The U.S. military is also keeping troop levels steady as NATO prepares to take over another contentious region -- eastern Afghanistan along the Pakistan border -- by the end of this year.

As a member of NATO, the United States will remain the biggest provider of troops in Afghanistan and will retain the lead role in combating terrorist leaders and groups such as al-Qaeda. Asked about the politically sensitive issue of waging strikes against Osama bin Laden or other terrorist leaders across the border in Pakistan, Eikenberry said he has the "authority and flexibility to take the fight to international terrorism."

"We will maintain our strong national capability in support of counterterrorism missions to strike al-Qaeda and its associated movements wherever and whenever they are found," he said in an opening statement.

Pakistani Leader Says Armitage Made Bomb Threat (USAT/AP)

USA Today, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf says a State Department official threatened to bomb his country “back to the Stone Age” after the Sept. 11 attacks if he did not help the U.S. war on terrorism.

The threat was delivered by Richard Armitage, who at the time was deputy secretary of State, to Musharraf's intelligence director, the Pakistani leader told CBS' 60 Minutes.

DOJ_NMG_0067390

"The intelligence director told me that (Armitage) said, 'Be prepared to be bombed. Be prepared to go back to the Stone Age,' " Musharraf said in an interview to be broadcast Sunday. "I think it was a very rude remark," Musharraf told reporter Steve Kroft.

By agreeing to cooperate with the United States, Musharraf said, he reacted responsibly. "One has to think and take actions in the interests of the nation, and that is what I did," he said.

Armitage disputed the language attributed to him but did not deny his message was a strong one, 60 Minutes said.

The former deputy secretary of State could not be reached immediately Thursday by the Associated Press.

Julie Reside, a State Department spokeswoman, declined to comment on the reported conversation between Armitage and the Pakistani official. "We are referring all questions to Mr. Armitage," she said.

Pakistan has been a close ally in the war on terrorism, Reside said.

"We are continuing to work cooperatively with them and in the process are broadening our bilateral relationship," Reside said.

The relationship has shown signs of strain. Pakistan vowed Thursday not to let foreign forces enter its territory, a day after President Bush told CNN he would "absolutely" order American military action inside the country if Osama bin Laden were found hiding there.

In a speech in January 2002, four months after the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, Musharraf gave a speech in which he clearly came down on the side of reform at home and opposition to Islamic fundamentalism.

In recent months, though, as the Taliban insurgency has intensified in Afghanistan, Pakistan has shown a reluctance to go after militants taking refuge in the rugged, mountainous region along its 1,500-mile border with Afghanistan.

Earlier this month, Musharraf's government struck a deal with tribal leaders along the border. It requires them to expel foreign al-Qaeda fighters in return for the release of tribesmen arrested in sweeps for Islamic militants.

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., one of the deal's many critics, accused Pakistan of "turning a blind eye to the Taliban high command" operating on its soil.

Musharraf is scheduled to meet with Bush today at the White House. The two leaders are scheduled to get together again next week in a three-way meeting with Afghan President Hamid Karzai.

$70B OK'd For Iraq And Afghan War Funds (AP-Y)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, September 22, 2006

House-Senate negotiators Thursday approved a new $70 billion infusion for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan as they wrapped up talks on a $447 billion Pentagon funding bill.

The additional war funds would bring the total approved by Congress for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan since Sept. 11, 2001, to more than $500 billion, with another installment likely to come next spring.

At the same time, the White House beat back an attempt by Republicans on the appropriations committees to take an additional $2 billion from defense programs to ease cuts to domestic programs such as education and grants to local governments.

The bill would be the first of 11 spending bills to clear Congress for the budget year beginning Oct. 1. With progress so slow on other bills — the homeland security bill is the only other spending measure likely to pass before Congress adjourns next week to campaign for fall elections — the Pentagon measure will also carry a stopgap funding bill to keep open agencies whose funding bills won't have passed.

The defense measure is certain to enjoy sweeping support in Congress despite widespread anxiety about how well the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan are going. Even opponents of the war tend to support the measure because it supports U.S. troops in harm's way.

"The troops are stretched thin," said Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania, the top Democrat on the House Appropriations Defense Subcommittee. "We're not making progress."

Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, said the $70 billion infusion for Iraq and Afghanistan operations will fund the war "at least until May, but we hope beyond that."

The bill provides for a 2.2 percent pay increase for the military as President Bush requested in his February budget.

The measure would cut about $2 billion from Bush's request for procurement of new weapons systems, providing $81 billion. Almost $11 billion of that would be used to build eight ships, including two DD(X) destroyers. That is significant because it would allow Bath Iron Works in Maine and Northrop Grumman's Ingalls Shipbuilding in Mississippi to build one ship each.

A House-passed defense policy bill had called for only one DD(X) ship, to be built in Mississippi.

DOJ_NMG_0067391

The final House-Senate agreement also largely restores cuts made by the Senate from the Army's request of more than $3.5 billion for the Future Combat System. The service's key weapons program is expected to produce more than a dozen manned and unmanned vehicles and aircraft for combat.

The bill also contains good news for lawmakers from California and Missouri, who won a total of 22 C-17 cargo planes, including seven added in end-stage talks. That is expected to keep manufacturing lines open for about an additional year despite the Air Force's wish to end production with the completion of a 180-plane inventory.

The C-17 is built in Long Beach, Calif., but several components are assembled at Boeing's St. Louis-based defense company.

Negotiations on the bill demonstrated the flexibility with which the Congress and the White House treat budget limits set on the Pentagon. The bill was originally supposed to carry $50 billion for Iraq and Afghanistan, but that figure jumped after lawmakers heard about rapidly deteriorating Army and Marine Corps readiness caused as equipment has worn out in harsh overseas conditions.

The bill cuts about $4 billion from Bush's request for core defense programs in order to ease White House cuts to domestic programs. The original Senate bill had proposed a $9 billion shift, provoking a veto threat.

An attempt by House and Senate appropriators to settle on a $5.9 billion transfer to domestic programs was scuttled by the White House and House and Senate GOP leaders.

But senators from western states succeeded in preserving $200 million of $275 million added by the Senate to combat wildfires.

House-Senate Panel Approves Defense Budget (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- House-Senate negotiators approved a $447.4 billion Pentagon budget including $70 billion in emergency funds for the war in Iraq and to begin the rebuilding of Army and Marine units worn down by the conflict.

Together with prior appropriations for Iraq, the total U.S. commitment will now approach $375 billion, and final concessions to the White House could squeeze billions from domestic spending bills delayed until after the November elections.

The action came as Republican leaders gave their reluctant blessing to a pre-election deal that tacitly recognizes the practice of individuals' bringing cheaper prescription drugs for personal use into the U.S. from Canada. Customs officers would be barred from preventing persons re-entering the U.S. with medicines, as long as the drugs were carried on their person and in limited quantities, such as filling a prescription for as long as three months.

The compromise should help expedite final action next week on a second major spending bill funding the Department of Homeland Security for the new fiscal year that begins Oct. 1. But it represents a significant breach in the tight alliance between Republicans and the drug industry, which remains a major source financial support for House and Senate campaigns.

Asked if he was pleased with the deal, House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) said bluntly: "No. But it looks like that's where we're going." The Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, which had assumed the proposal would be killed, was clearly upset with the outcome.

"If I were PhRMA, I wouldn't make a fight on this," said Rep. Jo Ann Emerson (R., Mo.), who had won an even broader amendment in the House earlier this year. Mail order, Internet sales and persons in the business of importing drugs wouldn't be covered by the exemption, and the drugs covered would have to be medicines approved by the Food and Drug Administration and not controlled substances.

But Ken Johnson, a senior vice president for PhRMA, said "We are adamantly opposed to importation for safety reasons." The group argues that counterfeit drugs represent a growing multibillion-dollar market in Canada and hazard to Americans that the FDA can't supervise in these circumstances.

Together, the defense and homeland-security budgets, are two of the last major legislative packages Republicans hope to complete before sending members home next week to campaign, and each will be used to carry additional legislation.

The defense bill, for example, will incorporate a stopgap funding bill to keep domestic agencies operating through Nov. 17, buying time for a lame-duck session after the elections. And the $34.8 billion homeland-security measure could become a vehicle for enacting new legislation announced last night giving the department authority to require high-risk chemical plants to carry out security measures and be shut down, potentially, if they don't comply.

Even as talks continued on the homeland bill, the House was churning out new immigration-related measures yesterday that it wants to add to the package. Senators have complained of the procedures, but Mr. Hastert was unswayed. "You have to look at the bigger good," he said. "It's good stuff. It makes sense."

DOJ_NMG_0067392

The Pentagon bill has its own quota of "stuff" as well, but it is most important for its sheer volume of money. The greatest share of the $70 billion in emergency funds would go to pay for personnel and operations overseas. And an additional $6 billion is provided for weapons-procurement accounts, including funds for 10 C-17 cargo aircraft built by Boeing Co. (See related article1.)

The measure provides $1.4 billion to fully fund the purchase of 20 F-22 fighter aircraft, but to cover this cost, Lockheed Martin's F-35 Joint Strike Fighter program appears to face a 40% cut in production funds. Instead of being able to buy five planes in the coming year, the Air Force would have money for just two, and the advanced procurement would also be trimmed back to 12. Within shipbuilding accounts, the Navy is promised $2.6 billion to begin production of two DDX destroyers, and Gulf Coast shipyards are expected to benefit from the addition of $117 million for an oceanographic research vessel.

--Anna Wilde Mathews contributed to this article.

GOP Leaders Work Out Deal On Defense Spending (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — With national security looming as a major issue in approaching midterm elections, Republican congressional leaders agreed Thursday to a new defense spending bill that would push the price tag for the war on terrorism above $470 billion.

The agreement on the 2007 defense appropriations bill — expected to be approved by the full House and Senate next week — spares Republicans the embarrassment of leaving Washington without funding the cash-strapped military.

But it marked another grim milestone for wars in Iraq and Afghanistan that by one estimate have already cost two-thirds as much as the Vietnam War, which lasted more than twice as long as the current conflicts have so far.

The prolonged and difficult negotiations over next year's Pentagon funding underscored the financial toll of war-related costs on other military-related services.

On the same day Republican leaders hammered out their agreement, advocates for military families came to Capitol Hill to talk about cutbacks in military-base libraries, child-care centers and other services for armed forces personnel and their kin.

"Our families are not whiners … but they are worried," said Joyce Wessel Raezer, a lobbyist for the National Military Family Assn.

"Our deployed service members want to know their families are being taken care of."

Before the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, Bush administration officials repeatedly said Iraq's oil wealth ultimately would pay for the reconstruction of the country.

Yet the U.S. government continues to bear the financial burden of the ongoing conflict in Iraq. And increasingly, reports suggest skyrocketing costs are seriously straining the military.

Senior House Democrats in recent months have spotlighted how military units in this country often don't have enough equipment to be combat-ready and that base commanders have had to scrimp to pay utility bills.

Army officials have described cutting back on personnel travel, freezing new contracts and taking other measures to make it to the next funding period.

At the same time, congressional Republican leaders have been under increasing pressure from some of their own members not to cut popular domestic programs.

"It's the return of the guns-and-butter debate," said Bryan Riedl, a senior policy analyst at the conservative Heritage Foundation think tank, referring to the Lyndon B. Johnson administration's struggle to maintain large domestic expenditures as the costs of the Vietnam War escalated.

This year, the Senate cut $9 billion from its version of the president's proposed defense budget, in part to pay for domestic programs. The Senate vote prompted a veto threat from the Bush administration and weeks of tough negotiations.

In the end, congressional leaders agreed Thursday to cut the defense appropriations bill by $4 billion, as House leaders had proposed, bringing its price tag to $428 billion for the fiscal year that starts Oct. 1.

Although spending breakdowns have not yet been disclosed, the deal reportedly will pay for an additional 22 C-17 military cargo planes, which may delay Boeing's plans to close the Long Beach factory that produces the jets.

Congressional leaders plan to augment the military budget with an emergency infusion of $70 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

That would follow a $65.8-billion emergency allocation in June and more than $50 billion in emergency funding in December, as well as other such supplements since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11.

The Bush administration defends the system of emergency funding as necessary during wartime.

DOJ_NMG_0067393

"The nature of the war on terror continues to make it difficult to predict with precision future funding needs," Office of Management and Budget spokesman Scott Milburn said Thursday.

But the practice has drawn increasing criticism from members of both parties.

"There seems to be an unwillingness to be real," said Rep. David L. Hobson (R-Ohio), a member of the House Appropriations Committee. "We need to really be straightforward about what we're funding and where it's coming from."

Democrats: War Forces Army To Cut Back On Base Operations (MCT)

By Drew Brown

McClatchy Newspapers, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Army is $500 million short of the money it needs to operate its bases this year because of the war in Iraq, forcing many posts to cut back on training, force protection and family support programs, House Democrats said Thursday.

Since June, some Army installations have had to close mess halls, reduce training time and cut back on ammunition, equipment, food and fuel to non-deploying units. Funds for family support activities, including child care, gyms, bus services and other programs have also been cut, hurting morale for families whose loved ones are fighting overseas, the congressional Democrats said at a press conference.

The Bush administration failed to anticipate the Army's needs and budget enough money to cover those expenditures, the group said. The Democrats called for a congressional investigation.

"You can't expect to fight an extended war without paying for it," said Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., the ranking Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee. "Cutting services that support soldiers and their families is shortsighted and just plain wrong. We should not be rewarding their service this way."

The problem has been building for several years, with the Army under-funding its base operations accounts. When fiscal year 2006 started last October, the Army had only 69 percent of the funds it needed for activities ranging from cutting grass and building maintenance to paying civilian workers to man security gates and equipment warehouses.

The Army was counting on money from the Bush administration's $72 billion emergency defense spending request to help cover those activities, but when Congress failed to pass the bill before the Memorial Day recess, belt-tightening began.

Army Vice Chief of Staff Gen. Richard Cody warned in a memo in May that unless Congress passed the bill, the Army would have to cut back on spare parts and supplies and cancel travel and training, and in June it would have to stop hiring civilians and let temporary workers go.

Even when Congress approved $94 billion in emergency war spending in June, including $722 million for Army base operations, the Army was still $500 million short of the total it needed, according to the House Democrats.

Army spokesman Dave Foster said Thursday that he had no immediate comment on the Democrats' analysis of the shortfall.

In testimony to Congress during the summer, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, testified that the Army needed a larger annual budget to address all of its needs.

For 2007, the Army has requested $5.2 billion in base operating funds and $17 billion to replace equipment damaged, worn out or lost in the war.

Skelton said the war has become a "black hole for resources" that is "sapping the non-deployed forces in order to support units in combat."

Rep. Vic Snyder, D-Ark., said cutting back on base services sends the wrong message to the men and women who are fighting overseas. It says "that even in a time of war that their country doesn't care about them," he said.

Rep. Silvestre Reyes, D-Texas, said Congress needs to exert more oversight and come up with ways of fixing the problem.

"At a time when they're fighting for us, and we're treating them this shabbily, that's unconscionable," Reyes said.

Joyce Raezer, director of government relations for the National Military Family Association, said troops serving in Iraq and Afghanistan want to know that their families are being taken care of back home. But she said indications are that services at many bases at getting worse, not better.

"Our families aren't whiners," she said. "They'll accept a certain amount of sacrifice to support their service member, but they're worried about the trend that seems to be developing."

Casey: Iraq War Becoming Internal Fight (AP-Y)

By Elena Becatoros, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 22, 2006

The conflict in Iraq is changing from a fight against U.S.-led coalition forces to an internal struggle for political and economic power, the top U.S. general in Iraq told The Associated Press in an interview Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0067394

Gen. George Casey acknowledged the security situation has become more difficult in the past few months, and said Iraqi leaders must find common ground on key issues if progress is to be made.

"We're starting to see this conflict here transition from an insurgency against us to a struggle for the division of political and economic power among the Iraqis," Casey told the AP.

The general made the comments as he finished a visit to a northern Baghdad neighborhood to talk with local officials about an operation aimed at curbing violence in the capital.

Maj. Gen. Bashar Mahmood Ayoub, commander of the 9th Iraqi army, said the situation has deteriorated in recent months.

"These days, the violence is worse and the politicians are not supporting us," Ayoub told the AP. He said it was up to political leaders to resolve the security situation, adding that the army could do nothing further for now.

Casey acknowledged the difficulties.

"I think the security situation is more complex and more difficult than it was in December '05," when Iraq held general elections.

The February bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra, 60 miles north of Baghdad, led to a surge of violence.

"It's why I think it probably is somewhat more complex than it was back in December," Casey said. "But it's peaked and it's come down again."

The general flew from the fortified Green Zone in the center of the city to visit the Shaab and Azamiyah neighborhoods, where Iraqi and U.S. forces have been conducting searches as part of Operation Together Forward.

Reducing violence in the capital is crucial to any possible success in Iraq, Casey said.

Baghdad is "critical in the overall campaign. In military parlance we would say it's the center of gravity for the country," he said. "Everybody knows that. The bad guys know it, we know it, the Iraqis know it. So we have to help the Iraqis secure their capital if they're going to go forward. And I think they're committed to doing that."

The operation is designed to clear the capital neighborhood by neighborhood, with security forces cordoning off areas and searching all buildings.

"The whole thought process here is to target the worst neighborhoods where the killings and the violence was the greatest, clear them out, impose Iraqi security forces back into the areas and then follow with economic reconstruction so that you keep the people looking ahead and not looking back," Casey said.

Col. Mike Shields, commander of the 172nd Stryker Brigade which is conducting much of the security operation in the capital, said his men were searching and clearing 1,000 to 3,000 buildings a day.

In Shaab, local officials said the operation was mostly working. But there were some complaints. They included problems with deliveries of water, and access by teachers and doctors to some areas.

Part of the security operation is the creation of physical barriers around the city — in the form of berms, trenches and roadblocks — to funnel traffic entering and leaving Baghdad through 28 checkpoints. Viewed from the air, the network of irrigation canals and ditches almost completely ringing the capital is clear.

The barrier "takes advantage of the rivers and the canals around the area, and really just blocks bridges and puts checkpoints around," said Casey. "The notion is push the bad guys out, keep them out, and then gradually go back and re-clear areas so that the people feel safe in their own neighborhoods."

"But it's a long process, it's not going to happen in two weeks," he said.

Inspired by Islamic history, the plan for a ditch around Baghdad is the newest twist in what has so far been a losing battle to prevent suicide car bombs and other weapons from entering the capital.

Casey said that for progress to be made, unity among Iraqi leaders was crucial.

"I think the greatest challenge at the moment is to get the Iraqi leaders to come together and resolve the four or five key issues that are dividing the country right now."

He said Iraqi leaders must focus on purging the government of senior officials who were members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party and on passing a law to govern management of the nation's huge petroleum reserves.

Another crucial issue is federalism — Shiite Arabs in the south want to create an autonomous region like that controlled by Kurds in the north, but are opposed by Sunni Arabs who fear losing out on oil riches. A second key problem is the prevalence of militias.

"If the leadership can come together and resolve those, and then codify them in law so people understand that their rights are going to be protected, then I think we'll start seeing people giving up the fighting," Casey said.

U.N. Expert: Iraq Torture May Be Worse (AP)

By Eliane Engeler, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0067395

Torture in Iraq may be worse now than it was under Saddam Hussein, with militias, terrorist groups and government forces disregarding rules on the humane treatment of prisoners, the U.N. anti-torture chief said Thursday.

Manfred Nowak, the U.N. special investigator on torture, made the remarks as he was presenting a report on detainee conditions at the U.S. prison in Guantanamo Bay as well as to brief the U.N. Human Rights Council, the global body's top rights watchdog, on torture worldwide.

Reports from Iraq indicate that torture "is totally out of hand," he said. "The situation is so bad many people say it is worse than it has been in the times of Saddam Hussein."

Nowak added, "That means something, because the torture methods applied under Saddam Hussein were the worst you could imagine."

Some allegations of torture were undoubtedly credible, with government forces among the perpetrators, he said, citing "very serious allegations of torture within the official Iraqi detention centers."

"You have terrorist groups, you have the military, you have police, you have these militias. There are so many people who are actually abducted, seriously tortured and finally killed," Nowak told reporters at the U.N.'s European headquarters.

"It's not just torture by the government. There are much more brutal methods of torture you'll find by private militias," he said.

A report by the U.N. Assistance Mission in Iraq's Human Rights office cited worrying evidence of torture, unlawful detentions, growth of sectarian militias and death squads, and a rise in "honor killings" of women.

Iraq's government, set up in 2006, is "currently facing a generalized breakdown of law and order which presents a serious challenge to the institutions of Iraq" such as police and security forces and the legal system, the U.N. report said, noting that torture was a major concern.

Nowak has yet to make an official visit to Iraq and said such a mission would be unfeasible as long as the security situation there remains perilous. He based his comments on interviews with people during a visit to Amman, Jordan, and other sources.

"You find these bodies with very heavy and very serious torture marks," he said. "Many of these allegations, I have no doubt that they are credible."

According to the U.N. report, the number of Iraqi civilians killed in July and August hit 6,599, a record-high that is far greater than initial estimates suggested, the U.N. report said Wednesday.

It attributed many of the deaths to rising sectarian tensions that have pushed Iraq toward civil war.

Associated Press writers Bradley S. Klapper in Geneva and Nick Wadhams at the United Nations contributed to this report.

Antiwar Push Starts Near White House; 34 Arrested (WP)

By Sue Anne Pressley Montes

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

A group of ministers, veterans and peace activists attempted to deliver a "declaration of peace" to the White House yesterday, kicking off a week of vigils and other activities in 350 communities across the country calling for the prompt withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq.

Thirty-four people were arrested here and charged with disorderly conduct after they demanded to speak with President Bush, then refused to leave the west gate of the White House. As part of an initiative of more than 400 groups, many of them religiously affiliated, the activists said they had to "bear moral witness" against the U.S. military role in Iraq.

"We are in a time of peril, and people of morals have got to stand up," said the Rev. Lennox Yearwood Jr., who founded the D.C.-based Hip Hop Caucus to involve youths in political and social action and helped to lead yesterday's protest. "If we don't stand now in the 21st century, there will not be a 22nd century. We will destroy ourselves -- we will either solve this together or die as fools together."

The day's activities also featured vigils for peace in dozens of cities and towns, including Little Rock; Tucson; Pasadena, Calif.; Miami; Decatur, Ga.; Pittsburgh; and Austin. In San Diego today, there will be a Dance Action for Peace. Tomorrow in Cincinnati, a tent city dedicated to peace will be erected. San Francisco is hosting a mass bicycle ride to protest the conflict in Iraq, and Madison, Wis., is holding community forums on the issue.

The week's activities will include civil disobedience actions at the U.S. Capitol, organizers said, as participants try to persuade members of Congress to sign the declaration of peace, a document demanding that the Bush administration "establish a concrete and rapid plan to end the U.S. occupation of Iraq."

The declaration of peace was created after religious and secular peace groups, including the Methodist Federation for Social Action, the Presbyterian Peace Fellowship and United for Peace and Justice, began discussions in January. Since then, the document has received more than 12,000 signatures online. Thousands more signatures have been gathered in petition campaigns around the country, organizers said.

DOJ_NMG_0067396

At yesterday's event outside the White House, about 75 people listened as Yearwood and others explained their purpose. Some held small, red "stop" signs to show their support for an end to the war and chanted, "No to war! We declare peace!"

"Today, here in front of the White House, we kick off a week of intensive antiwar action throughout the nation," said Leslie Cagan, national coordinator for United for Peace and Justice, which she described as the country's largest antiwar coalition. "It is time to end the war in Iraq. It is time to bring all of the troops home."

Army Meets Recruiting Goal (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, September 22, 2006

The Army is ending its best recruiting year since 1997 and expecting similar success in 2007, despite the weight of grim war news from Iraq, Army Secretary Francis Harvey said Thursday.

In an Associated Press interview, Harvey said the Army will enlist its 80,000th soldier on Friday, reaching its goal for the year with eight days to spare. That is a considerable turnaround from last year when the Army missed its target for the first time since 1999 and by the widest margin in more than two decades.

At the start of this recruiting year, which began Oct. 1, 2005, many questioned whether the Army would reach 80,000, given the many alternative career options available to young people and the growing unpopularity of the Iraq war. But a package of new financial incentives, new recruiting approaches and a bigger recruiting corps did the trick.

Army recruiters are making more use of the Internet to attract young prospects, and the Army this year began allowing people as old as 42 to enter the service; the maximum age previously was 35.

The Army also has accepted a larger number of recruits whose score on a standardized aptitude test is at the lower end of the acceptable range, and it has granted waivers to permit the enlistment of people with criminal records that otherwise would disqualify them. The Army says it does not grant waivers if there is a pattern of criminal misconduct or for convictions of drug trafficking or any sexually violent crimes.

Harvey said the Army would stick with the formula it used over the past 12 months, while adding a few new wrinkles for recruiters.

He described himself as "moderately optimistic" about reaching the 80,000 goal again next year. It is too early to know the final number for the current recruiting year, which ends Sept. 30, but Harvey said it would be the highest in nine years. Last year the Army fell short of its goal by the widest margin since 1979.

Harvey was flying to New York to personally enlist on Friday the 80,000th recruit — Shirley Salvi, 23, a Rutgers University graduate who will report to Fort Leonard Wood, Mo., to become an Army linguist or intelligence analyst.

The trend in recruiting is particularly important for the Army now because it is striving to expand its overall ranks. The expansion is fundamental to an Army plan that increases the number of combat brigades available for fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan, thereby giving soldiers more breathing room between overseas tours.

The Army secretary said combat brigades now get, on average, only 14 months at home for every 12 months at war. The goal is 24 months at home for every 12 months at war, but Harvey said they currently are moving in the wrong direction. Not long ago, combat brigades were getting 18 months between war tours.

By the end of the budget year on Sept. 30, the active-duty Army expects to have a total of nearly 504,000 soldiers, up from 492,000 a year ago. A year from now it hopes to reach its goal of 512,000, but that will not happen if recruiting slips again. Harvey indicated he expects recruiting to remain strong in the coming year.

"We're sticking with all the improvements we made" over the past year, including a beefed up recruiting corps, Harvey said. "If we start seeing trends that we don't like, we may" add even more recruiters, he said.

There are now about 6,600 recruiters for the active-duty Army, up from 6,401 a year ago and 5,119 two years ago. The Army National Guard and Army Reserve also have greatly increased their recruiting corps.

The outlook for 2007 is brightened a bit by the fact that the Army expects to begin the new recruiting year with about 14 percent of the target number of 80,000 already signed up. Many who signed up this month, for example, did so with the understanding they will not begin basic training for several weeks or months. The Army began the 2006 recruiting year with about 12 percent of the year's total already signed up.

Strained, Army Looks To Guard For More Relief (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 21 — Strains on the Army from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have become so severe that Army officials say they may be forced to make greater use of the National Guard to provide enough troops for overseas deployments.

DOJ_NMG_0067397

Senior Army officers have discussed that analysis — and described the possible need to use more members of the National Guard — with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's senior adviser on personnel, David S. C. Chu, according to Pentagon officials.

While no decision has been made to mobilize more Guard forces, and may not need to be before midterm elections, the prospect presents the Bush administration with a politically vexing problem: how, without expanding the Army, to balance the pressing need for troops in the field against promises to limit overseas deployments for the Guard.

The National Guard has a goal of allowing five years at home between foreign deployments so as not to disrupt the family life and careers of its citizen soldiers. But instead it has been sending units every three to four years, according to Guard officials.

The question of how to sustain the high level of forces abroad became more acute this week as General John P. Abizaid, the senior American commander in the Middle East, said that the number of troops in Iraq, currently at more than 140,000, could not be expected to drop until next spring at the very earliest.

That disclosure comes amid many signs of mounting strain on active Army units. So many are deployed or only recently returned from combat duty that only two or three combat brigades — perhaps 7,000 to 10,000 troops — are fully ready to respond in case of unexpected crises, according to a senior Army general.

An internal Army document that was provided to The New York Times notes that the demand for troops in Iraq and Afghanistan has greatly exceeded past projections that predicted earlier troop reductions. According to the document, the Army needs $66.1 billion to make up for all of its equipment shortfalls. Referring to the units that are to deploy next to Iraq and Afghanistan, or are in training, the document shows a large question mark to indicate their limited readiness.

The Army had to offer generous new enlistment bonuses of up to $40,000 to attract recruits into such dangerous jobs as operating convoys in Iraq. It was able to meet its active-duty enlistment goals this year with the addition of 1,000 new recruiters.

Enmeshed in negotiations with Bush administration officials over its spending request for next year, neither Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army Chief of Staff, nor any of his top Pentagon aides would agree to be interviewed about the personnel stresses they are confronting. But Army officials have shared their concerns with retired Army officers and members of Congress, and quietly distributed budget tallies, including the internal document on troop and equipment demands, to their supporters. Military officers and civilian Pentagon officials interviewed for this article would discuss the issues only on condition of anonymity.

An examination of the Army's plan for deploying its force shows some of the ways it has been overextended.

In overhauling its structure, the active-duty Army is growing to 42 combat brigades. Army officials have said they want to establish a pattern in which an active brigade spends two years at home for each year it is deployed overseas.

But so many units are needed for the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan that combat brigades are generally spending only a year at home for each year they are deployed. Military analysts concluded that this has severely reduced the number of forces that are available for other contingencies.

"The continuing frequent deployments to Iraq and Afghanistan have stretched the U.S. Army so thin that there are few brigades ready to respond to crises elsewhere," said Lynn Davis, a senior analyst in the Arroyo Center, a division of the RAND Corporation that does research for the Army.

Ms. Davis said that there was no quick fix for the limited number of troops. The longer-term solution, she said, was to rely more on the National Guard or to increase the number of Army brigades, a move that would cost billions of dollars.

Gordon R. Sullivan, the former Army chief of staff and president of the Association of the United States Army, said in an interview that the Army was simply too small for the many responsibilities it faced and should be expanded from about 500,000 in the active force to some 560,000. It also needs to make greater use of the National Guard, he said.

"The biggest challenge is manpower," General Sullivan said.

Barry R. McCaffrey, the retired four-star Army general, also asserted that the armed forces needed to be expanded. "We cannot sustain the current national security policy with an Army, Marine Corps, Air Force lift capability and Special Operations forces of this size," he added. "They are clearly inadequate."

The pace of deployments and financing shortfalls, he said, had taken a toll of units in the active duty Army and the National Guard. "One third is completely ready to fight, and two-thirds are severely impaired," he said.

Asked if it was true that only a handful of combat brigades not currently deployed were immediately ready for a crisis, a spokesman for the Army said he could not address specifics because the information was classified.

Mr. Rumsfeld has not favored substantially expanding the Army, concluding that such a step would draw money from programs he favors to overhaul the military and calculating that the high level of troops in Iraq and Afghanistan will prove temporary. Congress, however, has mandated a temporary 30,000-soldier increase for the Army.

As for whether any decision on mobilizing more members of the Guard can be expected, Mr. Chu, the Pentagon's chief personnel officer, declined through a spokeswoman to be interviewed on Army discussions about how to meet its needs.

DOJ_NMG_0067398

But active commanders have highlighted the issue. At a recent conference at Fort Benning, Ga., Gen. Dan K. McNeill, the head of the Army's Forces Command, which oversees training and mobilization for all Army forces in the continental United States, suggested that the service needed to make greater use of the National Guard if the United States was to pursue what the Bush administration has described as a "long war" against Islamic terrorists.

"If we are going to prosecute this long war, we need relatively unencumbered access to the citizen soldier formations," General McNeill said.

The equivalent of several Guard brigades are deployed today in Iraq, Afghanistan, Sinai, the Horn of Africa and Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. Sending more Guard units to Iraq is politically sensitive because of complaints from families and employers while the Guard and Reserve were used extensively in Iraq and Afghanistan in 2004.

Restrictions on the use of the Guard are a matter of interpretation. Guard officials said that under President Bush's current mobilization order, its members may not be called up if they have served for 24 consecutive months. But a conflicting Defense Department policy interprets the order as limiting the call-up of those who have tallied 24 months of total service, regardless of the length of time served consecutively. That view would put more Guard members off-limits for remobilization without a new order from the president.

If the military cannot deploy enough members of the Guard by following either interpretation of the rules, officials may be forced to propose that Mr. Rumsfeld advise President Bush of the need to sign a new mobilization order that would reset the clock for many Guard members who have already served overseas.

Lt. Gen. H Steven Blum, the head of the Guard, said his forces would be prepared to meet current requirements and to send more forces if needed.

"Can I sustain that?" General Blum said. "I say the answer is, 'Absolutely' — if three things remain, three critical things."

He said Guard members must continue to feel that what they are doing is important and that they have the support of the American people. Finally, he said, "We've got to give them some predictability or some kind of certainty so they can balance their civilian life, with their employers and their family, with their military service to the nation."

Given the lengthy lead time required for calling up, training, equipping and deploying Guard forces, Pentagon officials said that if more Guard members were mobilized, it would probably be for a rotation that begins in 2008.

Even so, Pentagon and military officials said that it was unlikely that any decision on a Guard mobilization would be necessary for several months or even into next year, which would place any announcement beyond the November mid-term Congressional elections.

To take on a greater load in Iraq and remedy existing equipment shortfalls, the Guard needs $23 billion over five years, Guard officials say.

"There is no brigade in the United States Army active, Guard or reserve that is completely ready back at home," General Blum said. "That is to ensure that every brigade overseas is completely ready. And by ready I mean completely equipped. Right now, the key to readiness of the total force is equipping it, resetting it and modernizing it. It is a function of time and money."

The stress of wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have prompted senior Army officers to pass a colorful hand card around Capitol Hill explaining that it will take $17.1 billion in extra spending over the next year to repair and replace tanks, trucks, radios and other equipment for the total force. The card indicates that another $13 billion is needed each year for the following five years to fix and replace equipment.

One Army official said this week that the service is seeking about $138 billion for the next fiscal year, compared with the $112 budget request the Army submitted last year.

DOJ:

Office Of U.S. Attorney 'stressed' (SEAPI)

By Paul Shukovsky, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, September 22, 2006

Federal prosecutor has seen budget steadily shrink

The federal prosecutor for Western Washington says his office is "stressed to the limit" because of years of budget cuts that threaten to slow the pace of criminal prosecutions.

U.S. Attorney John McKay has issued this warning to county prosecutors and special agents in charge of federal agencies, including the FBI, the Drug Enforcement Administration and Immigration and Customs Enforcement: "We may not be as responsive as you want us to be on the cases you refer to us."

The office has been hemorrhaging prosecutors and support staff members even as the other Washington is poised to impose another budget cut for the 2006-07 fiscal year.

The office, which handles federal criminal prosecutions and civil cases involving the U.S. government, is down six criminal prosecutors and one civil attorney, leaving 58 assistant U.S. attorneys, McKay said.

Fourteen positions in the office are unfilled, and McKay still must pay his 118 employees a mandatory 3 percent cost-of-living raise.

McKay said he is proud that the office has been able to maintain its productivity -- prosecuting more than 800 defendants last year. "We are on track to do slightly more than that" this year, he said.

But cases that might have been prosecuted under tougher federal laws are increasingly being sent to local prosecutors.

"We're not taking as many of these cases as we'd like to take," McKay said. "We're working hard to take up the slack, but we're not always successful in taking the cases we should."

A bigger budget would mean more prosecutions in burgeoning problem areas, such as cybercrime, according to McKay's top assistant, Mark Bartlett.

"You'd see more cases like 'botnet,' " he said, referring to the recent prosecution of a young man from California who infected thousands of computers around the world for personal profit. "You'd see more collaboration with Microsoft and other intellectual-property firms where piracy is a huge concern."

The office's cybercrime unit has two vacancies that "prevent us from being as proactive as we'd like to be," Bartlett said.

In fiscal 2003-04, the office's budget was $12.1 million. In fiscal 2004-05, it slid to $11.4 million. In the current fiscal year ending next week, the budget will have shrunk further, to $11 million.

It's not clear what the next budget will bring, but McKay has been told that the best case is a flat budget and that more cuts are possible.

The strain on the U.S. Attorney's Office is being felt in Whatcom County, where criminals who move contraband such as drugs, undeclared cash and illegal immigrants across the U.S.-Canadian border are arrested by the federal agents, but frequently prosecuted by locals.

McKay said his office is declining about 80 percent of the cases at the border that could be prosecuted in federal court. It's a lost opportunity, he said.

"We try to flip people by putting them through federal prosecution," said McKay, using a slang term for persuading criminals to cooperate with law enforcement in return for a lighter sentence. "We don't have that flexibility right now."

Whatcom County Prosecutor Dave McEachran said he's "amazed" that McKay is facing the possibility of more budget cuts.

McEachran needs federal prosecutors to take some of the load off his attorneys, who are handling an average of 200 felony cases apiece.

"We have a huge caseload here," he said.

McEachran said local prosecutors on the U.S. side of the Mexican border had to threaten to stop prosecuting arrests made by federal agents to get federal dollars to help them with the crush of border-related crime.

There have been attempts by northern border prosecutors to get similar federal assistance. But they have never received congressional approval, McEachran said.

Cuts in the U.S. attorney's budget also affect violent crimes such as bank robberies, which occur at a high rate in Western Washington.

Bank robberies can be prosecuted federally, and those convicted given harsher sentences. But "most of them are shifting over to the locals," McKay said. Only the most violent cases or serial bank robberies are seeing the inside of a federal courtroom.

As for "note jobs," in which an unarmed robber slides a demand note to a teller -- "we're not seeing those," McKay said.

"This is going into our third year of really tough budgets," he said. "We keep expecting it to get fixed, but that's dependent on Congress."

P-I reporter Paul Shukovsky can be reached at 206-448-8072 or paulshukovsky@seattlepi.com.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

H-P's Hurd Likely To Testify Before House Panel (WSJ)

By David Rogers And Don Clark

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Hewlett-Packard Co. Chief Executive Mark Hurd appears headed for a House committee examining the "pretexting" scandal at the company.

Mr. Hurd yesterday offered to testify after Rep. Joe Barton of Texas, chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said the computer maker's top executive may be called as a witness.

The hearing, scheduled for Thursday before the House subcommittee on oversight and investigations, already had a witness list that includes H-P General Counsel Ann Baskins and Patricia Dunn, the H-P chairman who pushed for an investigation of board leaks.

1 EMAIL TRAIL

Below are links to some key internal H-P documents: · In a series of emails2, Robert Sherbin, H-P's vice president of external communications, warns Ms. Dunn there is a "fresh" leak. In one message, Mr. Sherbin lists five directors Mr. Hurd suggested as investigation targets.

· H-P lawyer Kevin Hunsaker sends a email3 to his investigation team discussing how phone records were obtained. The message admits pretexting was used, but says the practice "is not unlawful."

But H-P emails reviewed by The Wall Street Journal suggest that Mr. Hurd was more closely involved in some aspects of the probe than previously thought. Mr. Hurd has scheduled a news conference for this afternoon. (See related article7.)

Yesterday, H-P shares fell 5.2%, or $1.91, to 34.87 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

In other developments, H-P disclosed that the Securities and Exchange Commission's enforcement division had made new requests for information from the company. In a filing on Sept. 6, H-P reported that the SEC's corporation-finance department had requested information about an H-P filing last May that reported the resignation of director Thomas Perkins, who resigned in protest over the leak investigation.

An H-P filing yesterday disclosed that the SEC division had requested information related to Mr. Perkins's resignation, a Sept. 6 company filing about the matter as well as "investigations conducted by HP or any of its directors into possible sources of leaks of HP confidential information."

H-P said it is cooperating with the SEC investigation. Other agencies, including the FBI and the California attorney general's office, are investigating H-P's conduct.

Rep. Barton was given expanded subpoena authority this week by his committee and appears to have strong support for the inquiry from Michigan Rep. John Dingell, the ranking Democrat on the Energy and Commerce Committee. Both men sit as ex-officio members of the investigative subcommittee, and the extra subpoena power will allow them to expedite orders seeking additional documents, for example, that investigators may want in preparation for next week's hearing.

Mr. Barton has a long history of support for protections of privacy. He and Mr. Dingell backed legislation, reported from the committee in March, to prohibit the practice of fraudulently posing as someone to gain access to telephone records, known as pretexting. H-P has admitted pretexting directors, reporters and others as part of an internal probe to track the source of board leaks.

Mr. Barton said he hoped the controversy would spark more pressure to move ahead with the legislation in Congress. There are various laws against using fraud to obtain private records, but "under current federal and state law, there is no specific statute that makes pretexting illegal," he said.

Mr. Barton said H-P "went overboard" in trying to identify board leaks to the media. "It's an unknown whether the higher-ups at H-P knew how the information was obtained, but somebody at H-P had to know how they obtained these records.

"When you get people's phone records and things like that, that would not be the type of information the subjects being investigated would voluntarily divulge," he said.

H-P's filing with the SEC yesterday disclosed some terms of a separation agreement between the company and Mr. Perkins, who resigned as a director in May in protest over the leak investigation, and George Keyworth, whom H-P identified as a leaker and who wasn't renominated for re-election to the board.

The company and the two directors agreed not to sue each other. But the two men, who are close friends, are entitled under the agreement to prosecute legal claims against security or investigative firms, or their contractors, involved in unlawfully obtaining personal information about the former directors or their family members.

Mr. Keyworth is being represented by Reginald Brown, an attorney with the Washington firm Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale & Dorr. Mr. Brown yesterday declined to comment about the possibility that Mr. Keyworth would sue any of H-P's outside investigators.

Mr. Perkins's attorney, Viet Dinh, of Bancroft Associates PLLC, couldn't be reached to comment.

Focus Turns To The Chief Of H.P.; Stock Falls (NYT)

By Damon Darlin And Matt Richtel

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 21 — Pressure is mounting on Hewlett-Packard's chief executive, Mark V. Hurd, to explain what appears to have been a greater role in the company's spying operation than was initially indicated.

Mr. Hurd has largely escaped mention in connection with the company's efforts to obtain private phone records and otherwise trace leaks from its board. But on Thursday, after his name figured in documents newly appearing in the investigation, Hewlett-Packard's stock price fell significantly for the first time since the revelations began early this month. The shares closed down 5.19 percent, at $34.87.

The California attorney general, Bill Lockyer, threatened at one point Thursday to issue subpoenas to Hewlett-Packard because of what he said was a lack of cooperation in his criminal investigation. But later in the day, a spokesman for his office said H.P. had expressed a willingness to cooperate, as the attorney general wanted.

The problem for Mr. Hurd arises from a sheaf of e-mail messages and other documents obtained by news organizations that suggest that he approved of at least one aspect of the spying operation, offered names of possible targets and may have been briefed by the supervisors of the effort at the start of a crucial phase.

None of the leaked documents directly implicate Mr. Hurd. He did not write any of the e-mail messages, nor is it clear that he was sent copies of others that refer to him and actions attributed to him.

But what may yet emerge — Hewlett-Packard delivered more than 5,000 pages of documents to investigators with the House Committee on Energy and Commerce this week, and more are expected Monday — is what seems to have worried investors and analysts.

"To the degree it impacts the C.E.O., that is something we are nervous about," said A. M. Sacconaghi, an analyst who tracks Hewlett-Packard for Sanford C. Bernstein & Company. But he said that "at this point the probability is very low" that Mr. Hurd, credited with turning the company around since his hiring in March 2005, might face criminal charges or be forced out.

Mr. Hurd offered Thursday to testify at a House subcommittee hearing on the case next Thursday. Several other Hewlett-Packard executives have also been asked to appear.

In addition, the company said the Securities and Exchange Commission was seeking records and information related to the resignation of Thomas J. Perkins from the board in May. It was Mr. Perkins's effort to force the company to acknowledge the reason for his resignation — his objection to the leak investigation — that brought the operation into public view.

Since then, documents have shown that Hewlett-Packard's detectives not only gained phone records of directors, employees, journalists and others, but also tried to plant software on a reporter's computer to track a bogus document it sent her and even considered infiltrating newsrooms with spies masquerading as clerical workers or cleaners.

E-mail messages between company officials, cited Thursday in The New York Times and The Wall Street Journal, show efforts to organize a briefing for Mr. Hurd last January, when the leak investigation entered an intense phase over a news account of a senior management meeting. It is not clear whether the briefing occurred.

Another message said Mr. Hurd pointed to five potential leakers on the board at that juncture. And The Washington Post reported that e-mail from the company's chairwoman, Patricia C. Dunn, cited Mr. Hurd as "fine with both the concept and the content" of the software tracking effort.

Mr. Lockyer, the California attorney general, said Thursday that he did not know yet whether the state would find culpability among senior officials in the company. "We haven't ruled anything in or out," he said. "We want to know who committed the wrongdoing."

The company promised that Mr. Hurd would answer questions at a news conference Friday afternoon, after the stock market's close, but the timing of the events also put investors on edge. "Traditionally in corporate America, bad news is delivered on a Friday after the markets close," Mr. Sacconaghi said.

Several people with close ties to board members said Mr. Hurd was preparing a plan to present to the board for how get the company beyond its current problems. It may announce dismissals or resignations, though that course could present other problems. Ex-employees have no incentive to protect the company or its executives or managers.

Hewlett-Packard's chairwoman, Ms. Dunn, has acknowledged that she authorized the internal inquiry, and documents have shown that she involved herself in it. Other documents show that Kevin T. Hunsaker, a senior company lawyer, directed the operation, which involved Hewlett-Packard investigators and several layers of outside detectives and their subcontractors.

Mr. Hunsaker has hired a San Diego criminal defense lawyer, Michael Pancer. Ann O. Baskins, the company's general counsel, to whom Mr. Hunsaker reported, has hired Cristina C. Arguedas, a white-collar crime specialist with the law firm of Arguedas, Cassman & Headley in Berkeley, Calif.

Mr. Hurd has been popular with investors because he is transforming Hewlett-Packard from a lumbering technology company content to live off the profits of its lucrative ink-cartridge business into a growth company. Hewlett is projected to bring in $91.2 billion in revenue this year — enough to make it the largest technology company in the world.

Oddly, the internal animosities exposed in the disclosures from the leak investigation had their roots in the activities of a board subcommittee established in 2002 to help the company make smarter technology strategy decisions.

After its contentious $25 billion merger with Compaq Computer, the board and some top executives became bitterly divided over how quickly the computer business could grow and how it should invest in the future, according to a person with direct knowledge of the divisions within the board.

Established at the urging of Mr. Perkins, a Silicon Valley venture capitalist who returned to the company as a director after the Compaq merger in 2002, the technology subcommittee routinely met a day before each board meeting to thrash out technology strategy issues and wrestle with how to restart growth at Hewlett-Packard.

The subcommittee was dominated by directors who maintained that the company could grow much more quickly by investing in information technology. Initial members included Mr. Perkins; George A. Keyworth II, a former Reagan administration science adviser; Richard A. Hackborn, a former Hewlett-Packard executive; and Lawrence T. Babbio Jr., vice chairman of Verizon. Shane V. Robison, the executive in charge of research and development, attended the meetings.

Mr. Hurd began attending after he joined the company, succeeding Carleton S. Fiorina as chief executive. It was where the most spirited deliberations about Hewlett-Packard's future took place, a person briefed on the sessions said.

But Ms. Dunn, who had become chairwoman, did not take part, and some subcommittee members have concluded that her exclusion rankled her. She and several other directors were skeptical of large research investments in computing, a person with detailed knowledge of the subcommittee's activities said.

"The conflict on the board wasn't about personalities; it was about growth strategies," said Mark Stahlman, a financial industry analyst who is now a strategist at Gartner Invest, a Wall Street research firm.

Friends of Ms. Dunn, who asked not to be identified, said some of the animosity could also be traced to the period when Mr. Hurd was hired. Mr. Perkins, Mr. Keyworth and Ms. Dunn were in charge of the search committee, and while they agreed about Mr. Hurd, Ms. Dunn became angry with leaks from the board about the search, those friends said.

Mr. Perkins and Mr. Keyworth became targets in both phases of the leak investigation, around the time of Ms. Fiorina's dismissal and again early this year. Their resulting confrontation with Ms. Dunn — Mr. Keyworth was identified as a source of unauthorized disclosures — ended in their resignations.

Nonetheless, with Ms. Dunn's decision last week to step down as chairwoman in January, to be succeeded by Mr. Hurd, the strategic dispute was settled. "The growth faction has now won," Mr. Stahlman said.

In a filing Thursday with the S.E.C., the company said Mr. Perkins and Mr. Keyworth, who resigned after Ms. Dunn stepped down, had agreed not to sue Hewlett-Packard, and the company had agreed to pay expenses arising from government inquiries or legal proceedings in the spying fiasco. The company and the former directors signed mutual non-disparagement agreements.

Hewlett-Packard Receives SEC Request For Information (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Allan Dodds Frank And Karen Gullo

Bloomberg, September 22, 2006

Sept. 21 (Bloomberg) -- Hewlett-Packard Co. received a request for information from the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission over its investigation into media leaks as California Attorney General Bill Lockyer complained the company stopped cooperating with him.

Hewlett-Packard disputed Lockyer's assertions and said it is cooperating with his probe, as well as reviews by the SEC, U.S. Justice Department and a congressional committee. Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd offered to appear before the committee, the company said today.

``Today we ran into a brick wall," Lockyer said in an interview. ``Frankly I'm pretty angry about it. I've instructed my lawyers this morning to paper the place with subpoenas."

The SEC probe and Lockyer's statements intensify the scandal hanging over Hewlett-Packard on the eve of Hurd's first press conference to discuss the methods the company used to uncover the source of boardroom leaks to the media. Lockyer said some tactics, including the use of fake identities to obtain phone records, are criminal.

Hewlett-Packard shares had their biggest one-day decline in more than two years after the Washington Post reported that e- mails it obtained suggest Hurd had more involvement in the investigation than the company has said. Hurd said in a statement today that he plans to give ``as much clarity as we can" to the probe.

``If Mark Hurd is being implicated and had a bigger role than it was thought to date, that would jeopardize his running the firm and that would be a severe negative on the stock," said Michael Cuggino, Pacific Heights Asset Management LLC in San Francisco, which owns 200,000 Hewlett-Packard shares. ``He's recognized as the driver behind H-P's turnaround."

No Change

DOJ_NMG_0067403

The company said there has been no change in its level of cooperation with the state, according to Ryan Donovan, a Hewlett- Packard spokesman. ``HP has been and continues to cooperate fully with the California Attorney General's investigation," he said.

Tom Dresslar, a spokesman for Lockyer, said Hewlett- Packard's lawyers had contacted the Attorney General's office after he spoke today.

``The lack of cooperation that we had been experiencing seems to have been addressed," Dresslar said in an interview. Lockyer had been seeking to conduct interviews with employees and examine communications between the company and outside contractors. ``Interviews with the people we wanted to talk with are being arranged," Dresslar said.

SEC

The SEC's enforcement division asked for records and information relating to the resignation of Tom Perkins from its board of directors and the company's probe of boardroom leaks, the company said today.

Hewlett-Packard also disclosed today that it hired law firm Morgan Lewis & Bockius to conduct an analysis of its investigation. A representative of the firm will join Hurd tomorrow at a press conference. Lockyer said he might show up at the event.

The new lawyers have advised Hewlett-Packard to stop handing over documents or talking. The law firm ``is not now honoring the original agreements we had," Lockyer said.

Morgan Lewis spokeswoman Amy Kalin didn't immediately return calls seeking comment.

Chairwoman Patricia Dunn, 53, said on Sept. 12 that she will resign in January to take responsibility for the investigation. Lockyer has said he has enough evidence to lay charges against company officials and outside investigators.

Shares Fall

The shares fell $1.91, or 5.2 percent, to $34.87 at 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange Composite trading after being little changed since the company made the investigation public on Sept. 6. That is the largest single-day drop since Aug. 2004 when the shares fell 13 percent.

In the past week, the company has been accused of following reporters and plotting to send bugs to their computers and spies into their newsrooms, according to newspaper reports. Hurd and Dunn approved a ``sting" operation to be conducted on a Cnet.com reporter to find out who she communicated with at the company, the Washington Post reported, citing e-mails from Dunn.

The e-mails link Hurd for the first time to the internal investigation, the Post said. Hewlett-Packard declined to comment on the e-mails, Donovan said.

Hurd, 49, was named to replace ousted CEO Carly Fiorina in March 2005 after a seven-week search by the board that was led by Dunn.

Meetings

Investigators hired by the company also sought meetings with Hurd, the Wall Street Journal reported, citing e-mails from January between Kevin Hunsaker, the company's senior ethics lawyer and Hewlett-Packard investigator Tony Gentilucci. It is unclear whether Hurd met investigators during that probe, the Journal reported.

Hewlett-Packard's first statement said its efforts to uncover the source of media leaks led investigators to take on false identities to obtain phone records of some directors and employees as well as nine reporters and other people outside the company. Since then, e-mail documents obtained by media outlets have suggested that the company went further.

The Post today said the company created a fictitious source named Jacob to deceive Cnet.com reporter Dawn Kawamoto. E-mails from Dunn and Hunsaker also indicate that she and Hurd approved a plan to feed Kawamoto information through Jacob, the Post said.

Dunn kept in touch with the probe, often sending responses to e-mails on her BlackBerry, the Post said.

Spies

The New York Times this week reported that the company considered sending spies into the newsrooms of the Wall Street Journal and Cnet.com posing as clerical employees or cleaning staff to help uncover the source of the leaks.

The U.S. Energy and Commerce Committee has requested Dunn and others involved in the probe testify next week before its subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations. General Counsel Ann Baskins will also testify.

Hurd, who wasn't asked to attend, today said he offered to appear before the committee. The hearing will focus on the company's use of investigators who assumed false identities to gain phone numbers, known as pretexting.

``Mark wants to be as transparent as possible," Donovan said. ``He wants to apologize publicly and talk about how we are ensuring that these events will not happen again."

Business Week today reported that investigators masqueraded as telecom employees to obtain the records from Verizon Communications Inc. customers.

James Brosnahan of San Francisco-based Morrison & Foerster LLP said in an e-mail today that he has been hired to serve as Dunn's lawyer. He didn't return a call seeking comment.

Second Investigation

Morgan Lewis will conduct the second investigation into the probe. The first was run by Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, the company's usual outside counsel. Larry Sonsini, the firm's president, was also the subject of investigation and has agreed to appear before the Energy and Commerce Committee next week.

The briefing tomorrow will end more than a week of silence from Hewlett-Packard, which has refused to comment on the scandal since Dunn agreed to step down. She will remain a director.

``What began as an effort to prevent the leaks of confidential information from HP's boardroom ended up heading in directions that were never anticipated," Hurd said today in an earlier statement. ``HP is working hard to determine exactly what took place and when, and without all the facts it has been difficult for us to respond to the questions that have been raised."

To contact the reporter on this story: Connie Guglielmo in San Francisco at Cguglielmo1@bloomberg.net .

Plot Thickens In HP's News-leak Probe (USAT)

By Jim Hopkins And Jon Swartz

USA Today, September 22, 2006

Hewlett-Packard's boardroom spying scandal intensified Thursday when the Securities and Exchange Commission ratcheted up its inquiry into the company's covert news-leak probe.

HP shares fell more than 5% on heavy volume as investors responded to a published report that for the first time tied CEO Mark Hurd to shady tactics used by the company's private investigators.

Hurd offered to testify next week before a congressional committee investigating the matter. He'll hold a news conference today to talk about steps the tech giant is taking in the case. The embattled HP board met again Thursday.

The Washington Post, citing an e-mail sent by HP Chairman Patricia Dunn, said Hurd had “approved an elaborate ‘sting' operation” on a reporter for the tech-news site CNet in February aiming to uncover news leaks from HP's board.

The Post report suggests Hurd, hired last year to lead a crucial turnaround, was more deeply involved, and at an earlier stage, in planning the news-leak investigation than HP has previously acknowledged.

HP said last week that Hurd did not learn about the probe's initial findings until March, and that he had learned about questionable tactics used against journalists and others “only in recent weeks.”

USA TODAY was unable to independently confirm the authenticity of the e-mails cited by the Post. HP had no comment on the story, said spokesman Ryan Donovan.

But a document obtained by USA TODAY shows one of HP's outside investigators sent CNet reporter Dawn Kawamoto an e-mail on Feb. 9 that contained a “tracking capability” that could help investigators find the board leak.

The document was prepared by Security Outsourcing Solutions, a Boston-area firm that is a focus of a California law-enforcement probe of HP. The document was provided to the newspaper by a source who is not directly involved in the investigation.

The Post said none of the e-mails it reviewed were to or from Hurd, and they did not “detail what information Hurd had when he approved the sting operation.”

The SEC's enforcement division is seeking records and information related to HP director Tom Perkins' resignation in May, HP said. The division also wants information about HP's news-leak probes and related Sept. 6 and May 22 SEC filings by the company. HP said it is cooperating.

HP's probe, which started early last year and continued through spring, involved spying on directors, employees and at least nine journalists.

Investigators hired by HP obtained private home phone-calling records of at least two directors and some journalists.

Hurd's offer to testify before the House Energy and Commerce Committee next Thursday came after Rep. Bart Stupak, D-Mich., asked other panelists to consider seeking his testimony. Stupak cited “allegations and media reports regarding Mr. Hurd's possible knowledge of HP's various deceptive investigative techniques.”

The committee does not yet have plans to call Hurd, said spokesman Terry Lane. Dunn and other senior HP executives already are scheduled to testify at the high-profile hearing, likely to focus on thousands of pages of internal documents the panel received from HP this week.

Kawamoto told USA TODAY in an e-mail that she is “shocked and outraged that they rifled through my phone records. … Not only was my privacy violated, my family's privacy was violated, and my ability to do my job was challenged.”

The HP scandal already has led to a boardroom reshuffling, announced last week, in which Hurd is to replace Dunn as chairman in January. Also, director George Keyworth, identified as the boardroom leak, resigned. Perkins resigned in protest on May 18, a move that forced HP three weeks ago to disclose its probe.

The Post's disclosures about Hurd, 49, come at a crucial time for the computer and printer maker, a corporate pillar in Silicon Valley and a leading Fortune 500 company.

Hurd, CEO since April 2005, is leading a critical revamping of the company as it recovers from the tech bust and a controversial merger with Compaq Computer that was engineered by predecessor Carly Fiorina.

HP shares fell 5.2% Thursday, closing at $34.87. About 42 million shares changed hands, nearly three times average volume. Financial analysts, who until recently brushed aside the boardroom drama, say Hurd's possible role in the spy plan could now affect HP.

"The stock market is voting correctly," says Roger Kay, CEO of Endpoint Technologies Associates. "You can lose any number of board members and nobody cares, but if the CEO is somehow impaired, then that raises questions about the operational side of the house."

The specter of Hurd becoming ensnared in the legal machinations could divert him from running the $86 billion company, Kay and others say.

"Hurd has done a remarkable job with the company. Yes, there are concerns he would be distracted," says Charlie Wolf of Needham and Co.

"There is a modest jeopardy here. Fortunately, HP has a strong bench (of executives), so there should be no material impact on the company's financial performance."

Hurd will be joined at today's news conference by a representative of Morgan Lewis & Bockius, a law firm hired by HP on Sept. 8 to defend the company amid investigations by the Justice Department, California Attorney General Bill Lockyer, the FBI and the SEC.

HP said Thursday that Morgan Lewis has begun a "comprehensive analysis" of the company's news-leak investigations that began early last year around the time the board was ousting Fiorina.

"HP is working hard to determine exactly what took place and when, and without all the facts it has been difficult for us to respond to the questions that have been raised," Hurd said in a statement. "We plan to give as much clarity as we can to these matters."

Lockyer spokesman Tom Dresslar said HP is now cooperating after "some stonewalling." "We will now gain expedited access to individuals and documents," he said.

Morgan Lewis partner John Hemann, a former assistant U.S. Attorney in San Francisco who helped prosecute Enron executives Ken Lay and Andrew Fastow, has met with federal prosecutors in San Francisco investigating the case, the San Francisco daily legal newspaper The Recorder has reported.

Hemann specializes in white-collar criminal defense and internal corporate investigations, according to the 1,250-lawyer firm's website.

Hemann did not return calls seeking comment.

HP Stock Falters In Spying Scandal (WP)

By Yuki Noguchi And Brooke A. Masters

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

The scandal over Hewlett-Packard Co.'s conduct in investigating press leaks started affecting its business yesterday for the first time, weighing down its stock price and raising questions about the future of its leadership.

Shares of the printing and computing company dropped 5 percent, the first major price dip since the company revealed early this month that it had obtained personal phone records of its board members and nine journalists under false pretenses. HP shares, which had been trading near a 52-week high of $37.25, dropped $1.91 to close at $34.87.

The decline came on the same day as a newspaper report that HP's president and chief executive, Mark V. Hurd, had personally approved an elaborate plan to trick a reporter into identifying her sources by sending her false information. That e-mail "sting" operation, reported by The Washington Post, was part of a broader leak probe that involved physical surveillance, false documents and electronic bugs, all in an attempt to flush out who on its board spoke with reporters.

Hurd yesterday offered to join HP Chairman Patricia C. Dunn and several others who are scheduled to testify next week at a House Energy and Commerce Committee hearing about the scandal. HP also disclosed in a filing that the Securities and Exchange Commission's enforcement division requested documents relating to its leak investigations and to the May resignation of a board member.

DOJ_NMG_0067406

Separate probes by the California state attorney general, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Justice Department also are under way. New details are dribbling out almost daily about HP's spying efforts, which began early in 2005 after company leaders resolved to identify which board members were leaking confidential information to reporters.

Meanwhile, HP's board of directors met yesterday and Hurd plans to hold a news conference this afternoon.

"This has nothing to do with the strategy or operations of HP," Hurd said in a statement "What began as an effort to prevent the leaks of confidential information from HP's boardroom ended up heading in directions that were never anticipated."

But yesterday, investors who previously shrugged off disclosures of the company's spying activity reacted unhappily to the report that Hurd had approved an e-mail sting. The operation involved sending an e-mail embedded with software to trace where the reporter subsequently sent the message.

Hurd was brought in last year to help HP recover from the stormy tenure of his predecessor, Carleton "Carly" Fiorina. He is widely seen as crucial to the firm's future.

"Hurd is the guy driving the turnaround at HP, and it's not done yet," technology industry analyst Rob Enderle said. "This is pulling him away from managing the business and it's going to have an impact," which could cause a slowdown in the company's operations by next year, he added.

Research analysts at most of the major investment banks have so far shied away from trying to quantify the impact of the spying imbroglio on HP's bottom line. But there are contracts HP would not want to jeopardize because of any criminal investigations. Earlier this week, HP beat out some of its computing rivals by winning a $5 billion, 10-year deal with the U.S. Army to provide computers, printers, displays and scanners.

Analyst Roger Kay, president of research firm Endpoint Technologies Associates Inc., said the scandal was not likely to affect the company's sales. "You don't look at an HP server or laptop as a lesser product because the CEO ordered a sting operation," he said.

But Robert Passikoff, president of research consulting firm Brandkeys Inc., disagreed. His firm's surveys show that HP has lost 14 percent of what is known as "brand strength," a measure of consumer sentiment for a brand name, since the scandal began and has dropped from third place in its sector to seventh. While the allegations do not appear to affect how consumers think about the technical aspects of HP products, they have pushed down its reputation for openness, honesty and trustworthiness, Passikoff said.

The allegations dovetail with consumer fears about spyware and privacy loss in an information age, he said, noting that people are asking, "If they are doing that there, what are they doing to me?"

Until corporate spying became an issue for HP, the company stood to benefit from recent missteps by rivals Apple Computer Inc. and Dell Corp., which recently recalled millions of laptop computer batteries because of overheating. "People will reserve judgment on the company for a few weeks, but if there isn't a big change, with someone of high credibility brought in, it's going to start to affect business," said Paul Argenti, a professor of corporate communication at the Tuck School of Business at Dartmouth. "When a breach in ethics happens in a senior group of managers, it calls into question the management of the company."

"It takes years and years to build up a reputation and a few weeks to lose it. They're doing a very good job of losing it right now," Argenti said.

Although it remains unclear whether HP executives or its outside investigators violated laws, some analysts said the prospect of criminal charges against either the firm or its executives and directors could seriously tarnish the company.

"If it were simply a civil matter, it would be easier to solve," said Howard Rubenstein, founder of New York public-relations firm Rubenstein Associates. But in this case, where California officials are talking about criminal wrongdoing, "they've got to be cautious that they don't convict themselves out of their own mouths."

Staff writers Mike Musgrove and Ellen Nakashima contributed to this report.

Hewlett-Packard, Wilson Sonsini Part Ways In Calif. Probe (LAW)

By Susan Beck, The American Lawyer

American Lawyer, September 22, 2006

Hewlett-Packard Co. said Thursday it has dropped Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati as its outside counsel in the California attorney general's criminal investigation of the company.

Wilson, HP says, will continue to represent the company in other matters, but in a written statement by spokesman Ryan Donovan, the company said that "Hewlett-Packard and Wilson Sonsini mutually agreed it would be in the best interests of both parties for Wilson to terminate its representation of HP in the California attorney general's inquiry."

Wilson chair Larry Sonsini has been HP's primary outside counsel for years, advising the client on the massive Agilent Technologies Inc. spin-off in 1999, and guiding it during the tumultuous proxy fight waged by former director Walter Hewlett that spanned 2001-2002. Sonsini has stated that he was not involved in the design of the leaks probe, but he did review the results of the probe for the company, and initially took the position that it was "within legal limits."

The probe by California AG Bill Lockyer centers on whether the company broke the law as it tried to uncover the source of leaks to the news media on deliberations by the company's board of directors. Lockyer is trying to determine whether crimes were committed when the phone records of directors and journalists covering the company were obtained under false pretenses. Last week, Lockyer said he believed he had "sufficient evidence" to indict people in the company.

On Thursday, Bloomberg reported that Lockyer said Hewlett-Packard had stopped cooperating with his investigation. "Today we ran into a brick wall," Lockyer said in the Bloomberg interview. He said the state of California would become more aggressive in its probe because of the company's "stalling tactics." He explained that HP's new law firm had advised the company to stop handing over documents and talking to investigators.

Later in the day, however, Lockyer spokesman Tom Dresslar said representatives of HP had been in contact with the AG's office since Lockyer had talked to Bloomberg, and the company's lack of cooperation "appears to be corrected." He added, "It seems now we'll be getting quick access interview subjects."

In a separate news release, HP announced that it will hold a press conference Friday where CEO Mark Hurd and lawyers from Morgan, Lewis & Bockius will address the leaks investigation. The press release states that Morgan Lewis was retained on Sept. 8 by HP to conduct a "comprehensive analysis of the leak investigations." It also notes that, "Morgan Lewis also is representing HP in connection with several government inquiries." The press release does not mention Wilson Sonsini's involvement for HP.

Donovan refused to clarify if Wilson continues to advise the HP board of directors in other aspects of the leaks investigation. He did emphasize, however, that "Hewlett-Packard and Wilson Sonsini continue to enjoy a strong relationship."

Wilson Sonsini spokesperson Courtney Dorman confirmed the HP statement. "We all agree it was the right decision," she wrote in an e-mail. She added, "Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati will continue to have a relationship with HP," but declined to say more.

Brosnahan: Don't Blame HP Chair, She's Not A Lawyer (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, September 22, 2006

Don't blame Hewlett-Packard Chairman Patricia Dunn, her new lawyer said Wednesday, for the convulsions the company's board have suffered in the wake of its troubled investigation of boardroom leaks.

"She's neither a lawyer nor is she an investigator," said James Brosnahan, the Morrison & Foerster litigator whom Dunn hired this week. "And she's not the kind of person, frankly, who would advise people to do something illegal."

Dunn has come under scrutiny for her role in directing the troubled probe -- The Wall Street Journal reported Wednesday that she closely supervised it -- and she's the latest figure in the imbroglio to get a big-name lawyer in response to multiple government investigations.

Brosnahan, long-known for handling high-profile clients -- including John Walker Lindh, the Marin County man once charged with fighting for the Taliban -- will represent Dunn before a congressional subcommittee and in the state and federal investigations into HP's probe of board members, journalists and employees.

The company's leak probe became public earlier this month, when The Journal reported that HP director Tom Perkins had resigned in protest of the methods used, which included "pretexting" -- or lying -- in calls to phone company officials in order to gain access to board members' phone records.

Reached Wednesday afternoon as he was in transit from a San Jose, Calif., trial to Dunn's induction dinner for the Bay Area Business Hall of Fame, Brosnahan said his client was trying to plug a troubling hole in HP's corporate security, and had relied on others to make sure the methods were legal.

The leak "was causing havoc in the securities market at the time, disrupting the ability to have business strategies vis a vis competitors," said Brosnahan.

In response, he said, Dunn ordered the investigation, relying on others to execute it. Once complete information about the probe comes out, Brosnahan said, Dunn's role will seem less problematic, even to skeptics.

"When the full story is out and clear, they will see she was pursuing a legitimate goal," he said. "She's confident, as am I, that she's not a good candidate for prosecution."

Thomas Carlucci, a Foley & Lardner partner and former federal prosecutor not involved in the case, said Dunn should be able to mount a strong defense by saying she relied on advice of counsel.

"We can all question her judgment about doing the investigation in the first place, but in the pretexting," he said, "I've got to believe she's relying on her general counsel or outside lawyers."

HP's general counsel, Ann Baskins, has hired Berkeley, Calif., defense lawyer Cristina Arguedas. Another in-house lawyer, HP ethics director Kevin Hunsaker, is represented by San Diego solo Michael Pancer. Arguedas could not be reached for comment by press time.

Larry Sonsini, the high-powered Silicon Valley lawyer who has long advised HP, has hired Michael Madigan, a Washington, D.C.-based partner at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, in connection with a congressional subcommittee hearing later this month.

Sonsini investigated the methods used by HP to plumb the leaks and has long been the board's outside adviser, a role which continued after the news of the leak probe broke. The Journal reported last week that Sonsini led the board discussions that culminated last week in Dunn's decision to relinquish her role as chair at the end of the year.

It isn't clear if Sonsini and his firm will continue in that role. When asked about this, Wilson Sonsini spokeswoman Courtney Dorman provided the following written statement: "Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati will continue to have a relationship with HP."

Ryan Donovan, a spokesman for Hewlett-Packard, said Wednesday that he wasn't able to answer questions about the company's relationship with Wilson Sonsini by The Recorder's deadline.

Susan Beck, a senior writer at The American Lawyer, contributed to this story.

HP's Dunn Toasted At Gala Dinner (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, September 22, 2006

Chairman receives warm welcome, standing ovation when accepting award from advocacy group that touts business ethics.

SAN FRANCISCO--Hewlett-Packard's embattled chairman, Patricia Dunn, accepted a "hall of fame" leadership award at a gala dinner here on Wednesday night where she received a standing ovation from local executives.

The applause and paeans to a long and successful career seemed to gratify Dunn, who has been the subject of ongoing criticism and media scrutiny since reports in the last two weeks revealed that she had called for and perhaps helped to direct an intrusive probe into boardroom leaks.

Dunn thanked the Bay Area Council, a regional business lobbying and networking group, for "courage in standing by your decision (to grant the award) in such unexpected circumstances." The council's board of directors includes representatives of Wells Fargo, Pacific Gas & Electric, Bank of America, and the law firm Pillsbury Winthrop Shaw Pittman.

"All I will say about the maelstrom is that I look forward eagerly, in the near future, to the time when I can set the record straight and go back to leading my life as discreetly as possible," Dunn said during her after-dinner speech.

HP's investigative practices have become the subject of criminal probes by the U.S. Justice Department and the California attorney general. The U.S. House of Representatives has scheduled a hearing for Sept. 28 where Dunn is expected to testify. HP's investigators accessed the phone records of more than a dozen people, including three CNET News.com reporters, and apparently engaged in physical surveillance and sending bogus e-mail tips.

The bizarre juxtaposition of receiving a leadership award from an organization that stresses business ethics and good corporate governance was not lost on Dunn, who said she's aware of the "irony of being inducted into the Bay Area Business Hall of Fame."

But for the most part, other dinner speakers offered plaudits to Dunn--there was even a slideshow with her high school yearbook photo--with only passing references to her recent troubles.

David Zenoff, chairman of Larkin Street Youth Services, applauded "her strong sense of humanity, high standards and doing the right thing." (Dunn and her husband are major donors to the nonprofit organization, which seeks to help homeless youth in San Francisco.)

Dunn "epitomizes the special spirit and qualities that our country and the Bay Area have long cherished," Zenoff said.

"Without the leadership our Bay Area Hall of Fame honors, we would be in a heck of a mess," said Alexander Mehran, CEO of the Sunset Development Company and the council's chairman.

Mehran did joke, however, that news reports have painted Dunn as the "new J. Edgar Hoover of Silicon Valley."

Dunn capped her speech with a joke as well. She said "it wouldn't hurt if the pope continued to make controversial comments"--which might get her name off the front page.

According to an HP spokesman on Thursday, CEO Mark Hurd--who has now been linked to the investigation--did not attend the dinner. (News.com was unable to verify who was present at the head table on Wednesday night because reporters were required to stand in the back of the hotel ballroom in a roped-off area.) The Washington Post reported on its Web site late Wednesday night that Hurd approved of an elaborate sting operation aimed at deceiving News.com reporter Dawn Kawamoto.

A second unlikely juxtaposition was Dunn sharing a stage with Bill Keller, the executive editor of The New York Times, which had at least one of its reporters "pretexted" by HP investigators. But Keller, who spoke afterward, stuck to a prepared script about national security and journalism.

Correction:Due to incorrect information provided by the Bay Area Council, the original story misstated who was sitting at the head table at a dinner honoring Hewlett-Packard chairman Patricia Dunn. An HP representative said on Thursday that CEO Mark Hurd did not attend the dinner.

Senators Press Probe Of Gemstar Ex-CEO (LAT/BLOOM)

From Bloomberg News

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

Gemstar-TV Guide International Inc. has enlisted two U.S. senators to press the Justice Department to speed up its investigation into what role the company's former chief executive, Henry Yuen, played in a $248-million accounting fraud.

Democratic Sens. Charles E. Schumer of New York and Dianne Feinstein of California wrote Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales to inquire about the government's case against Yuen, who withdrew eight months ago from a plea agreement with federal prosecutors in Los Angeles after a federal judge said the deal was too lenient. The senators also forwarded a letter from Gemstar's general counsel warning that a legal deadline to charge Yuen was approaching.

The Yuen case "may raise some questions about the adequacy of tools available to prosecutors to fight corporate wrongdoing," Schumer wrote in his Sept. 13 letter to Gonzales.

Gemstar's stock price has fallen about 76% since the fraud was revealed in April 2002. The Hollywood-based company, controlled by Rupert Murdoch's News Corp., publishes TV Guide magazine and is the largest provider of software for cable television program guides.

While saying he didn't want to interfere, Schumer added, "It is important that Congress be kept well-informed about this and other similar cases so we can monitor the enforcement of the laws designed to protect average Americans from the type of conduct of which Mr. Yuen has been accused."

Feinstein, who wrote Gonzales on Aug. 23, said, "I do not believe it is appropriate for me to intervene in prosecutorial decisions," but the Gemstar general counsel's letter "does raise some serious allegations."

The letters ratchet up a campaign by Gemstar to have Yuen sent to prison for his role in the fraud. The company, which has paid more than $100 million in civil settlements and attorneys' fees in connection with the accounting missteps, has taken the unusual stance that it is a victim of Yuen's alleged crimes.

Yuen has already been sanctioned for securities fraud in a civil case brought by the Securities and Exchange Commission. In May, a federal judge ordered him to pay $22.3 million — one of the largest penalties against an individual in an accounting case — for misleading investors and Gemstar's auditors while inflating the company's revenue from 1999 to 2002. Yuen is appealing.

Gemstar General Counsel Stephen Kay, in his letter to the senators, asked them "to do whatever you can to ensure that this case receives the attention it deserves so that the decision about whether or not to prosecute Mr. Yuen will be well-reasoned rather than the product of inexplicable neglect."

He said that most, if not all, potential charges against Yuen would be barred by March 2007 because of the statute of limitations on such offenses.

Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for U.S. Atty. Debra Yang in Los Angeles, who has been supervising the Yuen case, would not make further comments, saying, "The matter is still under investigation." Yuen's attorney Brian Maas declined to comment on the Justice Department probe. He said Yuen was still fighting Gemstar to collect his severance, about $30 million.

Cablevision Gave Backdated Grant To Dead Official (WSJ)

By Peter Grant, James Bandler And Charles Forelle

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Cablevision Systems Corp. awarded options to a vice chairman after his 1999 death but backdated them, making it appear the grant was awarded when he still was alive, according to a company filing and people familiar with the matter.

The country's fifth-largest cable operator in terms of subscribers also improperly awarded a compensation consultant options but accounted for them as if he were an employee, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission filing, citing the results of a six-week investigation by an outside law firm.

The findings of the probe were released yesterday as the Bethpage, N.Y., company restated its financial results and said two of its directors had stepped down from posts on the board's audit and compensation committees as part of an escalating investigation into its improper granting of stock options.

The company also said it had received a grand jury subpoena in connection with an investigation into its options practices from the U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of New York.

The improprieties regarding the deceased executive -- Vice Chairman Marc Lustgarten, who died in 1999 -- and a compensation consultant are among the more unusual allegations of abuse that have surfaced in the scores of investigations that have been launched this year over improper stock-options practices. About 100 companies are under federal investigation for possibly backdating or otherwise manipulating stock-option grants to secretly boost their value.

Stock options give recipients the right to purchase shares at a fixed exercise price, usually the market price on the day the options were granted. Backdating typically involves pretending the grant was made on an earlier date, when prices were lower, thus increasing the potential value of options.

Cablevision backdated options from 1997 to 2002, according to its SEC filing. In practically all cases the share prices were lower, "sometimes substantially lower," on the option awards than they were on the actual date options were granted, the filing said. "The company's board of directors and senior management believe that the practices...are contrary to the high ethical standards they believe should apply," the filing stated.

Cablevision announced on Aug. 8 that it was launching the options probe, would restate earnings and would delay reporting its results for the second quarter. The company also has said it is under investigation by the SEC as well as the U.S. attorney's office.

Cablevision's filing didn't address how many options were tainted, who received the options or whether executives holding backdated options would be forced to surrender them or reimburse shareholders. The filing also didn't identify the outside law firm that led the investigation, though it said the firm wasn't involved in the stock-option-grant process. It also didn't say whether the firm had advised Cablevision in other matters. Regulators and law-enforcement officials have been skeptical of probes that aren't conducted by independent, outside firms.

Earlier company filings show that Cablevision awarded at least 2.9 million options from 1997 to 2002 to at least five executives, including Chief Executive James Dolan and to Mr. Lustgarten, who died in 1999 of pancreatic cancer at the age of 52.

In its filing, Cablevision said only that an "executive officer" had received backdated options after his death. People familiar with the matter identified Mr. Lustgarten as that executive. He received at least 400,000 options from 1997 to 1999, according to filings. Besides being Cablevision's chief negotiator, Mr. Lustgarten was a close confidant of James Dolan and of his father, the founder of the company, Charles Dolan.

It remains unclear which of the options grants to Mr. Lustgarten was backdated. In its 2000 proxy statement, the company said it had granted options to four other senior executives carrying a date of Aug. 2, 1999, which was four weeks before Mr. Lustgarten's death. The proxy didn't include Mr. Lustgarten's name among those executives.

It wasn't clear when the options granted to Mr. Lustgarten posthumously were dated and whether they were exercised. Mr. Lustgarten's estate was entitled to exercise all his stock options upon his death, according to his 1994 employment agreement. A Cablevision spokesman declined to provide details. The co-executor of Mr. Lustgarten's estate, Robert S. Lemle, who also is a former general counsel of Cablevision, couldn't be reached for comment.

Harvey Pitt, former chairman of the SEC, called the grant to the deceased executive "really bizarre" and "absolutely crazy."

John Coffee, a professor of law at Columbia University, noted that options are intended to create an incentive for executives to boost their company's stock price. "Trying to incentivize a corpse suggests they were not complying with the spirit of shareholder-approved stock-option plans," he said.

The filing didn't identify the compensation consultant that was paid in options, but stated that the award was cancelled in 2003. It isn't clear whether those options were backdated. The company did say it improperly accounted for the grant as if the consultant was an employee. The company also said the consultant "directly participated in the options dating process."

The consultant and officers of the company who participated in the improper options dating "have either retired or had their relationship with the company otherwise terminated" more than a year before the options investigation began, Cablevision said in its filing.

The two board members who relinquished committee posts were Richard Hochman, who stepped down from the compensation and audit committees, and Victor Oristano, who left the audit committee. The two directors, who served on those committees during the period in question, sent letters to Cablevision Wednesday stating that they were making the moves "in light of the public attention" over the options investigation and the "numerous shareholder lawsuits" that name them, among others, as defendants, the company's filing states. Both remain directors.

The company restated its earnings for 2003 through 2005 and the first quarter of 2006. The results all were adjusted to show the cumulative impact of the improper options dating and other noncash compensation items, from 1997 to March 2006, which decreased net income in that period by a total of $89.2 million.

At 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading yesterday, Cablevision was down two cents, or 0.1%, to $22.99.

Brian Foley, a White Plains, N.Y., compensation consultant, said that while the dollar amounts of the restatement were relatively small compared with restatements at other companies with stock-options timing issues, he was surprised by the depth and range of the problems unearthed by the investigation.

"Once you take the lid off and look inside, you realize that the short rubber boots aren't going to do and you need the hip-waders," Mr. Foley said. "How could you have this many things go awry?"

Cablevision yesterday also reported its second-quarter earnings, which had been delayed by the probe. The company earned $14.6 million, or 5 cents a share, compared with $213.8 million, or 74 cents a share, during the same period in 2005, when earnings were boosted by an asset swap between Cablevision and News Corp. that resulted in a $332 million cash gain for the cable operator. Second-quarter revenue was $1.42 billion, up from a restated $1.23 billion in 2005 on strong sales of digital video, phone and high-speed Internet connections.

SEC Tightens Hedge Fund Scrutiny (FT)

By Jeremy Grant

Financial Times, September 22, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission is tightening scrutiny of hedge funds by stepping up examination of the links between hedge funds and broker-dealers, particularly where they are owned by a hedge fund, a senior SEC official said.

The move is a sign that the SEC continues to find ways to regulate hedge funds after a US court federal court in June overturned an SEC rule forcing hedge fund advisers to register with the agency.

Walter Ricciardi, deputy director of enforcement, said: “I think some of the problems we’ve seen with hedge funds, one of the risk factors, red flags, is where they have their own broker-dealer.

“That creates quite a conflict in the sense that investors’ money is sitting there and a hedge fund decides to trade through their own broker-dealer and [the hedge fund] gets a fee for such trading.

“It gives them an incentive to run up trading fees. It may not be in the best interests of investors,” he told the Financial Times.

While the SEC’s office of compliance already conducts routine inspection of broker-dealers, Mr Ricciardi said the enforcement division – which is focused on alleged wrongdoing in the securities markets – was “stepping up [the focus] on hedge funds”.

The SEC took similar steps in the wake of the collapse of Long Term Capital Management in 1998.

The timing of the fresh scrutiny comes as Amaranth Advisors, a hedge-fund manager that lost over $6bn in the past month, has become the second largest hedge fund loss since LTCM.

Last week, SEC enforcement chief Linda Thomsen said the SEC had used similar tactics to unearth evidence about late trading and market timing in mutual funds by hedge funds.

“The regulated entities [broker-dealers] are our window into hedge funds,” she said.

“Everybody’s doing business with them. We’re going to find out what they’re doing through what we can see.”

Mr Ricciardi said that hedge funds’ fee structures might have “attracted some miscreants”. “Probably the vast majority of hedge fund managers are very honest traders but in any environment where there is that much money and that much incentive to cheat you’re going to have some bad apples,” he said.

The types of issues that the SEC had seen revolved around evidence that trades might not have occurred, even though they were being recorded as having taken place, he added.

“You have statements coming from the hedge fund to investors and there may not be sufficient controls over that process. We’ve seen some instances where it’s just a phoney statement and the investments shown on the statements do not exist.

“A good question to ask is whether there are third party administrators to check to see that the investments are real and properly priced,” Mr Ricciardi said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Fitzgerald Given Way Out Of Libby CIA Leak Case (MSNBC)

By Joel Seidman, Producer

MSNBC, September 22, 2006

Judge says he can dismiss case if classified secrets will be revealed

DOJ_NMG_0067412

WASHINGTON - The judge in the CIA leak case ruled Thursday that if Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald feels that admitting certain classified documents at the upcoming trial of I Lewis "Scooter" Libby can jeopardize national security, Fitzgerald can then move to dismiss the perjury charges against Libby.

Judge Reggie Walton cannot automatically allow classified materials to be admitted at trial. He first must go through a series of closed hearings under CIPA regulations. CIPA, the Classified Information Procedures Act, protects and restricts the discovery of classified information in a way that does not impair the defendant's right to a fair trial. It also allows the government to propose a redacted version of a classified document as a substitution for the original, having deleted only non-relevant classified information.

In his ruling this morning, the Judge Walton, has given a technical legal victory to Libby's attorneys concerning the admissibility of classified materials they want to present at trial for their defense.

Three-part test

The issue concerns determining a standard for which the judge will review these secret documents, in a series of closed hearings later this month, to determine the use, relevance, or admissibility of classified information.

Fitzgerald argues that because of the sensitive national security value of the classified materials, a special three part test must apply before determining if a document can be admitted at trial.

That test, according to Fitzgerald, must include: (1) that the document is relevant; (2) that the document is "helpful to the defense," and (3) that the defendant's interest in disclosure of the document outweighs the government's need to protect the classified information.

Victory for Libby

Walton disagreed with Fitzgerald and favored Libby's attorney's argument that in reviewing the classified material to be presented at the hearing, he must simply apply the Federal Rules of Evidence.

Walton also suggested that, "if the government is still not satisfied that the classified information is adequately protected at the conclusion of these hearings, the government has the power to preclude entirely the introduction at trial of the classified information. While invocation of this option may require dismissal of this case."

Walton argues against adopting the balancing test proposed by the government, because it, "could infringe on the defendant's constitutional right to put on a defense by preventing him from introducing relevant and otherwise admissible evidence at his trial because the government's interest in nondisclosure was considered of greater significance."

Crush of national security work

While is it not publicly known which classified materials are at issue, Libby's attorneys have requested and have been given in recent months two batches of summaries and redacted versions of classified morning intelligence briefings which Libby attended with Vice President Cheney in 2003.

Libby's attorneys wish to present at trial a picture of their client as being overwhelmed by the crush of critical national security work at the White House — a client who may have misremembered, what they wish to portray as insignificant, the identity of former ambassador Joseph Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame who was a CIA employee at the time. Using certain classified documents at trial his lawyers could underscore that Libby was involved with important work at the time of the Plame leak.

Crux of the case

Fitzgerald's case rests on the premise that Libby lied to the FBI and to a grand jury about his own conversations with reporters confirming that Plame worked for the CIA and was somehow responsible for her husband's fact finding trips to Africa in search of proof about Iraq's alleged quest for fissile materials. Wilson wrote in a New York Times op-ed, in July 2003, that that quest did not exist, and that the administration was "twisting" the facts about Iraq's determination to procure Niger's yellowcake.

Fitzgerald has said in court filings that the Plame leak from Libby was orchestrated specifically to undermine the credibility of Wilson's public pronouncements — which Fitzgerald says consumed the vice president's office for several weeks in the summer of 2002.

Libby was charged in October, 2005 with lying to the FBI and a federal grand jury about how he learned the name of CIA officer Valerie Plame and when he subsequently told three reporters about her. He faces five counts of perjury, making false statements and obstruction of justice. Libby's trial is scheduled to begin Jan. 17, 2007.

Judge Rules For Cheney Aide (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

A federal judge ruled in favor of Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff in a fight over release of classified information in the Valerie Wilson case. The judge, Reggie B. Walton of Federal District Court, decided that he would not impose strict standards sought by prosecutors who wanted to limit the classified information used in the trial of the aide, I. Lewis Libby Jr.

DOJ_NMG_0067413

Judge Walton said that once he rules on which evidence is relevant government lawyers could propose parts to be blacked out or summarized. Mr. Libby is accused of lying to the authorities about discussions he had with reporters about Ms. Wilson's job at the Central Intelligence Agency.

Limits Used In Terror Cases Are Imposed On A Mob Figure (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

Alberto R. Gonzales, the United States attorney general, has imposed a set of highly restrictive rules generally reserved for terror suspects on an imprisoned mob figure who is under investigation for plotting to kill a federal judge, a prosecutor and three Mafia turncoats, prosecutors disclosed yesterday.

The move was the latest development in an increasingly bizarre case. The mob figure in the case, Vincent Basciano, has contended that a list he wrote naming the judge and the others was not part of a murder plot, as prosecutors have asserted, but an effort to use a mystical religion to improve his chances at his forthcoming trial, at which he could face the death penalty.

The disclosure that Mr. Gonzales had imposed the measures was made at a hearing in United States District Court in Brooklyn. The judge in the case, Nicholas G. Garaufis, who prosecutors have said was one of Mr. Basciano's targets, also unsealed a transcript from an Aug. 28 hearing at which the investigation and the list were discussed.

In July, Mr. Basciano provided the list to a fellow inmate at the Metropolitan Correctional Center in Manhattan who, unknown to Mr. Basciano, was cooperating with the authorities. Prosecutors have said Mr. Basciano indicated to the inmate that he wanted the people on the list killed.

The transcript of the Aug. 28 hearing provided additional details about what Mr. Basciano, known as Vinny Gorgeous, has said was his effort to use Santeria, a Caribbean religion, to influence the outcome of the trial.

One of Mr. Basciano's lawyers, James Kousouros, said at the August hearing that the inmate approached Mr. Basciano and told him that his mother was a Santeria "priestess."

The inmate "told Mr. Basciano to make a list of everybody involved, put it in your right shoe, stamp five times every day during the trial and it will help," Mr. Kousouros said. He did not explain why Mr. Basciano instead gave the list to the inmate.

The restrictive rules, known as special administrative measures, severely limit Mr. Basciano's phone and mail privileges, visits and communications with people other than his lawyers.

The measures, which were developed in 1996, have been carried out about 40 times, all but about 15 times in terrorism cases, according to Jaclyn Lesch, a Justice Department spokeswoman.

In one of the most high-profile cases, they were imposed on Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman, a Muslim cleric serving a life sentence for planning to bomb New York City landmarks. The sheik's lawyer, Lynne F. Stewart, was convicted last year of aiding terrorism by smuggling messages from the sheik to his followers, and of lying when she pledged to abide by the special rules.

Only the attorney general can impose the rules.

At the hearing yesterday, John Buretta, an assistant United States attorney, suggested that the measures were meant to prevent Mr. Basciano from communicating what prosecutors believe are his ill intentions.

Mr. Kousouros asked the judge to hold a hearing with testimony from the other inmate, who has not been identified. He also indicated that he might seek to have the judge recuse himself.

Judge Garaufis said that before he could determine whether to hold a hearing, Mr. Basciano's lawyers must consult with their client and decide whether they will seek to have him removed from the case.

Mr. Basciano was convicted earlier this year of racketeering conspiracy, but the jury deadlocked on a murder charge.

Defense: Reputed Mobster Used Santeria Ritual (NEWSDAY)

By ANTHONY M. DESTEFANO, NEWSDAY STAFF WRITER

Newsday, September 22, 2006

Well, at least he didn't try sticking pins in a voodoo doll.

Eager to seek an edge in his recent racketeering trial, reputed Bonanno crime family member Vincent Basciano was told by a fellow jail inmate to place a list with names of the prosecutor, trial judge and witnesses in his shoe and stomp his foot five times to get good luck.

The resulting list that Basciano drew up to carry out the ritual was simply part of a Santeria-related method and not a hit list as prosecutors have suspected, his defense attorneys said Thursday.

Basciano, at one time the acting street boss of the Bonanno crime family, is under investigation for allegedly creating the list and in "sum and substance" giving it to his fellow inmate to seek the murder of the listed persons, Brooklyn federal prosecutors have stated in court papers.

DOJ_NMG_0067414

Named on the list were assistant U.S. attorney Greg Andres, who prosecuted Basciano earlier this year; federal judge Nicholas Garaufis; disgraced attorney Tom Lee; and mob turncoats Dominick Cicale and James Tartaglione, court papers stated.

But while prosecutors put a sinister spin on the list and Basciano's attempt to seek magical intervention, his lawyers say that wasn't the case at all.

During a court hearing Thursday and in interviews, Basciano's attorneys related how their client was seeking Santeria help and not seeking murders.

Santeria is an amalgamation of African religion and Roman Catholicism that uses magic. Adherents seek out a babalawo, also known as a godfather, and a santera, or godmother, for help when in desperate straits.

"He is not denying he came up with the list, but it's not like he called up Lucca Brazzi," defense attorney Ephraim Savitt told Newsday, referring to the fictional hit man in the film "The Godfather."

Savitt, who stated the ritual was Santeria-like, said that the idea of preparing the list came from a fellow inmate of Basciano's at the federal detention center in Manhattan. The unidentified inmate was originally from the Caribbean and was facing drug charges, said Savitt. Basciano put stock in the idea and gave him the list, said the attorney.

The Santeria explanation first came up in a sealed courtroom hearing last month when the investigation of Basciano first surfaced. In a transcript of the hearing unsealed Thursday by Garaufis, it was defense attorney James Kousouros who first explained how Basciano was approached for the list by the inmate.

"This inmate, the person we believe to be this inmate, is somebody who approached our client and told him that this mother is some priestess for [Santeria]," said Kousouros and "told Mr. Basciano to make a list of everybody involved, put it in your right shoe, stamp five times every day during the trial and it will help."

Kousouros said there were other witnesses who could corroborate Basciano's story. Savitt told Newsday that there was even a second list that had names of defense attorneys on it.

Thursday prosecutors Thomas Buretta and Winston Chan disclosed in court that the probe of Basciano and the list was continuing. Buretta said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales had approved holding the defendant under special administrative measures, very strict detention standards usually reserved for terrorists.

Savitt said Basciano is allowed visits from his wife, as well as a woman friend with whom he had another child, a complicated domestic situation that had previously been disclosed in court papers.

Attorneys Deny Allegations Client Plotted To Kill Judge (LAW)

By Tom Perrotta, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, September 22, 2006

Attorneys for a former Mafia boss who might face the death penalty in an upcoming trial expressed dismay Wednesday at the unsealing of court documents that reveal their client, Vincent Basciano, is under investigation for a potential plot to kill a federal judge.

The attorneys, James Kousouros and Ephraim Savitt, said they would ask for an evidentiary hearing into the alleged plot against Eastern District Judge Nicholas G. Garaufis, which Kousouros said did not exist. Kousouros said it was "very unfortunate" that he was not notified by federal prosecutors that the document was going to be made public late Tuesday evening.

"I'm not saying we were entitled to notice," Kousouros said. "We have to now consider motions for recusal. This now creates a mess."

He said the unsealed papers could taint the jury pool, and might contribute to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' decision on whether the government will seek the death penalty.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Winston Chan said he would not comment, as the investigation into the plot is still active.

Judge Garaufis scheduled a hearing for noon Thursday to discuss the matter.

In May, Judge Garaufis presided over Basciano's conviction on racketeering charges; the jury did not reach a verdict on murder charges. Basciano may face the death penalty in an upcoming trial, also before Garaufis, for allegedly conspiring to kill a federal prosecutor.

On Tuesday, federal prosecutors asked the judge to unseal a letter they submitted to the court and defense counsel on Aug. 28. The letter detailed another possible murder plot, this time against Garaufis, and included several pages of correspondence written by Basciano.

One document was a list of names that prosecutors said Basciano gave to an unnamed inmate who was cooperating with the government, indicating, "in sum and substance," that he wanted the individuals on the list to be murdered. Garaufis was second on the list, after Assistant U.S. Attorney Greg Andres, the prosecutor at the center of the previous plot in which Basciano is accused.

DOJ_NMG_0067415

Basciano's attorneys contend that their client passed the list to an inmate because he thought the inmate had a connection to Santeria, a Caribbean religion. A priest or priestess of the religion, Basciano believed, could bless Basciano and make people tell the truth about him.

"It was utter foolishness," Kousouros said. "[Prosecutors] know he believes in this hocus-pocus nonsense."

The investigation into a possible threat against Garaufis was the subject of a closed hearing on Aug. 28. Basciano's attorneys said Wednesday that they were surprised that the investigation was made public while it was still pending.

"I don't understand what the rush was to go ahead and reveal something like this," Savitt said. "I don't think it helps to disclose information that you are still investigating. I just can't understand why it's being done."

However, Savitt said he did not necessarily think that the incident required Garaufis to recuse himself from the case, especially if prosecutors conclude that the list was not threatening.

"I believe that if the investigation reveals what really happened here, there's no question that the judge can continue on this case," Savitt said.

The U.S. Marshals Service for the Eastern District would not say whether Garaufis had been given additional security. Chief Deputy Timothy E. Hogan said the office had been working on the case for a number of months, in concert with the Federal Bureau of Investigations.

"Based on the information we have, we take what precautions we feel necessary," Hogan said.

FBI Raid Targets County Job Files (CHIT)

By Mickey Ciokajlo, Robert Becker And Jeff Coen

Chicago Tribune, September 22, 2006

FBI agents fanned out across Cook County on Thursday with grand jury subpoenas and a search warrant, probing deep into the role clout plays in county hiring.

The investigation, quietly under way since late last year, burst dramatically into public view Thursday morning. The flurry of activity indicated that federal prosecutors are now taking a hard look at clout and hiring in Cook County, even as they are investigating state hiring by the Blagojevich administration and city hiring by the Daley administration.

More than a dozen agents descended on the County Building around 9 a.m. Thursday to search the county's human resources bureau, where hiring and personnel records are kept. Agents remained all day in the 8th floor office at 118 N. Clark St.

In addition to the search warrant, agents delivered subpoenas for documents related to hiring at departments throughout the county. Subpoenas went to county health facilities, the Highway Department and the Cook County Forest Preserve District.

In a statement, Cook County Board President Bobbie Steele said the county would cooperate fully in responding to subpoenas delivered to various departments. Steele also said the human resources bureau was cooperating with the execution of the search warrant.

"I am committed to doing what is necessary to root out any problems," Steele's statement said. Steele assumed the office Aug. 1, replacing John Stroger, who had suffered a stroke.

The subpoenas seek documents related to "non-exempt" jobs, Steele said. Under a court order known as the Shakman decree, those positions are supposed to be filled on the basis of qualifications, not political influence.

Mayor Richard Daley's patronage chief, Robert Sorich, and three other former city officials were convicted of committing fraud and other crimes to circumvent the decades-old Shakman decree, which first applied to the City of Chicago and later to Cook County.

The federal investigation into the city's hiring is still under way.

Prosecutors are also engaged in a broad probe of hiring under Gov. Rod Blagojevich, who has acknowledged being interviewed by federal authorities.

In June, U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald sent a letter to Illinois Atty. Gen. Lisa Madigan saying his office has developed a number of credible witnesses in its investigation of allegations of "endemic hiring fraud" in multiple state agencies.

Though Thursday was the first public indication that the federal government is investigating hiring practices in Cook County, sources familiar with the investigation said the probe got under way in late 2005.

The sources said the search warrant was issued specifically for the human resources bureau because that is an area where records are concentrated.

The affidavit outlining the reason for seeking the search warrant is under seal.

Cheryl Cato, spokeswoman for the county's health bureau, said agents visited a number of its facilities early Thursday, including Stroger, Provident, Oak Forest and Cermak Hospitals.

DOJ_NMG_0067416

"I don't know if they've taken anything," Cato said.

The flurry of activity on Thursday came about two weeks after Steele placed Gerald Nichols, who had been Stroger's patronage chief, on paid suspension.

Steele's actions followed a Chicago Sun-Times article in which a county highway supervisor claimed Nichols pressured him to hire a political ally of Stroger's.

The government's investigation quickly became an issue in the Nov. 7 election for County Board president.

Republican candidate Tony Peraica, a county commissioner, held an impromptu news conference outside the human resources office while agents searched inside. Peraica's Democratic opponent, Chicago Ald. Todd Stroger (8th), is John Stroger's son.

"Clearly this is just the tip of the iceberg," Peraica said. "There's a criminal conspiracy here that has been going on for quite some time to falsify job applications, to alter test scores, to hire unqualified individuals, principally from the 8th Ward."

Todd Stroger suggested the federal activity was linked to a motion filed by Michael Shakman, the lawyer whose lawsuit led to the Shakman decree. Shakman returned to federal court in recent weeks to request the appointment of a federal monitor to oversee county hiring.

Stroger said he was not surprised by the investigation, and he added, "I don't think it's a surprise to many people. And I don't know what they are looking for or what they will find."

Stroger sought to distance himself from the federal probe.

"That's my father's administration," said Stroger, who was speaking at a news conference on an unrelated matter when the news broke of the federal search. "At this point, I am a city councilman and that is the job I've been doing."

County Commissioner Forrest Claypool, who lost to John Stroger in the March Democratic primary, said he was not surprised that the federal government is now probing hiring at the county.

"County government has been a patronage dumping ground for years, a place where unqualified politically connected people have been dumped by the thousands," Claypool said. "It wouldn't surprise me if lines were crossed and laws were broken in the hiring practices in Cook County.

"It's sad that reform at the county government is likely to come through law enforcement rather than through the political process," Claypool added. "We've known for years about these problems and very little has been done about it."

Shakman, too, wasn't surprised by the federal government actions, alleging the county has been engaged in violating his civil court order much as the city of Chicago was.

At a court hearing last week, a federal judge allowed the county time to respond in writing to Shakman's recent motion for a monitor to oversee county hiring, like with the city.

"The county seemed to be engaged in the same kind of systematic violation of court orders that the city engaged in, and it seemed that nobody at the county was prepared to supervise hiring to make sure it was nonpolitical," Shakman said.

Tribune staff reporters Brendan McCarthy, Todd Lighty, Laurie Cohen, Dan Mihalopoulos and Gary Washburn contributed to this report.

FBI Raids Cook County Office (CHIST)

By ABDON M. PALLASCH, NATASHA KORECKI, STEVE PATTERSON AND ERIC HERMAN, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, September 22, 2006

FBI agents descended on Cook County government offices this morning, serving a search warrant in an investigation that apparently centers on county hiring practices.

FBI agents could be seen carrying boxes of documents out of the Cook County Human Resources Department at 118 N. Clark St., as county human resources director Mark Kilgallon and county general counsel Laura Lechowicz Felicione looked on.

“We are fully cooperating” with the investigation, Felicione said.

While the seizure of documents proceeded downtown, federal agents served the search warrant at other county offices, too — including Provident Hospital, Cermak Hospital and the forest preserve district.

The federal agents hit the county offices starting at 9:15 a.m.

FBI spokesman Ross Rice said the search warrant is tied to a criminal affidavit that is under seal. “We’re looking for possible evidence of a crime,” Rice said. No arrests have been made and no charges filed, Rice said.

The search warrant comes one month after the Chicago Sun-Times reported that county officials said they routinely were told to hire politically connected candidates for county jobs over candidates who scored higher on civil service exams. A Cook County Highway Department supervisor, Eric Petraitis, said he felt coerced to change test scores to hire candidates connected to former Cook County Board President John Stroger.

DOJ_NMG_0067417

Following that report, County Board President Bobbie Steele ordered the suspension, with pay, of Stroger's patronage chief, Gerald Nichols, and four lower-level employees responsible for administering employment tests.

The Sun-Times also reported in late August that nearly 1,300 people were added to the Cook County payroll in the months after Stroger suffered a stroke. Stroger's campaign manager and his chief of staff's daughter were among those added to the payroll — even amid a hiring freeze — and more than a dozen others with ties to powerful political machines were also hired.

In response to the reports, attorney Michael Shakman went to federal court seeking to have a federal monitor appointed to oversee county hiring.

Steele didn't show up to a 12:30 p.m. news conference on the FBI activity, as she said she would. But her spokeswoman read a two-sentence statement saying Steele had been advised not to talk about the case, but her office is "fully cooperating."

Ald. Todd Stroger, who is running to succeed his father John and replace Steele, said the raid was not a surprise and that he believes it was connected to a motion filed by Shakman asking that a federal monitor oversee county hiring.

''I believe that everyone expected the federal government would come in the county building and Mr. Shakman has been saying there's problems and I believe he's been over to federal court,'' Todd Stroger, the Democratic candidate for County Board president, told reporters. ''And I don't know what they are looking for or what they will find,'' he said.

He also called the county's hiring system antiquated and said it needs to be revamped.

Todd Stroger's Republican opponent, Anthony Peraica, said the raid stems from what he called a ''criminal conspiracy to deny the rights of well-qualified persons and applicants jobs that were instead given to the politically connected.''

''Test scores were rigged, applications were falsified in order to allow hiring of clearly unqualified individuals, some with criminal histories,'' Peraica said.

FBI Raids Cook County HR Office (WMAQ-TV)

WMAQ-TV, September 22, 2006

CHICAGO -- The FBI conducted a search inside an office of the Cook County Building Thursday morning, NBC5 reported.

Federal investigators executed a search warrant at the offices of the county Bureau of Human Resources at 118 N. Clark St.

Agents executed a search warrant at 9 a.m. at Cook County's Bureau of Human Resources, FBI spokeswoman Cynthia Yates said. The search was part of an ongoing investigation, but Yates declined to say what the investigation was about.

NBC5's Phil Rogers reported that agents may have accessed the office's computer servers, looking for information about hiring practices and possibly the testing of Cook County employees.

Allegations have arisen that tests were rigged or changed to favor political cronies in the John H. Stroger administration, Rogers reported.

Chicago Mayor Richard M. Daley's patronage chief, Robert Sorich, along with four other former city officials are awaiting sentencing for a scheme to use fraud to cover up violations of a ban on patronage hiring.

Daley has not been accused of any wrongdoing.

Cook County's Bureau of Human Resources coordinates all human resource activities for the departments under the jurisdiction of the Cook County Board, including the Cook County Forest Preserve District.

Chicago Alderman Todd Stroger, who is running to replace his father, John Stroger, as Cook County board president, said the raid was not a surprise and that he believes it was connected to a motion filed by attorney Michael Shakman asking that a federal monitor oversee county hiring.

"I believe that everyone expected the federal government would come in the county building and Mr. Shakman has been saying there's problems and I believe he's been over to federal court," Stroger, the Democratic candidate for board president, told reporters.

"And I don't know what they are looking for or what they will find," he said.

He also called the county's hiring system antiquated and said it needs to be revamped.

Stroger's Republican opponent, Anthony Peraica, said the raid stems from what he called a "criminal conspiracy to deny the rights of well-qualified persons and applicants jobs that were instead given to the politically connected."

"Test scores were rigged, applications were falsified in order to allow hiring of clearly unqualified individuals, some with criminal histories," Peraica said.

FBI Agents Raid Cook County Office (WP/AP)

The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

CHICAGO -- FBI agents Thursday raided the offices where the Cook County government keeps its hiring records.

FBI spokeswoman Cynthia Yates would not say what the investigation was about.

However, Mayor Richard M. Daley's patronage chief and four other former city officials are awaiting sentencing for a scheme to subvert a ban on patronage hiring, or doling out jobs according to applicants' political connections. Daley has not been accused of any wrongdoing.

Chinta Strausberg, a spokeswoman for acting Cook County Board President Bobbie Steele, said only: "We are fully cooperating with the investigation."

Chicago Alderman Todd Stroger, who is running to replace his father, John Stroger, as Cook County Board president, said he believes the raid was connected to an activist's request that a federal monitor oversee county hiring to prevent abuses.

Stroger's Republican opponent, Anthony Peraica, said the raid stemmed from a "criminal conspiracy to deny the rights of well-qualified persons and applicants jobs that were instead given to the politically connected."

"Test scores were rigged, applications were falsified in order to allow hiring of clearly unqualified individuals, some with criminal histories," Peraica said.

Ex-N.O. Prosecutor Gets Life In Federal Civil Rights Rape Case (AP)

AP, September 22, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, La. -- A former deputy city attorney was sentenced Thursday to life in prison for using his position to rape two women in his office.

U.S. District Judge Lance Africk sentenced Henry A. Dillon on Thursday, more than four months after a jury found him guilty of depriving the women of their civil rights under color of law, by aggravated sexual abuse.

"He committed unspeakable acts of violence against innocent women while disguising himself as a public servant," U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said in a news release.

Dillon, 49, raped each woman after telling her in Municipal Court that he needed her to come to his office to complete some court business, according to the indictment.

Dillon admitted having sex with both women, but said it was consensual. That testimony "calls into question your grip on reality," Africk told him Thursday.

His arrest and firing on Dec. 1, 2004 marked the second time Dillon had been accused of rape.

In 1998, Dillon was arrested on the same charge and accused of raping a woman at his home.

Nearly a year after he was suspended from his job without pay, the state Attorney General's Office said it had too little evidence to prosecute, allowing Dillon to return to work at the City Attorney's office.

Dillon was jailed in December, when a magistrate ruled that he was a danger to the community.

He was indicted after relatives of one woman approached the Metropolitan Crime Commission of Greater New Orleans, a nonprofit police watchdog. That woman said Dillon used a wrestling move to pin her down _ and another woman had made a similar claim in 1998, the crime commission said.

Former Orange Beach Mayor's Wife Pleads To Obstruction Count (AP)

AP, September 22, 2006

MOBILE, Ala. (AP) — Crystal McDonald Russo, wife of former Orange Beach Mayor Steve Russo, pleaded guilty in federal court Thursday to one felony obstruction of justice charge as part of a plea agreement with prosecutors.

Prosecutors agreed to dismiss two other counts against her and recommend a sentence that will likely only get Crystal Russo probation, the Press-Register reported on its Web site Thursday.

Russo, 25, was facing trial next month for allegedly trying to help her 44-year-old husband hide $96,000 that was sought for forfeiture by prosecutors in their probe of the former mayor. On Sept. 1, Steve Russo, Orange Beach City Attorney Larry Sutley and developer Ken Wall were convicted by a federal court jury in Mobile of fraud and related charges in a real estate scheme in the Gulf Coast resort.

"She is glad that she's now seeing some closure in this and she thinks she's doing the right thing," Gordon Armstrong III, Crystal Russo's lawyer, said outside the courthouse.

U.S. District Judge Kristi DuBose scheduled Crystal Russo to be sentenced on Dec. 28.

Another Gamble For Online Betting (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Legal Wrangling in the U.S. Is Clouding the Prospects For the Industry World-Wide

DOJ_NMG_0067419

Two recent arrests of online-gambling executives in the U.S. are drawing attention to a spirited but so far unsuccessful effort in Washington to clarify the legal status of Internet gambling and resolve the political and legal issues of regulating it.

Earlier this month, Peter Dicks, at the time nonexecutive chairman of Sportingbet PLC, Britain's largest publicly traded Internet-gambling company, was arrested in New York on a Louisiana warrant. That followed the July arrest of David Carruthers, then-chief executive of BetOnSports PLC on federal charges. The two cases aren't directly related but have combined to spook executives of foreign Internet-gambling companies, which are wary of entering the U.S.

The developments underscore a fundamental problem for the Internet-gambling industry: U.S. lawmakers haven't agreed on whether the practice is legal. This summer the House passed legislation that would outlaw most forms of Internet gambling, including poker and casino-style games. But similar legislation is in limbo in the Senate, despite recent efforts by Majority Leader Bill Frist to attach the measure onto a must-pass defense-authorization bill this year.

Taming Internet gambling is difficult, however, given uncertainty about which rules apply to it. The Bush administration maintains that all interstate Internet gambling is illegal, but acknowledges that enforcement is sporadic. To shut down Internet sites, prosecutors rely mostly on the 45-year-old federal Wire Act, which prohibits sports betting across state lines, but was written with telephone, not Internet, lines in mind.

But not all judges agree that Internet gambling is already illegal, and Internet-gambling companies argue the Wire Act doesn't apply to the Internet.

"It's never really been clear up to and including now, how the 1961 Wire Act applies to the Internet," says Keith Whyte, executive director of the National Council on Problem Gambling, an advocacy group that helps gambling addicts.

"There's a lot of gray area to make some arguments. There's been an utter failure of Congress to address this issue. They're relying on a pretty antiquated law to stretch over this," Mr. Whyte says.

Pressure on Congress to resolve the issue is likely to increase. Eight states have prohibited Internet gambling -- a pattern that has led to calls for a unified national approach.

Lawmakers' failure to clarify the legal issues of Internet gambling has frustrated many in the industry. According to Christiansen Capital Advisors, a New Gloucester, Maine, research firm, online gambling is a $12 billion-a-year industry globally, and growing. For years, some online-gambling companies have sought U.S. legislation to regulate the industry to weed out dodgy companies and promote investor confidence.

More broadly, Congress's inability to act reflects lawmakers' ambivalence about the Internet and how to strike a balance between letting it operate without much interference and requiring it to adhere to socially desirable behavior.

Republican Rep. Bob Goodlatte, who represents a rural Virginia district, personifies the sometimes-conflicting impulses. In his seven terms in Congress, Mr. Goodlatte has built a conservative voting record faithful to free-market, small-government principles. In June he voted against a proposal, which failed, that would have prevented Internet providers from moving some traffic faster than other -- in part, he said, because he was worried that "government involvement often stifles innovation in the marketplace."

A few weeks later, however, he voted for a bill to outlaw most Internet gambling in the U.S. "There are those of us who are simply opposed to gambling because of societal problems that exist," he says, adding that with the Internet, "every home in Virginia now has a wide array of casino gambling to choose from."

Mr. Goodlatte, a 53-year-old father of two, has spent years trying to impose some order on the Internet -- such as preventing access to child pornography and protecting consumers' ability to encrypt emails. "We don't want it to become the Wild, Wild West," he says.

Some forms of gambling have largely avoided the U.S. government's focus. For example, the government has done nothing to stop Youbet.com, a publicly traded Internet company in Woodland Hills, Calif., that offers betting on horse racing. YouBet says it complies with state and federal gambling regulations, arguing that changes made in 2000 to the federal Interstate Horse Racing Act allow state-licensed interstate "interactive" parimutuel betting. Yet the company's financial statements note that the Justice Department says Internet gambling is prohibited in the U.S.

Justice Department officials say they launched a civil probe into Internet-gambling operations, including horse betting, last year, but say they have limited resources.

Even when the U.S. government tries to set rules for the Internet-gambling business, the global nature of the Internet gets in the way. In the United Kingdom, online gambling will be regulated and -- more importantly -- taxed, beginning in 2007. It is as easy for a would-be bettor to reach a gambling Web site in Athens, Greece, as one in Athens, Ga.

Indeed, the U.S. government's assertion that interstate Internet gambling is illegal has provoked an international trade fight. In March 2004, the World Trade Organization ruled the U.S. had violated global trade pacts by banning offshore firms from offering U.S. citizens some forms of Internet gambling -- notably sports betting -- while providing exceptions for U.S. companies that offer horse betting and state-run Internet lotteries. The U.S. says it has the right to ban imports that may be found morally objectionable.

DOJ_NMG_0067420

Even if Congress agrees on tough legislation, enforcement would be difficult. The legislation pending in Congress is designed to make it more difficult for Americans to electronically transfer money to fund their online gambling. But banks already have policies that restrict customers from using credit cards at Internet-gambling sites. Online-gambling companies have been able to get around that by miscoding transactions or encouraging customers to use other types of electronic money transfers.

Write to Amy Schatz at Amy.Schatz@wsj.com1

Feds Charge WTC Painter In $1 Million Ripoff From Sept. 11 Fund (NEWSDAY)

By Jennifer Maloney, Newsday Staff Writer

Newsday, September 22, 2006

A New Jersey painter was arrested Thursday on charges he bilked the U.S. Justice Department's Sept. 11 compensation fund of more than $1 million -- the biggest scam yet.

Mario Mastellone, 39, of East Windsor was accused in an indictment in U.S. District Court in Manhattan of accepting $1.07 million from the September 11 Victim Compensation Fund of 2001 by falsely claiming that had been disabled that day and had not worked since.

His lawyer, Peter Bark of Central Islip, said his client had suffered disabling back injuries and has not worked since then, except for a recent job as an extra on a film set, which the Justice Department had approved.

"He's been victimized twice -- once by him being in the World Trade Center on 9/11 and now by the U.S. Attorney's office," Bark said.

Prosecutors said Mastellone lied to a Department of Justice agent investigating his case and lied to a hearing officer evaluating his claim for compensation. According to the indictment, he also fraudulently sought compensation from the New York State Workers' Compensation Board and the Painting Industry Insurance Fund.

If convicted of fraud charges, Mastellone could face up to 40 years in prison.

Bark said Mastellone's Sept. 11 fund claim was legitimate.

"The government doctors examined him and they concurred with his doctors that he's disabled," Bark said. "He cannot do any kind of labor. Unfortunately, he's learning disabled so he can't do a desk job. All he can do is physical labor, and that he can't do."

Prosecutors Say Map-stealing Collector Motivated By Resentment (AP)

AP, September 22, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- A renowned dealer who admitted stealing nearly 100 rare antique maps acted out of resentment toward the prestigious libraries and to pay for his expensive tastes and mounting debts, prosecutors said Thursday.

Authorities filed court papers that offered the first official explanation of why E. Forbes Smiley III stole the maps over eight years from the New York and Boston public libraries, the Newberry Library in Chicago, the Harvard and Yale university libraries and the British Library in London.

"He explained that his initial thefts were acting out of resentment toward persons at certain institutions that he believed had wronged him, individuals who he believed had slighted him or used certain of his research without accreditation," prosecutors wrote. "Other thefts he explained resulted from some misguided sense of entitlement to the maps because he had, through collectors, provided better versions of the same map to the institution. He also acknowledged that stealing maps was profitable and he had mounting debts."

An FBI review of Smiley's computer records showed he had expensive tastes and mounting debts, prosecutors said.

Smiley, a 50-year-old resident of Martha's Vineyard, faces restitution and up to six years in prison under federal guidelines when he is sentenced Sept. 27. His attorney has asked for a sentence of up to three years, citing Smiley's cooperation with the investigation, charity work and unspecified "mental and emotional conditions which contributed" to the thefts.

Prosecutors did not specify a sentence, but recommended he be given credit for his cooperation with the investigation that led to the recovery of most of the maps.

They called Smiley's conduct "reprehensible," saying his victims included the libraries and dealers who suffered severe harm to their finances and reputations.

The British Library last week urged the court to impose a stiff sentence, saying Smiley systematically looted treasures that told the story of the new world and had survived catastrophic events over the centuries. Some of the maps have not been recovered, while others were damaged, the library noted.

The British Library has raised suspicions that Smiley stole additional maps, a charge he has denied.

Authorities defended their investigation, saying it involved hundreds of phone calls with curators, map historians and legal representatives of the institutions and checking Smiley's computer, phone and bank records. They said inaccurate cataloguing by some libraries, wide public access to materials and other issues made it difficult to prove Smiley stole a particular map.

"Based on this review, the FBI has not identified other information suggesting that Smiley has a hidden cache of maps or is protecting some unidentified purchaser of his maps," prosecutors wrote.

Smiley was arrested after a Yale librarian found a razor blade on the floor. The arrest prompted Yale and other top map libraries to review their security procedures.

Credit Card Companies Pledge Help In Fighting Child Pornography (NYT)

By John Files

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 21 — Executives from credit card companies, including Visa, MasterCard and American Express, told a Congressional panel Thursday that they were determined to eliminate the use of their services in the Internet child pornography business.

But they also said it was difficult to keep pace with those who seek to exploit children on the Web and called for broad collaboration among those in the financial services industry and law enforcement authorities around the world.

“Child pornography is a global problem in need of a coordinated response,” said Mark MacCarthy, a senior vice president for public policy for Visa U.S.A.

Mr. MacCarthy said that by working together with other financial services companies, the industry could “enhance our efforts to identify Web sites and pinpoint merchants that are trafficking in this illicit activity, cut them off from use of our network and provide assistance to law enforcement to put them in jail and shut them down for good.”

“The way forward lies in collective action,” he said.

Mr. MacCarthy and other executives testified at a hearing of the oversight and investigations subcommittee of the House Energy and Commerce Committee. The hearing was the sixth this year convened by the subcommittee to examine the growth of child pornography online.

Others who spoke to the committee included Ernie Allen, the president of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, and Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney for New Jersey, who led an investigation that in 2004 dismantled an Internet child pornography service stretching from Eastern Europe to Mount Laurel, N.J.

Mr. Allen described tactics adopted in recent months to combat child pornography Web sites, including the creation of the Financial Coalition Against Child Pornography, a group of major financial institutions and Internet companies. The coalition will seek to “follow the money,” Mr. Allen said, in an effort to eradicate such business by 2008. MasterCard, Visa, American Express, Bank of America, Citibank, PayPal, Yahoo and AOL, among others, have joined the coalition.

“We have changed our process for monitoring the Internet,” said Arne L. Christenson, a senior vice president for federal government affairs at American Express. “In the past our search for child pornography sites took place as part of our broader efforts to enforce our Internet pornography policy, and there was not always a clear differentiation between the two in our review and reporting.”

Among purveyors of child pornography, Mr. Christenson said, there is a “growing trend toward steering visitors of these sites to various alternative payment methods.”

Mr. Christie said one of those methods involved granting access to Web sites in return for explicit photographs of children. “That phenomenon is something that we are very concerned about,” Mr. Christie said.

Data Retention Bill Expected Next Week (CNET)

By Anne Broache, And Declan McCullagh

CNET News, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON--A Democratic member of the U.S. House of Representatives said Thursday that she plans to introduce legislation next week that would force Internet providers to record customer information for one year.

Rep. Diana DeGette of Colorado said that she is working with Republicans Reps. Ed Whitfield, chairman of the House Energy and Commerce oversight and investigations subcommittee, and Joe Barton, chairman of the full committee, to finalize language mandating a controversial practice known as data retention.

"Internet service providers across the board do retain this data for some period of time right now, so all were doing in this legislation is requiring a standard in the industry," DeGette said at a morning hearing here on online child pornography, which was at least the sixth event dealing with online child exploitation in the House this year.

DOJ_NMG_0067422

The data retention requirement is necessary because members of Congress have "learned that Internet service providers and social networking sites have information that law enforcement needs when investigating pedophiles online, and that is the IP address on a particular date and time that will help identify those involved," said Whitfield, a Kentucky Republican who is also heading a probe into Hewlett-Packard's boardroom scandal.

Privacy groups and industry groups have generally opposed mandatory data retention, with some companies such as Comcast voluntarily agreeing to retain user data for longer periods. Also, under an earlier proposal described by DeGette, the information would be available not only to police but to civil litigants as well, including divorce lawyers hoping to track someone down or employers embroiled in a lawsuit with a former employee.

Plans to enact the Bush administration's data retention proposal--reiterated this week by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales--have been brewing in Congress for months but have received increased attention as the November elections draw near.

DeGette, for her part, planned this spring to introduce such a proposal (click for PDF) as an amendment to a House telecommunications bill but ultimately dropped those plans. A senior House Republican also drafted a bill this year (click for PDF) but then backed away from it.

DeGette's bill is expected to be consistent with repeated calls for mandatory data retention in recent months from Gonzales and from 49 state attorneys general (click for PDF).

The two law enforcement officials at Thursday's hearing, representing the cybercrimes division of Homeland Security's Immigrations and Customs Enforcement bureau and the U.S. attorney's office in New Jersey, also offered endorsements.

"We need more and more information, and we need it as quickly as we can possibly get it," said Christopher Christie, U.S. Attorney in New Jersey.

Details on data retention

In general, data retention legislation could follow one of two approaches.

One form could require Internet providers and perhaps social networking sites and search engines to record for a year or two which IP address is used by which user. The other form would be far broader, requiring companies to record data such as the identities of e-mail correspondents, logs of who sent and received instant messages (but not the content of those communications), and the addresses of Web pages visited.

During a series of meetings with Internet companies hosted by the Justice Department--first reported by CNET News.com--officials have been ambiguous about how they want legislation worded, private-sector participants say. Those involved have included AOL, Comcast, Google, Microsoft, Verizon Communications and trade associations.

DeGette said Thursday that her proposal would not require retention of the communications themselves, but would identify data so that law enforcement officials--if they had probable cause to believe a crime has been committed--could go in and get a subpoena and subpoena these IP addresses.

An IP address is a unique four-byte address used to communicate with a device on a computer network that relies on the Internet Protocol. An IP address associated with CNET.com, for instance, is 216.239.113.101.

Ernie Allen, president of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, said he liked that DeGette's proposal was not focused on retaining content. "Obviously this is a real dilemma for the Internet service providers for a host of reasons, and I think there is an appropriate time frame that can be established," he said. "But overwhelmingly, we support (data retention mandates)."

DeGette sought to allay concerns raised by privacy advocates about the approach, adding, "I'm concerned about privacy considerations, too, especially in light of what I believe to be illegal surveillance of telephone records by this administration."

CIVIL LAW:

Federal Officials Scrutinizing Company Payments To Doctors (NYT)

By Barry Meier

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

Ela Medical, a small producer of implantable heart devices, said this week that it had received a subpoena from federal health care fraud officials seeking information about possible inducements paid by the company to doctors using its products.

In response to an inquiry last week from a reporter, Ela Medical stated that it had received an administrative subpoena from the inspector general of the Department of Health and Human Services. The company is a division of the Sorin Group, which is based in Milan.

DOJ_NMG_0067423

According to Ela Medical, the subpoena sought any documents related to "arrangements, clinical studies, provision of monitoring equipment and services and other agreements by which the company may have provided benefits to persons in a position to recommend purchase of devices."

Federal law prohibits certain types of payments to doctors that are meant to influence their choice of a particular product. Ela Medical, which has previously said that it complied with all relevant laws, said in its statement that it was cooperating with the investigation.

Last year, the Justice Department started to investigate the country's biggest makers of heart devices — Medtronic, St. Jude and Guidant — to determine if they provided doctors with excessive payments to enroll patients in postmarketing studies of their devices as a way of increasing sales. All three companies have said they did nothing wrong.

Such studies can have questionable scientific value, experts say.

In March, a federal official said that the government had begun an inquiry into Ela Medical that was focusing on, among other things, financial relationships between the company and doctors in the Miami area, including physicians who were enrolling patients in postmarketing trials.

At that time, however, officials of Ela Medical said they were unaware of any government inquiries into its practices. Earlier this week, a spokeswoman for the Sorin Group said it had received a subpoena last week.

Ela Medical had only a small piece of the market in this country for heart devices like defibrillators, according to analysts' estimates. Together, it and Biotronik, based in Berlin, have about a 5 percent market share.

Pediatrix Finalizes $25.1M Settlement (AP-YBIZ)

AP, September 22, 2006

Pediatrix Finalizes $25.1 Million Settlement With Justice Department

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. (AP) -- Pediatrix Medical Group Inc. on Thursday said it paid the federal government $25.1 million as part of its final settlement with the Justice Department related to a probe into the company's billing practices.

The settlement ends a federal investigation into the company's Medicaid and Tricare practices related to neonatal services provided between January 1996 and December 1999. In addition, the pediatric services provider said it would reach separate state settlements for each state Medicaid program involved.

Information for the period 2000 to 2003 also was reviewed as part of the investigation, and Pediatrix is not making any payments for this period.

Pediatrix announced a tentative settlement in February and set aside reserves related to the investigation during periods through December 2005. The settlement will not affect the company's operating results this year.

Shares of Pediatrix closed down 71 cents to $47.67 on the New York Stock Exchange.

IRS To Pay Former Workers Whose Jobs Were Outsourced (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

Ten former mailroom employees at the Internal Revenue Service who lost their jobs because of outsourcing will receive about $4,000 each in back pay as part of a legal settlement, the National Treasury Employees Union has announced.

The settlement ends a lawsuit brought by the union in a dispute over the meaning of an appropriations bill that prohibited the IRS from turning federal work over to a contractor during much of 2004 without first conducting a public-private competition.

In March, a federal judge ruled that the IRS, which did not hold a competition for the mailroom jobs, had improperly converted the jobs in the time period that had been put off-limits by Congress.

When the job conversions began two years ago, the IRS had 87 mailroom employees. Most of the employees left, some taking cash buyouts and others finding jobs elsewhere in the IRS. The contractor, a nonprofit organization, hired some IRS employees after being awarded a $33 million contract to operate more than 30 IRS mailrooms.

The employees who accepted job transfers or left their jobs voluntarily were not eligible for back pay, the union said.

An IRS spokesman would not comment on the settlement. Shortly after the court ruling, the IRS said it thought it had complied with procurement rules and regulations.

Colleen M. Kelley , the union president, said lawsuits challenging outsourcing decisions by agencies are difficult to win. "This is the first case of which NTEU is aware in which the government has paid money to employees in settlement of a contracting out lawsuit," Kelley said. "It was important to us to hold the IRS accountable."New Deadline for Defense?

Gordon England , deputy secretary of defense, has put a Senate oversight committee on notice that the Pentagon may come to Congress next year for additional time to establish a new labor-management relations system.

DOJ_NMG_0067424

The Defense Department faces a 2009 deadline for implementing new labor rules, but progress has been slowed by litigation and other factors.

A federal court stopped the new labor system after finding that the Pentagon's plan went too far in limiting the collective-bargaining rights of Defense

civil service employees. The case is on appeal, and England said he did not expect a decision until early next year.

Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) held a hearing Wednesday afternoon to check on the progress of the National Security Personnel System, which more rigorously links the job performance of Defense civilians to pay raises. The contested labor rules are one part of the NSPS.

Because of the litigation, the NSPS rollout has been limited to nonunion Defense Department employees. About 11,000 employees converted to the NSPS on April 30 in the program's first phase. A second phase begins Oct. 1 and will include more than 66,000 Defense employees.

When fully implemented, the NSPS will cover about 700,000 workers, or about half of the government's civil service workforce.COLA Countdown

With less than a month to go in the counting period, most government retirees appear on track for a cost-of-living adjustment of at least 3.5 percent.

The calculation is based on a Labor Department index showing that consumer prices rose again in August. The 12-month period measured by the index ends this month, and the Labor Department will announce the 2007 COLA in mid-October.Talk Shows

Carol A. Bonosaro , president of the Senior Executives Association, will be the guest on "Fedtalk" at 11 a.m. today on http://federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

Josefina Carbonell , assistant secretary for aging at the Health and Human Services Department, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Chastang Appointment To Be Reviewed By Department Of Justice (MR)

By Dan Murtaugh, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), September 22, 2006

Juan Chastang's future as a Mobile County commissioner is now in the hands of the U.S. Department of Justice, after the state decided not to appeal a federal court order handed down last month, a spokesman from the attorney general's office said.

The order, handed down by a panel of three federal judges Aug. 18, said Gov. Bob Riley had 90 days to get clearance from the Justice Department that the Chastang appointment complied with the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

If the Justice Department approves the appointment, nothing will change and Chastang, the commission's president, will continue to represent District 1.

But if the department finds that the appointment violated voters' rights, it could force Chastang out of office and call for a special election to fill the seat.

Suzanne Webb, a spokeswoman for the Alabama Attorney General's office, said Tuesday that the governor would not appeal the judges' decision to the U.S. Supreme Court and would instead ask for Justice Department clearance.

Chastang said he's confident the Justice Department will approve his nomination.

"Everything's going to be OK," he said. "I trust their legal opinion that that's the best option."

The attorney general's office represented the governor in a federal lawsuit in the matter, filed last year by state Reps. Yvonne Kennedy and James Buskey, both D-Mobile, and Bill Clark, D-Prichard.

The judges ruled that when Riley appointed Chastang to replace Sam Jones on the commission after Jones became mayor of Mobile in October, the governor failed to follow a provision of the Voting Rights Act that requires the Justice Department to review in advance any changes to Alabama election practices.

Justice Department review is necessary because of a Civil Rights-era law making Alabama, along with a number of other states, ask for federal approval before changing election laws.

In 1985, the Alabama Legislature passed a law requiring a special election to fill any Mobile County Commission vacancy with more than a year remaining in the term.

DOJ_NMG_0067425

That law was ruled unconstitutional in 1988 because it conflicted with a state law that gave the governor the power to make such appointments.

In 2004, though, the Legislature passed a law allowing local acts, such as the 1985 Mobile County ordinance, to make exceptions to the general rule of gubernatorial appointments.

Therefore, when Riley appointed Chastang instead of calling for a special election, he changed voting law, the judges ruled.

Chronicle, Job-fair Firm Called Biased Against Noncitizens (SFC)

By Vanessa Hua, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, September 21, 2006

The Chronicle and a firm that produces job fairs tried to bar noncitizens from an employment event in June, according to a complaint the ACLU and other civil rights groups filed Tuesday with the federal Justice Department.

The Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights, the American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California and the ACLU Immigrants' Rights Project allege that Expo Experts, a Cincinnati company that organizes job fairs in partnership with newspapers nationwide, discriminates against legal immigrants.

The complaint, filed in Washington, D.C., charges that the company illegally bars noncitizens from attending job fairs in violation of federal anti-discrimination laws and asks the Justice Department to impose civil penalties and issue a cease-and-desist order to stop the practice. The civil rights groups filed a companion complaint against The Chronicle, which co-sponsored the June fair with Expo.

An advertisement before the event, published in the newspaper and on its affiliated Web site, SFGate.com, said job-seekers were required to have U.S. citizenship to enter a pavilion featuring engineering, technology and security clearance positions, the complaint alleges. A second pavilion featured professional jobs.

When the Lawyers' Committee and the ACLU objected to the restriction in the days before the event, Expo Experts and The Chronicle removed the discriminatory language from the online version of the advertisement and opened both pavilions to all job-seekers, according to the complaint.

"The San Francisco Chronicle is aware that the Lawyer's Committee for Civil Rights has filed a complaint with the U.S. Department of Justice," said Brandon Hamm, spokesman for the newspaper. "The Chronicle denies that it has violated any laws or acted wrongfully as alleged in the complaint. The Chronicle previously addressed concerns raised by the LCCR and considers the matter to be resolved. There is no basis for the complaint."

Susan Turner, Expo's president, said many government jobs require applicants to be U.S. citizens. "That's nothing we made up, or The Chronicle made up -- that's through the government."

E-mail Vanessa Hua at vahua@sfchronicle.com.

Library's Ban On Prayer Service Upheld On Appeal (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, September 22, 2006

Judges rule 2-1 that distinction between worship, other meetings is constitutional

Contra Costa County did not intrude on religious freedom when it barred a church from holding prayer services in a meeting room of the Antioch library, a federal appeals court ruled Wednesday in a case that drew arguments from the Bush administration in support of the church.

In a 2-1 decision, the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco said that the Faith Center Church Evangelistic Ministries had the right to hold religious discussions in a room that was open to other community groups, but that the county could prohibit it from conducting worship services.

"The county has a legitimate interest in ... excluding meeting room activities that may interfere with the library's primary function as a sanctuary for reading, writing and quiet contemplation," and in preventing the room from being "transformed into an occasional house of worship," Judge Richard Paez said in the majority opinion.

He acknowledged that there may be little difference between prayer services and other types of meetings by religious groups in some cases, and said judges and government agencies are not competent to make such distinctions. But in this case, Paez said, Faith Center itself described its planned library gathering as one for "praise and worship."

Judge Richard Tallman stressed the same issue in his dissenting opinion. "Separating religious worship from other religious speech inevitably leads to state entanglement in religion" and is beyond the government's authority, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0067426

U.S. District Judge Lawrence Karlton of Sacramento, temporarily assigned to the appeals court, cast the deciding vote for the county. He wrote a separate opinion saying the "sorry state of the law" was due to Supreme Court rulings that have weakened the separation of church and state by blurring the distinction between "religious practice and secular speech."

The Bush administration entered the case on the side of the church, arguing last fall that barring worship services, while allowing social and political groups to meet at the library, would violate the religious group's freedom of expression.

"Religious worship is also communicative," the Justice Department said in its brief. "Hymns and prayers are expressions among believers, and to observers, of their common faith."

A lawyer for Faith Center said he would appeal Wednesday's ruling.

"The effect of this decision is to treat Christians and all religious people, who might want to worship in an otherwise public meeting room in a public library, as second-class citizens," said attorney Gary McCaleb of the Alliance Defense Fund.

But Deputy County Counsel Kelly Flanagan said the county was concerned that allowing prayer services in a public building would amount to an unconstitutional government endorsement of religion.

"We think a library and a church are different things and should stay different," Flanagan said.

Meeting rooms at the Antioch library, at 501 West 18th St., have been used by community and political groups, including the Sierra Club and a local Democratic Party chapter. The county initially banned all religious activities in the rooms, but, after Faith Center filed suit, modified the exclusion in December 2004 to prohibit only religious services.

Faith Center held a general meeting and a prayer service at the Antioch library in May 2004, but library officials denied permission for the church to hold another service two months later. A federal judge issued an injunction against the county's policy in May 2005, saying it was probably unconstitutional, but no further prayer meetings were held during the appeal.

E-mail Bob Egelko at begelko@sfchronicle.com.

ANTITRUST:

Samsung Exec Guilty Of Price-Fixing (AP)

By Dan Caterinicchia, AP Business Writer

AP, September 22, 2006

Justice Department Says Samsung Executive Agrees to Plead Guilty for Price-Fixing

WASHINGTON (AP) -- An executive from Samsung Semiconductor Inc., the world's largest manufacturer of dynamic random access memory (DRAM) used in computers, has agreed to plead guilty and to serve jail time for participating in a global price-fixing conspiracy, the Justice Department said Thursday.

Thomas Quinn, senior vice president of memory sales and marketing at the U.S. subsidiary of Korean firm Samsung Electronics Co. Ltd., was charged with a felony for his alleged participation in an agreement to fix DRAM prices and to coordinate bids in an auction held by a buyer.

The scheme directly affected sales to U.S. computer makers Dell Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co., Compaq Computer Corp., International Business Machines Corp., Apple Computer Inc., Gateway Inc., and Sun Microsystems Inc., according to the Justice Department. There were about $7.7 billion in DRAM sales in the U.S. in 2004, according to the department.

Under the plea agreement, which must be approved by the court, Quinn will serve eight months in prison and to pay a criminal fine of $250,000. In addition, Quinn has agreed to assist the Justice Department in its ongoing investigation.

"Prison time for price-fixers remains the most potent deterrent to illegal cartel activity," Thomas O. Barnett, Assistant Attorney General in charge of Justice's Antitrust Division, said in a release.

John E. Lucas, a spokesman for the California company, said Quinn remained a Samsung employee and issued a statement that read: "Samsung and the Department of Justice have previously reached a comprehensive settlement in the DOJ's industrywide investigation into alleged violations of U.S. antitrust laws among manufacturers of DRAM memory. Samsung is strongly committed to fair competition and ethical practices and forbids anticompetitive behavior."

Between April 1, 2001, and June 15, 2002, Quinn communicated with competitors to discuss the prices of DRAM to be sold to certain customers and agreed with competitors to coordinate bids submitted to Sun Microsystems Inc., according to Justice.

To date, a total of 13 individuals from Samsung, Hynix Semiconductor Inc., Infineon and Micron Technology Inc., have been charged and fines totaling more than $731 million have resulted from the investigation, which is being conducted by the antitrust division of Justice and the FBI in their San Francisco offices.

Shares of Sun Microsystems added 5 cents to close at $5.21, while Dell slid 32 cents to end at $21.18, and Apple lost 61 cents to finish at $74.65, all trading on the Nasdaq.

DOJ_NMG_0067427

Shares of Hewlett-Packard lost $1.91, or 5.2 percent, to end $34.87, while Micron Technology gained 18 cents to end at $17.74, and U.S.-traded shares of Infineon Technologies AG dipped 2 cents to close at $12.29, all on the New York Stock Exchange.

IBM lost $1.81, or about 2.2 percent, to close at $81.61, while Gateway fell 11 cents, or 5.4 percent, to close at $1.93, both on the NYSE.

Samsung US Executive Gets 8 Months For Price-fixing (SJBIZ)

San Jose Business Journal, September 22, 2006

A marketing executive with the U.S. unit of Samsung Electronics Co. Ltd. agreed to plead guilty and serve prison time for taking part in price-fixing in the computer memory chip business, the U.S. Justice Department said Thursday.

South Korea-based Samsung and its San Jose-based subsidiary agreed last year to pay a $300 million criminal fine for fixing prices.

The Justice Department said Thomas Quinn is the fourth Samsung manager to plead guilty in connection with the probe. Quinn is expected to serve eight months in prison and pay a $250,000 fine under the plea deal, and investigators said that if he had been convicted at trial, he could have faced a larger fine and a prison sentence of up to three years.

Quinn conspired to fix the price of memory chips sold to computer makers around 2001 and 2002, investigators said.

The government said the victims of the alleged price-fixing included Dell Inc. (NASDAQ:DELL - News), Compaq Computer Corp. (NYSE:CPQ - News), Palo Alto-based Hewlett-Packard Co. (NYSE:HPQ - News), Cupertino-based Apple Computer Inc. (NASDAQ:AAPL - News), International Business Machines Corp. (NYSE:IBM - News), and Gateway Inc. (NYSE:GTW - News).

Korean manufacturer Hynix Semiconductor Inc. and German manufacturer Infineon Technologies AG (NYSE: IFX - News) also agreed last year to plead guilty; Hynix was fined $185 million and Infineon was fined $160 million.

Four Infineon executives pleaded guilty to price-fixing charges, serving prison terms of four to six months and each paying fines of $250,000.

Samsung Executive Agrees To Jail Term For Chip Conspiracy (AFP-Y)

AFP, September 22, 2006

A US executive of South Korean electronics giant Samsung agreed to plead guilty and to serve jail time for participating in a global conspiracy to fix prices for memory chips, officials said.

The Justice Department said Thomas Quinn, vice president of marketing for memory products at Samsung Semiconductor, the California-based US unit of Samsung, agreed to the deal that would result in an eight-month prison term and a 250,000-dollar fine.

Quinn was charged with violating the US antitrust laws in a one-count criminal complaint alleging participation in an agreement to fix prices of dynamic random access memory (DRAM) chips.

The plea agreement, which must be approved by a US federal judge, also calls for Quinn to assist the ongoing investigation.

"Prison time for price-fixers remains the most potent deterrent to illegal cartel activity," said Thomas Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the department's antitrust division.

"Today's action sends a clear message: Those who engage in price-fixing schemes will be held accountable for their illegal conduct."

To date, four companies and 13 individuals have been charged and fines totaling more than 731 million have resulted from the DRAM investigation.

Last November, Samsung pleaded guilty as a company to charges of price fixing in a deal that came with a fine of 300 million dollars.

US authorities have alleged a conspiracy with Samsung and other producers to fix DRAM computer chip prices between April 1, 1999 and June 15, 2002.

DRAM is the most commonly used semiconductor memory product, providing high-speed storage and retrieval of electronic information for computer, telecommunications and consumer electronic products.

There were approximately 7.7 billion dollars in DRAM sales in the United States in 2004.

Authorities said the price-fixing scheme directly affected sales to US computer makers Dell, Hewlett-Packard and others.

Quinn is the fourth Samsung executive to agree to a prison sentence in the investigation. Three foreign-based Samsung executives, Sun Woo Lee, Young Woo Lee and Yeongho Kang, previously pleaded guilty and agreed to serve prison terms ranging from seven to eight months.

DOJ_NMG_0067428

In additional, jail terms were agreed for Hynix Semiconductor executives Dae Soo Kim, Chae Kyun Chung, Kun Chul Suh and Choon Yub Choi; and Infineon executives T. Rudd Corwin, Peter Schaefer, Gunter Hefner and Heinrich Florian.

Wright Deal Tweaked To Address Antitrust Concerns (DMN)

By Sudeep Reddy, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, September 22, 2006

New language wins over key detractor, Hutchison says

WASHINGTON – Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison said Thursday that new language addressing antitrust concerns in the Wright repeal bill has passed muster with a key detractor to the legislation.

With newfound support from Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, legislation that would lift restrictions on long-haul flights at Dallas Love Field may be poised to move forward.

"It's a major step forward, but it's not the end of the road," Ms. Hutchison said.

The Texas Republican initiated procedures Thursday to bring the revamped Wright bill to the Senate floor.

It could come up for a vote next week, though a packed schedule in the final days before a congressional recess may force the issue into a post-election session in November.

The new language removes a phrase that could have provided a blanket exemption from competition laws for the June agreement by the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, American Airlines Inc., Southwest Airlines Co. and Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport.

But the proposed amendment still offers potential legal cover to the North Texas compromise, by employing additional language sanctioning the deal.

Rather than issue a sweeping order that gates be eliminated at Love Field, the latest version of the bill orders the city of Dallas to tear down the facilities under its existing authority. It also orders the city to accommodate new carriers at the airport, as specified in lease agreements.

"I think it protects the parties on the balance of the agreement, which has been my goal," Ms. Hutchison said.

Mr. Specter said in a statement that he was "pleased to have worked with" Ms. Hutchison and Texas Sen. John Cornyn in resolving the Wright concerns.

The North Texas agreement, which marked the end of a rancorous dispute among the cities and the airlines over the 1979 law, would lift the Wright amendment in 2014 and immediately allow flights anywhere in the U.S., as long as passengers stopped inside the nine-state perimeter.

The number of available gates at Love would be cut to 20 from 32. Nineteen gates are now operational.

Gate concerns

Concerns over the gate-reduction provision had stalled the bill, as a few powerful lawmakers protested that the deal would reduce competition and circumvent antitrust laws.

The House Judiciary Committee removed the antitrust exemption from an original version of the bill last week.

The Dallas City Council had scheduled a meeting for this morning to consider whether the agreement could go through even without securing new language. That closed-door session was canceled late Thursday.

House members have said over the last week that they would find a way to get the original Wright bill – with an explicit antitrust exemption – onto the House floor, even though it could create a battle over the language that was removed by the House Judiciary Committee.

North Texas members' latest plan was to bring their original bill to the floor next week under procedures that suspend regular rules. That could allow the legislation to slide through without amendments, though if any influential members objected, it might force supporters to scramble for the two-thirds majority needed to pass the measure.

The move could draw out powerful members such as the House Judiciary chairman, Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., creating a floor battle over the language and forcing lawmakers with little interest in the bill to choose sides among several committee chairs.

"I expect he would vote against that on the floor," Jeff Lungren, a spokesman for Mr. Sensenbrenner, said of the efforts to sidestep the committee's changes.

'Infinite possibilities'

House members now face the question of whether to pass that version, which would face Senate opposition, or using a Senate bill that's more acceptable to Mr. Specter and other lawmakers who had objected to the antitrust language.

"There are infinite possibilities, and which one will be chosen hasn't been decided yet," said Rep. Kay Granger, R-Fort Worth.

DOJ_NMG_0067429

The Senate side still isn't free of obstacles. The top Democrat on its Judiciary Committee, Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., hasn't signed off on the new version of the bill. A spokeswoman for Mr. Leahy said Thursday evening that "good-faith negotiations continue" on the Wright issue.

Ms. Hutchison's move on Thursday – known as "hot-lining" the bill – is used to put uncontroversial legislation on a fast track to passage without a formal vote.

The procedure can draw out detractors, forcing them to put a hold on the legislation to signify their disagreement or their plans to block the legislation through a filibuster or other procedure.

If Mr. Leahy or any other lawmaker were to do that, it would force Ms. Hutchison to line up votes on the Senate floor to overcome the maneuver.

"I think if I can get to the floor," she said, "I will have the votes."

Ms. Hutchison said she spoke with Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, who supports the Wright legislation, and received his backing for moving it onto the Senate floor.

The overwhelming approval from the bill's originating committees, and its bipartisan support in both chambers, should help win passage, she said.

But the procedures of the House and Senate could force the issue into the short post-election session, Ms. Hutchison said: "We knew that this would be a tough road, and it has been."

Staff writer Emily Ramshaw in Dallas contributed to this report.

NYSE-Euronext: One, But Two (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

NYSE Group Inc. and Euronext NV will create separate U.S. and European entities to ensure that markets on each continent retain their independence if the stock-exchange operators complete their proposed merger.

Euronext will have a Dutch foundation for its markets to prevent U.S. lawmakers from affecting the rules and requirements for listing stock in European countries. Likewise, NYSE will create a three-person Delaware trust to ensure that no laws are passed in Europe that will affect how U.S. companies are regulated. The structure was unveiled in a regulatory filing with Securities and Exchange Commission.

The goal is to persuade everyone concerned that the planned deal won't encroach on securities laws on either side of the Atlantic. NYSE owns the New York Stock Exchange. Euronext owns stock markets in Paris, Amsterdam, Brussels and Lisbon as well as a major derivatives exchange in London.

The two entities will exist behind the scenes unless and until lawmakers or regulators pass rules that were viewed to affect the independence of regulators or companies in the other market. Essentially, they will only be able to react to laws or regulations rather than create strictures of their own.

Europeans are concerned that Congress or the SEC might take the merger of the two companies as an opportunity to try to extend U.S. regulatory reach to Europe. Such a scenario is particularly frightening to European executives, who would prefer to avoid the strict accounting and governance rules that U.S. companies are subject to since the Sarbanes-Oxley law was passed in 2002. Both SEC officials and Euronext have stressed such U.S. rules won't apply in Europe.

The economic rights of any shares would remain with a combined NYSE-Euronext.

In the filing, Euronext also said that it held preliminary merger discussions with another major U.S. exchange in late 2005 and early 2006. While the exchange wasn't named, Euronext continued the discussions through late April on how to structure a possible transaction with the exchange. By this point, NYSE talks were becoming more advanced and Euronext's talks with the other exchange went nowhere. At the time, the Chicago Mercantile Exchange -- the largest U.S. exchange operator by market value -- had expressed interest in parts of Euronext's business. A CME spokeswoman declined to comment.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Interior Official Says She Will Not Try To Recoup Lease Money (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 21 — A top official at the Interior Department said on Thursday that she would not try to recover $1.3 billion in royalties that the government lost as a result of flawed oil and gas leases it signed in the late 1990's.

DOJ_NMG_0067430

"That would be very hard to recoup," said Johnnie M. Burton, director of the Minerals Management Service of the Interior Department, at a forum held by Platt's, an oil industry newsletter.

Ms. Burton added that she had little or no bargaining power — and did not want any — to force more than 50 companies to renegotiate offshore drilling leases that currently allow them to escape as much as $10 billion in royalty payments over the next decade.

Administration officials say that they are close to reaching agreement with Shell Oil and BP and that they have held talks with about 10 companies. But more than half of the companies that hold the flawed leases have not responded to the government's pleas.

"I don't like to say 'negotiate' because I really don't have anything to trade," Ms. Burton said. Rather, she said, the government had told the companies that "we would really appreciate it" if they changed their contracts.

Even if the companies do agree to change their leases, she said, the government would not try to recapture the $1.3 billion in royalty payments that the companies have already been able to escape.

At issue are hundreds of offshore drilling leases for the Gulf of Mexico that were signed in 1998 and 1999 and that allow companies to extract up to 87.5 million barrels of oil per lease without paying royalties to the government. In what investigators believe was an unintentional bungle, the leases omitted a clause that would normally require companies to pay the full 12.5 percent royalty if oil prices climbed above about $36 a barrel.

Democrats reacted angrily to Ms. Burton's remarks, as well as to new allegations by a group of federal auditors who have charged that the Interior Department blocked them from recovering underpayments by more than two dozen companies.

"If things keep going like this, we're going to need two sets of handcuffs: one for the oil companies and one for the bureaucrats," said Representative George Miller, Democrat of California.

In May, the House passed a Democratic proposal that would pressure companies to change their leases by prohibiting those that refuse to do so from acquiring additional federal leases in the future. But the measure has stalled because Republican leaders in both the House and Senate are opposed to it.

Democratic lawmakers also called for investigations into new allegations by three current and one former federal auditor that the Interior Department had stopped them from trying to recover $30 million in deliberate underpayments by oil companies.

The allegations, disclosed on Thursday by The New York Times, were made in lawsuits that the auditors filed under a law to encourage whistle-blowers.

"These claims, while as yet unproven, are serious and cannot be brushed aside," wrote Senator Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico and Representative Nick J. Rahall II of West Virginia in a letter to the Interior Department's inspector general.

Ms. Burton dismissed the allegations, saying that the auditors "did not follow proper procedure" in filing the lawsuits.

At E. Coli Hunt's End, A Safety Standards Gap (WP)

By Annys Shin

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

It took exactly 14 days from the time state health officials in Wisconsin noticed five cases of E. coli O157:H7 in the same county until investigators arrived Wednesday at a field in California's Salinas Valley in search of the bacteria that ended up in bagged spinach and sickened 157 people in 23 states.

The outbreak -- the largest, in terms of victims, caused by fresh produce -- has exposed strengths and weaknesses in the highly fragmented U.S. food safety system. And the extent of it has federal officials talking about imposing tougher regulation.

"There are good agricultural practices out there. . . . The question that will be addressed is: Are they adequate? Are they being followed? Does the industry need to be further regulated to be safe?" said David W. Acheson, a top Food and Drug Administration food safety official.

Even as public health officials have gotten better at identifying the onset of illness borne by raw fruits and vegetables, the rules and procedures to prevent those outbreaks remain weaker than those for meat and poultry, consumer advocates and food safety experts said. And their enforcement relies on the voluntary efforts of growers and processors, and on the FDA, which has responsibility for much of the food supply but nowhere near the authority or resources devoted to the monitoring of meat and poultry.

"The FDA is acting like the fire department after the fire has already started," said Caroline Smith DeWaal, director of food safety for the Center for Science in the Public Interest.

Public health officials have sought to contain E. coli O157:H7, which over the past 20 years has turned up in hamburgers, alfalfa sprouts, apple juice, cheese and lettuce. Escherichia Coli is normally found in the digestive tracts of humans and warm-blooded animals, but the rare and particularly toxic strain, E. coli O157:H7, damages the intestinal lining, leading to internal bleeding and organ failure. It can be fatal, especially for the very young and old. The latest outbreak killed a 77-year-old woman in Wisconsin.

DOJ_NMG_0067431

Wisconsin public health officials were the first to sound the alarm on the current outbreak and call in the federal government, after receiving a report on Sept. 5 of five E. coli cases in Manitowoc County, located between Green Bay and Milwaukee. It later turned out that only one of those cases was linked to the tainted spinach; the others were traced to a local fair. But the initial cluster helped put state epidemiologists on high alert two days later when they learned of five more cases in the southeastern part of the state.

In those five, all of the victims had come down with Hemolytic Uremic Syndrome, a condition caused by E. coli that leads to kidney failure. On Sept. 8, Wisconsin officials notified the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Altanta and shared the DNA fingerprint of the E. coli strain with PulseNet, an 11-year-old network of public health labs operated by the CDC that has become instrumental in uncovering outbreaks of food-borne illness.

By Sept. 13, detailed interviews with seven of the victims led Wisconsin officials to believe there was a link with spinach, Department of Health and Family Services spokesman Jason Helgerson said. Through the CDC, they learned Oregon officials had reached the same conclusion. With spinach suspected as the culprit, the CDC called in the FDA.

On Sept. 14, the CDC held a conference call with several states reporting cases of E. Coli O157:H7. That evening, the FDA issued its initial warning to consumers not to eat bagged fresh spinach.

The next day, last Friday, the FDA, based on information gathered from victims, narrowed down the search to Natural Selection Foods, which processes spinach used by 30 different brands, and broadened its warning to include all fresh spinach, loose and bagged.

Using supplier and distribution records at Natural Selection, the FDA confirmed California as the source of the contamination on Tuesday. The next day, about a dozen FDA and California state investigators descended on a farm in the Salinas Valley, the first of nine farms they had singled out through records.

On Wednesday, New Mexico officials said they found the strain of E. coli involved in the outbreak in an opened bag of spinach from which a victim had eaten; that helped investigators with further details such as what fields the tainted crop may have come from. Yesterday, FDA officials sent six more investigators into the fields, bringing the total to 19.

Over the past decade, outbreaks of E. coli caused by fresh produce have become more frequent, while the number caused by meat and poultry has declined. Consumer advocates and some food safety experts believe the disparity reflects differences in the regulation of fresh produce and of meat and poultry.

The bifurcated system, which puts the U.S. Department of Agriculture in charge of meat and poultry and gives the FDA oversight of the rest of the food supply, has changed little since its creation a century ago following publication of "The Jungle," Upton Sinclair's expose of Chicago slaughterhouses.

Last year, the FDA's approximately 800 inspectors conducted about 20,000 food safety inspections of all non-meat products, allowing them to visit a processing plant on average once every few years. By contrast, the USDA, which has an inspector daily in more than 6,000 processing plants nationwide, performs the same number of inspections in a matter of days, said Tony Corbo, a lobbyist with Food and Water Watch.

"I liken this to Jack in the Box all over again," said Michael Doyle, director of the University of Georgia's Center for Food Safety. He was referring to a 1993 outbreak of E. coli in Jack in the Box hamburgers that sickened hundreds and killed three.

After that episode, the USDA mandated tougher processing standards, which food safety experts credit with lowering the frequency of meat- and poultry-related E. coli and salmonella outbreaks.

"Until the government comes in and says we're going to have a law here . . . I don't think we're going to make any monumental change in improving the safety of bagged salads in general," Doyle said.

Food safety in the fresh produce industry is largely a matter of self-regulation. Typically, the FDA and state health department officials can inspect only processing plants and don't venture onto farms unless there's an outbreak. The FDA doesn't have the power to order recalls, though it can seize food before it has gone to retailers if a producer doesn't agree to one. The federal government has more powers when it comes to produce that has a plant disease that threatens other crops, DeWaal said.

Growers and processors say they have an added layer of scrutiny from third-party auditors they hire "to avoid the situation we're seeing now," said Bob Perkins, executive director of the Monterey County Farm Bureau.

The FDA was more assertive after the 19th episode of E. coli-tainted greens last October, sending a warning letter to the industry, which in the following months worked out a set of voluntary best practices for farmers and processors.

Yesterday, industry leaders were talking again about more voluntary guidelines.

Earlier this month, the FDA and California state officials, with the cooperation of the industry, began visiting fields and processing plants to get a better grasp of possible sources of contamination.

DOJ_NMG_0067432

Industry leaders and some food safety experts contend there is no point to further regulation until scientists can figure out how produce becomes contaminated with E. coli.

"If you don't know what the problem is how is that inspector going to help you?" said Jerry Welcome, spokesman for the United Fresh Fruit & Vegetable Association. "Is the answer throwing inspectors in and putting more regulations in, or do we need to spend more time and effort to figure out how does it happen?"

Top E.P.A. Official Rejects Recommendations On Soot (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 21 — The Environmental Protection Agency's administrator on Thursday rejected the recommendations of his staff — and an unusual public plea from independent science advisers — choosing instead to tighten only one of two standards regulating the amount of lethal particles of soot in the air.

The short-term daily standard, intended to control acute exposure to the minute particles, was cut nearly in half. But the annual standard, which affects chronic exposure, remains at its original 1997 level.

A large volume of research has implicated the soot particles — which are less than one-thirtieth the diameter of a human hair and can penetrate deep into the lungs and the circulatory system — in tens of thousands of deaths annually from both respiratory and coronary disease. Scientists say they are among the deadliest contaminants to which the public is regularly exposed, and for which the E.P.A. sets exposure levels.

Stephen L. Johnson, a career scientist at the agency and the third administrator appointed during President Bush's six years in office, said in a conference call on Thursday that the annual standard would remain at its current level while research continued. No change was made now, he said, "due to insufficient evidence'' linking health problems to long-term exposure.

"Wherever the science gave us a clear picture, we took clear action," Mr. Johnson said, adding, "All Americans deserve to breathe clean air, and through these more protective standards that is exactly what we are delivering today."

The E.P.A. sets standards under the 36-year-old Clean Air Act, and is required to review the standards every five years, taking into account the latest science. There have been no new standards since the first ones were established in 1997. The agency was under a court-ordered deadline to finalize new rules by Sept. 27.

The process of setting the new standards for soot, which comes from sources that include power plants, heavy industry and vehicle tailpipes and tires, drew intense scrutiny from medical and environmental as well as industry interests. Neither side was pleased with the final result.

In a rare display of solidarity, all but 2 of the 22 members of the agency's Clean Air Scientific Advisory Council had urged that the long-term standard be lowered to a range of 12 to 14 micrograms per cubic meter, from 15.

The American Medical Association, which seldom intervenes in such matters, agreed with the scientists in a letter to the agency in April. The letter also recommended that the daily, or acute exposure standard, be further reduced. Thursday's action reduced the daily standard to 35 micrograms per cubic meter from 65, though the A.M.A. favored a level of 25 micrograms. Edison Electric Institute, which represents investor-owned power plants that generate about 60 percent of the country's electricity, said the agency was going too far in nearly halving the daily standard.

Dan Reidinger, an Edison spokesman, said power plant emissions associated with fine particles had been cut by 40 percent since 1980. "E.P.A. persists in overemphasizing studies that suggest a possible benefit to tightening the air quality standard, '' Mr. Reidinger said, "while downplaying those suggesting that doing so may not provide the health benefits E.P.A. is seeking to achieve."

The reaction from medical and environmental groups was sharper. Joel Schwartz, an epidemiologist at the Harvard School of Public Health who has written many peer-reviewed papers on the health impact of particulates, said lowering the standard to the level set by the science advisers would prevent 3,000 premature deaths annually.

Frank O'Donnell, who heads Clean Air Watch, an environmental lobbying group in Washington, said, "Particle soot kills more people than any other form of air pollution, and this E.P.A. decision will allow particle soot to continue killing many thousands of Americans that would be spared if the air were cleaned up."

In the teleconference, Mr. Johnson, the E.P.A. administrator, and two top agency officials, William Wehrum, the acting assistant administrator who heads the Office of Air and Radiation, and Dr. George Gray, an assistant administrator who heads the Office of Research and Development, stressed that the science advisers were not unanimous in their recommendations.

In an interview later Thursday, Mr. Johnson said, "The bottom line is these air standards are more protective today than they were yesterday."

DOJ_NMG_0067433

Asked about the health-related benefits of the tighter standard for daily exposure, he cited the agency's statistical estimates that the new rule would avoid an estimated "2,500 premature deaths in people with heart or lung disease, 2,600 chronic bronchitis cases, 5,000 nonfatal heart attacks," among other things.

He said he could not provide estimates for the benefits associated with toughening the annual standard to 14 micrograms from 15.

Ron Wyzga, a scientist and biostatistician with the Electric Power Research Institute, an industry group, said a review of health studies showed "there's no magic number saying what a standard should or shouldn't be, so it's a matter of judgment. And different people have different judgments."

EPA Cuts Soot Level Allowable Daily In Air (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

The Bush administration imposed stricter standards on the nation's air quality yesterday for the first time in nearly a decade, ruling that communities across the country must cut back on the amount of soot in the air on any given day.

The agency did not go as far as its own scientists had urged in curbing soot, which is linked to heart and lung disease as well as childhood asthma. The decision sparked complaints on both sides of the pollution debate, with public health experts saying it was inadequate and industry officials calling it too stringent.

The Environmental Protection Agency's new rule lowers the limit on how much fine particulate matter Americans may be exposed to over a 24-hour period, cutting the existing standard of 65 micrograms per cubic meter of air to 35. However, it leaves unchanged the annual limit for "fine particulate matter," or soot, in the air. That standard remains an average of 15 micrograms per cubic meter per day over the course of a year.

"Today EPA is delivering the most health-protective national air standards in our nation's history," agency Administrator Stephen L. Johnson said in a telephone news conference yesterday. "All Americans deserve to breathe cleaner air, and through these more protective standards, that's exactly what we're delivering today."

The EPA's scientific advisory panel voted overwhelmingly last year to recommend cutting the annual amount of soot Americans breathe, from a daily average of 15 micrograms per cubic meter to 13 or 14 micrograms. But William L. Wehrum, the EPA's acting assistant administrator for air and radiation, said officials concluded that the current annual standard "is in fact adequate to protect public health with an adequate margin of safety, and there isn't sufficient evidence to justify a tightening of that standard."

Under federal law, officials are supposed to revise air quality rules every five years to reflect the latest scientific findings. Wehrum said the Supreme Court has ruled that officials should be "no more and no less stringent" than is needed to protect public health. "We have to hit the sweet spot here," he said.

The District and Baltimore -- which lie downwind of several power plants and are clogged with traffic -- are struggling to meet existing federal soot standards, which date to 1997.

Vince Morris, a spokesman for D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D), said the city is disappointed with the decision to leave the annual fine-particulate standard unchanged.

"It's discouraging to see the EPA take this approach, but it's not really surprising," Morris said. "We're trying to make the air cleaner for District residents against an avalanche of suburban sprawl and upwind factories, and this decision isn't going to help us at all. It's really a shame."

Public health activists, who noted that 60,000 Americans are estimated to die prematurely each year because of air pollution, were harsher in their assessment. According to an EPA analysis, the stricter standards endorsed by the scientific advisory panel would have reduced air pollution-related deaths in nine cities by 48 percent; the administration's new rules would cut deaths in those same cities by 22 percent.

"It is the single worst action the Bush administration has taken on air pollution," said Frank O'Donnell, president of the advocacy group Clean Air Watch. "With this decision, the Bush administration has abdicated its responsibility to protect breathers from dangers in the air."

Dan Riedinger, spokesman for the Edison Electric Institute, whose members generate 60 percent of the nation's electricity, attacked the administration from the opposite perspective. Power plants have cut their fine-particulate emissions by 40 percent since 1980, he said, and the industry plans to spend more than $50 billion to cut emissions an additional 60 percent in Eastern states.

"EPA persists in overemphasizing studies that suggest a possible benefit to tightening the air quality standard, while downplaying those suggesting that doing so may not provide the health benefits EPA is seeking to achieve," Riedinger said.

DOJ_NMG_0067434

"Under the new standards, hundreds of counties that currently meet existing air quality standards will be in violation of the new ones, requiring tens of billions of dollars in annual expenditures to reduce emissions from all sectors of the economy."

The new rules will take effect in 2015; by then, the affected communities must draft plans for reducing air pollution or risk losing federal funds.

If the revised standards were in effect today, the District as well as Arlington and Loudon counties in Virginia would be out of compliance. But EPA officials said they expect all three areas to meet them by 2010.

Wehrum estimated that when the new rules take effect, about 32 additional counties -- most of them in Southern California -- will be out of compliance. Bebe Heiskell, who serves as county commissioner in Walker County, Ga., which is working to meet the 1997 standards, said she is concerned that the new rules will make it even harder for her community to attract businesses.

"It could have a detrimental impact on economic development and maintenance of the industry we do have," said Heiskell, who is appealing the EPA's decision to label her county as out of compliance. When it comes to soot in the air, she added, "I don't think it's affecting health in my community."

Confirmation Likely For Parks Nominee (AP)

By Mary Clare Jalonick

AP, September 22, 2006

Mary A. Bomar, President Bush's nominee to head the National Park Service, appeared headed for a quick confirmation as senators praised the British native Thursday for her professionalism and history with the agency.

Bomar, who has served as the Park Service's Northeast regional director since 2005, offered few opinions on current park service policy or the agency's budget problems at her Senate confirmation hearing. Bomar said she would help the agency "search for creative ways of working within our means."

If confirmed, Bomar will replace Fran Mainella, who announced this summer that she would step down for family reasons.

Senate Energy and Natural Resources Chairman Pete Domenici, R-N.M., and Wyoming Sen. Craig Thomas, the Republican chairman of the subcommittee on national parks, predicted that most senators will support her nomination.

"This will move fast," Domenici said after the hearing.

Bomar was born and raised in England and became a U.S. citizen in 1977. She has worked in numerous parks, serving as acting superintendent at Rocky Mountain National Park and as the first superintendent at the Oklahoma City National Memorial, among other jobs.

The Bush administration's handling of the national parks has drawn persistent critics. But the agency has recently retreated from some of its most controversial plans.

Officials this year rejected a management proposal that critics said would have expanded the use of snowmobiles and all-terrain vehicles on federal land. Instead, Mainella later signed a policy emphasizing that conservation is the parks' first responsibility.

But other issues remain. Bomar would take over the Park Service as the agency struggles with a yearslong backlog of maintenance and rehabilitation projects.

Bomar declined to elaborate on her personal views on a number of subjects, including snowmobiles and the maintenance backlog. She said she planned to "stay the course" and continue to look at the backlog.

"You have done a very good job of not answering the questions," Domenici teased during the hearing, adding that she appeared to understand the agency has serious issues to confront.

Oregon Sen. Ron Wyden, a Democrat, pressed Bomar on recent ethics issues at the Interior Department.

The department's inspector general, Earl Devaney, lashed out last week at what he said was the department's failure to deal with ethical missteps and conflicts of interest.

"I will be a leader who demonstrates high ethical standards and promotes transparency in all our activities," Bomar said.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Judge Suspends Jail Time For BALCO Journalists, Pending Appeal (CCT)

By Thomas Peele

Contra Costa (CA) Times, September 22, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - A federal judge Thursday ordered two journalists jailed on contempt charges for as long as 18 months for refusing to reveal who leaked them secret grand jury testimony in the BALCO steroids case.

DOJ_NMG_0067435

U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White immediately suspended his order pending the outcome of appeals to the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. He rejected the requests of San Francisco Chronicle investigative reporters Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada that they be fined rather than jailed.

In a tense exchange, Fainaru-Wada told White he would not, under any circumstances, reveal the source.

"Do you intend to honor the subpoena as issued to you?" White asked Fainaru-Wada after the reporter made an emotional statement before a crowded courtroom that journalism is a "meaningful, honorable profession."

"No," he answered. "I will not comply."

Williams told White that he meant "no disrespect to you and the judicial system," by defying the subpoena. "I have a deeply held ethical and moral belief as a journalist and a man that I have to keep my word," he told White.

But a justice department lawyer said the reporters' testimony was critical to its investigation of the leak.

"Our job is to get information and get to the truth," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Douglas M. Miller. "We want to indict the right people, not the wrong people. We have a right to prove our case."

The judge praised Fainaru-Wada and Williams as journalists and persons, but said the legal matter before him was incredibly complicated

"It is a very difficult area of the law and a conflict between the First Amendment and the Grand Jury's right to conduct its investigation." He cited a 1972 Supreme Court decision that journalists must comply with such subpoenas.

"The law in this country is quite clear. The reporters in this matter have no right not to testify. Every citizen has a duty to comply with a subpoena," White said.

The government has a legitimate need to determine who leaked the reporters the secret testimony of baseball stars Barry Bonds and Jason Giambi.

Giambi told the jurors he knowingly used steroids, according to the transcript. Bonds said he did not know that substances he used contained steroids. His personal trainer, Greg Anderson, has been twice jailed for also refusing to testify.

The Grand Jury is investigating whether Bonds lied when he said he did not know that substances called "the clear" and "the cream," which he admitted using, contained steroids. Fainaru-Wada said the pair's reporting and the book they wrote on steroids in baseball exposed a fraud committed against the public. "We were assigned to cover a story to the best of our ability," he said.

White's ruling speaks directly to the need for a federal law protecting journalists from revealing sources, Eve Burton, general counsel of the Chronicle's owner, the Hearst Corp., said outside court following the hearing.

The proposed federal "shield law," which is pending in the U.S. Senate, would allow judges to use a balancing test to weigh whether the public good served by a story should be considered when asking a journalist to testify in court, Burton said.

In the past 18 months federal judges have stopped using such tests, she said. In the last year Hearst journalists received 78 Grand Jury subpoenas compared to five in the previous year, Burton said.

At a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing Wednesday the No. 2 official in the Justice Department opposed a bipartisan bill to create a shield law. Despite that, Burton said she believes President Bush "wouldn't veto" the bill if it reaches him. The trend of requiring reporters to testify before federal grand juries "is a crisis of great proportion in this country," Burton said.

In one instance, a story involving a "case of public corruption" was not published recently because a reporter involved feared being subpoenaed. White's courtroom was packed for the nearly three-hour hearing. The crowd, which included a group of sportswriters from around the country, began to gather outside the federal court house in a show of support for Williams and Fainaru-Wada.

"This one hit us right in the wheelhouse," said the group's organizer, Rick Telander, a Chicago Sun-Times columnist. "This may be the end of investigative reporting as we know it."

Sportswriters, he said, "are usually a bunch of grumpy old guys looking for free food. But we want to stand behind Lance and Mark. We want the American people to see us. We want the president to see us. This is way beyond sports."

Reporters Get Jail In Steroids Inquiry, But Ruling Is Stayed (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 21 (AP) — Two San Francisco Chronicle reporters were ordered jailed Thursday for a maximum of 18 months, pending an appeal, for refusing to testify about who gave them secret grand jury testimony from Barry Bonds and other elite athletes.

The reporters, Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada, wrote a series of articles and a book based partly on the leaked transcripts of the testimony of Bonds, Jason Giambi and others before a grand jury investigating the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, a nutritional supplement company in Burlingame, Calif., that was exposed two years ago as a steroid ring.

DOJ_NMG_0067436

Federal prosecutors asked Judge Jeffrey White of Federal District Court to send the reporters to prison for the full term of the grand jury investigating the leak, or until they agreed to testify. Both sides agreed to stay the ruling pending an appeal to the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit.

Mr. Williams and Mr. Fainaru-Wada have repeatedly said that they would go to jail rather than comply with the grand jury's subpoenas and reveal their source or sources.

The reporters agreed with the government that they are in contempt, but had sought a "nominal monetary fine" and other punishment "short of full-blown incarceration," including house arrest and weekend jailing, according to court documents.

The authorities are seeking to prosecute whoever unlawfully leaked the transcripts, and told Judge White that the reporters were the only ones who knew the identity of their sources. Judge White ordered the two to testify on Aug. 15.

The criminal conduct being investigated in the Bonds leak case includes possible perjury and obstruction of justice by government officials, defendants in the steroid inquiry and their lawyers. All had access to the leaked documents, but have sworn that they were not the source of the reporting by Mr. Williams and Mr. Fainaru-Wada.

In August, Judge White ruled that his hands were tied by a 1972 Supreme Court precedent that said no one, journalists included, was above the law and could refuse to testify before a federal grand jury.

The Chronicle reported that Bonds told the grand jury that he believed he was using flaxseed oil and arthritic balm, not steroids, supplied by his trainer Greg Anderson, one of five defendants convicted in the steroid scandal.

Mr. Anderson served his three months and is in prison again for refusing to testify before another federal grand jury investigating whether Bonds committed perjury.

San Francisco Reporters Sentenced To Jail In Bonds Steroids Case (CCT)

By Thomas Peele, Contra Costa Times

Contra Costa Times, September 22, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - A federal judge Thursday ordered two journalists jailed on contempt charges for as long as 18 months for refusing to reveal who leaked them secret grand jury testimony in the BALCO steroids case.

U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White immediately suspended his order pending the outcome of appeals to the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. He rejected the requests of San Francisco Chronicle investigative reporters Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada that they be fined rather than jailed.

In a tense exchange, Fainaru-Wada told White he would not, under any circumstances, reveal the source.

"Do you intend to honor the subpoena as issued to you?" White asked Fainaru-Wada after the reporter made an emotional statement before a crowded courtroom that journalism is a "meaningful, honorable profession."

"No," he answered. "I will not comply."

Williams told White that he meant "no disrespect to you and the judicial system" by defying the subpoena.

"I have a deeply held ethical and moral belief as a journalist and a man that I have to keep my word," he told White.

But a Justice Department lawyer said the reporters' testimony was crucial to its investigation of the leak.

"Our job is to get information and get to the truth," Assistant U.S. Attorney Douglas Miller said. "We want to indict the right people, not the wrong people. We have a right to prove our case."

The judge praised Fainaru-Wada and Williams as journalists but said the legal matter before him was incredibly complicated

"It is a very difficult area of the law and a conflict between the First Amendment and the Grand Jury's right to conduct its investigation," White said.

He cited a 1972 Supreme Court decision that journalists must comply with such subpoenas.

"The law in this country is quite clear. The reporters in this matter have no right not to testify. Every citizen has a duty to comply with a subpoena," White said.

The government has a legitimate need to determine who leaked the reporters the secret testimony of baseball stars Barry Bonds and Jason Giambi, White said.

Giambi told the jurors he knowingly used steroids, according to the transcript. Bonds said he did not know that substances he used contained steroids. His personal trainer, Greg Anderson, has twice been jailed for also refusing to testify.

The Grand Jury is investigating whether Bonds lied when he said he did not know that substances called "the clear" and "the cream," which he admitted using, contained steroids. Fainaru-Wada said the pair's reporting and the book they wrote on steroids in baseball exposed a fraud committed against the public.

"We were assigned to cover a story to the best of our ability," he said.

White's ruling speaks directly to the need for a federal law protecting journalists from revealing sources, Eve Burton, general counsel of the Chronicle's owner, the Hearst Corp., said outside court following the hearing.

DOJ_NMG_0067437

The proposed federal "shield law," which is pending in the U.S. Senate, would allow judges to use a balancing test to weigh whether the public good served by a story should be considered when asking a journalist to testify in court, Burton said.

In the past 18 months, federal judges have stopped using such tests, she said. In the last year, Hearst journalists received 78 Grand Jury subpoenas compared to five in the previous year, Burton said.

At a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing Wednesday, the No. 2 official in the Justice Department opposed a bipartisan bill to create a shield law. Despite that, Burton said she believes President Bush "wouldn't veto" the bill if it reaches him. The trend of requiring reporters to testify before federal grand juries "is a crisis of great proportion in this country," Burton said.

In one instance, a story involving a "case of public corruption" was not published recently because a reporter involved feared being subpoenaed. White's courtroom was packed for the nearly three-hour hearing. The crowd included a group of sportswriters from around the country who gathered outside the federal court house in a show of support for Williams and Fainaru-Wada.

"This one hit us right in the wheelhouse," said the group's organizer, Chicago Sun-Times columnist Rick Telander. "This may be the end of investigative reporting as we know it."

Sportswriters, he said, "are usually a bunch of grumpy old guys looking for free food. But we want to stand behind Lance and Mark. We want the American people to see us. We want the president to see us. This is way beyond sports."

Judge: BALCO Reporters Face Prison If They Lose Appeals (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, September 22, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- A federal judge in San Francisco said today he will sentence two Chronicle reporters to prison if they lose their appeals of his decision requiring them to reveal their sources of confidential grand jury testimony about star athletes using performance-enhancing drugs.

Imprisonment is the only adequate means of pressuring reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams to comply with their legal duty of providing evidence to a federal grand jury about the source of the leaks, U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White said in what he described as a tentative ruling.

He rejected arguments by the journalists' lawyers that a monetary fine would be a more appropriate sanction for contempt of court. A fine would not put enough pressure on the reporters to testify, White said.

The judge also rejected federal prosecutors' request for an 18-month prison sentence and instead ordered the reporters confined for the rest of the current grand jury term, unless they agree to testify earlier.

Prosecutors haven't said how long the grand jury will be in session, but it could be as late as October 2007, according to court documents. Assistant U.S. Attorney Douglas Miller told White, however, that the reporters would not necessarily be free at that point, because prosecutors could convene another grand jury to continue the investigation.

The government has agreed to delay Fainaru-Wada's and Williams' imprisonment until a panel of the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decides whether they have a right not to reveal who leaked the grand jury testimony to them. That ruling is at least several months away.

Fainaru-Wada and Williams wrote a series of articles in 2004 quoting closed-door grand jury testimony by Jason Giambi of the New York Yankees, sprinter Tim Montgomery and other athletes. All of them said they had used performance-enhancing substances that, according to prosecutors, were illegal steroids supplied by the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, or BALCO.

Also leaked was testimony by Giants outfielder Barry Bonds, who denied knowingly using steroids but said he had taken substances he thought were flaxseed oil and rubbing balm for arthritis. Descriptions of those substances matched "the clear" and "the cream," two undetectable performance-enhancing drugs distributed by BALCO.

Bonds' sworn statements have given rise to a perjury investigation by a separate grand jury.

The disclosure of the athletes' testimony prompted a congressional investigation about drug use in sports and contributed to professional baseball's decision to implement a new steroid-testing policy. High school athletes in California are now required to sign pledges that they will not use steroids.

Five defendants in the BALCO case, including company founder Victor Conte, pleaded guilty to illegal drug distribution. But prosecutors did not make the athletes' grand jury testimony public or even reveal their names during the investigation of the laboratory, and have convened another grand jury to determine who disclosed the transcripts to the Chronicle reporters. Prosecutors say whoever leaked the testimony broke the law.

In refusing to testify, the reporters have claimed that the constitutional guarantee of freedom of the press includes the right to keep promises of confidentiality to their sources.

DOJ_NMG_0067438

Lawyers for Hearst Corp., which owns The Chronicle, argued that reporters should be forced to disclose their sources only if the harm caused by the breach of grand jury secrecy outweighs the public benefit of the reporting -- a standard proposed in a journalists' "shield law" now before the U.S. Senate.

California and most other states have their own shield laws that contain even stronger protections for confidential news sources.

There is no such federal law, however, and White ruled last month that journalists have no right to withhold information from a federal grand jury in a criminal investigation.

E-mail Bob Egelko at begelko@sfchronicle.com.

Jailing The Messenger (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2006

Locking up reporters is the wrong way to plug grand jury leaks.

A DRUG DEALER SELLS HIS WARES to professional baseball players, whose steroid-distorted performances subvert the game. Major League Baseball knows but does nothing. The feds find out and raid the drug lab. Two reporters look into the raid, discover rampant use of steroids in baseball and write a series of articles and a book that shock the public, launch a congressional probe, prompt the president to decry drug use in sports and finally move baseball to impose a tough steroid-testing policy.

The dealer goes to jail. Might anyone else do time in this web of corruption, deceit and ineptitude? Why, the reporters, of course. The suspected ballplayers got immunity, and baseball executives escaped scrutiny. But the journalists are facing time for their work.

San Francisco Chronicle reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams are scheduled to appear before a federal judge today to say why they do not deserve to go to jail for refusing to betray the source who gave them grand jury transcripts about the case. If they don't, the judge could put them behind bars until they change their minds.

Prosecutors say, correctly, that the reporters witnessed a crime when they received the sealed statements made during the grand jury probe of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroid scandal. They also argue that such proceedings are sacrosanct and must remain so in order to get witnesses to come forward. But prosecutors have at their disposal the full investigative power of the U.S. government to subpoena witnesses, grant immunity and compel testimony. They should be able to keep their own house in order. If they can't, and someone on their team or elsewhere in the courthouse leaks the testimony, they should be able to plug the leak without compelling reporters to break their promises to their own sources.

There is no room here for objections about how allowing reporters to protect their sources might interfere with the government's ability to keep the nation secure from attack in a time of war. The two Chronicle reporters are not withholding information about a security risk in the White House or the CIA. Nor is this argument about whether reporters deserve some kind of consideration others don't. They are acting on the public's behalf, and any rights they gain — or lose — also belong to the public.

Californians recognized the importance of protecting reporters from compelled testimony about their sources by passing a shield law and making it part of the state Constitution. Federal judges have the discretion to let the state law guide them in their rulings on the reporter's privilege. Meanwhile, Congress should pass a federal version of the shield law, even one that falls far short of perfect, such as the bill from Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) to restore the balance between the government — with its power to probe and compel — and two reporters backed by their enterprise and the 1st Amendment.

Contempt On Steroids In S.F. (DENP)

Denver Post, September 22, 2006

Their startling stories about Major League baseball provoked a national debate on the dangers of illegal steroid use. Incredibly, San Francisco Chronicle reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams could be sent to jail today in a contempt case that should never have seen the light of day.

At issue is a Justice Department subpoena that seeks to force the reporters to reveal who provided them with grand jury testimony in the Bay Area Laboratory Cooperative (BALCO) case. Federal judge Jeffrey White is set to decide whether their refusal - aimed at protecting the anonymity of their sources - merits jail time.

Federal authorities have been zealous in pursuing the reporters, but they haven't been so tough on themselves. After all, it was their own blunders that resulted in the release of information they meant to expurgate. The information, filed in an electronic court brief, summarized e-mail messages between BALCO President Victor Conte Jr. and Fainaru-Wada. The FBI obtained the e-mails when they searched Conte's home. In the messages, the two discussed the possibility of Conte giving Fainaru-Wada a copy of grand jury materials. Shortly after the exchange, the Chronicle ran a story quoting from the grand jury testimony of Olympic sprinter Tim Montgomery.

DOJ_NMG_0067439

One might deduce that the feds already know what they want to know. People involved in the case, including Conte,have served time behind bars. What is the point in launching a gratuitous attack against the reporters?

This summer, a number of conservatives called for the prosecution of New York Times reporters after the paper published a story regarding a government program tracking the bank transactions of terror suspects - despite the fact that President Bush had on numerous occasions publicly talked about tracking terrorists' financial transactions as part of the war on terror.

The work of a free press is imperiled by the threat of government persecution. Congress is considering a national reporters' shield law, which would give journalists a qualified privilege. Most states already have such protections, and we urge the Senate and the House to act now.

Theodore Olson, former solicitor general in the Bush administration, testified Wednesday in support of a shield law, saying it would promote investigative journalism. Such protection would ease the burden on the San Francisco journalists whose coverage of the baseball steroids story has been a valuable public service.

Outcome For Chronicle Reporters Means We All Lose (ESPN)

By Wright Thompson

ESPN.com, September 22, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams stood in front of the federal courthouse. Moments before, the two San Francisco Chronicle reporters had listened to a judge decide that they'd face jail time as a way of coercing their testimony.

They faced a wall of cameras and talked about the First Amendment and the importance of the press.

These words are being written in the sports department of the Chronicle, which opened its doors to out-of-town media in town for the legal proceedings. And there is a pall over the entire office.

A man stood near the back, anonymous. No one noticed that Michael Rains, Barry Bonds' attorney, had come to see rock bottom for the two men most responsible for exposing his client's alleged steroid use. Rains had tried to listen for the verdict on the radio and, like a lot of people in town, had been curious if the reporters would be ordered to do time. To him, there is no difference between them and Greg Anderson, Bonds' trainer, who is being jailed for his refusal to testify in front of a grand jury.

"Contempt is contempt," Rains said. "There shouldn't be preferential treatment because they claim to have a higher calling in life."

That's the question posed often by non-journalist friends of mine: Why should these two men have more protection than Anderson? What is the difference?

There is one. There is a difference between a steroids dealer who is covering for his friend and two hard-working journalists. Look, Anderson might be a very nice man. He certainly is a loyal friend. But he's hardly an innocent bystander in all of this. He did time for dealing harmful performance-enhancing drugs.

Mark and Lance? Their biggest mistake, it seems, was doing too good a job of exposing steroid use. Sure, their work got them a book deal and accolades. But it also got them 18 months. I've won journalism awards. They ain't worth 18 months.

These reporters were assigned a story, did it well and, in the process, sparked a national debate that did big things like teach kids about the danger of steroids and small things like help force a sport to clean up its act. In the end, those are the only relevant facts to me. They provided a public service, worked long hours, endured criticism and dead ends, pursuing the truth.

Funny, isn't that what the government is supposed to do?

In the end, it seems that the only people with pure motives in this entire saga are Williams and Fainaru-Wada.

Bonds and the rest of the BALCO athletes allegedly took steroids to cheat the games they play. They're a part of this because of their egos.

The U.S. attorneys have become so obsessed with winning this case -- seems to be going around these days -- that they're missing the forest for the trees. For all the talk of wanting to expose those who abuse steroids, they asked for the stiffest possible penalty for two men who actually did the thing they so desperately want to do.

Anderson is sitting in jail to protect a friend. If he wasn't, if he could clear Bonds, don't you think he would have done so by now?

Then there are Mark and Lance. In the courtroom, Fainaru-Wada got up and made a speech to the court in his defense. He started speaking fast, and the judge asked him to slow down. His mother and wife were among the spectators in the crowd.

"I tend to speed up when I get nervous," he said.

He told about wanting to be like his big brother, Steve Fainaru, a Washington Post reporter who recently wrote a string of outstanding stories about Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0067440

The Fainaru brothers are out there on the front lines, telling stories that make a difference. Since the days of Thomas Payne, this country has been built on the foundation of a free press. It's why that amendment was the first one. There's a reason the founding fathers -- I'll take Thomas Jefferson over the two government suits in the courtroom on Thursday -- didn't make the First Amendment about protecting secret grand juries.

"My name is Mark Fainaru-Wada," he told a packed courtroom, "and I have been a journalist for most of my adult life. ... Like many of my colleagues today, I had seen the movie and read the book 'All The President's Men,' and it inspired me to become a reporter. Journalism seemed like an honorable, meaningful profession."

He talked of wanting to do something that would cause change, that would help people. He wasn't trying to win a case or a baseball game. Those two well-meaning government attorneys should have felt real low at that moment. They'd spent lots of money going to law school, working hard to get these jobs and, instead of helping make the world a better place, they were sending difference makers to jail.

"Nobody is above the law," U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White said.

The government wants to know who leaked secret grand jury testimony to the reporters, and they're going to the mattresses to find out. That's their right. The law says they can do that, though I believe the law is wrong. Right now, Congress is debating a federal shield bill that would protect journalists working on important stories. Write your congressman or congresswoman and let them know that you support it. One of those stories might be about a plant polluting your neighborhood or a corrupt school district that is supposed to be educating your children.

These words are being written in the sports department of the Chronicle, which opened its doors to out-of-town media in town for the legal proceedings. And there is a pall over the entire office. Not long ago, Williams walked out of the building, his attorney by his side, the lawyer's tie loosened.

It had been a long day, one in which the government won and we all lost.

Wright Thompson is a senior writer for ESPN.com and ESPN The Magazine. He can be reached at wrightespn@gmail.com

NFL, Union Meet To Discuss Drug Tests (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

Filed at 7:58 p.m. ET

NEW YORK (AP) -- NFL commissioner Roger Goodell met Thursday with union chief Gene Upshaw and a group of other league and union officials on a range of issues, including the possibility of expanding testing for performance-enhancing drugs.

NFL spokesman Greg Aiello said nothing definitive would come out of the session, one of the first formal meetings of its kind since Goodell took over three weeks ago from Paul Tagliabue.

The meeting has been scheduled for a while to work out details of the extension to the labor agreement, arrived at last March in Dallas. Goodell, as the NFL's chief operating officer under Tagliabue, was the league's main contact with Upshaw during those negotiations.

But it also includes such subjects as putting a team in Los Angeles -- Goodell was the league's point man on that issue before becoming commissioner -- and expanded testing for steroids and other performance-enhancing substances, such as human growth hormone.

"There was a wide-ranging CBA follow-up meeting today involving several people and many issues, including the drug program," Aiello said in a statement. "Those meetings will continue."

"No announcements," Upshaw said in an e-mail to The Associated Press.

The HGH issue became more urgent in the last month after the Charlotte Observer ran details of medical records produced in court for the trial of Dr. James Shortt. Shortt, was sentenced to a year and a day in prison after prescribing steroids and human growth hormone for several Carolina Panthers in 2002 through 2004. They went to the Super Bowl after the 2003 season.

More recently, Washington offensive tackle Jon Jansen said on HBO he believes "perhaps 15, 20 percent" of NFL players use HGH, human growth hormone. Jansen later backed off that figure.

The league currently tests seven players per team per week on a random basis for performance-enhancing drugs. It has asked the union to consider more and Upshaw, after first balking, has indicated he would be amenable to additional tests.

Goodell, Upshaw Discuss Drug Testing Program (WP)

By Mark Maske, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0067441

NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell and Players Association chief Gene Upshaw met yesterday without agreeing to any modifications of the league's steroid-testing program, officials said.

Goodell and Upshaw discussed a variety of topics, including the league's drug policy. A league spokesman said no agreements were reached on that issue but that conversations would continue at some point. Goodell said in recent weeks that he had opened discussions with Upshaw about the possibility of strengthening the program, possibly by increasing the frequency of tests and adding substances to the banned list.

Upshaw said most recently he was open to the possibility of modifying the sport's drug policies if the league's medical advisers recommended it. Previously, he'd said he didn't think more tests were necessary and he thought the drug program should be changed only when scientific advancements in testing warranted it.

The two also discussed topics related to the economics of the sport and the league's efforts to put a franchise in the Los Angeles market.Panthers' Smith Practices

Wide receiver Steve Smith participated in the Carolina Panthers' practice yesterday, perhaps signaling that he will return to the club's lineup Sunday in Tampa.

Smith hadn't practiced the previous two weeks and missed the Panthers' first two games of the season because of an injured hamstring muscle. The Panthers and Buccaneers will take identical 0-2 records into Sunday's matchup of teams that reached the NFC playoffs last season but are struggling now. The game also will mark the first time that Buccaneers Coach Jon Gruden and Panthers wide receiver Keyshawn Johnson will be on the same field since Gruden de-activated Johnson for the final six games of the 2003 season for insubordination.

The two coexisted peacefully during the Buccaneers' Super Bowl-winning season in 2002, but clashed while the club struggled the following season. Gruden reacted by sending Johnson home even though the team had to continue paying him. The Buccaneers traded Johnson to the Cowboys after that season, and he spent two seasons in Dallas before being released this past offseason and signing with the Panthers. . . .

Left tackle Orlando Pace participated in portions of the St. Louis Rams' practice yesterday. He suffered a concussion during last weekend's loss at San Francisco. The Rams upgraded Pace's playing status for this weekend from doubtful to questionable on their official injury report. . . .

The New York Giants play Sunday in Seattle, the site of the memorable game last season when they lost in overtime after committing 11 false-start penalties amid the din of the Qwest Field crowd. The Giants also watched their place kicker, Jay Feely, miss three potential game-winning field goals. Feely's misadventures even spurred a "Saturday Night Live" skit. Left tackle Luke Petitgout had five of the false starts.

Goodell has said he likes venues with loud, boisterous fans, but he and members of the competition committee will consider possible measures to lessen the disadvantage that visiting teams face in such settings. Goodell has said it's possible that, in the future, all offensive players could have radio receivers in their helmets to be able to hear the quarterback's signals.

Ex-city Worker Admits Heroin Dealing (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, September 22, 2006

A former hoisting engineer for the city's Department of Water Management pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court Thursday to running a heroin distribution ring while working for the city.

George Prado, 48, is cooperating with federal investigators in the case against his alleged supplier, Sandra Stewart, and in other ongoing drug investigations, authorities said.

He admitted Thursday that he purchased large quantities of heroin that he distributed through a network of couriers and dealers, including fellow city employees Anthony Ritacco and Michael Hart.

Hart and Ritacco, who is Prado's brother-in-law, also have pleaded guilty in the case. Like Prado, they have lost their city jobs.

Stewart, 32, of Bensenville, allegedly received drugs directly from Colombian suppliers. She is scheduled to stand trial in December.

Prado likely will be a key witness in the case.

Standing in court Wednesday shackled at the legs, Prado meekly acknowledged that from 2002 to 2005 he ran a drug ring that dealt in hundreds of thousands of dollars of heroin.

"You were kind of a middleman. You would obtain heroin from sources ... and then deliver it to your couriers?" Senior Judge Harry Leinenweber asked.

Prado admitted that was the role he played in the heroin trade.

According to authorities, Prado was captured on a wiretap threatening to kill one of his own couriers.

DOJ_NMG_0067442

If he had gone to trial, Prado would have had to listen to a series of such wiretaps and face testimony from several members of his ring who also pleaded guilty.

Under the deal he reached with prosecutors, he likely will face a little more than 8 years in prison.

Prado's indictment in 2005 came at a time when the city's Water Management Department was reeling from the Hired Truck scandal. And one week before Prado's arrest, then-Water Department Commissioner Richard Rice was fired in the aftermath of an alleged time-sheet scam.

But investigators said Prado's drug ring was unconnected to other problems in the scandal-plagued department.

During his guilty plea Thursday, his work for the city wasn't mentioned.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Michael Gurland instead chronicled a series of specific drug deals that Prado admitted he orchestrated.

Gurland also noted Prado's history of laundering drug money through the purchase of property.

Under his plea agreement, Prado must forfeit more than $433,000.

The U.S. Marshals Service seized one home Prado owned at 5900 S. Newcastle Ave. The home was sold for more than $59,000.

Prado's home in the 5800 block of South Nordica Avenue is also subject to forfeiture unless Prado can pay off his debt to the government some other way.

Gurland asked that Prado's sentence be delayed until Stewart is tried.

He is scheduled to be sentenced in January.

rrbush@tribune.com

Feds Break Up Alleged Coke Ring (BOSH)

By Steven Ryan

Boston Herald, September 22, 2006

Federal authorities seized 150 kilograms of cocaine and busted 13 people for running a sophisticated drug ring in Lynn, Revere and Dorchester, the U.S. Department of Justice announced today.

“Residents of the North Shore should not have to live with drug dealers operating in their communities,” said U.S. Attorney Michael Sullivan in a press release.

A federal grand jury investigating the alleged ring handed down indictments against 13 people, according to June W. Stansbury, special agent in charge of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration in New England, and Sullivan. They were charged with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute 5 or more kilograms of cocaine.

The feds said the charges stem from a wiretapping investigation from May to August of this year of the alleged cocaine ring.

The wiretaps caught conversations allegedly arranging for the distribution and payment of wholesale quantities of cocaine that were shipped from New Jersey and Texas. Investigators intercepted three separate deliveries of the cocaine, two of which were transported by tractor trailers.

“We will not allow traffickers to turn our interstates into cocaine highways,” said Stansbury. “As this case demonstrates, it’s a dead end.”

Eleven of the 13 suspects were arrested in August, while another one, Daniel Mueses, 30, of Hackensack, N.J., was arrested yesterday in New Jersey. The last suspect, Joseph Ovalle, 33, also of Hackensack, remains a fugitive and is believed to be in the Dominican Republic.

The seven locals charged in the drug distribution ring are Dario De Los Santo-Pascal, 31, Bertha Valencia, 43, and Jose Valencia, 25, all of Revere, Juan Estrada, 26, and Yokasta Dejada, 26, both of Dorchester, Orlando Moldonado, 29, of Melrose, and Joseph Valeri, 25, of Fitchburg.

Huge Coke Bust (DI)

By David Liscio

Daily Item, September 22, 2006

LYNN - Thirteen members of an alleged North Shore cocaine distribution network, including three Revere residents, were indicted in federal court Thursday following a wiretap investigation and a major drug seizure in Lynn.

Federal agents from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) and other law enforcement organizations spent three months listening to and recording conversations among the suspects, culminating in the interception of three separate cocaine shipments, according to Samantha Martin of the U.S. Attorney's Office in Boston. Two of those deliveries involved tractor-trailers. The largest - containing 123 kilograms of cocaine - was seized in a Lynn parking lot Aug. 14.

DOJ_NMG_0067443

Another drug seizure occurred shortly after undercover agents spotted some of the suspects in the Walgreens pharmacy parking lot at the corner of Broadway and Fernwood Avenue in Revere. The suspects were seen transferring a white, powdery substance in a red-and-blue diaper bag emblazoned with a picture of Elmo. Police followed the suspects' vehicle to Lynn, where it was stopped. A police dog found the drugs inside the Elmo bag on the car's backseat, according to court documents.

Overall, as a result of the sting, authorities seized approximately 150 kilograms, or more than 300 pounds of cocaine.

Named in the indictment are: Dario De Los Santo-Pascal, 31, also known as Felipe Acevedo and nicknamed "The Mayor", 58 Florence Ave., Revere; Bertha Valencia, 43, 341 Beach St., Revere; Jose "Freddy" Valencia, 25, 536 Beach St., Revere; Juan Estrada, 26, and Yokasta Dejada, 26, both of Boston's Dorchester section; Orlando Maldonado, 29, of Melrose; Alfredo Salinas, 41, and Callentano Longoria, 33, both of Texas; Joseph Valeri, 25, of Fitchburg; Miguel Lugo, 24, and Nicholas Lugo, 38, both of Tijuana, Mexico; and Joseph Ovalle, 33, and Daniel Mueses, 30, both of Hackensack, N.J.

According to court documents, the investigation was conducted from May to August and included court-authorized wiretaps to probe suspected cocaine trafficking in Lynn, Revere and Dorchester. The defendants were heard making plans to pick up, distribute and pay for wholesale amounts of cocaine shipped into Massachusetts from other parts of the country, including New Jersey and Texas. In some instances, the suspects used a Lynn woman's cell phone to conduct business, based on wiretap monitoring records.

DEA agents, State Troopers, and police departments in Lynn, Revere, Boston and Everett, participated in the investigation that traversed several North Shore communities. Undercover officers tracked the suspects to several locations, including parking lots at the Square One Mall in Saugus, a Peabody truck stop, and a junkyard off Western Avenue in Lynn, according to court records.

A federal grand jury returned the indictment on charges of conspiracy to possess cocaine with intent to distribute. Eleven defendants were also charged with cocaine possession.

"Residents of the North Shore should not have to live with drug dealers operating in their communities, brazenly conducting their drug deals in mall parking lots and truck stops," said U.S. Attorney Michael J. Sullivan.

Only one suspect, Ovalle, was not apprehended and police believe he fled to the Dominican Republic. If convicted, each defendant faces a mandatory minimum sentence of 10 years imprisonment and up to life behind bars.

Worker On New Las Vegas FBI Office Nabbed On Old Murder Warrant (AP)

AP, September 22, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) - A man applying for work building a new Las Vegas FBI office was nabbed on a 22-year-old murder warrant after a background check found he was wanted in a double slaying in Texas.

Jesus Garcia, 50, was arrested Aug. 24 and returned to Harris County, Texas, to face charges in a Sept. 7, 1984, shooting that left two men dead and two other men wounded in a Houston-area lounge, said David Staretz, spokesman for the FBI office in Nevada.

"Even after 20 years, the law eventually will catch up with you," Staretz said Thursday.

Garcia voluntarily provided fingerprint samples when he applied for a construction job at a new southern Nevada FBI regional office, Staretz said. The prints matched those on file with a warrant in the slaying.

Garcia was one of 21 workers arrested or notified they were wanted for crimes and infractions based on background checks required for work building the Las Vegas FBI office, officials said.

The $28 million, 120,000 square-foot building is being built by Virginia-based Harwood and Associates for lease to the FBI for a minimum of 15 years.

Judge In Nightclub Fire Case Upbraids Prosecution Over Leak (NYT)

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

BOSTON, Sept. 21 — A Rhode Island Superior Court judge chastised the state's attorney general Thursday, saying his office had leaked to the press a letter telling relatives of 100 people killed in a nightclub fire that the club owners would plead no contest to involuntary manslaughter charges and that one would not face jail time.

The judge, Francis J. Darigan Jr., said the leak was "unethical, reprehensible, devoid of any consideration for the victims of this tragedy and totally abrogated an agreement reached after weeks of discussion."

Judge Darigan said the court mailed out its own letter to families Wednesday night explaining the terms of the plea agreement. He said he had intended for them to receive word of it before the news media.

The office of Attorney General Patrick C. Lynch had planned to send a separate letter telling families he objected to the deal, but his letter was faxed to a television station Wednesday night and was made public a short time later.

DOJ_NMG_0067444

Mr. Lynch said in a statement that notifying all the families personally would have been an "unprecedented challenge." While many families would be "deeply hurt" by the news of the plea arrangement, he said, most would have heard of it through the press anyway.

"While each of us had the victims' best interests in mind in sending individual letters, the reality is that the vast majority of people would still learn of the court's intentions through the news media," he said.

Mr. Lynch also said he shared Judge Darigan's concern "that the process did not work as well as we had hoped, and I will, in time, find out why." He did not say if his office had faxed the letter to the station, and his spokesman did not return telephone calls seeking comment.

Judge Darigan's letter to families said that even though the prosecution and the defense could not come to an agreement, he accepted the no-contest pleas after seeing video and photographic evidence "of a most disturbing nature" that would have been presented at trial.

"I am sure this evidence would only serve to further traumatize and victimize not only the loved ones of the deceased and the survivors of the trial, but the general public as well," he wrote.

Under the plea agreement, the nightclub owners, Jeffrey and Michael Derderian, who are brothers, are to plead no contest to 100 counts each of manslaughter. Michael Derderian is to be sentenced to four years in a minimum security prison. Jeffrey Derderian is to receive three years' probation and 500 hours of community service. The agreement was reached during jury selection for Michael Derderian's trial.

Michael Derderian is facing greater penalties because he was involved in buying highly flammable soundproofing foam that ignited when it was hit by a pyrotechnic. Jeffrey Derderian was in the club, The Station in West Warwick, when the fire erupted the night of Feb. 20, 2003. The men are to be sentenced Sept. 29.

A lawyer for Michael Derderian, who has been speaking for both brothers, did not respond to phone messages.

News of the agreement angered many relatives of those killed and the 200 people injured in the blaze.

"People are being held above the law," said Eileen DiBonaventura, whose son Albert died. "This was the ultimate disrespect for the victims who perished in that fire."

IMMIGRATION:

U.S. Prosecutors Indict 15 In Alleged Commercial Driver's License Conspiracy For Unqualified Immigrants (FINDLAW/AP)

By Steve Brisendine, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 22, 2006

(AP) - KANSAS CITY, Missouri-The operators of two trucking schools were charged with conspiracy and fraud for allegedly helping unqualified Somalian and Bosnian immigrants pass driving tests in order to obtain commercial driver's licenses, federal prosecutors said in an indictment unsealed Thursday.

The indictment, returned Wednesday by a grand jury in Springfield, Missouri, names 15 defendants who face charges including conspiracy and mail fraud, making a false writing and causing a false identification document to be produced.

It stems from an investigation dating to fall 2004 of testing practices at the South Central Career Center Truck Driving School in West Plains, Missouri, in which authorities found a suspiciously high percentage of students passing the driving tests.

"The pass rate for the school was found to be 99 percent," Col. Jim Keathley, superintendent of the Missouri State Highway Patrol, said. "The average pass rate statewide is 83 percent."

The school's superintendent, Dean P. Proffitt, 71, was among those indicted, as was Ernest Arnel White, who ran a Kansas City-area school and would send students to Proffitt's school to take the driving exam.

Proffitt was placed on a leave of absence in February, and the school can no longer test for commercial driving licenses.

White, who allegedly provided test answers to students at his driving school in Kansas City, also is charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm.

The indictment alleges that White, 49, who converted to Islam while in prison for a 1993 robbery conviction, used his connections in the Muslim community to recruit students to his Muslim Brothers and Sisters driving school.

"Many of the individuals to whom he gave the answers spoke little or no English," Schlozman said.

The FBI's Mark Wagoner said White, who operated his school in Kansas City, Missouri, and Kansas City, Kansas, at various times, did have an old semitrailer that could have been used for instruction.

DOJ_NMG_0067445

However, prosecutors said, his students were rarely given the full two-hour proficiency tests required by state law. Instead, the indictment alleges South Central Career Center instructor Orbin May gave shortened examinations, drove trucks while White's students rode along or simply signed their examinations without their having even shown up in West Plains.

White, whose school is no longer operating, funneled between 200 and 300 students through his school, Schlozman said, and "developed a reputation in the Somali community for being able to obtain what he called 'invisible licenses.'"

Prosecutors allege White and Proffitt both profited from the students' payments for the fraudulent licenses.

The indictment also names Howard E. Schneider, 39, of Overland Park, Kan.; Hiram Chebar Oliver, of Raytown; Osman Abdullahi, 30, of San Diego; Abdiwahab Mohabud Mohamed, 37, of Minneapolis; Samir Hasanovic, 22, of Arnold; and Kansas City residents Elias Mohamed, 25, Ahmed Muhidin Sharif, 27, Abdulfatah Osman Farah, 24, Yusuf Kalmole, 34, Adil Majlovic, 19, Mersud Kajtazovic, 31, and Abdirizak Abdi Mohamed, whose age was given as 25 or 32.

The other defendants assisted in the fraud by various means, Schlozman said, including providing translation or transportation services or by directing license applicants to White.

All of those who obtained licenses through White's school will have to pass another competency test or lose them, Schlozman said.

Twelve of the 15 defendants, including Proffitt, White and May, were in custody early Thursday afternoon.

Authorities do not believe terrorism was involved, U.S. Attorney Bradley J. Schlozman said, but public safety was at risk because some of the immigrants - more than 100 of whom also earned endorsements to transport hazardous material - never proved even rudimentary big rig driving skills.

House Bills Make Illegal U.S. Entry Tougher (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — With a majority of Democrats joining virtually all Republicans, the House today passed three bills designed to make it harder for foreigners to enter the United States illegally and to increase the penalties for those who do.

The bills had already cleared the House last July as part of a larger package of measures to control illegal immigration. The Senate passed its own version of immigration legislation that included a guest worker program and a path to citizenship for some foreigners in this country illegally.

The punitive House bill and the more lenient Senate approach were so different that the two chambers have not tried to forge a compromise. Instead, the House is passing part of its original bill piecemeal.

The House approved last week the first proposal — 700 miles of fence along some of the most popular crossing points on the U.S.-Mexican border. The Senate was considering that bill today.

However, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) said he believed the issue should not be dealt with piecemeal and the future of the House bills seemed cloudy at best.

Of the three bills considered by the House today, the first dealt with the treatment of persons in the U.S. illegally. It would give the government the authority to expel illegal immigrants deemed to be dangerous, including gang members. It would also allow the detention of illegal immigrants beyond the current limit of six months.

Rep. John Conyers of Michigan, the top-ranked Democrat on the House Judiciary Committee, accused Republicans of "political gamesmanship" for bringing up individual provisions that the House had already approved in bulk. Today's bills "are clearly designed to distract the American public," he said.

Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) argued that the Republicans had voted down Democratic proposals to add border patrol agents and immigration officials, along with more beds in border detention facilities. She pointed out that the new bills did not provide any new money but relied on subsequent legislation to do that.

"Republicans are all talk but cheap on action to secure our borders," she said.

House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) replied that House Republican leaders were bringing up the bills separately in hopes of moving something through the Senate to President Bush's desk before Congress' planned adjournment at the end of next week for the November elections.

"This Congress is running out of time," Sensenbrenner said.

The House passed the first of the three bills by a count of 328 to 95. Republicans supported the bill, 222 to 4, and Democrats did as well, 105 to 91. The House's lone independent also voted for the bill.

The second of the three bills, approved by a vote of 277 to 140, would provide federal assistance to state and local authorities responsible for enforcing immigration laws. The third, approved unanimously, would penalize those who tunnel under the border to smuggle people or objects into the United States.

joel.havemann@latimes.com

DOJ_NMG_0067446

House Passes 3 Bills On Border Security (USAT)

USA Today, September 22, 2006

The House of Representatives approved three border security bills Thursday that would impose prison sentences of up to 20 years for tunneling under the border, allow the Homeland Security Department to hold illegal immigrants detained for crimes or as threats to national security beyond six months, and empower state and local authorities to arrest illegal immigrants.

It's unlikely this year that Congress will pass broader immigration changes favored by the Senate, so House GOP leaders said taking action to seal the border was a matter of urgency.

"We're running out of time" on the larger immigration legislation, said House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., and "the American people say border security first."

Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., said Republicans were playing "political gamesmanship."

Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said the individual bills are unlikely to pass the Senate.

Investments measure would shield troops

Servicemembers would be protected from people pushing overpriced financial service and insurance packages under legislation ready for President Bush's signature. The measure, which was given final congressional approval Thursday in the House of Representatives, would allow state insurance regulators to better enforce state and federal law on military bases.

It also would ban discredited financial products that are no longer available on civilian markets but are still sold to servicemembers. The House approved the bill on a 418-3 vote. The Senate passed it on a voice vote in July. Rep. Geoff Davis, R-Ky., said that as a former combat arms officer, he was among those losing thousands of dollars from deceptively advertised investments.

Deal would ease ban on Rx drug imports

House Republicans tentatively agreed to relax a ban on importing prescription drugs from Canada, said Sen. David Vitter, R-La. "This is a very significant breakthrough," he said. The deal would let Americans carry up to a 90-day supply of medication back to the USA from Canada without it being seized by Customs agents. Medications are generally cheaper in Canada because of government price controls.

There was no indication when legislation to implement the agreement might pass Congress.

Report: Info couldn't have stopped 9/11

Intelligence gathered by a secret military unit could not have stopped the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, a report from the Pentagon inspector general's office said.

An investigation found no evidence that the unit, known as Able Danger, had identified any of the attackers before the hijackings. The report contradicts assertions by Army Lt. Col. Anthony Shaffer, a former intelligence officer who worked on Able Danger, and Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., vice chairman of the House Armed Services and Homeland Security committees. It also rejected Weldon's claim that Pentagon lawyers barred the unit from giving information to the FBI.

House Passes Border Security Bills (AP)

By Jim Abrams

The AP, September 21, 2006

Republicans took a new crack at old border-security legislation Thursday as the House approved pre-election bills on deporting gang members, imprisoning tunnelers and empowering local police to arrest illegal immigrants.

With no prospects this year for passing broader immigration changes favored by the Senate, House GOP leaders said taking action to seal the border was a matter of urgency.

"We're running out of time in this Congress," said Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis. "The American people say border security first."

But Sensenbrenner's Republican counterpart in the Senate, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, said, "I don't see how we can deal with the immigration issue on a piecemeal basis." There would be no motivation for the House to negotiate on the issue "if we take care of all of their priorities and none of the Senate's," he said.

The House passed legislation last December that concentrated on border security and enforcement of laws banning employment of undocumented workers. The Senate in May passed a broader bill, generally endorsed by President Bush, that included provisions for a guest worker program and ways for the nation's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants to work toward legal status and eventual citizenship.

There's been no progress in efforts to reconcile the two bills.

The three border security bills the House took up Thursday were in large part already included in the bill passed last December.

DOJ_NMG_0067447

House leaders said one plan was to try to attach the bills to Homeland Security spending legislation that Congress must clear before the end of the session, an approach that Specter, also a senior member of the Senate Appropriations Committee, appeared to dismiss.

The Senate, meanwhile, was debating legislation passed by the House last week that would approve construction of a 700-mile fence stretching across one-third of the U.S.-Mexico border.

Democrats said Thursday's votes were an attempt to cover up the failure to pass more comprehensive immigration changes.

"It's political gamesmanship that forecasts an election" less than two months away, said Rep. John Conyers of Michigan, top Democrat on the Judiciary Committee.

Congressional Democratic leaders, seeking to capitalize on Hispanic opposition to the get-tough policy on illegal immigrants, on Thursday unveiled plans to enact immigration changes and improve education and health care for Hispanic families. "For too long this do-nothing Republican Congress has ignored, and in some cases worsened, the critical challenges facing Latinos," said Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid.

The three House bills would:

_Impose prison terms of up to 20 years for those who knowingly construct or finance an unauthorized tunnel under a U.S. border. People who permit the construction of such a tunnel could face 10 years in prison. Sensenbrenner said 50 tunnels, used to smuggle narcotics and illegal immigrants, have been discovered along the Mexican border since 1990, and 36 in the last five years. It passed 422-0.

_Allow the Department of Homeland Security to hold illegal immigrants detained for crimes or as threats to national security beyond the current limit of six months, and set up expedited procedures for deporting these people. The bill also would make it easier to detain and deport illegal immigrants found to be part of criminal street gangs. It passed 328-95.

The National Immigration Forum voiced opposition to the provision, saying it "gives the attorney general the ability to designate any group as a gang and then punish an individual for belonging to that group, regardless of whether the individual committed a crime."

_Reaffirm the authority of state and local law enforcement to arrest, detain and transfer to federal custody illegal immigrants. It would ask the Justice Department to increase the number of attorneys prosecuting immigrant smuggling cases. It also would close loopholes that have led to "catch and release" policies in which illegal immigrants, mainly non-Mexicans, are released because they cannot be immediately deported. It passed 277-140.

Bush Ready To OK Border Barrier (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

President Bush will sign the bill to construct 700 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border if it is approved by the Senate, the White House said, as Congress continued yesterday drafting more legislation to combat illegal immigration.

On Wednesday night, Mr. Bush told CNN's Wolf Blitzer that he would sign the bill if approved by the Senate, which spent the past two days debating whether they should even consider the fence bill.

Late yesterday, Democrats finally agreed to allow the bill to be taken up.

The House, meanwhile, approved a slew of new bills to speed the deportation of illegal aliens, outlaw tunneling under the border and close loopholes that allow criminal aliens to be released into the U.S.

"I think today's actions here in the House on these three border-security bills demonstrate that House Republicans are serious about securing our borders and enforcing our laws," House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, said yesterday. "The American people have called on Congress to take immediate action, and we have."

While the bills passed the House by wide margins yesterday, they face an increasingly dim future in the Senate, which has refused to approve major border-security legislation unless it is coupled with a guest-worker program and a direct path to citizenship for most of the illegal aliens currently in the U.S.

Senate Republicans have spent the past two weeks fighting among themselves over a White House proposal for dealing with terrorism suspects, and Democrats have stalled for more than a week approving the House bill to construct 700 miles of border fencing.

The most contentious immigration legislation approved by the House yesterday was a 277-140 vote to give state and local law enforcement more authority to combat illegal immigration. Also, it would close a decades-old loophole that bars federal officials from placing illegals from El Salvador into "expedited removal proceedings." The provision, adopted during El Salvador's 1980s civil war, means that suspected illegals often are freed back into the U.S. to await deportation proceedings but never heard from again.

DOJ_NMG_0067448

The vast majority of Republicans in the chamber were joined by 62 Democrats to approve the changes in policy.

The House also overwhelmingly approved a bill to allow federal officials to detain illegals for more than six months if they are awaiting deportation. The same bill also would bar illegals from obtaining political asylum if they are found to be part of a "criminal street gang." That bill passed on a 328-95 vote.

A third bill passed without objection and would close a loophole in current federal law. The Border Tunnel Prevention Act of 2006 would criminalize the construction and financing of border tunnels with criminal penalties of up to 20 years' imprisonment for persons who knowingly construct or help finance an unauthorized tunnel across a U.S. international border.

Under current law, it is illegal to cross over a border, but not under a border. In recent years, 39 such tunnels have been found along the southern border through which illegal aliens and large quantities of drugs are smuggled. That bill passed on a 422-0 vote.

While House Democrats say they would prefer a single comprehensive bill to address illegal immigration, many, including top party leaders, joined in supporting yesterday's measures.

"Overwhelmingly in our caucus there is support for bipartisan comprehensive immigration reform," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said yesterday. "Some of these things that they are putting forth piecemeal are awful; some are OK; but all of them are more acceptable in the context of comprehensive immigration reform. At the end of the day, if the issue is managed, there is a path to legalization, if the border is secure, if the workplace enforcement is there, if American workers are protected, then you can absorb some of these other initiatives they put forth. But standing alone, they don't manage the issue."

Immigration Ugliness (WP)

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

THE CYNICAL immigration endgame of the 109th Congress isn't particularly surprising. But after a session in which the Senate actually managed to produce a bipartisan, comprehensive measure to overhaul the existing system, the latest, enforcement-only developments are nonetheless disappointing and dangerous.

The House has passed, and the Senate seems ready to go along with, a measure to require construction of a 700-mile fence along the Mexican border. That would cost at least $2 billion, and that's in addition to a $2.5 billion initiative, entrusted to Boeing Co. this week, to erect "virtual fences" along the northern and southern borders.

A fence would damage relations with Mexico, harm the environment and, especially in the absence of broader changes, be ineffective. Even if a foolproof fence could be placed along every mile of the border, it wouldn't eliminate illegal immigration. Perhaps half of those in the country illegally did not slip secretly across a border but arrived through official entry points, using fraudulent documents or coming in legally and overstaying their visas.

But the fence is, sadly, the least offensive of the measures under consideration. On Wednesday, the House approved an unnecessary and arguably unconstitutional bill to require voters to show photo identification to take part in federal elections beginning in 2008; in 2010, the ID would have to demonstrate proof of citizenship. This would effectively disenfranchise many poor and elderly Americans, who are less likely to have, or be able to obtain, such documentation. It responds to a non-problem. The manifold challenges of election administration do not include large numbers of noncitizens trying to vote. The Senate should not go along.

Yesterday, the House passed another batch of immigration-related measures, the worst of which would deputize state and local law enforcement officers to enforce federal immigration laws. The measure would permit, but not require, state and local police to arrest and detain illegal immigrants for even civil violations of federal immigration law. This would undermine the ability of law enforcement to deter and prosecute violent crime. As New York Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg told the Senate Judiciary Committee in July, "Do we really want people who could have information about criminals -- including potential terrorists -- to be afraid to go to the police?"

The most disappointing aspect of the debate is the passive posture of President Bush. Mr. Bush could have used his bully pulpit to make clear the importance of comprehensive reform. He could promise to veto the bills on the understanding that enforcement measures, even justifiable ones, will be needed as leverage to obtain the comprehensive program he says he wants. Instead, he's meekly following the worst instincts of his fellow Republicans. "Yes, I'll sign it into law," Mr. Bush told CNN, adding, "If your question is, 'Will I stop trying to push for a comprehensive reform?' The answer is, 'No, I won't stop trying to push for comprehensive reform.' " With pushing like this, who needs opponents?

U.S. Project To Secure Borders Will Begin In Arizona Desert (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0067449

WASHINGTON, Sept. 21 — A rugged, largely unpopulated 28-mile stretch of desert southwest of Tucson will be the testing ground for the latest high-tech campaign by the United States government to wrestle control of the border, this time in a partnership with Boeing, the military and aerospace company.

Yet as top Department of Homeland Security officials and Boeing executives gathered here on Thursday to hail the start of the project — which will cost an estimated $2 billion over six years and eventually cover the entire 6,000 miles of the Mexican and Canadian borders — they acknowledged that the first challenge was disproving skeptics.

"The common complaint about the government is there is a lot of lofty rhetoric, but the achievement always falls short," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said. "We are very mindful of that. This is a very tall order. This is about a solution we believe is going to do the job."

Boeing, Mr. Chertoff formally announced, beat out other military contractors that had bid to be the engineer of sorts for the program, the Secure Border Initiative.

In that role, Boeing will be charged with lining up radar systems, cameras, ground sensors, aerial vehicles, wireless communications equipment and vehicle barriers, as well as traditional fences. It will also coordinate their use by a Border Patrol force that is supposed to be made up of 18,000 officers by 2008. That is the year by which the Department of Homeland Security intends to achieve "operational control" of the border.

"There have never been before all of these tools collected in one plan," said the department's deputy secretary, Michael Jackson. "It is a radical change in business as usual at the border."

The department is well aware of the decades of failed or incomplete border-security efforts, including most recently a program known as the Integrated Surveillance Intelligence System that turned out to be a $429 million flop.

In that effort, begun in 1997, the cameras often broke down, fogged up in the cold and rain, or were never installed as promised. Even when cameras or sensors set off alerts, they most often were false alarms or, if they were not, the Border Patrol often did not investigate them, a report by the department's inspector general said last year.

Given this track record, the department is starting small with a tiny section of the Arizona border, so it can quickly adjust if the strategy does not work. That means for now, the Boeing contract is worth $70 million, enough to cover setting up the management for the entire project and to pay for installing the equipment near the border post at Sasabe, Ariz., one of the busiest spots for illegal crossings.

"We recognize we are in a fish bowl here, and everybody will be watching, and we have to perform," said J. Wayne Esser, the Boeing executive who supervised the company's pitch for the contract. "Failure is not an option."

At Sasabe, Boeing intends to install nine tower-mounted camera and radar systems, to track movement, day or night, in any weather. Sensors will be buried in the ground to cover areas outside the radar's reach, Mr. Esser said. When the radar or camera notices activity, the cameras would be used to figure out how many people are involved, if they are on foot or in a vehicle or if the motion is an animal instead.

Border Patrol officers will be able to monitor the camera images from the field through wireless laptop connections. The officers will also probably have tiny unmanned aerial vehicles that can be launched from a truck to keep track of illegal immigrants until they can be caught.

Boeing will rely on subcontractors for most of the equipment. Its primary job, similar to the role it plays in building airplanes, will be to integrate all the parts into a working system, officials said. It will be given work orders in small increments, so Department of Homeland Security officials can monitor its performance.

"Build a little, prove it, build more," Mr. Jackson said.

The key, he said, will be figuring out how to use the Border Patrol staff most effectively to pick up the illegal immigrants and return them to Mexico or other countries of origin quickly enough so that the system is not overwhelmed.

Tamar Jacoby, a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute, a conservative research group, said the technology sounded impressive, but he wondered if it was enough.

"As long as you have half a million new jobs here going empty each year but for these workers, they are going to find a way to get around whatever obstacles we put in their way," Ms. Jacoby said.

About $700 million has been budgeted for the project this year and next. While officials had given an overall estimate of $2 billion, Mr. Chertoff refused to put a price on the project. "As inexpensive as possible" was all he said.

U.S. To Closely Watch Boeing's Border Plan (WP)

By Griff Witte And Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0067450

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said yesterday that the government learned its lessons from failed border-security initiatives and will move cautiously with its private-sector partner, Boeing Co., in the latest effort to use technology to curb illegal immigration.

In announcing that Boeing had won the Secure Border Initiative Network (SBInet) contract, Chertoff emphasized that his department would call the shots and keep close watch on the company's progress.

Homeland Security officials had been criticized by some immigration experts and lawmakers for indicating that the private sector would be given wide discretion in shaping a new system to secure 6,000 miles of land border. Previous attempts to do that have cost the government hundreds of millions of dollars but left little to show for it as equipment malfunctioned, agents were overwhelmed with false alarms and illegal immigration continued to climb.

"Prior efforts to put technology on the border have been focused on individual tools but have not been focused on integrating all the tools together as part of a comprehensive program," Chertoff said. SBInet, he said, will allow border patrol agents "to know when anybody or anything is crossing that border."

That will not happen for several years, at least. The SBInet program is estimated to be worth as much as $2.5 billion, but initially Boeing will be given just under $70 million to work on a high-traffic, 28-mile stretch of the border south of Tucson. Government officials want the company to fully deploy its technology there within the next eight months. Assuming the program receives funding from Congress, the company would expand its operations from there, working on other areas of the Mexican border first and then moving to the Canadian border. The contract runs for three years, with three option years.

Boeing beat four other competitors for the contract by proposing a network of 1,800 towers that could be used for surveillance and communications. Homeland Security officials said yesterday, however, that their choice of Boeing has not locked them into a specific number of towers or type of technology, and that the strategy will vary depending on the terrain and on what's working.

"At every step of the way as we roll out additional segments of the border under this contract, we will have the opportunity to negotiate the best price," Chertoff said. "We will have the opportunity to look for alternatives."

Chertoff's announcement was met with skepticism by T. J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council, which represents 11,000 agents. Bonner said giving agents a better sense of who is crossing the border and where wouldn't do much good on its own. "Surveillance technology can be useful if you have enough people on the ground to respond to it," he said. "But if you don't, you just have to file it away because you're too busy with the first 50 people that the cameras caught. It's not the solution to the illegal immigration problem. The solution is denying access to jobs so people don't come across in the first place."

The government's most recent attempt to use technology to enhance border security triggered too many false alarms to be effective. Boeing has said that its technology is more sophisticated and can better distinguish between genuine threats and routine movement.

Even if the technology behind SBInet works, there remains the challenge of integrating it with other border security programs. SBInet does not cover ports of entry, and it does not involve patrolling the coasts.

Boeing executive Wayne Esser said in an interview this month that he hopes more surveillance will deter some people from trying to cross borders illegally at all. But he conceded that it could merely shift the problem elsewhere. "It'll put a lot more pressure on the ports of entry, and it's going to put a lot more pressure on our coastal borders," he said.

Pickers Are Few, And Growers Blame Congress (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

LAKEPORT, Calif. — The pear growers here in Lake County waited decades for a crop of shapely fruit like the one that adorned their orchards last month.

“I felt like I went to heaven,” said Nick Ivicevich, recalling the perfection of his most abundant crop in 45 years of tending trees.

Now harvest time has passed and tons of pears have ripened to mush on their branches, while the ground of Mr. Ivicevich’s orchard reeks with rotting fruit. He and other growers in Lake County, about 90 miles north of San Francisco, could not find enough pickers.

Stepped-up border enforcement kept many illegal Mexican migrant workers out of California this year, farmers and labor contractors said, putting new strains on the state’s shrinking seasonal farm labor force.

Labor shortages have also been reported by apple growers in Washington and upstate New York. Growers have gone from frustrated to furious with Congress, which has all but given up on passing legislation this year to create an agricultural guest-worker program.

DOJ_NMG_0067451

Last week, 300 growers representing every major agricultural state rallied on the front lawn of the Capitol carrying baskets of fruit to express their ire.

This year's shortages are compounding a flight from the fields by Mexican workers already in the United States. As it has become harder to get into this country, many illegal immigrants have been reluctant to return to Mexico in the off-season. Remaining here year-round, they have gravitated toward more stable jobs.

"When you're having to pay housing costs, it's very difficult to survive and wait for the next agricultural season to come around," said Jack King, head of national affairs for the California Farm Bureau Federation.

California farms employ at least 450,000 people at the peak of the harvest, with farm workers progressing from one crop to the next, stringing together as much as seven months of work. Growers estimate the state fell short this harvest season by 70,000 workers. Joe Bautista, a labor contractor from Stockton who brings crews to Lake County, said about one-third of his regular workers stayed home in Mexico this year, while others were caught by the Border Patrol trying to enter the United States.

With fewer workers, Mr. Bautista fell behind in harvests near Sacramento and arrived weeks late in Lake County. "There was a lot of pressure on the contractors," he said. "But there is only so much we can do. There wasn't enough labor."

For years, economists say, California farmers have been losing their pickers to less strenuous, more stable and sometimes higher-paying jobs in construction, landscaping and tourism.

"If you want another low-wage job, you can work in a hotel and not die in the heat," said Marc Grossman, the spokesman for the United Farm Workers of America. The union calculates that up to 15 percent of California's farm labor force leaves agriculture each year.

As they sum up this season's losses, estimated to be at least $10 million for California pear farmers alone, growers in the state mainly blame Republican lawmakers in Washington for stalling immigration legislation that would have addressed the shortage by authorizing a guest-worker program for agriculture. Many growers, a dependably Republican group, said they felt betrayed.

"After a while, you get done being sad and start being really angry," said Toni Scully, a lifelong Republican whose family owns a pear-packing operation in Lake County. "The Republicans have given us a lot of lip service, and our crops are hanging on the trees rotting."

Tons more pears that were harvested were rejected by Mrs. Scully's packing plant because they were picked too late. The rejects were dumped in a farm lot, mounds of pungent fruit swarming with bees, left to be eaten by deer. "The anthem about the fruited plain," Mrs. Scully said sadly, "I don't think this is what they had in mind."

Some economists and advocates for farm workers say the labor shortages would ease if farmers would pay more. Lake County growers said that pickers' pay was not low — up to $150 a day — and that they had been ready to pay even more to save their crops. "I would have raised my wages," said Steve Winant, a pear grower whose 14-acre orchard is still laden with overripe fruit. "But there weren't any people to pay."

The tightening of the border with Mexico, begun more than a decade ago but reinforced since May with the deployment of 6,000 National Guard troops, has forced California growers to acknowledge that most of their workers are illegal Mexican migrants. The U.F.W. estimates that more than 90 percent of the state's farm workers are illegal.

Most California growers gave up years ago on recruiting workers through the seasonal guest-worker program currently in place. Known as H-2A, the program requires employers to prove they tried to find American workers and to apply well in advance for relatively small contingents of foreign workers for fixed time periods.

"Our experience with the current H-2A program has been a nightmare," said Luawanna Hallstrom, general manager of Harry Singh & Sons, a vine-ripe tomato grower based in Oceanside, near San Diego.

Ms. Hallstrom said her company tried to use the program in the months after the Sept. 11 attacks, when security checks forced it to fire illegal migrant employees who were working in tomato fields on a military base. Her company lost $2.5 million on that 2001 crop, she said.

Over the years, occasional programs to draw American workers to the harvests have failed. "Americans do not raise their children to be farm workers," Ms. Hallstrom said.

The failure of Congress to approve a new guest-worker program surprised California growers because a proposal that the Senate passed stemmed from a rare agreement between growers' organizations, the U.F.W. and other advocates for farm workers, and legislators ranging from conservative Republicans to liberal Democrats.

Known as AgJobs, the proposal would create a new temporary-resident status for seasonal farm workers and give them the chance to become permanent residents if they work intensively in agriculture for at least three years. It was included in a bill that passed the Senate in May. The House has passed several bills focused on border security, and has avoided negotiations with the Senate on a broader immigration overhaul. [Three of the House bills were passed Thursday.]

DOJ_NMG_0067452

Mr. Ivicevich, a 69-year-old family farmer, is not given to displays of emotion. But he paused for a moment, overwhelmed, as he stood among trees sagging with pears that oozed when he squeezed them. His nighttime sleep, in his cottage among his 122 acres of orchards, is disrupted by the thud of dropping fruit and the cracking of branches.

For decades, Mr. Ivicevich said, migrant pickers would knock on his door asking for work climbing his picking ladders. Then about five years ago they stopped knocking, and he turned to a labor contractor to muster harvest crews. This year, elated, he called the contractor in early August. Pears must be picked green and quickly packed and chilled, or they go soft in shipping.

"Then I called and I called and I called," Mr. Ivicevich said.

The picking crew, which he needed on Aug. 12, arrived two weeks late and 15 workers short. He lost about 1.8 million pounds of pears.

His neighbor, Mr. Winant, standing in his drooping orchard with his hands sunk in his jeans pockets, said he would rather bulldoze the pear trees than start preparing them for a new season.

"It's like a death, like a son died," said Mr. Winant, 45, who cares for the small orchard himself during the winter. "You work all year and then see your work go to ground. I want to pull them out because of the agony. It's just too hard to take."

Illegal Workers Supplant U.S. Ones, Report Says (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

New illegal immigrants accounted for 56 percent of the increase in employed workers in the United States in the five years after 2000, and competition from these immigrants contributed to a sharp decline in employment of teenage and young adult Americans, according to a labor market study released yesterday.

The survey found that in the five-year period, foreign-born workers, including both legal and illegal immigrants, made up 86 percent of the net increase in the total number of employed workers, the highest share for immigrants ever recorded in this country.

At the same time, the number of employed native workers ages 16 to 34 fell by more than 1.5 million. The study contends that 90 percent of the job deficit for young Americans would be erased if American teenagers and young adults held the jobs that immigrants now hold.

The study was carried out by Andrew Sum, Paul Harrington and Ishwar Khatiwada from the Center for Labor Market Studies at Northeastern University in Boston and was published by the Center for Immigration Studies, a group in Washington that advocates reducing immigration.

Last month a study by the Pew Hispanic Center, another Washington research organization, concluded that there was no nationwide pattern of displacement of American workers by immigrants.

Several economists noted that the past five years had been marked by a slow economic recovery that created unusually few jobs for all workers in the United States. They said that several factors contributed to declining employment among young people and that an increase in the number of youths going to college was one.

Employment rates have plummeted for young black men without high school diplomas.

"They face tremendous barriers, but immigrant competition is not the biggest one," said Jared Bernstein, an economist at the Economic Policy Institute, a Washington group that focuses on labor issues. "If immigrant competition were to drop significantly, they would still have big problems."

TAX:

I.R.S. Inquiry Into Sermon Is Challenged By Church (NYT)

By Stephanie Strom

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

A California church under investigation by the Internal Revenue Service for possible violations of laws against political activities by churches has denied the agency's request for documents.

The decision forces the I.R.S. either to drop the case or to ask the Justice Department to take the church, All Saints Episcopal Church, in Pasadena, to court. The agency could also revoke the church's tax exemption, but legal experts said that was unlikely.

The church said it regarded an I.R.S. investigation of an antiwar sermon delivered by the church's former rector on the Sunday before the 2004 election as an attack on freedom of speech and religion.

DOJ_NMG_0067453

"We have nothing to hide, but there are principles here we think we need to uphold," said Robert A. Long, the lay leader, or senior warden, of All Saints.

Mr. Long said the 26 members of the church's vestry, or governing body, had voted unanimously to decline to comply with two formal requests, called administrative summonses, for documents, testimony and other information that it received from the I.R.S. last Friday.

The church was making a point by requesting the summonses, which asked for documents ranging from copies of church policies and e-mail message to utility bills, as well as an interview with Rev. J. Edwin Bacon Jr., the rector. Mr. Bacon said the church asked for the formal process after receiving the second of two informal I.R.S. requests for information "that was far more intrusive and that we thought were clearly aiming to invade our worship practices, which is clearly illegal."

The request for formality is also a time-honored way of getting disputes with the I.R.S. into court, legal experts said.

"This looks like the short-cut way for the church to get the issue as to whether this is a valid investigation or not right into the court and allow it to rule on the constitutional issues," said Kevin J. Hasson, founder and chairman of the Becket Fund for Religious Liberty. "It's a perfectly respectably legal maneuver, not something like a militia movement refusing to put license plates on their cars."

Federal law prohibits the I.R.S. from discussing any specific taxpayer. In a statement outlining its general procedures, the agency noted that in cases involving questions of inappropriate political activity by churches and other charities, it rarely revokes tax exemption, preferring to work with organizations to bring them into compliance with the law.

"Speaking generally, Congress has said that churches and charities that are exempt from federal taxes are prohibited from speaking on behalf of, or against, any candidate in office," the statement said.

The role of churches and other charities in politics has increased as Republicans and Democrats alike have sought to tap into networks of members and donors. Charities are prohibited generally from what the I.R.S. calls "campaign intervention," but the boundaries between what is acceptable and what breaks the law are not always clear. Does allowing one candidate to use a church's plane, for instance, amount to support for that candidate that would run afoul of the prohibition on campaigning for a specific candidate?

Churches and other religious organizations have been hoping for a court case to clarify the issue, though most anticipated that a conservative church would be the first to challenge the I.R.S., not a left-leaning church like All Saints.

Mr. Bacon said that was precisely what the church was trying to do. "We're not trying to change the rules, we're trying to make sure the rules are interpreted the way the I.R.S. has always interpreted them in the past," he said.

He said the church had been critical of the internment of Japanese-Americans during World War II, the Vietnam War and the country's response to Sept. 11 without inciting I.R.S. inquiry. "My question is why now?" he said.

The I.R.S. has not said what part of the sermon the Rev. George F. Regas delivered at All Saints on Oct. 31, 2004, may have violated the law. In the sermon, Mr. Regas, the former rector, imagined Jesus chiding President Bush and his Democratic opponent, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, on topics including the war in Iraq, nuclear weapons, poverty and the increasing income gap.

He singled Mr. Bush out for criticism by portraying Jesus as saying things like "President Bush, you have not made dramatically clear what have been the human consequences of the war in Iraq" and "Mr. President, your doctrine of preemptive war is a failed doctrine."

Mr. Regas said in his sermon it was not his intent to tell his listeners how to vote. "When you go to the voting booth on Tuesday, take with you all that you know about Jesus the peacemaker," he said in closing. "Take all that Jesus means to you. Then vote your deepest values."

IRS Probe Of Cal Church Could Reverberate In Political Season (AP)

By Gillian Flaccus, The Associated Press

AP, September 22, 2006

PASADENA, Calif. - An Episcopal church's decision Thursday not to cooperate with an IRS investigation into an anti-war sermon delivered before the 2004 presidential election sets up a high-profile confrontation between the liberal congregation and the IRS, which usually keeps such inquiries private.

The leaders of the 3,500-member All Saints Church voted unanimously to resist an order to turn over documents related to the sermon, which was given just two days before the election. The decision means the IRS must decide whether to ask the Justice Department to pursue the case in court. A judge would then rule on the validity of the agency's demands.

Bob Long, the senior warden at All Saints, said the 26-member vestry voted unanimously early Thursday to reject the IRS' demands, which included an interview with the rector, copies of e-mails and internal correspondence and utility bills.

DOJ_NMG_0067454

"We're going to put it in their court - and in a court of law - so that we can get an adjudication to some very fundamental issues here that we see as an intolerable infringement of rights," Long said.

IRS spokesman Terry Lemon said he could not comment on the specific case and would not say whether the agency would request a court hearing. He instead issued a statement describing the procedure during such an investigation.

"If the entity ultimately declines to answer the summons, the IRS can ask the Justice Department to pursue the case in court," the statement read.

The dispute has attracted the attention of religious leaders on the right and left, who say the IRS' actions could make it more difficult for them to speak out on moral issues such as gay marriage and abortion during the midterm election campaign.

Under federal tax law, church officials can legally discuss politics, but to retain tax-exempt status they cannot endorse candidates or parties. Most who do so receive a warning.

The IRS, however, has promised tougher enforcement of the law during this year's mid-term elections and in the 2008 election cycle.

The agency completed investigations of 90 tax-exempt churches and charities in 2004 and found wrongdoing in 70 percent of the cases. Four - none of them churches - lost their tax-exempt status. In 2005, the agency began audits of 70 churches and charities and has 40 cases pending so far this year.

Earlier this week, the conservative Alliance Defense Fund and the Family Research Council sent letters to thousands of pastors informing them about their right to speak to congregations on issues in this year's elections, including abortion and gay marriage.

In recent years, Republicans in particular have teamed with conservative evangelical leaders to motivate would-be voters, a strategy credited with helping President Bush win re-election.

The dispute with All Saints centers on a sermon titled "If Jesus Debated Sen. Kerry and President Bush" that was delivered by guest pastor Rev. George Regas on Oct. 31, 2004. Though he did not endorse either President Bush or Sen. John Kerry, he said Jesus would condemn the Iraq war and Bush's doctrine of pre-emptive war.

"I believe Jesus would say to Bush and Kerry: 'War is itself the most extreme form of terrorism. President Bush, you have not made dramatically clear what have been the human consequences of the war in Iraq,'" Regas said, according to a transcript.

The IRS reprimanded the church in June 2005 and asked that it promise to be more careful. Church officials refused.

Last week, the IRS demanded documents and an interview with the rector by the end of the month.

According to the IRS, the only church ever to be stripped of its tax-exempt status for partisan politicking was the Church at Pierce Creek near Binghamton, N.Y., which was penalized in 1995 after running full-page ads against President Clinton in USA Today and The Washington Times in 1992 during election season.

All Saints member Sally Howard, of West Hollywood, said she agreed with the vestry's decision.

"The church should not back down from speaking to issues of peace and justice. And if that means that the church is going to face loss of its tax-exempt status, then that will be," she said. "We do not want to be in that position of being neutral or being silent because of the political ramifications."

Howard said Regas never urged parishioners to vote for particular candidates.

"He has never, and he didn't that day, he's never stated that a particular person should be voted for," she said.

All Saints Episcopal Church Won't Comply With IRS Probe (LAT)

By Louis Sahagun, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

Pasadena's All Saints Episcopal parish board challenges a request to turn over documents in a case over a 2004 antiwar sermon.

A liberal Pasadena church on Thursday declared that it will refuse to comply with an IRS investigation into its tax-exemption status launched after a guest speaker was critical of President Bush in a sermon.

At a news conference attended by 50 cheering supporters gathered before the marble altar at All Saints Episcopal Church, the Rev. Ed Bacon said his 3,500-member congregation did not violate tax regulations barring tax-exempt organizations from endorsing or opposing candidates when a former rector, George F. Regas, criticized the Bush administration two days before the 2004 presidential election.

The Episcopal faith, the 58-year-old rector said, "calls us to speak to the issues of war and poverty, bigotry, torture, and all forms of terrorism … always stopping short of supporting or opposing political parties or candidates for public office."

Joined by members of other faiths, he added, "We are also not here for ourselves alone but to defend the freedom of pulpits in faith communities throughout our land."

DOJ_NMG_0067455

The All Saints case escalated a week ago when the IRS slapped the 80-year-old parish with a summons demanding that it turn over by Sept. 29 all materials, such as newsletters and sermons, produced during the 2004 election year with political references. Bacon was told to testify in person Oct. 11.

At stake, several religious leaders say, is freedom from government intimidation when churches address moral issues of the day from the pulpit.

In an interview, Richard Land, president of the Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission of the Southern Baptist Convention, said, "Churches should not endorse political candidates. But the IRS is seriously out of kilter and wrong-headed on this one; it's an appalling intrusion and it smacks of intimidation."

Now, as the November election approaches, some churches worry that they may be the next targets of the IRS. This summer, the agency issued a statement warning nonprofits, including churches, that it was stepping up its efforts to crack down on illegal electioneering.

The Interfaith Alliance announced Thursday that it has started distributing 20,000 pamphlets to churches, synagogues and mosques offering advice on how to comply with federal law.

The Rev. C. Welton Gaddy, president of the alliance, a national group with 185,000 members, said that he was concerned that "the recent rush of candidates and political parties — and their often aggressive tactics — to reach out to people of faith lures religious organizations into dangerous legal territory."

The goal, Gaddy said, is to avoid the kind of partisan politicking recently aired in a televised campaign ad for Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. (D-Tennessee), who is running for a Senate seat. The commercial is set inside a church.

Then there was Kansas Atty. Gen. Phill Kline, a Republican who, according to a four-page strategy memo leaked to the news media, told his reelection campaign to get pastors to recruit "money people" who could help his reelection campaign.

At All Saints, the 26-member vestry voted unanimously early Thursday to "challenge the IRS in a court of law," said senior warden Bob Long. Federal law prohibits the IRS from discussing a specific case. But in an interview Thursday, Steven T. Miller, commissioner of the agency's tax-exempt and government entities division, said the law is clear: The nation's roughly 1 million nonprofits, including churches, are barred from speaking on behalf of, or against, any candidate.

The law is not new; it dates back to 1954. What is new is a concern over the level of prohibited activity that the IRS has been seeing by charities and churches in recent years. A recent IRS report reviewed 87 completed cases of alleged illegal campaigning by nonprofits in the 2004 election cycle.

Of those closed cases, 71% were found to have engaged in what the agency called "political intervention." But in only four of those cases, none of them involving churches, did the IRS revoke a group's tax-exempt status.

If an entity declines to answer a summons in a case of alleged illegal campaigning, the IRS can ask the Justice Department to pursue the case in federal court, which is exactly what All Saints wants to happen.

"That is not to say that this challenge, as well as many other steps we have already taken to respond properly and timely to the IRS investigation, does not stretch us financially — it does," Long said. To help defray the legal costs, Bacon said All Saints, the largest Episcopal church west of the Mississippi, has created a new category of membership, "Solidarity Membership," for supporters of other faiths wishing to join the cause.

"We smell intimidation," said Maher Hathout, chairman of the Islamic Center of Southern California. "It smells rotten, and we should not allow any aspect of intimidation to be directed to any member of our great country."

Rabbi Steven Jacobs of Temple Kol Tikvah, who also attended the news conference, said, "There seems to be an assault upon the pulpit, and it seems to fit a pattern of focusing on those challenging our administration."

All Saints' public skirmish with the IRS is only the latest example of how it has been speaking out on political issues since a rector protested the internment of Japanese Americans during World War II. Bacon, a former Southern Baptist who was a conscientious objector during the Vietnam War, continues that tradition. The church has even posted documents central to the case on its website, http://www.allsaints-pas.org , and Bacon likes to say that social action is a requirement of religious faith.

Tax experts, however, expressed mixed opinions about the church's chances of prevailing against the IRS. A federal judge could order the church to produce the documents or face sanctions, including fines.

"It's very difficult to beat a summons in court," said Ed Robbins, an attorney specializing in tax exemption litigation. "At the end of the day, if the IRS digs in its heels and wants this data, they'll get it."

All Saint's, however, had welcome news about three weeks ago when one of its attorneys, Marcus Owens, a former head of the IRS exemption office, persuaded the IRS to drop an audit of the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People. That investigation was also sparked by a speech that criticized Bush and the Bush administration's war in Iraq.

Immediately after Thursday's news conference, Owens informed the IRS of the church's decision. "We believe the only way to challenge the IRS' actions in this case is through a summons enforcement proceeding in court," he told IRS officials in a letter, "and therefore the church respectfully declines to respond to the summons. Rev. Bacon will not appear to testify Oct. 11."

DOJ_NMG_0067456

louis.sahagun@latimes.com

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Rare Judicial Impeachment Hearing Ends With Little Action Taken (LAW)

By T.R. Goldman, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 22, 2006

A House Judiciary subcommittee on Thursday held a rare impeachment hearing for a California federal judge but reached no conclusions and appeared eager to let a special committee of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals finish its investigation before deciding whether to take up the matter in Congress again.

Judge Manuel Real, a Lyndon Johnson appointee who in November will have been a federal judge for 40 years, spent Thursday morning rebutting -- for the first time in public -- allegations that he had improperly seized control of a bankruptcy proceeding involving a woman whose criminal probation he was overseeing.

"I am here to tell you I categorically deny any misconduct on the bench," said Real, 82, who was seated next to his wife, Elizabeth, and lawyer and longtime friend, Donald Smaltz, the former independent counsel who a decade earlier had headed the investigation into former Clinton Agriculture Secretary Mike Espy. "I have never been sanctioned for any type of judicial misconduct."

Real has a reputation as a stern and autocratic jurist. "There are a lot of people who dislike you," said subcommittee member Chris Cannon, R-Utah. "No," responded Real, who spoke slowly but forcefully. "I don't think there are many people; I think there are a few."

One of those, the man who first filed the original complaint more than 2 1/2 years ago, is Stephen Yagman, a Venice, Calif., attorney whom Real fined $250,000 in 1984 for his conduct in a defamation case Real was handling. The sanction was later reversed by the 9th Circuit, but, Real noted, Yagman has had a "personal vendetta against me for over 20 years."

Yagman, in fact, has no connection to the underlying bankruptcy case. But under the 1980 Judicial Conduct and Disability Act, anyone, whether he is connected to the underlying case or not, can file a complaint against a federal judge.

"The issue for me is not what he did now, but the fact that he has been tormenting lawyers and litigants for 40 years and no one did anything about it and everyone knows about it," said Yagman in a telephone interview the day before Real's impeachment hearing.

The hearing, held by the House panel's subcommittee on the Court, was chaired by Lamar Smith, the Texas Republican who is on the short-list to take over the House Judiciary Committee when Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., steps down next year. "None of us on the subcommittee relishes this undertaking," said Smith.

Asked by subcommittee member Maxine Waters, D-Calif., whether he had been subpoenaed, Real replied, "I came by invitation, Ms. Waters, [although] I felt it was more than just an invitation."

The ethics case against Real is now in its fourth year and has followed a torturous path. The original complaint was filed in February 2003, then dismissed by the chief judge of the 9th Circuit, Mary Schroeder, six months later.

The 9th Circuit's Judicial Council, which handles misconduct complaints, sent the case back to Schroeder, who dismissed it again in November 2004.

The Judicial Council upheld the dismissal in September 2005 by a 7-3 vote, which included a blistering dissent by council member and 9th Circuit Judge Alex Kozinski.

The complaint was then sent to Washington, to the Judicial Conference Review Body, which reluctantly determined that it lacked jurisdiction to review the 9th Circuit case because Schroeder had failed to appoint a so-called special committee to investigate the allegations.

Less than a month later, on May 23, 2006, Schroeder appointed a "special committee" to investigate the complaints against Real. That committee's work is still in progress.

"I think we should have held off on this hearing to allow the special committee to do its job," noted the subcommittee's ranking member, California Democrat Howard Berman. Today's hearing, he added when it ended, "wasn't a wise thing to do."

Sensenbrenner has long pushed for more congressional oversight of the judiciary, and the long-running and disjointed 9th Circuit investigation of Real has provided an easy target for asserting committee jurisdiction.

Earlier this year, Sensenbrenner, who is term-limited and must give up the chairmanship in January, sponsored a bill that would create an inspector general to investigate complaints of judicial misconduct and allegations of fraud.

"The question is, How much of this is Sensenbrenner trying to do a last hurrah and throw his weight around, or how much of this is really going to happen?" noted a former congressional staffer who is closely following the Real impeachment. "Don't forget, Sensenbrenner is the same person taking the lead for pushing for the 9th Circuit split, which deals with the same chief judge," the ex-staffer added.

DOJ_NMG_0067457

Many social conservatives are eager to divide the circuit because its often liberal decisions affect not just California but many far more conservative Western states that are also part of the circuit's vast geographic reach.

Sensenbrenner was also instrumental in the last three impeachments of federal judges -- Walter Nixon, Harry Claibourne and Alcee Hastings -- all of whom were subsequently convicted and removed from office by the Senate. That's nearly half of the seven federal judges who have ever been impeached and removed from office.

And it was Sensenbrenner who introduced the resolution of impeachment against Real on July 17, singling out the failure of the 9th Circuit to discipline Real as his reason. "When the judicial branch has failed to address serious allegations of judicial misconduct, as the 9th Circuit arguably has in this matter, the Constitution provides the Congress only one course of action -- opening an impeachment inquiry," Sensenbrenner said when he introduced his resolution.

The hearing, coincidentally or not, came just two days after a panel headed by Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer released a long-awaited report on judicial discipline, a report that singled out the investigations into Real's alleged misconduct and four other so-called high-profile complaints as "problematic."

Still, the panel's two expert witnesses, Indiana University School of Law professor Charles Geyh and Pittsburgh School of Law's Arthur Hellman, seemed to agree that it would be tough for the allegations against Real, if proved true, to reach the bar needed for impeachment, much less conviction, by the Senate.

"An isolated act of simple favoritism, absent a pattern, doesn't rise to the level of an impeachable offense," Geyh told the half-dozen subcommittee members in attendance.

Tony Snow (CSM)

By David Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, September 22, 2006

Dodging questions is a key part of the White House press secretary's assignment. At one point in a Monitor-sponsored breakfast with reporters on Thursday, Tony Snow, press secretary and assistant to the president quipped, "I'm going to engage in a little cotton-mouthed diplo-speak."

It is an example of the self-deprecatory humor that Snow has brought to the White House since his first briefing on May 8. "I must say the first day I was absolutely scared stiff because I did not know what to expect, I had never done anything like it," Snow says.

Snow's predecessor in the post, Scott McLellan, was a long-time Bush loyalist who stuck closely to his talking points and seldom seemed to be enjoying himself in the verbal give and take with reporters. It is not clear whether reporters get more information from Snow. But the White House informational diet is clearly being served up now with greater verbal dexterity and humor.

Snow says that what he brings is a major change in attitude toward the press. "I don't come out of the political side where a lot of times you see people coming out of the political side and they will look at the press room and they will look at it as a den of vipers, a seething hostile mass," Snow said. "What I see is a lot of people trying to get information so they can write a story...I think the change in the point of view makes all the difference in the world."

Before moving to Fox News, Snow had a long career in newspapers, working for the Greensboro Record, The Virginian-Pilot, The Detroit News, and The Washington Times. His newspaper column was syndicated to more than 200 papers.

So he relishes the reporting aspect of his current position. "The one thing that I hadn't counted on that I rather enjoy is that the press secretary's job is a reporting job," Snow said. "So in any given day we take a close look at a lot of stories and my first answer is, 'well what is going on here?' and so you make the calls. And you call around and you talk to people who are involved."

Getting ready to answer reporters' questions at two formal sessions a day involves intense preparation. There are days when Snow, a self-described "night person" gets up at 3:45 a.m. to prepare. "The biggest challenge is... just trying to make sure you know enough about the things that are going to be of interest to reporters," he says. "There are a lot of days I come in and I've got to study to the exam. And then, over time, I develop the kind of background that will enable me with greater confidence to give detailed answers to such questions. But it is fun."

Part of the fun is having a voice in policy making. Snow sought assurances on that front before taking the job. "I think when I was talking about having a policy role, I was pushing against an open door," Snow said. "Obviously, when it comes to getting involved in the thickets of [the Geneva Convention's] Common Article Three I just keep my yap shut. That's a lawyers' issue. On the other hand, on issues where I have long experience having been in the business for 28 years as a reporter and editorial writer ... there are areas where I have built up a certain amount of intellectual capital and I certainly put in my two cents worth."

DOJ_NMG_0067458

When he was asked about White House negotiations with Senate Republicans over legislation regarding treatment of terrorism suspects, Snow said, "the status is ongoing ...this is like warm milk on the kitchen counter right now. Whatever news I can get you will turn to yogurt by the time you get back to the office."

Turning to the international scene, and efforts to end the genocide in the Darfur region of Sudan, Snow said, "There are behind the scenes, ongoing diplomatic efforts to try to put together the right kind of coalitions of influence that will enable a blue-helmeted UN force to enter Darfur. The president has been speaking about Darfur for a very long time. He has been pressuring the United Nations, pushing the United Nations to acknowledge the genocide that is going on and to act aggressively to deal with it. He is continuing to do so. There is considerable behind-the-scenes diplomacy taking place right now that I am not at liberty to discuss but at some point it will become known. But let me just assure you that the president has been very actively engaged."

With the upcoming Congressional elections marking the start of the final two year's of Mr. Bush's term, Snow was asked about the president's legacy. "The president is not really a legacy guy," Snow said. "Last year he read three biographies of George Washington who, having been dead for 207 years, is still the subject of reappraisal. And if you are visiting that upon arguably the most popular president in American history and certainly one of the most consequential, the idea that you are somehow you are going to be able to retire to Crawford knowing what your legacy is is pure folly. So his view is to do the job and do it the best he can and take on big issues."

Presidential Ratings Rise With New Message Man (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

Former talk show host Tony Snow took over as President Bush's communications point man four months ago, beefing up the press office staff, honing internal operations and deploying a quick-response strategy.

Now, polls show, the president's approval rating has jumped to its highest level since January.

Could Mr. Snow be responsible for the surge?

"We're just busy going out and trying to be as aggressive as we can in getting the message out," Mr. Snow says. "Part of the challenge is to explain what we are doing and why. ... Sometimes you have to let people know very clearly what the policy is and that is one of our key aims."

The operation has changed dramatically in recent months after crucial missteps, including last year's dead-on-arrival nomination of White House counsel Harriet Miers to the Supreme Court and this year's fiasco over the proposal to allow a company based in the United Arab Emirates to manage U.S. port operations.

Joshua B. Bolten took over as chief of staff and immediately brought in Mr. Snow, a longtime friend and confidant. Since then, the pair have been at the head of efforts to refocus the White House message and the way it is disseminated.

"If there is an operative philosophy for me, it's 'flood the zone,'" says Mr. Snow, using a football term to describe overwhelming the opponent. "If we spin you," he told reporters at a hotel near the White House yesterday, "we die."

Even though he says he was "absolutely scared stiff because I didn't know what to expect, I'd never done anything like it," Mr. Snow says he has fallen in love with the job he has performed since May.

"The most pleasant surprise about this job has been how much fun it is," he says. "I've never had a day when I've gone home and kicked the dog out of frustration. ... I can't think of another job that I would willingly wake up as early as I do for" -- 3:45 a.m. on some days.

But since he took over as the chief White House spokesman, the former television and radio host -- who also once wrote editorials for The Washington Times -- has learned to use the skills he picked up in his 28 years in journalism.

"The press secretary's job is a reporting job," he says, noting that, even with an office right down the hall from the president, he spends a lot of his day calling others in the administration, asking, "What's going on here?"

"And sometimes phone calls are not returned as quickly as you want," he told the reporters, who laughed, knowing that plight well.

As for standing at the podium on behalf of the most powerful man in the United States, Mr. Snow says "there are a lot of days when I come in and I've got to study for the exam." Some reporters have complained that their former colleague doesn't always know the answer to tough questions, and he acknowledged that "the biggest challenge is ... just trying to make sure that you know enough about the things that are going to be of interest to reporters."

Mr. Snow has direct access to his boss. If he needs to know something, he says, "I'll walk into the Oval Office and get it straight from the president."

Mr. Snow sits in on policy discussions with Cabinet members and senior staff. He says views are expressed in frank exchanges, although the president has the job of "making the call at the end of the day."

DOJ_NMG_0067459

"There are areas where I have built up a certain amount of intellectual capital and I certainly put up my 2 cents' worth. You have an obligation to give your best advice, and if you lose, you lose," he says. "Nobody elected you; they elected the president. But I think it is incumbent upon people to give their best and most honest advice."

Probe Finds Jackson Urged Favoritism In HUD Contracts (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

An inspector general's report charges that top U.S. housing official Alphonso Jackson urged staff members to favor friends of President Bush when awarding Department of Housing and Urban Development contracts. But investigators so far have found no direct proof that Jackson's staff obeyed.

His chief of staff told investigators that Jackson, the HUD secretary, "personally intervened with contractors whom he did not like . . . these contractors had Democratic political affiliations," says the report, a copy of which was made available to The Washington Post.

The investigation "did not disclose any pattern or practice of issuing contracts based on political affiliation . . . however, there were some limited instances where political affiliation may have been a factor in contract issues involving Jackson," the report says.

Awarding contracts on the basis of party affiliation violates federal law.

The 340-page report by the Criminal Investigations Division of HUD's Office of Inspector General has been released to Jackson for a response and given to members of Congress who requested it. A spokesman for the office declined to say whether the report would be released publicly.

Calls for an inquiry came after Jackson, Bush's onetime neighbor in Dallas and former housing authority chief in that city, told attendees at a public forum in Dallas on April 28 that he had killed a contract award to a firm after its chief told Jackson he disliked Bush. Jackson later took back his remarks and told investigators from the inspector general's office that he had "lied, and I regret having done that."

The investigation found "no evidence that a contract was canceled, rescinded, terminated or not issued as a result of the encounter between Secretary Jackson and the contractor," the report says.

Jackson said the report cleared him of wrongdoing. "As I stated previously, during my tenure, no contract has been cancelled, rescinded, terminated, awarded or not awarded due to the personal or political benefits of the recipient," he said in a statement released yesterday.

"I sincerely regret my April 28 remarks that led to this investigation."

Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.), who called for Jackson's resignation after the April incident, disagreed.

"The President should not tolerate this type of activity by a member of his Cabinet," Lautenberg said in a statement yesterday. "Given the allegations made by very credible witnesses in the Inspector General's report, the Department of Justice needs to get involved."

According to two senior HUD officials, at a staff meeting this year "Jackson had advised . . . that when considering discretionary contracts, they should be considering supporters of the president," the report says.

"I don't recall doing that. They might have misconstrued it," the report quoted Jackson as saying.

Jackson, who reports directly to the White House, "indicated that he did have a bias, in that he wasn't likely to assist someone who would 'castigate' him or the president, although he would not interfere with a contract on that basis," the report reads.

The report describes investigators' research into the political contributions of 29 companies that received HUD contracts. The sample found that officers and key staff members at the 29 winning companies "contributed $101,931 to Republican candidates and $45,320 to Democratic candidates."

Investigators also describe Jackson's personal involvement with contracts and contractors. Jackson "would meet with individuals who were either contractors or who wanted to obtain contracts at HUD," the report said. A former HUD lawyer was quoted as saying "we warned him against it."

The report contains a lengthy description of delays in releasing a contract to Massachusetts-based Abt Associates, after Jackson objected. Though the award had already been granted and publicized, Jackson's dislike of the firm -- which his chief of staff said was politically motivated -- put the release in limbo for weeks while staffers scrambled to satisfy him and allay outside concerns over the delays.

Jackson told investigators his dislike was based on the quality of the firm's work, "an assertion rendered problematic by other testimony and evidence," the report says, including Abt's high marks in the agency's own evaluation process.

DOJ_NMG_0067460

The report says the HUD Office of Inspector General plans to evaluate whether "a more comprehensive audit of HUD contracting activities is feasible and warranted." A spokesman for the office declined to say when that decision would be made.

HUD Chief's Remarks Aside, Study Finds No Favoritism (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 21 — The Bush administration's housing secretary told his aides that they should consider the political leanings of contractors in awarding agency business, an investigation has found. But the inquiry found "no direct evidence" that political favoritism was linked to specific grants or contracts.

Three top officials of the Department of Housing and Urban Development testified that Secretary Alphonso R. Jackson had told them that "it was important to consider presidential supporters when candidates for HUD discretionary contracts were being considered," the department's inspector general, Kenneth M. Donohue, wrote.

Aronetta Baylor, now an assistant deputy secretary and formerly the department's chief procurement officer, told investigators under oath that Mr. Jackson had once said, in the report's exact words, "You know, if we weren't here, if the president hadn't appointed us, they wouldn't be (expletive) getting these contracts."

"And he said that makes him mad that they don't realize that," Ms. Baylor testified.

Ms. Baylor's account is in a 340-page report drawn up by Anthony G. Medici, special agent in charge of the inspector general's criminal investigations division. The report, dated Sept. 18, has not been made public. Its contents were disclosed on Thursday by The Dallas Morning News. The report itself was made available to The New York Times by aides to Democratic lawmakers who have been critical of Mr. Jackson.

It is illegal under federal procurement law to reward or punish contractors on the basis of their political views.

The inquiry, which includes testimony from dozens of witnesses including Mr. Jackson, arose from the secretary's boast on April 28 that he had scuttled a contract for advertising services because the person who was about to get it had been critical of President Bush.

In fact, Mr. Medici's investigation found, no contract was canceled or rescinded under the circumstances described by Mr. Jackson before a real estate forum in Dallas. But a reporter for The Dallas Business Journal heard the remark, and his account touched off a controversy that is not likely to end with the inspector general's report.

Some witnesses testified more than once during the inquiry. Before concluding that there was no direct evidence of political favoritism in the awarding of contracts, Mr. Donohue's office reviewed 22 contracts involving property management, advertising and other services.

Although the inspector general's office concluded that Mr. Jackson had not torpedoed a contract, as he had boasted, the investigation uncovered "instances of Secretary Jackson personally intervening with contractors whom he did not like," the inquiry found.

The report said the inspector general's office would consider undertaking "a more comprehensive audit of HUD contracting activities."

"I lied, and I regret having done that," Mr. Jackson testified during the inquiry. He told the inspector general that his account had been "an exaggeration," the report said.

Soon after his Dallas remarks were reported in early May, Mr. Jackson said he regretted his "anecdotal remarks," which he said were meant to illustrate how things work in Washington.

Mr. Jackson affirmed his regrets in an interview with The Dallas Morning News. "I've never done anything illegal or unethical, and I didn't do it this time, other than shoot off my mouth," he said. "That's what I did, and I made a serious mistake doing it."

Among Mr. Jackson's strongest Democratic critics are Senator Frank R. Lautenberg of New Jersey and Representative Henry A. Waxman of California, who are on their chambers' governmental affairs committees, and Representative Barney Frank of Massachusetts.

All expressed outrage after the Dallas episode, and Mr. Lautenberg said Mr. Bush should demand Mr. Jackson's resignation if the accounts of the Dallas speech were accurate. Mr. Jackson has headed the department since March 31, 2004.

Mr. Lautenberg renewed his criticism of the secretary on Thursday.

"The inspector general's report contains very serious charges that need to be reviewed by the Department of Justice," the senator said. "This episode cannot be ignored by Congress. We must hold hearings to get to the bottom of this case. However, I am concerned that Republicans will sweep this under the rug."

Don't Let Him Near The Checkbook (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0067461

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

President Bush's selection of former Agency for International Development chief Andrew Natsios as special envoy to try to halt the violence in Darfur drew mixed reviews from those involved in the region.

His task will be to get the Sudanese government to allow 20,000 U.N. peacekeepers in to stanch the horror in Darfur -- something the government has refused to do.

Natsios, though perhaps not as high-profile choice as might be hoped, could turn out to be a good selection -- he is well-versed on the issues, knows the country and the situation. But, we trust, he'll not be allowed to have anything to do with drawing up aid budgets for the region. We recall his famous prediction, back on April 23, 2003, when he told an incredulous Ted Koppel on ABC's "Nightline" that the rebuilding tab for Iraq would be $1.7 billion.

"You're not suggesting that the rebuilding of Iraq is going to be done for $1.7 billion?" Koppel asked.

"Well, in terms of the American taxpayers' contribution, I do," Natsios said. "This is it for the U.S. The rest of the rebuilding of Iraq will be done by other countries who have already made pledges -- Britain, Germany, Norway, Japan, Canada -- and Iraqi oil revenues. . . . But the American part of this will be $1.7 billion. We have no plans for any further-on funding for this."

Nope, no plans at all.A Hiring First at State?

Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, is back in town for a bit -- and that has sparked chatter that maybe he'll be named deputy secretary of state, maybe with a specific portfolio of Iraq and Afghanistan.

The chatter is likely idle, generated by the fact that the post has been vacant since Robert Zoellick 's departure almost three months ago and that many names have been floated as his replacement. One big concern would be pulling Khalilzad out of Iraq, but there is some thinking in Baghdad that he may have done as much there as he can do.

Our research isn't complete, but we'll go out on a limb and say it appears he would be the first Sunni deputy secretary.

Given the Senate's scheduled departure next Friday, the deputyship would be filled, if at all, by a recess appointment or by an "acting" deputy until after the Nov. 7 elections.Bolton Possibly in Limbo

Speaking of recess appointments, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee calendar has a business meeting scheduled for Tuesday, with votes to be taken on two nominations -- but nothing is scheduled for U.N. Ambassador John Bolton . His recess appointment ends no later than Jan. 3 unless he gets confirmed, but it appears that Sen. Lincoln "Roadblock" Chafee (R-R.I.) hasn't budged -- yet.GAO's Car and Driver

A Loop Fan driving north on the George Washington Memorial Parkway in Virginia calls to say he was headed to work downtown a bit after 7 a.m. and a "black Cadillac scoots in front of me . . . license plate GAO 0001." Our caller said he passed and noticed "someone reading papers in the back, but the windows were tinted."

So David Walker , head of the Government Accountability Office, the watchdog guarding against waste and fraud, is chauffeured to work?

"It's a black Chrysler 300," corrects GAO spokesman Paul Anderson . "And by statute, the comptroller general has the right to be driven to and from work." Walker, however, drives himself "90 percent of the time," but he had a bike accident over Labor Day weekend. He broke his collarbone and four ribs, and hasn't been able to drive.

"We have the X-rays to prove it," Anderson said.More Common-Sense Lawmaking

The Democrats think they're going to take over the House if they can sell their spurious allegation that this is a "do-nothing" Congress. It's going to be a hard sell because the House intends to work hard in the remaining days of this session.

We note action was pending this week on H Con Res 235: Expressing the sense of the Congress that States should require candidates for driver's licenses to demonstrate an ability to exercise greatly increased caution when driving in the proximity of a potentially visually impaired individual .Mazel Tov, Etc.

The Jewish High Holidays begin tonight, capping a week in which it was learned that Sen. George Allen 's mom was Jewish. That means, as far as Jewish law is concerned, Allen is considered Jewish, able to fly over to Tel Aviv and claim immediate citizenship.

Loop Fans have been writing in with congratulations, new year's wishes and a hearty "L'shana tova."

Payment To Lewis Aide Is Cleared (LAT)

By Tom Hamburger

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — The House Ethics Committee on Thursday cleared a longtime aide to House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis of any breach of rules for accepting a nearly $2-million payout from his former lobbying firm.

The aide, Jeffrey Shockey, received $1.96 million in severance payments when he left Washington-based Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White to return to work for Lewis (R-Redlands) as deputy staff director of the Appropriations Committee. Federal investigators are examining the relations between the firm, which specialized in appropriations matters, and Lewis.

DOJ_NMG_0067462

Since federal investigators began looking into links among lobbyists, powerful members of Congress and the special appropriations known as earmarks, the firm has received unwanted attention and split into two companies.

Federal investigators have requested information from the firm's clients who have received appropriations earmarks, including several communities in Southern California represented by Shockey.

Ethics Committee staffers were specifically reviewing whether Shockey's 2005 payout from Copeland Lowery might have broken rules that prohibit congressional staff from receiving income earned after becoming federal employees. But Shockey showed the committee documents revealing that his compensation was based on work completed before he returned to Capitol Hill.

"It appears that the terms of your buyout agreement are consistent with applicable laws and House rules," wrote Reps. Howard L. Berman (D-Valley Village) and Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) the top ranking members of the ethics panel.

A spokesman for Shockey said the congressional aide was pleased by the committee's statement and decision to cease further review of the matter. "Jeff Shockey said all along he wanted to do things by the book," spokesman Trent Duffy said. "Now he welcomes the fact that the official judges agreed" he has done so.

Although Shockey apparently violated no laws or official standards in reporting his compensation, his move from the Capitol to lobbying firm and back to the Capitol remains an example of the "revolving door" in Washington. It also shows the extraordinary amounts of money private interests are willing to pay for help in getting earmarks into appropriations bills.

Defense contractors, universities and municipalities have paid high fees to lobbyists who they believed could help get these spending directives for them. The lobbyists, in turn, often made large campaign contributions to lawmakers such as Lewis who preside over the process.

Shockey, who worked for Lewis in the 1990s as a congressional aide, became one of a category of lobbyists in Washington that specialized in appropriations matters. His former employer is a specialist in earmark lobbying and helped Lewis raise tens of thousands of dollars in campaign contributions.

One of the firm's senior partners was Bill Lowery, a former Southern California congressman and close friend of Lewis.

Shockey's lawyers have said he did nothing wrong and noted that he has not been contacted by federal investigators looking into Lewis and his relationship with the lobbying firm.

The President, Up Close And Personal (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

President Bush sat for interviews with the hosts of the three network evening news programs in recent weeks, surrounding the anniversaries of Hurricane Katrina and the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. The interviews focused mostly on the administration's response to the devastation of the Gulf Coast, and its performance in the Iraq war and its anti-terrorism effort. But anchors Charles Gibson of ABC, Brian Williams of NBC and Katie Couric of CBS also offered a window into the president's mind-set and personal life. Here are some excerpts:

On his frustrations: "The death of innocent people and our soldiers. That's the hardest thing for me. I meet with a lot of the families. And -- I do the best I can to cry with them or, you know, laugh with them if they wanna laugh and hug them." (CBS)

On when he is overwhelmed with emotion : "Generally, it's triggered when I meet somebody who lost their loved one . . . and that happens fairly frequently. . . . It's a good sign you're able to empathize, that your heart breaks for somebody who suffered. . . . Tears can get contagious, as far as I'm concerned." (ABC)

On his relationship with his father: "My relationship is adoring son. . . . My dad means the world to me as a loving dad. He gave me the greatest gift a father can give a child, which is unconditional love. And, you know, we go out and float around there [at the family retreat in Kennebunkport, Maine] and try to catch some fish and chat and talk. But he understands what it means to be president. . . . I explain exactly . . . how I view the current tensions. And he takes it onboard and he leaves me with this thought, "I love you, Son.' " (NBC)

On his reading habits, which recently included "The Stranger" by Albert Camus: "I was in Crawford and I said -- I was looking for a book to read, and Laura said, 'You ought to try Camus.' I also read three Shakespeares. . . . I'm reading about the battle of New Orleans right now. I've got an eclectic reading list."

Census Data On Some Of 1,100 Missing Laptops (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, September 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0067463

The Commerce Department said Thursday that 1,100 of its laptops have been lost or stolen, including some that contain personal information collected by the Census Bureau.

Department officials said that the potential loss of personal data was limited, however, and that it is unaware of any data being improperly used.

“The amount of missing computers is high, but fortunately, the vulnerability for data misuse is low,” Secretary Carlos Gutierrez said in a statement disclosing the discovery. “While we know of no instances of personal information being improperly used, we regret each instance of lost material.”

The announcement followed a review of more than 30,000 computers used by department personnel dating to 2001. Of that total, the department said 1,137 were lost, stolen or missing, and 249 of those computers contained personally identifiable information. Each laptop contains information on an estimated 20-30 households.

“All of the equipment that was lost or stolen contained protections to prevent a breach of personal information, and we are moving to institute better management, accountability, inventory controls, 100% encryption and improved training," Gutierrez said.

Most of the missing laptops were from the Census Bureau. It used field representatives to compile survey data across the country using laptop computers. The department said the Census Bureau had in place technological means to protect that data and make it inaccessible, once entered in databases, even to the workers using the laptops.

The disclosure follows a series of other computer losses. The Veterans Affairs Department said a laptop with information on 26.5 million current and former military personnel was stolen in May. The laptop was recovered and the FBI said personal data had not been copied.

1,100 Laptops Missing From Commerce Dept. (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

More than 1,100 laptop computers have vanished from the Department of Commerce since 2001, including nearly 250 from the Census Bureau containing such personal information as names, incomes and Social Security numbers, federal officials said yesterday.

This disclosure by the department came in response to a request by the House Committee on Government Reform, which this summer asked 17 federal departments to detail any loss of computers holding sensitive personal information.

Of the 10 departments that have responded, the losses at Commerce are "by far the most egregious," said David Marin, staff director for the committee. He added that the silence of the remaining seven departments could reflect their reluctance to reveal problems of similar magnitude.

In a private briefing yesterday for three members of Congress, Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez estimated that the disappearance of laptops from the Census Bureau could have compromised the personal information of about 6,200 households, Marin said. He said the department was still trying to determine the extent of the problem.

"We don't know exactly how many computers were lost or whether personal information was compromised," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), who chairs the House Government Reform Committee and attended the briefing. "The secretary has assured me that getting that information is priority number one, and I'm confident he'll get his arms around the problem."

Commerce officials told the congressmen that the inventory of missing laptops had escalated rapidly in recent weeks as the department investigated the disappearances. Marin said the committee was concerned that that number could increase significantly as Commerce officials learn more about missing handheld computers, which are increasingly being used in the Census Bureau.

Commerce officials said in a statement that they knew of no instances in which information from the missing laptops had been improperly accessed, adding that all the equipment contained safeguards that would prevent a breach of personal data.

"The amount of missing computers is high, but fortunately, the vulnerability for data misuse is low," Gutierrez said in the statement.

With its disclosure, Commerce is the latest federal agency to admit in recent months that it had lost laptops with sensitive personal data. In May, an employee of the Department of Veterans Affairs lost a laptop containing unencrypted information on about 26.5 million people. Three months later, Veterans Affairs acknowledged that a second computer, with information on about 38,000 hospital patients in Pennsylvania, was also missing.

The Federal Trade Commission has lost two laptops with files containing people's financial account numbers, and the Department of Agriculture announced that one of its laptops had disappeared along with personal information on about 350 employees.

DOJ_NMG_0067464

Gutierrez and his staff told the congressmen that 1,137 laptops had been stolen, lost or otherwise vanished since 2001, mostly from the Census Bureau and the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration. Of these, 249 contained personally identifiable information, nearly all from the Census Bureau. All were password-protected, a low-level safeguard. Only 107 of the computers were fully encrypted.

Commerce Department Has Lost 1,137 Laptops Since 2001 (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Commerce Department has lost 1,137 laptop computers since 2001, most of them assigned to the Census Bureau, officials said Thursday night.

The Census Bureau, the main collector of information about Americans, lost 672 computers. Of those, 246 contained some personal data, the department said in a statement. However, no personal information from any of the missing computers has been known to have been improperly used, the department said.

The number of people affected by the equipment losses could not be determined, the department said.

"All of the equipment that was lost or stolen contained protections to prevent a breach of personal information," said Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez. "The amount of missing computers is high, but fortunately, the vulnerability for data misuse is low."

More than 30,000 laptops were used within the department's 15 operating unit since 2001, the department said, and a total of 1,137 were stolen or missing.

Fifteen handheld devices used to record survey data for testing processes in preparation for the 2010 Census also were lost, the department said. The department was in the process of contacting the 558 households with data recorded on the missing devices, although because of encryption technology, the risk of data misuse was considered low, it said.

A half-dozen other federal agencies or departments have reported data thefts and security breaches involving personal information in the last six months.

The Veterans Affairs Department suffered the biggest loss with the theft in May of a laptop and external drive containing information for 26.5 million veterans and active-duty troops. Burglars stole the equipment from the home of a Veterans Affairs employee, but the computer was later recovered and showed no signs of having been accessed for the personal data.

Other government departments reporting the loss of computers with personal information include the departments of Agriculture, Defense, Education, Energy, Health and Human Services and Transportation. The Federal Trade Commission also has lost laptops with sensitive data.

Capitol Police Revise Details On Intruder (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

Contradicting earlier reports, officials said yesterday that an armed man who raced into the U.S. Capitol this week was stopped by employees of the Flag Office -- not by Capitol Police officers.

The episode exposed gaps in security of the Capitol building and grounds, and legislators are expected to meet Tuesday to grill U.S. Capitol Police about what went wrong. The suspect, Carlos Greene, 20, who was described as high on drugs, drove through a construction entrance partially blocked by a Capitol Police vehicle at 7:45 a.m. Monday and smashed into a concrete wall. He jumped from his vehicle and dashed into the domed building, outrunning police in a wild, four-story chase.

At a news conference Monday, Acting Capitol Police Chief Christopher M. McGaffin said his officers had subdued Greene in a basement office used to fill orders for flags that have flown over the Capitol. But yesterday, McGaffin acknowledged that three employees in the Flag Office had actually "confronted the individual."

"There was a struggle they participated in, in preventing this individual from getting any farther," McGaffin said in a telephone interview. The scuffle, he said, provided "the few precious seconds we needed to catch up with this suspect."

Police found a pistol in Greene's waistband after he was arrested. No one was harmed in the incident.

McGaffin said he did not have details about how the scuffle progressed.

However, other law enforcement and congressional sources gave this account: Greene burst into the Flag Office and grabbed the supervisor, Karen Livingston, demanding to know how he could get out. She broke away and a burly male co-worker corralled the intruder.

Capitol Police arrived seconds later and made the arrest. The sources spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to provide details on the investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0067465

Asked why he had provided the incorrect information at his Monday news conference, nine hours after the incident, McGaffin said he was unaware at the time that anyone but Capitol Police officers took part in the arrest. The officers had not mentioned the civilians' role in their report, he said.

Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.), who chairs the subcommittee that funds the Capitol Police, yesterday identified the Flag Office employees who stopped the intruder as Livingston, the supervisor; Dennis Anthony, the assistant supervisor; and Isaac Livingston, a clerk who is not related to the supervisor.

They "did a great job in bringing him under control," Allard said. Their role was first reported by the Hill newspaper.

The three employees were barred from talking publicly about their actions because of the Capitol Police investigation, said Cynthia Snyder of the Architect of the Capitol's office, which oversees the Flag Office.

Legislators have expressed shock and anger that Greene managed to get so far into the Capitol.

"It's very serious," Allard said. "You can just assume that terrorists somewhere are taking note."

Congress has given the Capitol Police hundreds of millions of dollars for new equipment and additional officers since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. The force now has more than 1,600 officers.

The House Appropriations Committee is expected to meet Tuesday to review how the Capitol Police handled the incident, officials said.

"Frankly, I think it's a bit outrageous that this kind of incident could take place with all of the new police personnel and all of the money we have spent," Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), a committee member, said in a telephone interview. "Obviously, somebody on the front line was simply not paying attention."

Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), said he was "extremely concerned" and "wants a report about how this will never happen again."

The Capitol Police are being assisted by "national security agencies" in their investigation, Allard said yesterday. McGaffin said he had requested the agencies' assistance "so we can have an independent assessment" of the incident. He declined to identify them, but another official said the U.S. Secret Service was involved.

McGaffin has blamed the security breakdown on human error, rather than funding or equipment. He declined to specify what went wrong until an internal review is finished.

He acknowledged that the intruder made it through two key points: the entrance on the perimeter of the Capitol and the door into the building, which was not locked or guarded. That door was being used by construction workers who have been trying to finish the U.S. Capitol Visitor Center that is under construction on the east side of the building.

Since the incident, security has been increased, with added police posts around the Capitol and concrete barriers placed in front of the construction entrance on First Street and Maryland Avenue NE used by the intruder.

Greene, of Silver Spring, has been jailed since his arrest. He is scheduled to appear in court today on a charge of unlawful possession of a firearm by a convicted felon.

Pro-marriage Bill Seeks $4 Million Budget Add (WT)

By Amy Doolittle

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

The chairman of the Senate Appropriations subcommittee on the District said yesterday that he will add $4 million to the D.C. budget next year to help married or engaged couples buy a home, get job training or start a business.

"We need more family formation in the District ... We need more children raised in two-parent homes," said Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican. "This initiative will help with doing that ... It will expand job-training funding for those who get married; there's also funding in there for mentoring and counseling couples."

Mr. Brownback's proposal would add $1 million to a matched-savings program approved by the Senate last year.

Under the program, the federal government contributes $3 for every $1 a D.C. couple invests and allows a maximum lifetime payment of $9,000. Couples must withdraw the money and be married within three years of entering the program.

The new proposal would provide more funds for job training and mentoring. Last year's version was the first of its kind in the country.

D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams said yesterday that he supports Mr. Brownback's bill.

"There are a lot of things we agree on and a lot of things we disagree on," said Mr. Williams, a Democrat who is not seeking re-election. "But this is something on which we wholeheartedly agree, and that is that too many children in our city are being raised by single parents."

The mayor said there are more than 13,000 families headed by single parents in the District who earn less than $10,000 a year and live well below the poverty line. Many parents do not get married for fear of higher taxes, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0067466

D.C. Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, a Democrat, said yesterday that the marriage incentive is important because it gives children a chance to be raised by two parents.

"We're talking about the failure to form families at all, and that is becoming the trend across our country," Mrs. Norton said. "We're forgetting who gets hurt -- the children are hurt from the moment they step into this world.

"When Sam said he wanted to do marriage development, I said, 'Right on, right on, anything we can do,'" she said.

Mr. Brownback said he has yet to experience any serious opposition to his bill. He said it likely will go to a vote in the Senate in late November as part of the larger D.C. appropriations bill.

U.S. Recommends Routine Testing For The AIDS Virus (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

All adolescents and adults should routinely be tested for HIV infection in hospitals, clinics and doctors' offices, the federal government said yesterday, signaling a radical shift in the public health approach to the 25-year-old epidemic.

Under the new recommendations from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, patients would no longer have to sign a consent form and get extensive pre-test counseling. But they would have to be told they were being tested for the AIDS virus, asked if they have any questions and given the opportunity to "opt out."

The policy is a huge change from an era when stigma and fatalism led to a unique and -- in the opinion of some practitioners, onerous -- set of procedures for HIV testing.

"This represents a milestone for CDC and for our national health protection," Julie L. Gerberding, the CDC's director, said in a telephone news conference.

Universal HIV testing is part of an all-out effort to address three problems that many experts view as scandalous: 250,000 Americans are infected with HIV and do not know it, 40 percent of infected people are diagnosed when their infection is already at an advanced stage, and the number of new infections annually in the United States has not declined in 15 years.

If medical providers go along, the strategy may be able to reduce the number who do not know they are infected by two-thirds. Because many of those people are highly likely to pass the virus on -- either because of their behavior or because they are in an early stage of the disease, when more virus is in their bloodstream -- that could in turn help prevent new cases.

By rolling an HIV test into routine blood testing to measure blood sugar, kidney function, hemoglobin count and myriad other health indicators, the policy would make AIDS unique in another way. It would become the only infectious disease tested for more or less automatically in medical encounters. Pregnant women are tested for AIDS, syphilis and hepatitis B, but the CDC policy would cover everyone 13 to 64 years old.

Advocates for AIDS patients generally lauded the new strategy but expressed concern that it could lead to occasions when people are not told they are being tested or are not prepared to handle the results.

"It's all in the implementation," said David Munar, associate director of the AIDS Foundation of Chicago. "I am concerned that in some settings that patients will be shortchanged."

Marjorie J. Hill, executive director of Gay Men's Health Crisis in New York, said her organization agrees "that HIV testing needs to be expanded and that the procedures need to be streamlined as far as possible." But she added: "It is also important that the individual who is the object of these procedures and information have meaningful, informed consent. For some people that may be a two-minute conversation. In others it may take longer."

Between 16 million and 22 million HIV tests are done each year in the United States. CDC officials would not speculate on how much that might increase.

Newly identified cases of HIV are reported to local health departments in most states, and under another CDC policy they will soon be reported in all. That allows public health officers to help get those people into care and in some cases to trace sexual contacts.

Practically speaking, the goal is to have everyone in the age range tested at least once, and high-risk people tested at least once a year. Low-risk people do not have to be tested each time blood is drawn.

The District began a campaign three months ago to make HIV tests a routine part of visits to emergency rooms and physicians' offices. This week, officials said 3 percent of people tested at community health sites are infected -- about twice the national rate.

HIV testing is a two-step process. An initial test, called an ELISA assay, screens for antibodies against the virus. If it is positive, a more specific test, called a western blot, is performed. The price ranges from about $8 to $80, which includes the cost of counseling. The lower figure is for a negative ELISA, the higher for a positive test that would require a western blot and more extensive post-test counseling. Rapid HIV tests, which give results in 20 minutes, cost about $20 more.

DOJ_NMG_0067467

The expense of expanded HIV testing would be borne by the current payers of medical care -- insurance companies, the government, hospitals and clinics, and patients. If a medical institution finds that fewer than 1 in 1,000 HIV tests are positive, it can drop routine testing.

Testing regulations differ around the country, and some states will need to change laws to follow the recommendations. Virginia does not require a separate consent form for HIV testing, but Maryland does.

The new recommendations say that "patients should be informed orally or in writing that HIV testing will be performed unless they decline. . . . Information should include an explanation of HIV infection and the meanings of positive and negative test results, and the patient should be offered an opportunity to ask questions and to decline testing."

CDC officials emphasized that while HIV testing may become routine, following up positive tests will still require specific attention.

"Active efforts are essential to ensure that HIV-infected patients receive their positive test results and linkage to clinical care, counseling, support, and prevention services," the recommendations say.

One of the CDC's main goals is to lower the practical and psychological barriers faced both by people offering HIV tests and by those getting them.

The emergency department of Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore set out to offer testing to every patient eight months ago but has found that goal difficult to achieve.

"The legal requirements for written consent in the state of Maryland take time and effort beyond what is feasible in a busy emergency department," said physician Richard E. Rothman.

He said the department recently began using a "facilitator" who counsels patients and gets consent. That has "dramatically increased" the number of tests offered. About 50 percent of patients are now asked, and about 75 percent of them agree.

"Patients are definitely interested in being tested. There is no doubt about that," Rothman said.

Public health officials also hope the shift will help further destigmatize HIV. When the CDC recommended in 1995 that all pregnant women be tested, many clinics found that women embraced the policy, as it no longer required them to identify themselves as "at risk" to get tested.

The benefits of knowing -- and the hazards of not knowing -- one's HIV status are clear from studies. Between 54 and 70 percent of sexually transmitted cases of HIV are transmitted by people who do not know they are infected with the virus.

Once people know, most take precautions. The frequency with which a person has unprotected intercourse, homosexual or heterosexual, falls by about 50 percent once that person knows his or her HIV status. But the rate of unprotected sex may remain as high as 40 percent in some groups.

U.S. Urges H.I.V. Tests For Adults And Teenagers (NYT)

By Donald G. Mcneil Jr.

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

In a major shift of policy, the federal government recommended yesterday that all teenagers and most adults have H.I.V. tests as part of routine medical care because too many Americans infected with the AIDS virus don't know it.

The recommendation, by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, urges testing at least once for everyone aged 13 to 64 and annual tests for those with high-risk behavior.

The proposal is a sharp break from the early days of the AIDS epidemic, when the stigma of the disease and the fear of social ostracism caused many people to avoid being tested.

That led to heated debate about whether positive test results could be shared by medical and governmental authorities in their effort to contain the epidemic by reaching out to partners of those who might be infected.

Under the agency's plan, which states can adopt or modify if they choose, patients would be advised they were being tested, but the tests would be voluntary.

So that the tests could be easily administered, however, the agency urged the removal of two major barriers that some states now have: separate signed consent forms and lengthy counseling before each test.

That would require new laws in some states, however, which could take years because some civil liberties groups and lobbyists for people with AIDS oppose the changes.

Many doctors are expected to welcome the changes.

"These recommendations are important for early diagnosis and to reduce the stigma still associated with H.I.V. testing," said Dr. Nancy Nielsen, a board member of the American Medical Association, which endorsed the new guidelines.

Dr. Julie Gerberding, the disease control agency's director and a doctor who treated some of the first San Francisco AIDS patients in 1981, said: "Our traditional approaches have not been successful. People who don't know their own H.I.V. status account for 50 to 70 percent of all new infections. If they knew, they would take steps to protect themselves and their partners."

DOJ_NMG_0067468

The new guidelines, if adopted, would move the agency toward its "ultimate goals," which Dr. Gerberding described as: no more H.I.V.-infected children, no one living for years without antiretroviral treatment and, eventually, no more new cases of the disease.

About 40,000 Americans are newly infected each year, a number that has been remaining steady. In contrast to the early days of the epidemic, which struck gay men the hardest, many of those now infected are black or Hispanic, are teenagers and were infected by heterosexual sex. The agency estimates that 250,000 Americans, a quarter of those with the disease, do not know they are infected.

Moreover, 42 percent of those who find out they are infected are tested only because they are already seriously ill — which means they have been infected for up to 10 years and may have been passing the infection on all that time, Dr. Gerberding said.

The American Academy of H.I.V. Medicine, a group for AIDS specialists, gave a qualified endorsement of the guidelines, agreeing with the need for more testing but arguing that they gave counseling short shrift.

"Counseling just naturally goes with testing, as diet does to exercise," said Dr. Jeff Schouten, the academy's chairman.

Some civil liberties organizations and those representing people with AIDS, while favoring more testing, have lobbied against removing signed consent forms or pretest counseling for fear that such changes will make testing less voluntary.

Some states, including New York, have laws requiring such counseling and consent forms. They were passed in the early days of the AIDS epidemic, when having the virus amounted to a death sentence, the disease's stigma often led to denial of jobs or housing, and testing was done primarily to protect the blood supply.

Dr. Thomas R. Frieden, New York City's health commissioner, said yesterday that he "absolutely" agreed with the new guidelines and had been lobbying the state Legislature for a law incorporating them.

A bill he supported was introduced late last year, Dr. Frieden said, but opponents kept it from coming up for a vote.

"I am optimistic that it will make it through this year," he said.

Rose A. Saxe, a staff lawyer with the AIDS Project of the American Civil Liberties Union, said her group opposed the recommendation because it would remove the requirement for signed consent forms and pretest counseling. In settings like emergency rooms where doctors are strapped for time, Ms. Saxe said, "we're concerned that what the C.D.C. calls routine testing will become mandatory testing."

Patients, particularly teenagers, she said, "will be tested without an opportunity for understanding the magnitude of having a positive result."

David Ernesto Munar, associate director of the AIDS Foundation of Chicago and a board member of the National Association of People With AIDS, said he favored more testing and faster counseling to encourage it.

"But our fear," Dr. Munar said, "is that on the ground, the rush to get more blood samples is going to railroad right over any consent."

Illinois, like New York, requires written consent before a test, he said.

Disease control agency experts deny that their guidelines would encourage such problems.

They oppose mandatory testing, secret testing or testing without informing patients, at least orally, that such a test will be done. They suggest that whatever general consent for routine medical care a state law requires include consent for H.I.V. testing.

They also want anyone who tests positive to be counseled that AIDS is a serious disease and taught where to get treatment and how to keep from infecting others.

As an example of success in a related program, Dr. Timothy Mastro, acting director of the agency's AIDS prevention division, pointed to the agency's guidelines to prevent infection of newborns.

The guidelines say that all pregnant women should be tested unless they refuse and that oral consent is acceptable. They also recommend tests again in late pregnancy for women who inject drugs, have sex with many men, have sex for money or live in neighborhoods where AIDS is common.

The number of babies born infected dropped to fewer than 240 a year now from 1,650 in 1991, Dr. Mastro said.

Laws for prisoners, which Dr. Mastro described as "a tricky area," might also need revision. In some states, testing is mandatory for all prisoners. In New York, it is voluntary.

Health officials in other states appeared to welcome the new guidelines. Steve Huard, spokesman for the Hillsborough County Health Department, which includes Tampa, Fla., said: "We strongly believe in universal H.I.V. testing through anonymous and confidential testing. With the recommendations, it would be more widespread. It would go out to private physicians and we should see infection rates going down."

Some states with few AIDS patients, like Wyoming, may be reluctant to adopt the guidelines on the ground that routine H.I.V. tests would be unnecessarily burdensome for doctors and patients.

DOJ_NMG_0067469

To compensate for that, the guidelines suggest that routine tests might not be required in areas where fewer than 1 in 1,000 people test positive. But health care practitioners are not very good at guessing what rate will be found among their patients, said Dr. Bernard Branson, the C.D.C.'s associate director for laboratory diagnostics, so there should first be a period of routine testing.

The wholesale cost is about $1 for each test run in batches and about $8 for rapid tests done individually. Each positive test would require a second confirmation test and then counseling, which would raise the cost to about $80, Dr. Branson said.

That is far cheaper than many other routine screening tests like colonoscopies or mammograms, and Dr. Branson said most such tests were paid for by insurers because it was usually cheaper to treat diseases when they were caught early.

CDC Recommends AIDS Tests For Most People (USAT)

By Steve Sternberg

USA Today, September 22, 2006

AIDS virus testing should be offered regularly to everyone ages 13 to 64 in every hospital, doctor's office and clinic to speed diagnosis and help curb the epidemic, federal health officials recommended Thursday.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's recommendations are not legally binding, but they are designed to make HIV testing as routine as tests for high blood pressure, cholesterol and diabetes.

About 1 million people in the USA are HIV-positive, but 250,000 of them have not been diagnosed, according to the CDC.

"It will allow us to identify a lot of people who have HIV and don't know it," says Timothy Mastro of the CDC's HIV/AIDS program.

The guidelines no longer require health workers to provide special counseling before and after the test, and they lift the requirement that patients supply specific written consent, though patients must be given the opportunity to refuse testing.

Daniel Kuritzkes of the University of Colorado, chairman of the HIV Medicine Association, says, "I think the guidelines will help destigmatize HIV testing by making it part of routine medical care and not a test with some special mystique about it."

More than a dozen AIDS advocacy groups released a statement objecting to the decision to drop counseling.

"We fear that some health care settings will interpret today's announcement as a call for universal screening and test patients without informing them or arming them with the information they need to avoid putting others at risk," says David Munar of the National Association of People with AIDS.

Peter Staley, a founder of the protest group ACT UP, disagrees with his peers: "The bottom line is that we're really losing the fight here. We're losing lives. I'm an ACT UP grad, and our motto is 'by any means necessary.'

"I realize that abandoning written informed consent raises issues. People are worried about privacy and stigma. But the bottom line is that this would probably save lives, and that's why I'm very much in favor of it."

Even patients diagnosed late in the course of the disease can extend their life expectancy by 14 years with standard treatment, according to a recent study led by Rochelle Walensky of Harvard Medical School.

Patients diagnosed soon after infection can extend their lives by as much as 25 years, she says.

Mastro says diagnosis is a powerful tool for prevention. "We think that the quarter of a million people who don't know their infection status account for 70% of sexually transmitted infections," he says. "We have very strong data showing that when patients know they're infected, they take strong measures to avoid infecting others."

Studies have shown that AIDS testing is as cost-effective as tests for high blood pressure and colon cancer.

The new guidelines leave open two key concerns: who will pay for the tests and the cost of treating 250,000 new HIV patients.

"The strain that this is going to place on Medicaid, the Ryan White Care Act and the state AIDS drug assistance programs is going to be enormous," says A. David Paltiel of Yale University, who has studied the test's cost-effectiveness.

Report Recommends Change In Medicare (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 21 (AP) — Quality not quantity should be the federal government's guide in setting payments to doctors, hospitals and other health care providers, said a report that was released Thursday.

Medicare pays doctors and hospitals when they perform a service, but such a system "tends to reward excessive use of services, high-cost complex procedures, and lower quality care," said the report, which was requested by Congress and prepared by the Institute of Medicine, part of the National Academy of Sciences.

Medicare serves nearly 43 million elderly or disabled Americans and spends more than $320 billion a year.

DOJ_NMG_0067470

The institute said Congress should cut the base payments that Medicare makes to hospitals, nursing homes, insurers and doctors, and should use the savings to create pools that reward providers when they do work that has been proved effective in improving a patient's health.

Such a change, it said, would not "necessarily reduce the cost of care, but it will help ensure that what is paid for will be more beneficial to patients."

The recommendations did not please many health care providers.

Carmela Coyle, senior vice president for policy at the American Hospital Association, said new financing should be arranged for the bonus pools called for in the report.

Dr. Cecil Wilson of the American Medical Association said, "Congress must provide the Medicare program with additional funding so that Medicare patients' current access to quality care is not jeopardized by cuts that force physicians to make difficult practice decisions."

Medicare Drug Costs Debated (AP)

By Kevin Freking

AP, September 22, 2006

Filling the doughnut hole in Medicare drug plans would cost older people and the disabled about $40 a month more.

Democratic lawmakers estimated the additional cost and said Thursday that is a major reason why 88 percent of the Medicare beneficiaries signing up for drug plans opted for a coverage gap.

Democrats designated Friday as "doughnut hole day," when the coverage gap would hit the average older person who is taking several medications.

"This gap in coverage doesn't have to exist. This was a conscious choice, based on a value system, that put drug companies ahead of our seniors and people with disabilities," said Sen. Debbie Stabenow, D-Mich.

The Bush administration estimates that about 3 million Medicare beneficiaries will hit the doughnut hole, fewer than the 7 million often cited by critics. Mark McClellan, the administration's pointman on Medicare, says the 7 million figure is outdated.

Under the standard Medicare plan, the government subsidizes the drug costs for older people and the disabled. But after costs reach $2,250, the subsidy stops until a beneficiary has paid $3,600 of his or her own money. Then, the government will start picking up 95 percent of each purchase.

But beneficiaries go back to square one with each new year, and could face the doughnut hole repeatedly over the ensuing years.

Also, beneficiaries must pay the monthly premium even while they are in the doughnut hole.

Those qualifying for a low-income subsidy are not included in the Democrats' estimate of those facing hardship, nor are those who enrolled in Medicare Advantages programs, which work like an HMO.

McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, emphasized that beneficiaries who fall into the gap got a lot of government assistance beforehand.

"If you reach the doughnut hole, you've already gotten $1,500 or more worth of help with your drug costs," McClellan said. "That's a lot of money that you can use for paying for basic necessities or for paying for enhancing your health insurance coverage."

According to the Democrats, it would cost $458 a year on average to switch to a plan that had full coverage. But that figure varies from state to state. Residents of New Jersey, for example, would have to pay, on average, an additional $298. The highest additional premium — $721 — would hit beneficiaries in seven states: Iowa, Minnesota, Montana, North Dakota, Nebraska, South Dakota and Wyoming.

"As this report shows, the opportunity to purchase plans that fill the hole is a mirage," said Rep. Pete Stark, D-Calif. "Beneficiaries are no more able to afford expensive, full-coverage plans than minimum-wage Americans are able to afford a Mercedes."

At a news conference, Rep. Janice Schakowsky, D-Ill, read a letter from a constituent, Pauline Metzger-Aronson of Morton Grove, Ill.

"All I know is that last month what I paid $20.00 for cost me $96.12 this month, and that was only on one prescription. What adds insult to injury is that we must now also pay the premium while we lose our benefits," Metzger-Aronson wrote.

Rep. Bill Thomas, R-Calif., said Democrats were trying to scare and confuse people.

"So, with all the success of the new drug benefit, why are Democrats continuing to attack the program? Because they are terrified that Republicans will get credit for this tremendously successful program," said Thomas, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0067471

McClellan said older people approaching the coverage gap should keep using their Medicare drug card because it means the consumer can get the plan's discount. He also said they should contact the drug companies that make their medicine, as well as their state, to see if they qualify for assistance programs. Twenty-one states offer such programs, as do many of the major drug manufacturers.

Democrats contend that one solution to filling the doughnut hole would be to let the government negotiate drug prices on behalf of beneficiaries, instead of having fragmented insurance companies doing that. Then, the government could use the savings achieved to do away with the gap.

But McClellan said it would cost the government an additional $500 billion over 10 years to fill the gap.

Luring Customers From Medicare (NYT)

By Milt Freudenheim

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

For years, private insurers have offered alternatives to the federal Medicare program that are meant to give patients lower-cost options than the government coverage provides. More than 7 million people now subscribe to such plans, out of a total Medicare population of 42.5 million.

But suddenly a type of private insurance plan is gaining ground that looks very similar to the basic coverage long available to anyone with a federally issued Medicare card.

And the government is paying the private insurance industry a subsidy of 11 percent per patient, on average, to provide it.

Since the government substantially increased the subsidies two years ago for these most basic private industry plans — known as private fee-for-service — enrollment in the plans has grown tenfold to 820,000. About 18,000 people signed up in August alone, Medicare said yesterday in its latest update. And some analysts expect enrollments to double or even triple by 2009.

The $7 billion that Medicare will pay private industry this year to provide this fee-for-service coverage is at least $770 million higher than the government would spend covering those patients itself, based on the 11 percent calculation.

Critics see the trend as further evidence that the government is paying private industry to take Medicare off its hands.

It is a "back-door way of trying to privatize Medicare," said Dr. Jack Lewin, the chief executive of the California Medical Association, a physicians' group. But the Bush administration's Medicare chief, Dr. Mark B. McClellan, insisted yesterday that the trend "is definitely not a 'push to privatization,' " but simply a way to give people with Medicare more choices. "The original Medicare program is and remains an option for those who prefer it," said Dr. McClellan, who plans to step down next month.

Private insurers can offer more choices and cost breaks to patients, he said, while providing overall better health care that will end up saving the government money.

The 11 percent calculation comes from the Medicare Payment Advisory Commission, an independent federal research body that advises Congress. And some insurance executives say the figure is an exaggeration. But there is little dispute that federal subsidies are encouraging the insurance industry to recruit members for the plans.

And while the current industry coverage can be a good deal for some patients, critics worry that Medicare patients reliant on private insurers could be left stranded if the federal money is eventually cut.

"We are very concerned that Congress is going to pull back on the funding," Dr. Lewin said, "and we will be left with a private system that offers fewer benefits and is going to be influenced by Wall Street."

Critics say the growing transfer of the nation's $342 billion Medicare program to private industry has already been playing out through other means, like the new Medicare Part D drug program and various Medicare-linked managed care plans and H.M.O's offered by private insurers.

Providing Medicare coverage in all its guises has become a $60 billion-a-year business and one of the few profitable growth areas for insurers. Medicare enrollees look especially attractive to insurers, as the industry's other main clientele — corporate America — struggles to meet the growing cost of providing health benefits to working people.

The fee-for-service plans, the focus of the current controversy, are in many ways similar to the government's own Medicare. Under the industry version, patients have the right to choose their own doctors and hospitals — as they have long been able to do with their federally issued Medicare cards.

And as with the federal program, enrollees in the private fee-for-service plans typically pay a monthly $88.50 premium to the government.

Under the industry plans, moreover, the hospitals and doctors receive the same rates as when they are paid through the basic federal Medicare program.

Experts say that because the administrative costs of providing the private policies are minimal, they represent easy income for the insurance companies, with profit margins of 4 percent or so.

DOJ_NMG_0067472

But many see the private fee-for-service Medicare plans as mainly a feeder program in which insurance companies hope to gradually convert members into even more complex, more profitable private Medicare offerings that the government also subsidizes.

The more lucrative plans, like Medicare health maintenance organizations or doctor-network managed care programs, which have been available longer, can yield profits in the 10 percent range, analysts say.

The more basic private fee-for-service plans, around for less than a decade, were authorized through an amendment to the 1997 balanced budget act as a way to ensure that elderly people could obtain adequate health insurance. Now the plans are envisioned as primarily for rural Americans who typically have few medical choices.

The insurance industry largely ignored the fee-for-service plans until the insurers' subsidies were increased by $14 billion over 10 years by the 2003 Medicare overhaul legislation. Insurance lobbyists had argued that expanding private Medicare programs would eventually lower the government's costs.

But insurers "are not really being asked to do anything for additional subsidies," said Marilyn Moon, a longtime Medicare researcher who served as a public trustee of the program — a watchdog role — during the Clinton years. She is now at the American Institutes for Research, a nonpartisan research center in Washington.

Insurers, though, say they provide benefits that basic Medicare does not cover.

The leader by far in private Medicare fee-for-service, with more than half the total members, is Humana. UnitedHealth and WellPoint are also big players.

John M. Bertko, a Humana vice president, says benefits included having nurses stay in touch with discharged hospital patients with chronic diseases to make sure they were following doctors' orders.

Other selling points for the private insurance plans include predictable out-of-pocket co-payments — typically $5 to $20 for doctor visits. That compares with the uncertainties patients face under traditional federal Medicare, in which they are responsible for 20 percent of whatever the doctor charges.

Martin Smith and his wife, Donna, of Bristol, Ind., chose a fee-for-service plan from UnitedHealth's Secure Horizons Medicare unit earlier this year.

The monthly premiums of $12.50 each for Mr. Smith, 68, and Mrs. Smith, 70, are in addition to their government Medicare premiums of $88.50 each. But the Smiths say the private plan is paying off.

Mrs. Smith recently had heart bypass surgery. And though the bill has not yet arrived, she knows that the hospital deductible for her Secure Horizons plan is $600, compared with the $952 she would be responsible for under traditional Medicare.

And instead of 20 percent of the approved doctors' fees in traditional Medicare, the Smiths pay only $10 to a primary care doctor and $20 for specialists. Secure Horizons pays the rest out of its subsidies from Medicare — which are $692.29 a month, on average, for each fee-for-service member in that part of the country.

The Smiths chose to sign up for Medicare Part D drug coverage from a separate insurer, Humana.

Like the Smiths, more than half of the private fee-for-service enrollees so far have also chosen drug coverage, and many are choosing a plan that combines both.

One is Cathy Watts, 58, of Decatur, Ill., a former nurse who says she had to retire four years ago because of Parkinson's disease and partial paralysis. Last January she signed up for a fee-for-service offering from Humana that included Part D drug coverage.

Other than the government's $88.50 Medicare premium that is deducted from her monthly Social Security check, Ms. Watts pays no premium to Humana.

She says the drug coverage was the main lure for her because her drug bill last year was $6,000.

"I will probably pay $3,600 this year" for drugs, she said. "So that will be better." And she can still see the doctors of her choice.

While insurers do run a risk of losing money on a patient if he or she has unexpectedly large health costs, the companies can consult county-by-county Medicare cost data and decide where to offer coverage and which high-cost areas to avoid.

In southern Illinois, where Mrs. Watts lives, the average monthly rate the government is paying an insurer to provide Medicare fee-for-service is $692.29 — the same as in Mr. Martin's town in Indiana.

Under Medicare's complicated rules, though, the amount actually paid to a company for a patient can vary. Around the nation, depending on local medical costs and the health profile of Medicare-eligible residents, the monthly federal subsidy to the insurance company can range from $400 to $2,500, said Dr. Scott Latimer, a Humana executive based in Tampa, Fla.

Enrollments in the fee-for-service plans are still primarily, though not exclusively, concentrated in rural and small cities. Before the Medicare subsidies were increased in 2003, insurers had little incentive to focus on such places. With few doctors and sometimes only one or two hospitals in such areas, insurers typically have little bargaining power. And the health care providers have often balked at accepting the lower fees and second-guessing often associated with managed care insurance networks. But when enough patients in a local area have been enrolled in the private fee-for-service plans, the companies say local health care providers may have little choice but to join the insurers' Medicare networks.

DOJ_NMG_0067473

Rick Jelinek, the chief executive of UnitedHealth's Secure Horizons Medicare business, acknowledged that the company's strategy was "in the longer term, to build networks around our programs."

With such networks in place, he said, the company could help manage patients' health — and the insurer's costs — through techniques like having nurses provide telephone health counseling aimed at helping keep patients with heart disease and diabetes avoid hospitalization.

Dan Mendelson, a former Clinton administration health official who is now the president of Avalere Health, a Washington research and consulting firm that advises insurance companies, said the private fee-for-service trend "should save money for Medicare by improving patient care."

But Ms. Moon, the Medicare researcher, said she was "unconvinced by the logic that says, 'If we are overpaying the health plans now, they will save us money later.' "

White House Willing To Deal To Get GSE Bill, Paulson Says (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips And Elizabeth Price

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

BEIJING -- U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson on Thursday said the Bush administration had clearly communicated a willingness to compromise with members of Congress at odds over legislation to establish a new regulator for the housing finance companies Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac.

"They're not waiting for me, or for the administration because we've indicated a willingness to work something out," Mr. Paulson said in an interview with the Wall Street Journal in between meetings with Chinese officials.

"So the key question is whether people can get together on both sides of the aisle and get together in the House."

A bill to create stronger government oversight of the mortgage companies is mired over differences about cutting down the companies' combined $1.4 trillion investment portfolios, which critics argue are too large and are a threat to stability of the U.S. financial system.

Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D., Md.), the Senate Banking Committee's ranking minority member, told reporters after lunch with other Democrats Tuesday that he was waiting to hear to new proposals from the Treasury Department.

"We're quite happy to look at anything that comes along," Mr. Sarbanes said.

Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac are housing government-sponsored enterprises, which buy mortgages on the secondary market from lenders. They are both recovering from massive accounting scandals and have not filed timely financial statements in years.

The House passed a bipartisan bill last year that would give the new regulator the ability to limit the portfolios based on safety and soundness, among other things. Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board have opposed that version of the bill, urging stricter limits on the GSEs.

The Senate Banking Committee passed a different bill, along party lines, that would directly limit the assets the GSEs hold in their portfolios. Champions of each version have been at a stalemate this year, and time is running out to get a law before the end of this Congressional term. Congress recesses after next week, as members return to campaign in their districts during October in preparation for the November elections.

"I would like to hope there could be movement before the elections, but I think it would be a long-shot to get anything as significant as this done in the few weeks we have before Congress goes home," Mr. Paulson said. "I'd sure like to be proven wrong," he added.

However, Congress could return after the elections for a so-called lame duck session, as some legislators have suggested.

GOP Games At The FDA (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

A Senate committee voted Wednesday to endorse Andrew von Eschenbach's nomination to be Food and Drug Administration Commissioner. But now two Republican Senators are threatening to block the impeccably credentialed acting FDA head unless they get their way on two different pet issues. This is an abuse of their "advice and consent" powers under the Constitution and a danger to the health of Americans, who need a confirmed FDA Commissioner with full authority to manage that bureaucracy.

One of the obstructionists is Jim DeMint of South Carolina, who is threatening a "hold" -- that is, to prevent a full Senate vote -- on Dr. von Eschenbach's nomination unless the FDA moves to take the RU-486 abortion pill off the market. Mr. DeMint claims there are safety concerns with the product, but having lawmakers second-guess the agency's regulatory decisions on various products was hardly what Congress intended when it created the FDA.

DOJ_NMG_0067474

Last month we criticized Democrats Hillary Clinton and Patty Murray for blocking the von Eschenbach nomination until the FDA approved over-the-counter sales of the so-called "morning after pill." The FDA has since done so, but Senators Clinton and Murray were wrong to hang their decision on just one of the $3 trillion worth of products -- many of them life-saving drugs -- that the FDA regulates. Senator DeMint's threat is no more defensible.

The other obstructionist is David Vitter of Louisiana, who is threatening a "hold" until he gets his way on "reimporting" cheaper prescription drugs from foreign countries like Canada. This policy shift isn't even within the FDA's power to accomplish. If Senator Vitter thinks prescription drugs are too expensive in America, the proper course is to convince his colleagues to revise the patent system Congress itself created with the intent of providing incentives for drug development. The threatened hold on Dr. von Eschenbach is evidence of Mr. Vitter's failure to move his issue democratically -- i.e., as a Senator.

The FDA badly needs a host of reforms -- especially a streamlined process for approving drugs to treat terminal diseases such as cancer. In Dr. von Eschenbach, President Bush has nominated one of the best available men to do that job. But the acting FDA chief can't get started in earnest without the bureaucratic clout that accrues to a Senate-confirmed Commissioner. If Senators DeMint and Vitter won't be reasonable, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and others should call them on the deadly consequences of further delay.

Back On Track In Space (NYT)

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

We've never been great fans of the International Space Station, an enormously costly project that will yield such limited scientific and economic benefits that it seems destined to be considered a white elephant. Nevertheless, we had to marvel at the magnificent performance of the crew of the shuttle Atlantis, which ended an arduous 12-day mission to the station with a flawless landing yesterday.

The flight drove home the point that the greatest value of the space station undertaking is simply the experience of building such a large and complex structure in space, far from the nearest hardware store or emergency repairman. Michael Griffin, the NASA administrator, aptly described the station as "one of the most amazing construction projects that human beings have ever undertaken."

This was the third shuttle flight since the disastrous loss of the Columbia in 2003 and the first devoted to resuming construction of the station. The astronauts spent three long days working in open space. The only glitches and human fumbles seemed minor and easily surmounted.

For the first time in years it seems possible that NASA may actually be able to finish the station by 2010 and then retire the aging shuttle fleet so as to free up money for new vehicles to carry out the more ambitious program to explore the Moon and eventually Mars. The only caveat is that this flight went so smoothly in part because the crew, which was grounded after the Columbia accident, had more than four years to get ready.

There was no evidence that the shuttle's delicate heat shield had been hit by chunks of debris like that which doomed the Columbia. This was the second successive flight without debris damage, suggesting that NASA's redesign of the external fuel tanks that previously shed foam has made the shuttles much safer. It should now be safe enough to launch at night, thus opening many more launch windows for the flights needed to complete the space station.

Our main hope is that a seemingly safer shuttle and new abilities to inspect shuttles in orbit and possibly even make small repairs will enable a mission to service and upgrade the Hubble Space Telescope before its batteries and gyroscopes run down. Mr. Griffin said NASA wants to service the Hubble by early 2008 if it can be done safely. He rightly described the Hubble as "one of the great scientific instruments of all time," responsible for fundamental discoveries about the universe that would otherwise not be known. It seems more important to service the Hubble than to finish a station whose main value will be the act of finishing it.

OTHER NEWS:

Bush Talks Taxes In Tampa (SPT)

By Robin Stein And Adam C. Smith

St. Petersburg Times, September 22, 2006

President Bush made a two-city swing through Florida on Thursday, raising money and the spirits of two Republican candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0067475

Across the country, Republican candidates have been distancing themselves from Bush before the upcoming midterm elections as the president's approval ratings have sagged while voters have grown dissatisfied with his handling of Iraq and the economy.

But on Thursday, there was no distance between Bush and Charlie Crist, the GOP candidate for governor, or Gus Bilirakis, who is running for Congress, as Bush zeroed in on tax policy, typically a point of strength for Republicans.

The issue, which Bush called a "fundamental difference" between the parties, is particularly timely in Florida. After years of absorbing hikes in property taxes and home-owners insurance premiums, residents in recent weeks have staged waves of protests in local tax offices.

"Elections are all about giving the people clear choices," Bush said in Tampa. "Do you want to keep your taxes low so we can keep the economy growing, or do we raise taxes and let the politicians in Washington try to grow the economy?"

Of course, matters of national security remained at the fore, too.

The normally soft-spoken Bilirakis seemed to burst with newfound resolve as he took to the stage just after 1 p.m. at Raymond James Stadium to introduce Bush.

"By the way, president," he said. "Thank you for making us safer."

For his part, Bush once again defended his policy of taking preemptive action to thwart terrorism.

"We've got to take threats seriously before they come home to hurt us," he said. "Getting rid of Saddam Hussein was the right thing to do, and the world is peaceful because of it."

As the applause tapered off, Bush quickly corrected himself: "The world is more peaceful because of it."

That is a matter of some debate, even among Republicans.

Indeed, in other circumstances, Democrats would be hard-pressed to claim any realistic shot at winning House races in traditional Republican strongholds such as Sarasota's District 13 and District 9, the seat Bilirakis hopes to keep in the family. (His father, Mike Bilirakis, has held the seat since 1982.)

For many Democrats those hopes are still a long shot, but leading Florida Democrats on Thursday pounced on the chance to cast Crist, Bilirakis and Katherine Harris, the Republican candidate for U.S. Senate, as "stay the course'' supporters of the president.

"We would hope that George Bush stays in Florida the entire election,'' said Mitchell Berger, finance chairman for Crist's Democratic opponent, Jim Davis.

A throng of protesters waved posters near Raymond James stadium.

The price of entry for the Bilirakis event — $1,000 a ticket or $2,100 for a one-on-one photo with the president — proved useful fodder for a counterattack from Phyllis Busansky, the Democratic candidate for District 9.

Busanksy hosted a luncheon in protest on Thursday.

"If your homeowner insurance rates went up by $1,000 or more," she wrote in the invitation, "I'd like to buy you lunch — and we can discuss ways we will fight back!"

While national polls and pundits suggest Democrats' most powerful weapon is the popular discontent with Bush, Florida Republicans didn't flinch.

"I'm just proud to have him here," said Carole Jean Jordan, chairman of the Republican Party of Florida.

"Floridians are proud to stand beside President Bush."

Among the nearly 500-person crowd gathered in Tampa were state Rep. Trey Traviesa, former governor Bob

Martinez and embattled Senate candidate Harris.

Before the president's remarks, Harris was effusive in her praise for the president's policies and dodged questions about whether she had been invited to fly to Orlando aboard Air Force One.

The GOP establishment's support of Harris has been a matter of bitter contention for months.

In his remarks, Bush gave Harris a noticeably terse mention and afterward offered a clipped, "Thank you," as he pushed past her without making eye contact. Later, while Crist and Bush mingled with the big-dollar guests in one reception room at the Ritz-Carlton in Orlando, Harris was in the $500-per-person reception down the hall.

She was relegated to the crowd of spectators as Crist stood on stage, side by side with the president and his brother Gov. Jeb Bush.

The president praised Crist, who won the Republican primary for governor on Sept. 5, as "a people's governor."

"He likes to shake hands, he likes people," Bush said. "You want somebody who feels comfortable with the people of a state, somebody who can make decisions, and somebody who can set a clear vision on behalf of this vital state. And that's Charlie Crist."

And in between the two fundraisers, Bush and Bilirakis made an unannounced stop by the Buccaneers' new headquarters just as the team was wrapping up practice for the day.

DOJ_NMG_0067476

Jackets were off as the president marched onto the sun-baked field and huddled with a ring of cheering players.

As much as Democrats savored the chance to link Republicans to President Bush, the day also underscored the immense fundraising advantage Florida Republicans enjoy again this year.

In less than eight hours, the president helped raise more than $450,000 for Bilirakis in Tampa, and in Orlando, he brought in at least $2-million for the Crist's campaign and the state Republican party.

President's Visit Pads GOP's War Chests (TT)

By William March

Tampa Tribune, September 22, 2006

TAMPA - President Bush helped Republicans raise at least $2 million for gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist and $500,000 for Gus Bilirakis, running for a Tampa Bay area congressional seat, in fundraising stops Thursday in Tampa and Orlando.

Although he boosted those two candidates, Bush was cool to his party's nominee for the U.S. Senate, Katherine Harris, giving her a short-shrift handshake along the rope line at the Tampa event and no ride on Air Force One.

Bush spoke to a crowd gathered in the club level of Raymond James Stadium at midday Thursday for Bilirakis, defending Republican tax cuts and the war in Iraq as well as touting the candidate for Congress. About 440 people attended the event, which raised half a million in donations.

Bush then made an unannounced stop at the Tampa Bay Buccaneers' new practice facility.

For about 40 minutes, the president signed footballs, talked to players and coaches and admired the biceps of running back Michael Pittman, said to have the biggest on the team at 19 inches.

Bush responded sympathetically when Coach Jon Gruden mentioned that the Bucs' season has not started well.

"I've been 0 and 2 before," Bush said. He then thanked the players for their volunteer work and said, "I admire the courage you show out there on the football field.

"Any Texans here?" he called out to the players gathered around for a huddle chat on the practice field, getting responses from, among others, offensive lineman Jeb Terry.

"Have faith in your coach, faith in each other, and be resilient - that was the message he gave us," cornerback Ronde Barber said.

It was Gruden's first meeting with Bush, even though a Super Bowl-winning coach normally meets the president. Gruden was not able to make the White House trip after the Bucs won Super Bowl XXXVII three years ago.

Bush then took off for Orlando, where he spoke to a $25,000-a-person reception intended to raise money for the Republican Party to spend on its candidates in November's elections, most of it for Crist. Senate Candidate Acknowledged

Harris, whose relationship with the Republican Party leadership has been troubled, got brief mentions in Bush's speeches at both events.

"I'm proud to be here with Congresswoman Katherine Harris, running for the United States Senate," he said in Tampa, mentioning her as part of a list of other acknowledgments in his speech.

Even though she will top the GOP ticket in November, Harris was not onstage at either event and said she was not asked to travel on Air Force One. Bilirakis was invited aboard for the Tampa-Orlando flight but had campaign commitments here, a spokeswoman said.

"That's what you'd call icy cordiality," said University of South Florida political scientist and Republican Party historian Darryl Paulson. "Bush does not want to create any ill feelings among Republican activists and Harris supporters by publicly trashing her. On the other hand, he does not want Harris to play a prominent role in the campaigns and potentially damage other Republican races." Tampa Boy Gets Award

When he arrived at Tampa International Airport, Bush conferred an award for volunteer service on 8-year-old Zach Bonner of Tampa, who has logged hundreds of hours collecting money and gifts for hurricane victims.

"I was very nervous," Zach said later, "but when he came over to me, I wasn't as nervous as before. I said, 'Hi,' and he said he was proud of me."

During the event for Bilirakis, his Democratic opponent, Phyllis Busansky, responded by offering free lunch at a Spanish restaurant in West Tampa for anyone whose homeowners insurance has gone up more than $1,000 a year.

"I think it's safe to say that Gus Bilirakis will not exactly be an agent for change in Congress," Busansky said in a statement, calling him a "rubber stamp" who has "embraced the failed leadership of Dick Cheney, Speaker [Dennis] Hastert, Newt Gingrich and now George W. Bush."

In his speeches, Bush hammered on two major points: telling voters that Republicans will lower taxes and Democrats will raise them and arguing that the war in Iraq is necessary to defend the nation against terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0067477

He said the United States is "a nation at war" and "Iraq is the central front in the war on terrorism."

Urging the Republicans to work for continued control of Congress, Bush said Democrats "will raise your taxes, and it will hurt our economy." Republicans, he said, have "cut the taxes on the small businesses and working people to make sure you had more money in your pocket."

He said the beneficiaries of the tax cuts were "the working people, the small-business owners, those who struggle to put food on the table for their families."

Democratic Rep. Charles Rangel of New York, whom Bush singled out for criticism in his Tampa speech, responded that the tax cuts have been "tax breaks for the wealthy that no one has asked for and have driven our nation deeper into debt."

Reporter Roy Cummings contributed to this report, which includes information from The Associated Press.

President Pitches Crist To Party Faithful (MH)

By Mary Ellen Klas

The Miami Herald, September 22, 2006

ORLANDO - Bush pitches Crist to faithful

Conjuring up images of tax-obsessed Democrats and emphasizing the need to stay the course in America's "great ideological struggle" against terrorism, President Bush urged party faithful in Florida on Thursday to defeat Democrats in November and put Charlie Crist in the governor's office.

The president took his blue-state pitch to a Tampa fundraiser for congressional candidate Gus Bilirakis and later to a high-end fundraiser for Crist and the Republican Party of Florida in Orlando.

At Orlando's Ritz-Carlton, a throng of lobbyists, business leaders and community activists from around the state agreed to pay $25,000 apiece just to get in the door.

"This is an extraordinarily successful event, and I thank you," the president told the cheering crowd.

Party officials said they expected to raise $2 million toward their goal of collecting $30 million for Crist's election bid, although organizers boasted they might collect as much as $4 million.

The event was co-sponsored by Orlando trial lawyer and Democrat John Morgan, whose firm employs Crist's running mate, state Rep. Jeff Kottkamp. Morgan, who endorsed Democrat Jim Smith in the primary, didn't attend the event but headed to Gainesville instead, where singer Tom Petty was performing at his alma mater, the University of Florida.

After recognizing Crist and urging the crowd to support U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris' run for the U.S. Senate, Bush unleashed a torrent of warnings about tax-loving Democrats and the failed policies he said they will attempt to pursue if they regain control of Congress.

TAX MESSAGE

"One of the issues that is important for our nation and our state is taxes. I think you're taxed too much. So does Charlie," the president said. ``I aim to make taxes a key issue across this country."

Bush said Crist would take the same approach.

"If you get him in office, he's going to cut your property taxes and you can take that to the bank," Bush said, referring to Crist's plan to double the homestead property tax exemption from $25,000 to $50,000.

The president's tax-cut theme was echoed in his remarks in Tampa, where he spoke to about 300 people at Raymond James Stadium and then stopped briefly to give a pep talk to Tampa Bay Buccaneers players as they worked out on the practice field.

In Orlando, the president warned the audience of Republican loyalists that Democrats 'may not tell you they're going to raise your taxes. They're just going to say they're just going to let the tax relief expire. That's like a boss who came in and said, `You know something, I'm going to let your last pay raise expire.' "

The tax-cut emphasis was at odds with what Florida voters have told pollsters this election season. Voters have said they are concerned about rising gas prices, the war in Iraq and the continued turmoil in the Middle East.

The crowds in both Tampa and Orlando didn't seem to care. People lined up for more than an hour to have their picture taken with Bush in Orlando "because people are proud to stand next to their president," said Carole Jean Jordan, chairwoman of the Republican Party of Florida.

Some of the party's top money men agreed. "People are wrong to criticize this president," said Zachariah Zachariah, a Fort Lauderdale cardiologist and leading fundraiser for the Republican Party. ``This president's approval ratings are climbing every day."

In an apparent gesture of acknowledgement of the president's critics, Gov. Jeb Bush defended his brother, saying the nation should ``be glad we have someone who's steadfast, who's resolute and who's bold and who will not be deterred by all of the critics and all of the pundits."

DOJ_NMG_0067478

Gov. Bush introduced Crist as "a great attorney general" who will have the courage of his convictions and who will ``build on our platform of success."

Crist thanked the Bush family for its legacy and Gov. Bush for his service to the state, and noted that the president once gave him a nickname when he was running for state commissioner of education: Chalkboard Charlie.

The president responded that "Chalkboard Charlie" should be changed to ``Gov. Charlie."

HARRIS ATTENDS

In the audience was Harris, the U.S. Senate candidate whose campaign was derided by Republicans for months before she won the primary with half the vote in a four-way race.

The governor tried to recruit a replacement candidate, and the head of the state party refused to back Harris in the primary and said she couldn't defeat incumbent Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson.

After Harris won, Crist and other Republicans declined to invite her on a fly-around to a series of GOP unity rallies across the state.

Harris said Thursday that the Republican Party of Florida has warmed up to her candidacy "finally," adding: ``I'm really glad for that."

Harris, who has derided her fellow party members as being part of the "Republican elite," said she has received phone calls and offers of help from the party, the White House and other Republicans. "Of course, Sen. [Mel] Martinez has always been there," she said.

Asked whether this would end her criticism of the "Republican elite," Harris said: ``I will never be one of the beltway boys."

Bush Leads New Offensive Featuring Economy And Linking Democrats To High Taxes (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

ORLANDO, Fla., Sept. 21 — President Bush began a blistering new political offensive on Thursday, asserting that if Democrats won control of Congress from Republicans it would mean higher taxes, less money in the pockets of working families and damage to the economy.

The speech by Mr. Bush here, in which he belittled Democrats as “the party of high taxes,” signaled what Republicans described as a new phase of the White House’s fall campaign, as Republicans begin to combine their emphasis on national security with a tough new emphasis on the issue that unites them more than any other, taxes.

Mr. Bush’s offensive was backed up by a flood of television advertisements on behalf of Republican candidates.

“If they get control of the House of Representatives, they’ll raise your taxes, it will hurt our economy, and that’s why we’re not going to let them get control of the House of Representatives,” the president said at a fund-raising event at Raymond James Stadium in Tampa for Gus Bilirakis, a Republican state representative running for Congress.

“The Democrats have made their position clear,” Mr. Bush said. “I want you to remember the last time they had control of the United States Congress back in 1993, they passed a massive tax increase.”

Mr. Bush’s words were echoed in advertisements that have been showing up on the airwaves, in mailings to voters’ homes and in e-mail sent to their computers. This new offensive reflects what Republicans have said is the power they see in the tax issue, in motivating both Republican base voters — who have seemed particularly dispirited this year — and independents.

Republican officials said they had been scouring the voting records of Democrats running for re-election, in search of ways to press the issue.

“Sherrod Brown has voted for higher taxes over 35 times,” an announcer says in a television advertisement shown this week in Ohio, attacking Mr. Brown, a Democratic member of Congress who is challenging Senator Mike DeWine. Mr. Brown’s face is shown amid a grid of television screens displaying the word “tax” as the announcer lists various taxes Mr. Brown supported.

“Liberal Melissa Bean has not supported making the tax cuts permanent,” says a mailing attacking Representative Melissa Bean, Democrat of Illinois, that was produced by the National Republican Congressional Committee. “Can you afford this tax increase?”

“Taxes have always been a good message in ads for us,” said Carl Forti, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee. “We’re on the air in 18 districts now, and 8 of them are on taxes.”

Many Democrats are on record calling for some or all of Mr. Bush’s tax cuts to be rolled back, especially those benefiting the wealthiest taxpayers.

But Democrats said that Republicans were distorting Democratic positions on taxes affecting the middle class and that by this point, Republican attacks on tax cuts had become so familiar to voters that they would not have much effect.

DOJ_NMG_0067479

"Our candidates have all announced they're for middle-class tax proposals," said Representative Rahm Emanuel, Democrat of Illinois, who is leading the Democratic effort to take back the House.

Referring to Mr. Bush's comments, Mr. Emanuel said: "This is from a guy who ran up three trillion in debt and has submitted a deficit every year for the last five years. If I were him, I wouldn't be throwing stones in a glass house."

In Pennsylvania, Chris Carney, a Democratic challenger to Representative Don Sherwood, a Republican, is running an advertisement this week pushing back on Mr. Sherwood's criticism of him as supporting tax increases.

"The truth is I'm for middle-class tax cuts," Mr. Carney says in the advertisement. "Truth is, I'm for a new-baby tax credit. These attacks are another example of Sherwood bringing Washington politics back to Pennsylvania."

After a series of presidential addresses and events meant to put Democrats on the defensive about national security this month, the speeches here and in Tampa were the second phase of an election-year plan to stave off a Democratic takeover of Congress.

Some of the pages of this White House script may seem familiar. The attack on taxes, for instance, was reminiscent of the way the White House tried to use the legislative record of Senator John Kerry in the 2004 presidential campaign, culling all possible votes to try to paint him as a serial tax raiser.

Mr. Bush on Thursday presented a new set of numbers, saying that 95 percent of House Democrats voted against his tax cuts in 2003 and that 92 percent voted against extending his tax cuts this year.

Democrats said they did not fear the new assault and welcomed a fight on economic issues.

Mr. Brown, in Ohio, responded to a Republican advertisement with his own attack posted on his Web site. He criticized Mr. DeWine as supporting "tax breaks for the rich."

In Florida, Bush Touts Tax Cuts (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

ORLANDO, Sept. 21 -- President Bush accused Democrats on Thursday of preparing to raise taxes should they take over the House, as he pivoted to a different election-year theme after several weeks of trying to draw sharp differences on fighting terrorism.

On a campaign swing through the vote-rich Interstate 4 corridor of Florida, Bush cited the tax increases approved in Congress when it was last controlled by Democrats in 1993, as well as the opposition of many House Democrats to key aspects of his tax-cutting agenda.

"If they get control of the House of Representatives, they'll raise your taxes," Bush told several hundred supporters at a fundraiser in Tampa. "It will hurt our economy, and that's why we're not going to let them get control."

Democrats scoffed at the president's assertion. "This president has added $2.7 trillion to the nation's debt, and every year he has been president, he has run a deficit," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), who is heading the Democratic campaign to regain the House.

The sharp exchange signaled the intensifying battle for control of Congress, where the Republicans face a strong Democratic challenge in both houses. It was the first time in two weeks that Bush has made public appearances on behalf of GOP candidates. Some polls have shown modest improvement in the president's anemic political standing since the fifth-anniversary commemorations of the Sept. 11 attacks.

White House aides said the president plans in the coming weeks to be heavily engaged in the midterm elections, with stops scheduled on behalf of endangered Sen. Mike DeWine and Rep. Deborah Pryce in Ohio, Senate hopeful Bob Corker in Tennessee, the Connecticut Republican Party, and the reelection bid of Alabama Gov. Bob Riley. Many of these events will be closed fundraisers, though one senior official said Bush is expected to participate in get-out-the-vote events in GOP strongholds such as southwest Missouri and eastern Iowa.

Several of Bush's recent political appearances have been focused on terrorism, with only a modest nod to the traditional GOP tax-cutting agenda. But Thursday, at separate appearances on behalf of GOP House candidate Gus Bilirakis and gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist, Bush sought to draw a sharp difference between Democrats and Republicans on taxes. A homeowner revolt over taxes and insurance costs is roiling this critical battleground state, according to Florida political analysts.

The president zeroed in on comments this week by Rep. Charles B. Rangel (N.Y.), who would take over the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee if the Democrats win back the majority. Rangel told Bloomberg News that he "cannot think of one" of Bush's first-term tax cuts that merits renewal.

Bush told the crowd in Tampa, "That's one way of saying they're going to raise your taxes, because, you see, if you don't extend the tax cuts, your taxes go up."

DOJ_NMG_0067480

The reference to Rangel -- though not by name -- came with ironic timing. It was the same day that the veteran congressman called a news conference in Washington to defend the president against the attacks this week by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez at the United Nations and at a Harlem church. Those attacks, as well as jibes from the Iranian president, seem to have energized Bush's political base.

Rangel told reporters: "I just want to make it abundantly clear to Hugo Chavez or any other president: Do not come to the United States and think because we have problems with our president that any foreigner can come to our country and not think that Americans do not feel offended when you offend our chief of state."

After the speech, Rangel said a top priority will be offering families relief from the alternative minimum tax. He also said he will review "tax breaks for the wealthy that no one has asked for and have driven our nation deeper into debt."

Republicans said the president collected about $450,000 for Bilirakis, who is aspiring to the seat held by his father, Michael, for the past 12 terms in the Tampa area. The GOP nominee is favored, but Democrat Phyllis Busansky is waging an aggressive campaign. Bush also stopped by football practice to offer a pep talk for the Tampa Bay Buccaneers, who have started the season with two losses, before moving on to Orlando for a Crist fundraiser.

Crist, the Florida attorney general, is leading in the polls against the Democratic nominee, Rep. Jim Davis of Tampa, but the race is considered competitive. At the fundraiser, Bush was joined onstage by brother Jeb Bush, the Florida governor -- ineligible for reelection because of term limits. Conspicuously not on stage, but in the audience, was another GOP statewide candidate, Senate nominee Katherine Harris, who is struggling to unseat Sen. Bill Nelson. Bush urged the Orlando crowd to support her candidacy.

Political researcher Zachary A. Goldfarb in Washington contributed to this report.

Bush Flexes Campaign Muscles (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, September 22, 2006

President Bush, politicking at full campaign speed, contended Thursday that a vote for Democrats this fall would be a vote to siphon money out of American families' budgets.

It was Bush the Politician, unleashed, seven weeks before the midterm congressional elections.

The president's campaigning to help his party win governorships and maintain control of Congress in the November voting has been kept largely under wraps of late. Most of his political appearances have been at closed fundraisers. That reflected his low approval ratings that have GOP candidates eager for Bush's ability to collect campaign cash but unwilling to be splashed across the local press at his side.

Not so on Thursday.

Racing through three venues in two Florida cities, Bush displayed his competitive streak and a love for engaging in political battle.

"I'm looking forward to reminding the American people there are significant differences in between what our party believes and what the other party believes. It's easy to tell us apart," the president said, pounding the lectern and shouting at sometimes earsplitting levels, at an open-to-the-press luncheon here that raised $450,000 for state Rep. Gus Bilirakis. He is trying to succeed his father in Congress in a safe Republican district. "And the first place you can start is looking at taxes," the president said.

Bush has repeatedly called for Congress to make permanent all the tax cuts passed at his urging earlier in his administration. GOP leaders have had little success doing so, focusing instead on extensions.

He criticized Democrats for passing what he called a "massive tax increase" in 1993 when their party last controlled the House. And he said that in the 13 years since, "they've worked hard to sustain their record as the party of high taxes," with overwhelming majorities of House Democrats voting against many of the Bush cuts.

And now, Bush said, the man poised to be chairman of the House tax-writing committee if Democrats control the chamber "can't think of one of our tax cuts that should be extended." Bush, who equates that opposition with an intention to raise taxes, was referring, though not by name, to Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y.

"There should be no doubt in anybody's mind where they stand," the president said of Democrats. "If they get control of the House of Representatives, they'll raise your taxes."

Rangel said he would seek Republicans' cooperation, but he defended a review of "tax breaks for the wealthy that no one has asked for and have driven our nation deeper into debt."

Stacie Paxton, spokeswoman for the Democratic National Committee, said: "Under President Bush, the GOP has turned record surplus into record debt, Americans' wages are stagnant and families are taking on more and more debt just to keep up in the Republican economy. You can't trust Republicans to handle your money."

DOJ_NMG_0067481

After speaking inside the Tampa Bay Buccaneers' football stadium, Bush went to the team's nearby practice field where he spent more than a half-hour, sleeves rolled up and laughing with excited players and officials. The president offered a pep talk to the team, off to a winless start this season. "I've been 0-2 before," he said to laughs. "The beginning of the season is not the end of the season."

Bush wrapped his Florida tour at an Orlando reception that scooped up $2 million for GOP gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist, Florida's attorney general, and the state Republican Party. He hadn't lost any of his enthusiasm in the four hours since the first fundraiser, and he sounded the same themes.

"We got a record of cutting taxes, and they got a record of opposing tax cuts — it's night and day," the president said.

Democrats, whom political observers give a chance of gaining a majority in the House and, less likely, the Senate, have sought to make the elections a referendum on the unpopular war in Iraq.

The president, meanwhile, has tried to shift attention to the economy, as well as to the broader war against al-Qaida terrorists and their allies. He continued that push Thursday.

"I need members of Congress who understand that you can't negotiate with these folks, you can't hope that they change their mind, that the best way to protect the American people is to defeat them overseas so we do not have to face them here at home," he said.

GOP Rep. Katherine Harris, who won the Republican nomination in this state's Senate race despite party objections to her candidacy from the White House on down, attended both fundraisers.

But Bush's help for her long-shot race to unseat Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson was limited to briefly noting her presence in Tampa, and urging support for her in Orlando. "I, too, encourage you to vote for Katherine Harris for the United States Senate. Welcome, Katherine," he said before quickly moving on.

Bush Campaigns On Tax Cuts (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

ORLANDO, Fla. — Opening a new phase in his campaigning for the midterm elections, President Bush delivered a tough attack Thursday on the Democratic Party's policy on taxes.

Bush, speaking at two political fundraisers in Florida, sought to distinguish Republicans from Democrats on a core issue that advisors believe will motivate GOP voters.

"There's a fundamental difference in this campaign and campaigns all across the country about who best to spend your money. We believe that the best people to spend your money is you," the president said at an appearance in Tampa, citing tax cuts passed by the Republican-led Congress since 2001.

Democrats responded by criticizing Bush for adding to the national debt.

"The deficit the president has run up has essentially put a $28,000 tax on every newborn, and that's not to mention the $1 billion a week we're spending in Iraq," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who leads the Democratic effort to win more House seats.

Bush spoke in Tampa at a fundraiser for Gus Bilirakis, a Republican, who is seeking the seat his father, Michael Bilirakis, has held in the House. "There's nothing wrong with a son following in his father's footsteps," said Bush, the son of a president.

The reception at a concourse of Raymond James Stadium raised $450,000.

Bush spoke later in the day in Orlando, at a fundraiser for Charlie Crist, the state attorney general who is the Republican nominee for governor.

The president's focus on taxes marked a change from his efforts over the last three weeks to highlight his administration's anti-terrorism policies.

Challenging the Democrats' record on taxes, Bush said in Tampa: "When we first cut taxes back in 2001 to get this economy going, when we cut taxes to recover from a recession, when we cut taxes to make sure we recovered from a corporate scandal, almost 85% of the House Democrats voted against it."

He said that 95% of House Democrats had voted against a 2003 tax cut proposal. "I think you're beginning to get a drift of their philosophy about your money," he said.

Emanuel, the Democratic congressman, said in a written response: "For a guy who added $3 trillion to the nation's debt and has run a deficit five out of the last five years, George Bush should not throw such sharp stones while living in such a glass house."

The president also warned of the dangers of terrorism.

Defending his decision to launch the war against Iraq, he said: "Getting rid of Saddam Hussein was the right thing to do…. The world is more peaceful because of it."

DOJ_NMG_0067482

Bush finessed a potentially difficult political moment, acknowledging the presence of the party's Senate candidate, Rep. Katherine Harris (R-Fla.), who as Florida's secretary of state was at the center of the disputed recount in the 2000 presidential election.

Republican Party leaders had tagged Harris as a likely loser and discouraged her candidacy, but she won the party's nomination nonetheless. Bush made passing references to Harris in Tampa and again in Orlando.

"I'm proud to be here with Congresswoman Katherine Harris, running for the United States Senate," he said in Tampa when he recognized the various political figures in the audience.

Democratic Win Means More Taxes, Bush Warns (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

TAMPA, Fla. -- President Bush yesterday charged that if Democrats gain control of the House in the November elections, they will try to force tax increases on Americans.

Pivoting from his recent series of speeches on the war on terrorism, which have boosted poll numbers for him and Republicans overall, Mr. Bush turned to the economy, the other issue that he thinks his party has a strong record on which to run.

"There should be no doubt in anybody's mind where we stand on cutting taxes. And the Democrats in Washington have got a record of their own, and there should be no doubt in anybody's mind where they stand," the president told 400 Republicans at campaign fundraiser here.

He came armed with a series of statistics about Democrats' records, which he said voters should remember when they head to the polls: 85 percent of House Democrats voted against his 2001 tax cut package, 95 percent voted against his 2003 tax cut package and 92 percent voted against this year's bill to extend some of those cuts.

"I think you're beginning to get a drift of their philosophy about your money," Mr. Bush said.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said she welcomed turning this election into a referendum on the economy.

"Real incomes for middle-class families have declined since the president took office," she said, pointing to increased health insurance, energy and college tuition costs.

And Rep. Rahm Emanuel, Illinois Democrat and chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said that given that the national debt has grown so quickly under Mr. Bush, he shouldn't "throw such sharp stones while living in such a glass house."

Mr. Bush, though, said Democrats have even threatened to raise taxes.

He pointed to comments by Rep. Charles B. Rangel of New York, who would become chairman of the Ways and Means Committee if Democrats won control of Congress. Mr. Rangel has said he doesn't see any Bush tax cuts worth extending.

"That's one way of saying they're going to raise your taxes because, you see, if you don't extend the tax cuts, your taxes go up," Mr. Bush said.

The president has dominated press coverage in the past few weeks with his push on terrorism, and his tax message yesterday was overshadowed by the deal his administration reached with key senators to approve a CIA interrogation program.

The talk on terrorism has been good for him.

A Los Angeles Times-Bloomberg poll released yesterday found Mr. Bush with a 44 percent approval rating. That is Mr. Bush's highest rating since January.

The number matches the 44 percent approval rating that the Gallup-USA Today poll showed earlier this week.

Still, a CBS-New York Times poll released this week found that Mr. Bush "had not improved his own or his party's standing" with his series of speeches, according to yesterday's Times.

That poll put Mr. Bush's job approval rating at 37 percent, unchanged from an August poll, as was the number -- 54 percent -- who approve of the way he is handling the war on terrorism.

Bush: Best Way To Protect Nation Is To `stay On The Offense' (MERCN)

By William E. Gibson

The San Jose Mercury News, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON - Hoping to regain his political stature, President Bush has hit the campaign trail to sound warnings about terrorism while boosting Republican candidates in this year's elections.

Returning to Florida, the state that secured his election in 2000, Bush on Thursday helped Republicans raise money in Tampa and Orlando while asserting that defending America means fighting in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0067483

"The best way to protect the United States is to stay on the offense and bring the enemy to justice before they come here and hurt us in America," Bush told a supportive crowd in Tampa.

In political terms, Bush and fellow Republicans are playing the security card, the one that sent the president's public-approval ratings to a record high in 2001 and helped the party consolidate control of the White House and Congress in the next two elections.

The president's campaign offensive has boosted his approval ratings by a few percentage points in national polls while prompting Democrats and other critics to accuse him of playing politics with terror.

Voters in Florida and elsewhere are divided over Bush's effectiveness, depending on whether they believe the war in Iraq has made America more secure or more vulnerable. What was once Bush's strength has become another partisan quarrel.

In this conflicted environment, one big question is whether Republicans once again can ride the terror issue to victory. At stake is majority control of Congress.

"If Bush has not fanned the fires of fear, he has stood by and warmed himself near them," said Robert Watson, associate professor of political science at Florida Atlantic University. "Every speech, every warning, all the color-code alerts - he reminds people at every turn about the dangers of terrorism.

"Why? Because it's such a close race. Neither party has much to stand on, and what else does the president have to talk about? Not the price of gasoline, not the price of health care."

In his Tampa speech on Thursday, Bush touted his low-tax policies and said he had fulfilled his promise to Florida to set "reasonable limits" on offshore oil drilling. But the focus of this and nearly every recent Bush speech was terror and Iraq.

"Iraq is the central front of this war on terror," he said.

"Saddam Hussein was a threat. And don't let people rewrite the history of the way the world was. He was a state sponsor of terror. He paid families of suiciders. (sic) He attacked his neighbors. He used weapons of mass destruction."

The issue has spilled into congressional campaigns in South Florida and other communities, where unease over Iraq has sapped much of the president's popularity.

Democrats argue that Bush's policies and the war in Iraq have become a recruiting tool for terrorists and have left Americans less secure. Their campaign strategy is to depict Republican candidates, such as Rep. Clay Shaw of Fort Lauderdale, as part of a "rubber-stamp" Congress.

"Clay Shaw is not providing any kind of oversight of what is going on in Iraq," said state Sen. Ron Klein of Boca Raton, Shaw's Democratic opponent. "He's not asking the tough questions."

Shaw contends that "most people want to stay the course" and accuses Klein of not presenting an alternative plan.

"This (Iraq war) has taken away some of the energy the president once had," Shaw conceded. "The American people do not want to support a prolonged war. We want to get in and get out and come home. Sadly we just can't do that, and we're stuck."

After taking office in the disputed 2000 election, Bush's approval ratings in The Gallup Poll had drifted down to 51 percent in September 2001. Then came the terrorist attacks and a dramatic rallying effect, which boosted Bush's approval rating to 90 percent.

It has ratcheted down ever since, reaching a low of 31 percent in The Gallup Poll in May before bouncing up to 44 percent in the most recent poll. Along the way, it was briefly buoyed by the invasion of Iraq and by terrorist incidents and red alerts. The climate of fear became a political windfall for Republicans, the party often associated with defense and security issues.

"If fear gets intensified, that pulls people toward the president," said Steven Kull, a pollster and director of the Program on International Policy Attitudes at the University of Maryland. "It makes people feel under siege. They hunker down and draw closer to the president and are less apt to criticize. But you can't keep doing that day after day."

Democrats are counting on the public separating Iraq from the larger war on terror while focusing again on domestic issues, such as health care and energy.

"They (Republicans) are going to keep this balloon floating as close as they can to November. The president is going to spend a lot of federal jet fuel flying all over the country talking about how he has protected America," said Rep. Kendrick Meek, D-Fla. "Obviously in Florida, because of Jeb Bush, he's had the bullet-proof vest on as it relates to his approval numbers.

"But there will come to a point when folks say this cycle is done, let's talk about some of these other issues that are facing Americans. People are going to say there should be a body, a chamber, that is going to bring balance to what this administration has been doing."

8 Year Old Meets President, Invites Him To Party For Hurricane Victims (BRAH)

By Melanie Marquez

The Bradenton Herald, September 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0067484

TAMPA - A Valrico 8 year old shook hands with the president today, received a citizenship award and then invited him to a party for young victims of a hurricane.

Zach Bonner told The Herald on the tarmac at Tampa International Airport that President Bush politely declined to attend the Christmas party for Katrina victims in Louisiana in December, but said he would "send something."

For his meeting with the commander and chief, Bonner wore a dark blue blazer and a red tie that matched the president's.

Bonner was accompanied in his brief meeting with Bush by his mother, Laurie Bonner, and his brother, Matt Chesney, 17. Mom and brother stood off to the side as the president shook Zach Bonner's hand and presented him with the President's Volunteer Service Award.

Zach Bonner worked and organized relief efforts for the victims of hurricanes Charley in Florida and Katrina in Louisiana and Mississippi.

Just minutes after Air Force One touched down at TIA at 12:15 p.m. and taxied to an area near Raytheon Aircraft Services, the president descended stairs and met with the family. Media members about 45 yards away watched but could not hear what was said at the brief ceremony.

Afterward, Zach Bonner spoke to The Herald.

He said he was honored, and that he presented the president with a photograph of National Parks badges collected around the country as he has traveled to drum up support for the children affected by hurricanes in 2004 and 2005.

It was a beautiful day for the outdoor ceremony. Bush appeared energetic during his first visit to Florida since the primary elections.

After the ceremony, he entered a car as part of a motorcade. The reason for the trip was to appear at a fundraiser for State Rep. Gus Bilirakis, who is running congress.

Bush was to fly out of TIA in the early afternoon.

Valrico Boy Gets Presidential Award (SPT)

By Letitia Stein

St. Petersburg Times, September 22, 2006

TAMPA — At 8 years old, Zach Bonner met his second U.S. president on Thursday. Although partisan types may take exception, he found both George W. Bush and Bill Clinton equally charming.

"They were both really, really nice," Bonner said. "I was really excited about both of them."

Arriving in Tampa for a fundraiser, Bush met the Valrico boy outside Air Force One.

Bonner, who had been practicing his handshake, felt nervous as the commander-in-chief walked over.

"It went so fast," he recalled. "He said congratulations, and he was proud of me."

If it weren't coming from a president, "proud" could sound like an understatement for Zach's accomplishments.

Two years ago, he heard that the victims of Hurricane Charley needed water. Zach asked his mother if he could give some. Then his neighbors. Twenty-seven pickup truckloads later, he was still helping others.

Today, Zach has his own nonprofit, the Little Red Wagon Foundation Inc., complete with a Web site at www.littleredwagonfoundation.com.

"I wanted to help other kids," he said. "Some of the organizations I wanted to help, I had to have 501(c)3. And so I started my own organization."

In his brief visit, Bush awarded Zach a lapel pin inscribed with "Presidential Call to Service Award."

As far as meeting presidents go, Zach confessed that 43 may have one-upped 42.

"It probably meant a little bit more to me from President Bush because, I mean, he's still in office," said Zach, who met Clinton after his presidency.

Welcome To My Site! (LRWF)

Little Red Wagon Foundation, September 22, 2006

My name is Zach and I am the founder of the Little Red Wagon Foundation Inc. I created a non profit so I could help kids in distressed situations. My plan is to help as many kids as I can, have fun and keep it simple. I hope you like my site and find it to be useful and informative. If you have any questions about what I am doing or how you can help, email me. Don't be shy, leave me a comment, let me know you were here. If you would like to recieve updates on what I am doing please click join this site listed above! Then I can keep you upddate on my projects and the auction! THANKS FOR STOPPING BY!!!

This is a picture of President Bush and me. He was very nice and it was an honor to meet him. He gave me the President's service award and we talked about the JR Ranger program.

AUCTION HAS BEGUN. DIFFERENT ITEMS WILL BEGIN THROUGH OUT THE EVENING.

Clicking the link above will give you the opportunity to help us. Every time you do an internet search using Good Search the Little Red Wagon will recieve a small amount of money. It is run my Yahoo so you know it can be trusted.

President Visits Bucs, Throws With QB (FWNS)

By Fred Goodall

The Fort Wayne News-Sentinel, September 22, 2006

TAMPA, Fla. - It seems like everyone has some advice these days for the winless Tampa Bay Buccaneers and struggling quarterback Chris Simms.

Even President Bush tossed the football with the former University of Texas quarterback Thursday, and offered some advice.

"Never give up," Bush said Thursday when asked what he told the Bucs during a half-hour visit to the team's training facility near Raymond James Stadium, where the president delivered a fundraising speech to about 400 people in a VIP club area.

Coach Jon Gruden wouldn't disclose what additional wisdom the president might have imparted to Simms.

"It's great, though, to get some advice from the president of the United States. It's a little different when the coach is telling you to do this or do that. You have the president come and give you some advice, that's something you gotta listen to," Gruden said.

"Hopefully it works. If it doesn't work out this week, he can call the president to see what happened."

Bush accepted an invitation to stop by practice and was greeted on the field by Simms and teammates Derrick Brooks, Ronde Barber and Mike Alstott and Ryan Nece, as well as an appreciative Gruden.

"The president has a lot to do. For him to show up here with the SWAT team on the roof and the Secret Service guys, that's awesome," Gruden said.

The Bucs (0-2) are preparing for Sunday's game against Carolina, another winless team. Simms has been the target of criticism following subpar performances the first two weeks of the season.

Bush addressed the entire squad, coaching staff and other team officials and personnel in the middle of the field. The president mingled with players, coaches and officials, posing for pictures and signing autographs before playing catch with Simms, son of New York Giants Super Bowl-winning quarterback Phil Simms.

'Republicans Will Make History' (WSJ)

By Ken Mehlman

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Last month's narrowly averted plot to blow up airliners bound for the U.S. from Great Britain is a stark reminder that we are engaged in an extraordinary and dangerous global war. In 46 days, the American people will make an important decision about how we prosecute that war: Do we stay on the offense and use every tool available to defeat the enemy, or do we elect leaders who would weaken America and surrender key tools we need to defeat the global jihad?

This war began long before September 11, 2001. For a generation, the terrorists have attacked free nations, from the 1972 Olympic Games in Munich to the 444 days that American hostages were held in Iran; from the 1983 Beirut attacks to the bombings of the World Trade Center in 1993, Riyadh in 1995 and Khobar Towers in 1996; from the embassy attacks in 1998 to bombing of the USS Cole in 2000. Too often, free nations responded weakly, or not at all, so the enemy grew emboldened. The result was 9/11.

Now we understand that we face a radical global movement of Islamic fascists, held together by a totalitarian ideology as deadly as the ones we faced in World War II or the Cold War. This movement ebbs and flows. Its adherents meet in cyberspace instead of buildings. They gather on blogs instead of barracks. A terrorist in Syria can recruit allies in the heart of Europe and a cell leader in Asia can activate an attack in the U.S., all without leaving their homes. That makes this enemy difficult to defeat. They constantly adapt -- so we must as well.

That is why the choice we face on Nov. 7 is so critical. Democratic leaders are saying Iraq is a diversion from the war on terror, that we should be more focused on defending the homeland. But again and again, the Democrats have proposed weakening our defenses.

We learned on 9/11 the need for coordination between federal, state and local governments; yet the majority of congressional Democrats voted against re-authorization of the Patriot Act. The foiled airplane plot re-emphasized the importance of following an enemy whose command and control is often obscure; yet Democrats opposed the NSA surveillance program and praised an activist judge's attempt to shut it down.

We need to aggressively and effectively interrogate captured terrorists in order to stop their plans before they come to fruition; yet Democrats want to handcuff those efforts. Terrorists cannot build IEDs or buy weapons without funding, but when the

DOJ_NMG_0067486

New York Times disclosed a secret program that was tracking their financing, more than 85% of House Democrats voted against a resolution supporting the program and condemning its media disclosure. We need to stop rogue regimes like Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons; yet Democrats want to take any use of force off the table.

Even more dangerous is that Democrats truly seem to believe that Iraq is completely separate from the greater war on terror. Al Qaeda's leaders are not confused about the importance of Iraq to their goal of global jihad. Osama bin Laden's No. 2, Ayman al-Zawahiri, has said his plan is to use Iraq as a base to launch further attacks, with the goal of creating a new caliphate in the Middle East. He wants to turn Iraq into another Taliban-era Afghanistan, except one strategically located between Syria and Iran, and sitting on one of the world's largest supplies of oil. Osama bin Laden himself said that the American withdrawal from Somalia emboldened his movement before 9/11. Imagine the victory celebrations among the terrorists if we were to retreat from Iraq. Yet this is exactly what Howard Dean and a majority of Democrats would have us do. In 46 days, we must ask ourselves, would surrendering Iraq to the enemy make us safer -- or less safe?

Here at home, we are also working to reform government. We live in a global economy, one in which it is just as easy to create jobs in India as it is in Indiana. Republicans understand this, which is why we are committed to lower taxes, less regulation and fewer lawsuits. Republicans have cut taxes every year since George W. Bush was elected president. We have streamlined regulations, reformed bankruptcy laws, offered choice to Medicare recipients, and limited class-action lawsuits. The Democrats opposed every single one of those reforms -- and they are pledging to stand in our way as we move forward.

Republicans want to eliminate the death tax once and for all. Democrats want to bring it back. Republicans want to explore new sources of energy to bring gas and heating prices down. Democrats want to block domestic exploration. Republicans want small businesses to be able to band together to provide health care to their employees at a reasonable price. Democrats don't believe entrepreneurs should have that freedom. Republicans want all parents to have the choice of where they send their kids to school. Democrats would limit that choice to the rich and powerful. The list goes on and on.

It would be foolish not to acknowledge the challenges Republicans face this election cycle. We are up against history. It has been close to a century since Republicans have held the White House and the House of Representatives for eight straight years. Winning four elections in a row doesn't happen that often.

Each election is unique, and the issues and candidates in the governor's race in Michigan are different from congressional races in California or the Senate contest in Tennessee. But there can be no doubt about the national and international import of the choice we all face as Americans. We face war and a changing global economy, and Republicans have very different strategies for victory than the Democrats. I believe the American people understand the choice of 2006, which is why I am confident that in 46 days Republicans will make history and maintain our majorities in Congress.

Mr. Mehlman is chairman of the Republican National Committee.

'Democrats Offer A New Direction' (WSJ)

By Howard Dean

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

We need a Democratic Congress to fight the war on terror -- and to end the war on America's families. Republican policies of the last five years have damaged our economy and failed Americans. Democrats believe strengthening the middle class is essential for a thriving economy that rewards work, provides economic opportunity to all and makes it easier for parents to devote time to their families. An economy that favors the top 1% at the expense of everyone else might be good for President Bush's politics, but a shrinking middle class is bad for capitalism, democracy and America. We need a new direction.

The Republican record on managing the federal budget is dismal. Republicans have turned surplus into debt, hope into lost opportunity; they have become the party of borrow-and-spend. The Joint Committee on Taxation estimates that the total cost this year of the president's tax cuts is $258 billion. This means that even with spending for wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and the response to Hurricane Katrina, the federal budget would essentially be in balance if the tax cuts had not been enacted, or if they had been offset as required under the pay-as-you-go rules that Republicans allowed to expire. These economic policies amount to a war on American families:

· Under Mr. Bush and the Republican Congress, incomes today are $1,000 less for the typical household than during Bill Clinton's final year in office; incomes for the typical working-age household have declined every year since the president took office. Black and Hispanic households have fared worse over the same period: Black household income has fallen every year, after rising every year (except for a one-year $60 dip) under Mr. Clinton. Incomes for Hispanic households are down $1,000, after rising more than $7,000 under Mr. Clinton.

· Incomes have fallen because wages -- which provide 75% of income for typical families -- are stagnant for most workers. Under Mr. Bush, wages for college-educated workers increased only 1.3% between 2000 and 2005, as compared to 11.3% during Mr. Clinton's last five years. For the nation's lowest-paid workers, the situation is even worse, as the minimum wage is worth less now than at any time in at least 50 years.

DOJ_NMG_0067487

· Health and retirement coverage have declined for most workers and their families, and workers' costs have increased. The share of Americans with job-based health coverage fell over the last five years from 62.6% in 2000 to only 59.5% in 2005, virtually erasing gains in such coverage under Mr. Clinton, when coverage rose from 57.1% in 1993 to 63.6 % in 2000. Workers are also paying more for their coverage. Between 2001 and 2005, the amount workers paid for family premiums grew more than 50%. These factors have fueled increases in the number of uninsured every year under Mr. Bush, to almost 47 million last year -- roughly one in six Americans.

· Retirement coverage has also declined. Only 19% of workers have guaranteed pensions today, compared with 39% in 1980. And under Mr. Bush, retirement coverage, including both guaranteed pensions and 401(k)s, fell almost three percentage points, to just less than 46% in 2004.

· Americans are taking on more debt just to keep up in the Republican economy. Last year, household debt was a record 132% of disposable income. Not surprisingly, home mortgage foreclosures are also up; in March of this year, the foreclosure rate was 63% higher than last year.

· While wages and incomes have slowed, health costs increased, debt increased and retirement coverage declined, the cost of sending kids to college has exploded. Between 1995 and '96 and 2005 and '06, the average costs for a four-year private college rose 32% and for a four-year public college, 42%.

· These dwindling economic fortunes have resulted partly from a decline in unionization, which has been exacerbated by the all-out assault of the Bush Republicans on workers' rights to organize and bargain. From stripping away union protections for whole classes of workers to intervening in labor-management disputes in various industries, Mr. Bush, backed by a Republican Congress, has done more to undermine workers' rights than any president in more than 70 years.

These bleak statistics explain why the overwhelming majority of Americans know our country is moving in the wrong direction -- despite the economic cheerleading of the Republicans. Americans know who has benefited in this economy -- and, for most, it isn't them.

The president's failures in Iraq are also hurting our economy, our country and our ability to fight the war on terror. We are spending $8 billion a month in Iraq -- that's $267 million a day. Consider that for what we spend in three weeks in Iraq, we could make needed improvements to secure our public transportation system; for what we spend in five days we could double the COPS program, and put more police on the streets to keep our neighborhoods safe, or we could put radiation detectors at all our ports.

Democrats offer America a new direction in fiscal policy, for the middle class, and in the war in Iraq. We believe that America should work for everyone:

We will restore honesty in government, starting with the pay-as-you-go discipline in Congress that served Mr. Clinton so well. Balancing the Federal budget will be a high priority with concurrent limitation of spending. We will ease the burdens on middle class Americans and reverse Republican cuts in college tuition aid and health care. We will ensure that a retirement with dignity is the right and expectation of every single American, including pension reform, and preventing the privatization of social security.

We will dramatically expand support of energy independence in order to generate large numbers of new American jobs and reduce our dependence on foreign oil. We will have a jobs agenda that includes good jobs that stay in America, a higher minimum wage and trade policies that benefit the global labor force, not just multinational corporations.

We will have a defense policy that is tough and smart, starting with phased redeployment of our troops in Iraq, and shore up our efforts to attack al Qaeda and fight the war on terror. We also will close the gaps in our security here at home by implementing the 9/11 Commission recommendations.

We are ready to lead with a thoughtful, fiscally responsible long-term vision. We will reach out to all Americans who value hope over fear and begin moving the country forward again.

Mr. Dean is chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

Good News For Republicans? (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

In Minnesota, Amy Klobuchar looks into the camera and declares: "These days, no matter how hard you work, the price of gas, college and health care is getting out of reach."

The answer, says the Democratic candidate for the U.S. Senate, is to "bring a dose of Minnesota fairness to Washington."

DOJ_NMG_0067488

In Ohio, Democrat Sherrod Brown, who is campaigning against Republican Sen. Mike DeWine, says his state's residents "work hard, they love their country, they play by the rules." But their jobs in "cars, steel and appliances" are being pushed overseas by unfair trade agreements.

The maneuvering this month for November's midterm elections is primarily about shaping the priorities that voters will carry with them to their polling places. Behind the speeches and the ads is a subtle war for position, an effort to prepare the ground for the campaign's final weeks.

The obvious battle is over whether voters on Nov. 7 will be thinking more about the violence in Iraq, which pushes them the Democrats' way, or about the broader war on terrorism.

In this skirmish, Republicans can chalk up modest but real gains. The Pew Research Center found that the proportion of voters who listed terrorism as the most important problem facing the country increased from 5 percent in May to 15 percent this month. Significantly, the share of independents who listed terrorism as the key issue rose from 5 percent to 13 percent.

The proportion of all voters listing Iraq as the most important problem went up, too, from 18 percent to 26 percent. Much of the increase was among Democrats -- 36 percent of them said Iraq was the central question. But among independents, there was virtually no change in the importance of Iraq, and the findings were similar for self-described moderates. The relative balance between terrorism and Iraq among less partisan and ideological voters has shifted in the Republicans' direction.

But the question that has received far less attention in Washington is the one joined by Klobuchar and Brown: How will voters see the economy?

Through July and August, Republicans were reeling from voter anger over what GOP pollster David Winston calls "the cost-of-living issue" dramatized every day at the pump. He uses "cost of living" instead of "inflation" because, while the formal inflation rate is relatively low, the costs important to families -- gas, health care and college tuition, as Klobuchar's ad suggests, plus housing -- have been rising.

"Over the summer, we would talk about good economic numbers -- and then people would go to the gas station," Winston says. Now falling gas prices reinforce the Republican message about economic improvement.

The GOP is still in trouble on the economy. The New York Times-CBS News poll published yesterday found that 36 percent of respondents thought the economy was getting worse, compared with 17 percent who saw it getting better.

But this is actually good news for Republicans, considering that in July the same poll found that only 12 percent saw the economy improving while 47 percent saw it declining. And in the Pew survey, the share of voters listing gas prices and the constellation of issues around energy as the country's most important problem fell from 14 percent in May to 7 percent this month.

Are these improvements in the political terrain for Republicans the beginning of a long-term shift, or are they primarily a coming home of Republican-leaning voters who were eventually going to get back to their party anyway?

Republican strategists such as Winston are simply relieved that after a very bad summer, there is at least some movement the GOP's way. Democrats concede Bush's gains in his own party but note that even after the president's recent political push on terrorism, independents are still inclined toward the Democrats. In the race for Congress, the Times-CBS poll gave Democrats a 15-point advantage, while a Los Angeles Times-Bloomberg survey, also published yesterday, put them ahead by 10. A margin of that sort at this point usually signals victory for the party running ahead.

The decisive question is whether Democrats can seize the initiative back from Bush in early October, after the Republican Congress returns home. Democrats plan to marry the themes of national and economic security -- think of their economic platform as a dose of Klobuchar and a dash of Brown -- and hope that splits among Republicans on torture, which were resolved only yesterday, will dampen GOP gains from the resurgence of the terrorism issue.

The paradox is that the survival chances of a Republican Party led by a former oilman from Texas will depend in large part on whether gas prices keep falling.

Americans Upbeat About Economic Forecast (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

Americans have become more optimistic about the economy and they are giving President Bush some of the credit, a new Times/Bloomberg poll shows.

Republicans running for election next month could benefit from the development, as voters say the economy will influence their choices in November more than any other national issue, including the war in Iraq and terrorism.

Consumer confidence fell this summer as gas prices peaked and the housing market weakened, particularly in California. Those polled in July were almost evenly split on the state of the economy, with 49% saying the economy was doing badly.

DOJ_NMG_0067489

Now, the optimists outnumber the pessimists in the poll by 10 percentage points, with 54% saying the economy is doing well.

"There's a lot of conflicting indicators but things seem to be cruising along pretty steadily," said respondent David Busch, 38, a sales executive in Redmond, Wash., who describes himself as an independent voter. "We've seen a lot of alarmist talk about housing bubbles bursting, gas prices that are going to derail the economy that haven't materialized."

Seven weeks before the midterm elections, the economy remains voters' primary focus. Among registered voters, 32% listed the economy and jobs as the most important election issue, followed by the war in Iraq (21%), immigration (17%) and healthcare (10%).

Those polled cited a variety of reasons for feeling better about the economy, including unemployment at a low 4.7% nationally, lower gas prices this month and an interest rate freeze by the Federal Reserve.

That could be good news for Republican candidates, as the GOP is the party in power in Washington and may be able to take some credit for the economy.

When the economy is rocky, voters traditionally punish the party in power, said Bruce Oppenheimer, a political science professor at Vanderbilt University. But when the economy is doing well, their reactions are more difficult to predict, he added.

"This year it's a little more complex to figure because it's clear that the objective measures of how the economy is doing are not striking everybody equally," Oppenheimer said.

For instance, pay is rising for some college-educated professionals, but most workers face wage stagnation, he said. While falling gas prices could boost Republican candidates, he said, "The question is will it be too little too late?"

The Times/Bloomberg poll interviewed 1,517 adults, including 1,347 registered voters, nationwide between Saturday and Tuesday under the supervision of Times Poll Director Susan Pinkus. The survey's margin of sampling error is plus or minus three percentage points.

Although the survey shows more than half of registered voters still disapprove of the way Bush is handling the economy, the ranks of those who approve are increasing. Among registered voters polled, 43% said they approve of the president's handling of the economy, up from 38% in July and a January low of 37%.

"Everything seems to be going all right. I don't hear a lot of people complaining that much about the economy. The Feds have kept the interest rates down, so that will probably help," said Chester "Chet" Kusmitch, 69, a retired union carpenter in Crystal Falls, Mich.

Kusmitch said the president is doing a good job handling the economy. "You can't blame everything on the president for crying out loud. A lot of things effect the economy."

Charles Gunnells, 54, a disabled diesel mechanic and registered Republican in Salyersville, Ky., said he has his doubts about the economy, but believes the president is doing "about as good a job as anybody else could be doing."

Gunnells said his opinion of the president improved in recent weeks as he watched prices at the gas pump drop. "I feel a lot better about it when I see the prices go down," Gunnells said.

Many of those polled agree with him — 26% said high oil prices are the greatest threat to the economy today, far ahead of other factors such as foreign competition (18%) and terrorism (16%).

The average price of gas rose to $3.08 in August before dropping to $2.54 this week, according to the Department of Energy. The dip in oil and gas prices is increasing most Americans' confidence in the economy, said Chuck Williams, dean of the business school at the University of the Pacific in Stockton.

"People see the economy in terms of their daily expenses — what is it going to cost to pick up their child from day care, what does it cost to buy lunch, what does it cost to fill the tank of their car. And if someone's driving an SUV and it's 100 bucks every time you fill up, that gets your attention," Williams said. "If the price is down by 50 cents a gallon, you notice it."

He said consumers' optimism is tempered by uncertainty about fuel prices as winter approaches and by a weakening housing market on both coasts. Homes are lingering on the market in Phoenix, Philadelphia and Washington D.C., and fewer new homes are being built. Last month, new home starts were down nearly 20% since last year, 6% since July, according to a Commerce Department report Tuesday.

In the latest poll, 53% of respondents expect home prices to remain unchanged six months from now and 19% expect prices to drop. Both numbers are up four percentage points since July. A quarter of those earning $60,000 to $100,000 worry that their home will lose value during the next six months, the poll showed.

"Six or twelve months ago, pretty much everybody thought housing prices were going to go up," said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist at PNC Financial Services Group in Pittsburgh. "Clearly, people have changed their expectations. A little bit of reality has set in."

DOJ_NMG_0067490

Donna Bushby, 41, a part-time office worker, said she's getting nervous about the cost of heating her home this winter in the Chicago suburb of Elmwood Park. She and her husband, a truck driver for United Parcel Service, also worry about the value of their home. Six houses on their street are not selling and one has been on the market for a year and a half.

The couple earn enough to cover expenses for a family of five but not to save, Bushby said, and consider home equity as savings. "So if you think of your house going down, that's like your nest egg going down."

Many Americans appear to be stretching to make ends meet around the house. More than half of those polled, 53%, said they have trouble keeping up with rising costs, including 30% of those earning more than $100,000.

"People's paychecks are not going up as much as the prices around us," said Bushby, who is nonetheless optimistic. "Hopefully, it's temporary."

Geoffrey Gray Sr., 56, is a registered Republican but believes the president has mismanaged the economy and worries about the future. Although Gray's house in Reading, Pa. is paid for and the local market isn't likely to collapse, he worries about poor families and "the shrinking middle class."

"People are living paycheck to paycheck," he said.

Many of those polled, especially working-class Americans, are postponing major purchases such as cars, vacations and large appliances, unsure about their finances. Of those polled, 64% said now is not a good time to make major purchases — including 81% of those earning less than $40,000, 66% of those earning $40,000 to $60,000.

"If I do make a big purchase," said Bushby, "it may be a hybrid car."

Drug Imports From Canada Set To Be Eased (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, September 22, 2006

House Republicans tentatively agreed Thursday to prohibit Customs agents from seizing prescription drugs that Americans buy in Canada and bring back into the United States.

The deal would let Americans carry up to a 90-day supply of medication back to the U.S. from Canada without being stopped by Customs agents, House and Senate Republicans said. But it would not let Americans purchase cheaper prescriptions over the Internet or by mail-order, officials said.

"This really breaks the dam, and it shows that it's only a matter of time before we pass a full-blown reimportation bill," said Sen. David Vitter, R-La., who led the fight in the Senate to prohibit the Homeland Security Department from seizing prescription drugs being carried over the border. U.S. Customs and Border Protection is an arm of the Homeland Security Department.

Vitter acknowledged that sales of drugs though mail order or through the Internet is significant. But, he added, "I think support for that is going to continue, and going to continue to grow, no matter what this bill says or doesn't say."

Both Presidents Bush and Clinton have rejected repeated congressional efforts to lift the ban on prescription imports. Medications are generally cheaper in Canada because of government price controls.

While importing drugs into the United States is illegal, the Food and Drug Administration generally has not stopped small amounts of medicine purchased for personal use. But Customs officials began intercepting imported controlled substances two years ago and prescription drugs since last November. Since then, Customs and Border Protection agents have seized more than 34,000 packages of drugs coming into the country.

The pre-election controversy over the new rule threatened to split House GOP leadership who oppose lifting the import ban and rank-and-file Republican lawmakers who want to help elderly voters buy cheaper drugs.

However, many Customs agents already allow prescription drugs into the U.S. from Canada because they don't rigorously search people and cars for them.

Democrats who pushed for broader access to imported drugs accused Republicans of trying to "blow smoke to the voters about cheaper prescription prices when it really doesn't do much of anything," said Dan McLaughlin, spokesman for Sen. Bill Nelson, D-Fla. Earlier this year, Nelson sponsored legislation to prevent Customs agents from seizing mailed medication after he began getting complaints from seniors in his state.

"I think you could call this agreement in the House a very small advance and certainly we'll take it, but it's no place that we can stop and certainly isn't enough to be satisfied with," McLaughlin said. "It really doesn't help very many people."

Opponents said importing drugs that do not have FDA approval could be unsafe for consumers. The FDA says it cannot guarantee the safety of imported drugs.

Representatives for the pharmaceutical industry said Canadian Internet pharmacies, for example, have been known to sell fake and potentially unsafe medicines to unknowing American consumers through other countries.

"Americans should look at much safer alternatives that already exist and are proving to be incredibly effective here at home," said Ken Johnson, senior vice president for the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, or PhRMA.

DOJ_NMG_0067491

According to the Congressional Budget Office, brand-name drugs cost, on average, 35 to 55 percent less in other industrialized nations than they do in the United States. Supporters of importing drugs contend that the U.S. is subsidizing the cost of medicine for the rest of the world.

The prescription drug policy shift would be included in a $33.7 billion bill to fund the Homeland Security Department next year. Lawmakers who control the department's spending levels will meet Monday to debate other last-minute changes to the legislation, which has also been stymied by proposals to give Homeland Security regulatory oversight of security measures at chemical plants.

Lawmakers were negotiating whether to let the department require some high-risk chemical facilities to use nontoxic materials that would be more expensive but safer to the public if there is a release. The chemical industry strongly opposes such a requirement, and environmentalists have been pushing for it just as vociferously.

___

Associated Press writer Kevin Freking contributed to this report.

Savings, Shakeup Seen In $4 Drug Plan (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, September 22, 2006

Wal-Mart Stores' move to offer some generic drugs for $4 a prescription could save modest amounts for some consumers. It may also draw more customers to its stores or prompt a price war with other pharmacies.

Wal-Mart, the nation's third-largest seller of prescription drugs, said Thursday that it will offer the $4 price on about 150 generic drugs to the insured and uninsured alike, starting immediately in the Tampa area. It will take the program statewide by January.

“We intend to take it nationwide next year,” says Bill Simon, Wal-Mart's executive vice president of the Professional Services Division. For uninsured consumers, the $4 price for some generics is below what they would pay at most pharmacy counters and is less than typical $10 to $15 co-payments on generics offered by many insurance plans.

Savings could be less than $1 per prescription to more than $20, depending on the drug and pharmacy where customers shop, according to information from Wal-Mart and prices of other retailers posted at MyFloridarx.com, a state-run website.

That could draw more customers to Wal-Mart, already the largest seller of groceries and toys, possibly forcing other chain drugstores to cut their prices, says Ed Kaplan of the Segal Co., a benefits consulting firm.

“Customers who take five or seven medications a month and can save $10 on each, might switch,” Kaplan says.

The move caused share prices for generic drug and pharmacy companies to drop Thursday.

Wal-Mart says the price of $4 for a 30-day supply price would save customers $7.98 a month for blood-pressure drug lisinopril, $3.85 for diabetes drug metformin and 80 cents for blood-pressure drug atenolol.

Simon says the $4 generics are not expected to be a “loss leader,” meaning Wal-Mart doesn't expect to lose money on the drugs in hopes of attracting more customers to buy other products.

That's because the drugs offered are longtime generics that have multiple manufacturers and that are already inexpensive on the wholesale market. Large companies such as Wal-Mart can often purchase them in bulk for less than the $4 cost.

Wal-Mart said 291 drugs will be covered, a total that includes different dosage strengths of the same drugs. When the differing dosage strengths are taken out, the list includes fewer than 150 products, including treatments for high blood pressure, infection and diabetes, along with some vitamins and painkiller ibuprofen. That's a fraction of the estimated 2,100 generic products available.

“This is a much narrower list than they're giving the impression it is,” says drug-industry expert Stephen Schondelmeyer at the University of Minnesota.

Simon says the drugs chosen for the list represent 20% of the prescriptions Wal-Mart currently fills and cover a wide range of medical needs. More products may be added, he says.

The move comes as Wal-Mart works to counter critics who say the chain doesn't make health insurance affordable for many of its workers.

“Providing low-cost drugs is a good thing. But not providing affordable health care to workers is not a good thing. Why can't Wal-Mart address the serious health care crisis in its own stores?” asks Chris Kofinis, of WakeUp Walmart.com.

Some praised Wal-Mart's move.

“That's a great price for a 30-day supply of drugs and will be a tremendous boon for seniors,” says Devon Herrick, economist at the National Center for Policy Analysis.

Wal-Mart Cuts Prices For Many Generic Drugs To $4 (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0067492

By Gary Mcwilliams And Barbara Martinez

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Wal-Mart Stores Inc., long attacked by some critics for its employee health-care benefits, waded into the nation's health-care debate and its rivals' pharmacy businesses by promising to cut the price of some of its generic drugs to $4 for a 30-day supply.

The Bentonville, Ark. retailer said it will use its purchasing and distribution prowess to offer versions of about 150 different generic drugs, such as the antibiotic tetracycline, at prices on average 20% below its existing ones. The drugs are mostly older medications; the company said it plans to add more popular drugs later on. Wal-Mart implemented the price policy yesterday at 65 stores in the Tampa, Fla. area, and early next year will expand it to about 170 other Florida stores before taking the policy nationwide later next year.

The savings on some drugs will be considerable compared to rival pharmacies. For example, under the new plan, Wal-Mart will charge $4 for 850 milligrams of the diabetes treatment metformin, compared with $17.72 at other Florida stores and $28.19 at Walgreen.

Richard Hastings, senior analyst at Bernand Sands, tells5 CNBC that even Wal-Mart's incremental moves like a $4 prescription price will have a profound effect on the competition and the economy in general.

On other drugs, however, Wal-Mart's new price still isn't below the competition. Wal-Mart's new price for the popular blood-pressure medicine atenolol is $4 for 30 pills, down from $8.62. Costco Wholesale Corp. lists a price of $3.69 for 30 pills on its Web site.

Wal-Mart's move drew praise from doctors and health-care experts but mostly shrugs from rivals who dismissed it as a publicity move. For now, the price cuts will apply to fewer than 300 formulations of 150 drugs, a fraction of the roughly 2,000 generic drugs sold in most pharmacies. The reductions are unlikely to be costly to Wal-Mart, which along with other retailers already buys many of these drugs at "pennies per pill or less," said Elliot Wilbur, a generics-industry analyst at CIBC World Markets.

Wal-Mart cast the change as a boost to the nation's uninsured and a savings even for those with health insurance. The pricing "aims to provide access and affordable health care to our customers and associates," said Bill Simon, a Wal-Mart executive vice president. Wal-Mart plans to add generic versions of widely used drugs such as cholesterol-lowering Zocor, at lower-than-existing prices "at some point in the not too distant future," he said.

If it does extend the price cuts to more popular generic drugs, Wal-Mart will put pressure on other retail pharmacies and generic drug makers to reduce their margins too, just as it has in groceries and toys, said Tim van Biesen, a Bain & Co. partner and generic-drug industry expert. "Typically when they start down this path, they don't stop," he said.

The stocks of generic-drug makers and drug-store chains tumbled yesterday as investors weighed the potential inroads of Wal-Mart on the business. In 4 p.m. trading on the New York Stock Exchange, shares of CVS were off 8%, or $2.96, at $32.47, while Walgreen Co. fell 7% or $3.67. Wal-Mart shares were off just 41 cents at $48.46.

Wal-Mart's new plan could also put pressure on big pharmacy-benefit managers, or PBMs, who administer the drug benefits for many employers and health plans and who operate their own mail-order pharmacies that compete with retail pharmacies. Like retail pharmacies, PBMs make much of their profits from the big margins on generic drugs they sell through the mail.

Bain & Co.'s Mr. van Biesen said because generic drugs carry a higher profit margin at retail than branded drugs, Wal-Mart can clip its profit on the drugs and use any increased store traffic to sell more profitable non-generic items. "It was frankly just a matter of time before someone decided to chip away at the generic-drug distribution system," he said.

He said even an expanded roster of drugs would have little impact on the nation's overall health-care costs, however. Pharmaceuticals account for just 15% of all U.S. spending on health care and generics are a fraction of all pharmaceutical revenues. "What it does is provide access to the uninsured and [Wal-Mart's] own employee base," he said.

The announcement yesterday drew politicians to a Tampa Wal-Mart where Florida Gov. Jeb Bush praised the local price drop as "good corporate citizenship," and U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson lauded it as "a pretty darn good deal for consumers."

Critics called the effort "marketing spin" and pointed to what they characterized as Wal-Mart's less-than-generous employee health-care policies, in which employees bear a big share of the costs. Partly as a result, many Wal-Mart workers don't even sign up for insurance.

WakeUpWalMart, a group financed by the United Food and Commercial Workers union that aims to force the company to change its labor policies, said in a statement: "Wal-Mart cruelly ignores the fact that it fails to provide company health care to over half (775,000) of its employees."

Wal-Mart's Mr. Simon rejected any characterizations of the pricing cuts as a marketing ploy. Mr. Simon insisted a standard pricing for common generic drugs wasn't about legislative issues, or attacks on its wage, environmental and employee health insurance policies. "We're certainly hopeful this is a positive business move ... as well as a significant social benefit," he said.Wal-Mart expects to slowly implement the price changes at its more than 3,000 stores nationwide, citing the need to hire additional pharmacists, and strike agreements with additional generic drug makers. Mr. Simon declined to disclose what impact, if any, the company expects on profits at its about $20 billion a year pharmaceuticals business, or its generic-drug market share.

DOJ_NMG_0067493

Pharmacy chains dismissed Wal-Mart's initial effort and said it would offer little competition. "A lot of the medications are very old generics," said Walgreen spokesman Michael Polzin. "I don't think the price change for a lot of these is that much." Mr. Polzin said Walgreen plans no pricing changes in response.

Almost 95% of Walgreen's prescriptions are covered by insurance, with the remainder covered by cash payments, Mr. Polzin said. The savings from a typical $5 co-payment "is not enough of a difference," to cause customers to change pharmacies, Mr. Polzin said. "Our convenience and locations have proven over the years to have a bigger effect on behavior."

Richard Hastings, senior retail analyst at Bernard Sands LLC, said those companies likely to be hurt would be "smaller prescription drug buyers, including certain supermarket chains that offer pharmacy services." In a research note, he wrote that those companies "will see some margin erosion if they are forced to compete on price."

Wal-Mart Sets $4 Price For Many Generic Drugs (WP)

By Kathleen Day

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

Retailing giant Wal-Mart Stores Inc., known for forcing prices down to dominate nearly every market it enters, said yesterday that it would sell nearly 300 generic drugs for $4 per prescription, whether or not a customer has insurance.

Using its might as the nation's largest retailer and its legendary ability to force suppliers to cut prices to the bone, the company will begin the $4 price program in its 65 stores in the Tampa area today, in all of Florida in January, and in as many other states as possible by the end of 2007. The $4 is for a typical monthly supply of medicine, and included on the Wal-Mart list are generic versions of many popular prescription drugs, including the antibiotic amoxicillin and the heart and blood-pressure treatment lisinopril, sold under the brand names Prinivil and Zestril.

Health-care industry analysts said the program has the potential to transform the $230 billion prescription-drug business the way Wal-Mart has transformed other industries, including groceries and toys, where its aggressive pricing has forced some competitors out of business and allowed it to dominate entire categories of merchandise.

Health-care costs rose an average of 9.6 percent a year from 2000 to 2004, and a large component of the increase was the price of drugs, which rose an average of 11.4 percent a year in that time. Inflation during that period was around 2.6 percent a year. Though the increase in drug prices has been slowing in recent years, largely because of the wider use of generics, it has still outpaced inflation, health-care analysts and industry trade groups say.

Wal-Mart executives, criticized by labor unions and consumer groups that say the company shortchanges its employees on pay and health care, said they started the program to help families and retirees, especially those on Medicare. They said at news conferences and in telephone calls yesterday that they see these groups struggling daily at the company's pharmacies to pay for medicine.

"This $4 program represents real savings for working families," said William S. Simon, executive vice president for professional services at Wal-Mart. "Wal-Mart's taking this step so that our customers and associates can get the medicines they need at prices they can afford. . . . Customers tell us all the time that prescription-drug costs are forcing them to make tough decisions."

Generic drugs have the same active ingredients as their brand-name counterparts but are much cheaper. Last year, they accounted for 56 percent of all prescriptions filled in the United States but only about 10 percent of total prescription-drug sales.

Wal-Mart spokesman David Tovar said the company will make money on the sales but will not disclose whether it negotiated with drugmakers, wholesale suppliers or both to make the deal profitable. "It is not a loss leader. It is something we intend to make a profit on," he said. "The way we do that is through our logistics and our technology."

Some top-selling generics are not on the list of drugs Wal-Mart will offer for $4, including the painkiller hydrocodone -- whose trade name is Vicodin -- and generic forms of the painkiller Darvon and the anti-anxiety drug Xanax. But many are.

While Wal-Mart is likely to continue to profit from generic sales, the company would not say how much the $4-per-prescription program will reduce its earnings. Some of the reductions appear to be substantial. A Wal-Mart in Alexandria, for example, was selling 30 tablets of lisinopril for $20.72.

Analysts said the company was probably gambling that the lost revenue from lower-priced drugs will be offset by increased traffic in its stores.

Gary Claxton of the Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation said pharmacies are always placed at the back of stores in the hope customers will pick up other merchandise along the way to get their prescriptions. Wal-Mart probably hopes to benefit in overall sales, but also in drug sales because customers bringing in generic prescriptions are likely to fill their brand-name prescriptions, too, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0067494

Wal-Mart's announcement roiled the retail drug industry. Shares of Walgreen Co. and CVS Corp., two large drugstore companies, fell more than 7 percent and 8 percent, respectively.

According to the Generic Pharmaceutical Association, 8,400 of the 11,167 drugs listed by the Food and Drug Administration are sold generically. The average price of a 30-day supply of a generic prescription drug was $28.71 in 2004, compared with the average price of a brand-name version at $95.54. The Congressional Budget Office has estimated that generic drugs save consumers $8 billion to $10 billion a year.

Mark McClellan, administrator of the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said he did not think the Wal-Mart offer would siphon beneficiaries from the Medicare drug benefit, known as Part D. "Remember that the drug plans in Medicare already provide excellent coverage for generics," he said. "Many of the plans have generics for a dollar or two, or even free."

What the Wal-Mart plan does provide, he said, is a way for Medicare recipients to save more money after they reach the "doughnut hole." That's the point at which an individual's yearly drug cost reaches $2,250, and Medicare ends its subsidy. After that, a beneficiary has to pay $3,600 out of pocket before government subsidies kick in again.

In that interval, or gap, the Wal-Mart program could result in significant savings, given that the average Medicare beneficiary is expected to spend about $3,081 on prescription drugs this year, McClellan said.

Tovar, the Wal-Mart spokesman, said that the $4 price is available to anyone, but that Wal-Mart will try to collect insurance on prescriptions for people with prescription-drug coverage. However, some insurance contracts stipulate that pharmacies will not be paid the full cost of a drug unless customers pay the full co-payment the insurer requires.

Tovar said Wal-Mart will still allow insured customers to pay $4 per prescription, even if that is less than the co-payment required and even if that means Wal-Mart will not be paid any money by insurance companies.

Mohit Ghose, a spokesman for America's Health Insurance Plans, which represents providers of insurance of all types, including for prescription-drug coverage, said the typical co-payment for a generic prescription is $5 to $15. He said it is unclear how the Wal-Mart plan will affect insurance coverage.

Staff writers Ylan Q. Mui and Christopher Lee contributed to this report.

Wal-Mart To Offer Discount On Drugs (WT)

By Gregory Lopes

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

Retail giant Wal-Mart said yesterday it will start selling nearly 300 generic drugs at a steep discount in Florida with the hope of expanding the discounted drug prices nationwide next year.

The move to charge $4 for 291 generic drugs in Tampa starting today puts pressure on its competitors, although other retailers said yesterday they do not currently plan to follow suit.

"At this time, $4 is not enough to drive a change in individual behavior," said Walgreens spokesman Michael Polzin. "A large percentage of our customers are insured with copayments between $5 and $6, so this will not have a big impact."

Rite Aid, which has 87 stores in the Washington area, does not plan to lower generic drug prices, said spokeswoman Jody Cook.

CVS, which has the most pharmacies in the Washington area of any of drugstore chain, did not return calls for comment.

Shares of CVS Corp. fell the most in almost five years, declining $2.96, or 8.4 percent, to $32.47 yesterday on the New York Stock Exchange. Rite Aid Corp. declined 5 percent and Walgreen Co. dropped 7.4 percent.

Consumers are increasingly using generics, which often are made by multiple companies after the original patent on a drug expires. The average monthly cost for a generic drug prescription is $28.74, according to the National Association of Chain Drug Stores, compared with $96.01 for branded drugs.

Generic drug sales are an important part of pharmacies' business because they bring in higher profits than brand-name drugs. Pharmacies pay less for generic drugs because drug manufacturers must compete against each another for the pharmacies' business.

Independent pharmacies, unlike large drugstore chains, are not able to afford reducing the cost of drugs, they said.

"You have to be able to cover costs," Leo Mallard, who operates Calvert-Arundel CARE Pharmacy in Owings, Md. "We would maybe match those prices as long as we are not losing money and not infringing on contracts with insurers."

Said Rebecca Snead, executive director of the Virginia Pharmacists Association: "Independent pharmacies cannot sell generics at that price."

DOJ_NMG_0067495

Gerson Serody, chief executive officer of CARE Pharmacies, an Arlington organization representing 60 independent pharmacies in the Washington area, left the door open for change.

"I am analyzing it to see how it shakes out. It is possible that we may have a list of generics that consumers can get for $4," Mr. Serody said.

The Generic Pharmaceutical Association, a trade association, said generic medicines account for 56 percent of all prescriptions dispensed in the United States, but 13 percent of all money spent on prescription drugs.

After the announcement, critics pounced on Wal-Mart, claiming the world's largest retailer will use the low-priced drugs to entice shoppers to buy other Wal-Mart products, a business tactic known as "loss leading."

But Wal-Mart spokesman David Tovar dismissed that claim.

"This program is not a loss leader for us," Mr. Tovar said. "It will be a profit creator for us."

Mr. Tovar said Wal-Mart will not charge a sign-up fee to participate in the program and consumers will not have to pay premiums or deductibles to get the $4 drugs. Wal-Mart has 19 stores in the Washington area.

The number of drugs being sold at the discount is low compared with the overall number of generic drugs Wal-Mart stocks. A company spokesman said Wal-Mart dispenses "thousands" of generic drugs but did not provide an exact number.

The drugs included in the program are widely prescribed and, for the most part, not expensive. For instance, the popular high blood pressure generic medications furosemide and hydrochlorothiazide sell for close to $4 already, pharmacists said.

But Bill Simon, executive vice president of the company's Professional Services Division, said buying a 30-day supply of the diabetes drug Metformin for $4, is nearly 50 percent cheaper than the brand-name version.

Relief For Some But Maybe Not Many In Wal-Mart Plan For $4 Generic Drugs (NYT)

By Michael Barbaro And Reed Abelson

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

At first glance, Wal-Mart's plan to sharply cut the cost of generic drugs, to $4, seems like a signal event in American health care. It could make scores of treatments affordable to the uninsured, reduce the burden on Medicaid and bring competitive pricing to the pharmacy industry.

Even company critics have praised the plan, conceding that it represents a case of the giant retailer using its size and ability to wring out costs to improve the lives of regular Americans.

But a close examination of the program, with details confirmed by the company yesterday, suggests that its impact could be blunted by several factors.

The plan, which is said to cover 300 drugs, includes only about 124 separate medicines in various dosages, like 12 versions of the popular antibiotic amoxicillin. It leaves out some popular drugs altogether, like the generic version of the cholesterol-lowering treatment Zocor.

And while uninsured people should benefit from the program, those with insurance may save only a dollar or so, making a trip to Wal-Mart not worth their while, analysts said. In Florida, where the program will have its debut, most people on Medicaid pay nothing and may have little incentive to shop around for cheaper prescription drugs.

"It is not as significant as it first seems, in our opinion," said Joseph Agnese, an analyst at Standard & Poor's, who expressed surprise at investors' reaction to the Wal-Mart announcement, which sent shares of its competitors CVS and Walgreen down sharply yesterday.

As it has for dozens of consumer products, Wal-Mart reduced prices of generic prescription drugs by attacking the few remaining pockets of inefficiency in its operations. For example, it cut out third-party distributors that stood between the chain and drug manufacturers.

"There is a huge profit margin in the generics" for the middlemen like pharmacy benefit managers, the distributors and the pharmacies themselves, said Patricia Wilson of Associates & Wilson, a Rosemont, Pa., health care consulting firm. Wal-Mart appears to be taking some of those profits from the traditional middlemen to lower the prices it is charging for these generic drugs.

The company also introduced rapid, automated machines into its pharmacy distribution centers that had long relied on workers to fill orders. In doing so, Wal-Mart reduced the amount of time that costly drugs sat in warehouses, rather than on store shelves where they could create revenue. "It is not glamorous," said Bill Simon, an executive vice president at Wal-Mart. "It's pennies at a time."

Wal-Mart said that by covering one-fifth of the generic drugs it prescribes at its more than 3,000 United States pharmacies, the new program would make it possible for thousands of people to buy drugs they either cannot afford or currently ration, sometimes by cutting pills in half, to cut costs.

DOJ_NMG_0067496

Under the plan, which will begin in the Tampa, Fla., area — and the company says will eventually expand to the rest of the country beginning next year — the $4 fee charged by Wal-Mart will be paid by a combination of consumers, insurance companies and the federal government, depending on a person's health coverage. On average, generic drugs are now sold at retail for $10 to $30 for a 30-day supply.

An insured customer will not pay more than $4, no matter what the co-payment is, the company said. Wal-Mart would bill the insurer for the difference if the co-payment was below $4. Customers whose co-payment is above $4 are unlikely to use insurance, but pay for the drug out of pocket. Where required, Medicaid users would still pay a small co-payment for a prescription drug, with the government billed the balance. In the past, Wal-Mart might have billed the government significantly more than $4 for a generic drug. "It's a tremendous savings for state Medicaid," said Mr. Simon, the Wal-Mart executive.

But Christa Calamas, secretary of the Florida Agency for Health Care Administration, said the state would probably save money only on those Medicaid consumers who already fill prescriptions at Wal-Mart. Since most Florida Medicaid users pay nothing for their prescriptions, they are likely to choose convenient pharmacy locations over lower prices, experts said.

Wal-Mart said it would not lose money on the low-cost generic drugs — and, in fact, several industry analysts predicted the company's pharmacy business would benefit from the new plan. Unlike CVS or Walgreen, which rely on prescription sales for most of their revenues, Wal-Mart's pharmacy business represents less than 10 percent of its total revenue and the company has identified it as an area that needs improvement.

By luring customers of all incomes into the store at least once a month to fill generic drug prescriptions, Wal-Mart could increase overall pharmacy and store sales, these analysts said.

Health care analysts were quick to point out that Wal-Mart has carefully chosen which drugs it will cover — 300 out of roughly 11,000 generic drugs available. Moreover, it is not offering some expensive drugs, like any of the cholesterol-lowering statins, at the $4 price. And some of the drugs covered, like generic ibuprofen, cost very little and may be currently available for less than $4. "They are not losing money on all these products," said Ms. Wilson, the health care consultant.

But she praised Wal-Mart for bringing attention to the cost savings available from generic drugs, which are significantly less expensive than their branded counterparts. Wal-Mart could also introduce much greater competition to the marketplace by pushing the concept of discounts into what has traditionally been an inefficient market. "People will begin to compare prices," she said.

Wal-Mart has come under fierce attack for its employee health benefits; critics contend the benefits are too costly, given the typical Wal-Mart worker's wages, and frequently force employees to rely on state programs or forgo coverage altogether. With the lower generic drug prices, which apply to its workers as well as customers, the company appears to be trying to address those concerns.

Still, critics say this plan does little to confront the high costs of health care for the uninsured, including Wal-Mart employees, since they still face the expense of going to a doctor to get a prescription, for example. While the plan is a good first step, "it is clearly as much a public relations effort as a substantive change," said Ron Pollack, the executive director of Families USA, a Washington consumer group that has often criticized Wal-Mart's health care offerings.

Wal-Mart's chief executive, H. Lee Scott Jr., said that "competition and market forces have been absent from our health care system, and that has hurt working families tremendously." The company, he added, is "excited to take the lead in doing what we do best — driving costs out of the system — and passing those savings to our customers and associates," as Wal-Mart refers to its employees.

'We're OK,' Despite Drop In Factory Activity (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh And Adam Shell

USA Today, September 22, 2006

Economic jitters grew Thursday after a report showing a decline in factory activity in part of the USA became the latest piece of data to suggest the slowdown in the economy may be sharper than initially thought.

But although the economic fears sparked a sell-off on Wall Street, some economists said it is too early to panic.

"I don't see broad enough signs to indicate that the economy is really grinding to a halt," PNC Financial Services chief economist Stuart Hoffman says.

Manufacturing activity — which includes production, jobs and orders — in the Philadelphia area fell in September, the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia said. The Fed bank's index of conditions in the area, considered representative of U.S. factories, fell to -0.4 this month from an 18.5 reading in August.

Numbers below zero point to a decline in activity, while those above suggest growth. It was the first time the index was below zero since April 2003, when the start of the Iraq war shook business and consumer confidence. Orders and shipments and expectations of activity six months from now all deteriorated this month, the Philadelphia Fed said.

DOJ_NMG_0067497

Wall Street reacted negatively. The Dow Jones industrial average fell 79.96 points to 11,533.23, derailing its run at a record high. The blue-chip index is now 189.75 points away from its 2000 peak.

"The Philly Fed report is a harbinger of things to come," says Stuart Schweitzer, global markets strategist at JPMorgan Asset & Wealth Management. "The developing slowdown may have further to go."

A rally in the bond market confirmed stock investors' fears, as the yield on the 10-year Treasury note, which moves in the opposite direction from prices, fell to 4.64%, its lowest since March 2. Investors tend to seek the safety of bonds when the economic outlook dims, pushing bond prices up and yields down.

Other recent data, particularly reports on housing, have come in much softer than expected, adding to economic jitters.

But Putnam chief economist David Kelly says the economy has a number of things going for it: Commercial construction is picking up, helping to absorb workers losing their housing jobs; the global economy is expanding strongly, providing a boost to U.S. exports; and falling energy prices are giving consumers and businesses more money to spend in other parts of the economy.

Such positives will keep the economy growing and out of recession territory, he says.

"We're OK," Kelly says.

Philadelphia Fed Posts Sharp Drop In Output Gauge (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-morales And Michael S. Derby

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

An index designed to measure manufacturing activity in the Mid-Atlantic states plunged in September, upsetting financial markets and raising concerns that the slowing housing market could be sapping the economy's strength at a faster pace than previously thought.

The Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia said that its business conditions index, a gauge of the regional manufacturing sector's health, fell to a reading of negative 0.4 in September, compared with 18.5 in August. The September reading was the first negative reading since April 2003. Economists had expected the index to register 15 in September. Negative readings denote contraction.

The change in the Philadelphia index was so striking that financial markets reacted swiftly. Stock prices and the dollar sank while bond prices -- which tend to benefit from negative economic news -- rallied. The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell more than 50 points following the noon release of the report and ended the day at 11533.23, down 79.96, or 0.69%.

The Philadelphia index's weak showing "could mark the first real hard evidence that the infection from the [national] housing slump is spreading into a broader economic malaise," said Richard Iley, a senior U.S. economist with BNP Paribas in New York.

The Philadelphia Fed report is widely viewed as a proxy for national manufacturing trends, and as such its decline raises questions about the health of the broader factory sector. "Generally, the Philly data [report] has the best correlation with industrial production of all the regional indexes, so [it] needs to be treated seriously," said Alan Ruskin, a strategist with RBS Greenwich in Greenwich, Conn.

The report covers business conditions in eastern Pennsylvania, southern New Jersey, and Delaware.

Meanwhile, The Conference Board issued a separate economic report that also signaled the economy is headed toward slower growth for the remainder of the year. It reported that its composite index of leading indicators -- which attempts to forecast economic activity as much as six months into the future -- fell 0.2% in August to a reading of 137.6, following the same decline in July. The Conference Board, a nonprofit business research group, noted that the leading index has now fallen in five of the last eight months. Three of the 10 factors making up the leading index rose in August, led by stock prices and money supply. The biggest negatives were consumer expectations and building permits.

"The economy is going to remain slow" and it's likely there will be "continued modest growth this autumn" and beyond, said Ken Goldstein, a Conference Board economist. The economy, as measured by changes in inflation-adjusted gross domestic product, grew at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 5.6% in the first quarter and slowed to 2.9% in the second quarter. The consensus estimate of economists surveyed last month by The Wall Street Journal Online calls for annualized growth to slow slightly further to 2.8% during the third quarter, which ends this month. The Bureau of Economic Analysis is scheduled to release an estimate of third-quarter GDP on Oct. 27.

Separately, the Labor Department reported that initial jobless claims increased a seasonally adjusted 7,000 to 318,000 in the week ending Sept. 16. The four-week moving average of new claims, which economists use to gauge underlying labor-market trends, was unchanged at 315,000.

Write to Rafael Gerena-Morales at rafael.gerena@wsj.com3 and Michael S. Derby at michael.derby@dowjones.com4

DOJ_NMG_0067498

Investors Finally Break From Calm; Dow Drops 79.96 (WSJ)

By Michael Hudson And Serena Ng

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Investors had been taking bad news in stride lately -- big troubles at a large hedge fund, political turmoil in Thailand and Hungary, a weakening U.S. housing market -- as they pushed the Dow Jones Industrial Average near a record high.

A semiobscure economic report changed that yesterday.

The Dow fell 79.96 points, or 0.69%, to 11533.23, its largest one-day decline since early August. At one point yesterday afternoon it was down more than 100 points but rallied late in the day. The tech-stock-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index dropped 15.14 points, or 0.67%, to 2237.75. The Standard & Poor's 500 index fell 7.15 points, or 0.54%, to 1318.03.

Meanwhile, Treasury bonds, a haven for worried investors, rallied. The benchmark 10-year note rose 23/32, or $7.19 for every $1,000 invested, sending its yield down to 4.644%, the lowest level since mid-March.

The catalyst for the selloff in stocks was a report by the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia, which showed business in Mid-Atlantic states was softer than many investors had anticipated. Though it covers a narrow slice of the economy, the Philadelphia Fed index sometimes grabs the attention of investors because it is one of the earliest reads available on monthly economic activity.

"The soft Philly Fed numbers rocked the market, and there's a bit of a flight to quality into bonds," said Brian Williamson, a stock trader at Boston Company Asset Management.

The market's sharp reaction to the report marked a notable about-face from recent activity. The Dow began the day just 110 points from its record close of 11722.98, set in January 2000. That mark seemed attainable. Meanwhile, an array of risk measurements in the market had been remarkably stable, despite news about huge losses at hedge fund Amaranth Advisors and the military overthrow of Thailand's government.

For instance, the Chicago Board Options Exchange "VIX" index -- which measures how much investors are willing to pay for options that protect them from market volatility -- has declined for much of the month, though it rose yesterday. That is a sign that investors have been calm but might be changing their view.

Bond-market indicators have been sending similar signals. Turmoil abroad often raises the interest rate of debt in other countries relative to the interest rate on U.S. bonds. This difference in interest rates is known in the markets as a "spread" and reflects the risk of these assets compared with Treasurys. Despite Tuesday's coup in Thailand and protests in Hungary, the "spread" on emerging-market bonds has remained relatively stable at less than two percentage points above Treasurys.

The spreads rose to 1.96 percentage points on Thursday, from 1.83 the day before, according to a Merrill Lynch index.

"A few years back, this would be just the kind of political risk that would have driven investors out of the markets entirely," said Raja Visweswaran, a credit strategist at Bank of America in London. The lack of a "contagion" effect from events in Russia, Thailand and Hungary, he said, shows how emerging markets have matured.

In the junk-bond market, the riskiest slice of the corporate-bond world, spreads were at 3.48 percentage points over Treasurys, up from 3.33 percentage points last week but down from 3.73 percentage points at the beginning of the year.

Yesterday's activity suggested that a U.S. economic slowdown could be a bigger obstacle for the markets than these other events.

"That Philadelphia Fed survey took people a bit by surprise and just added to the general air of 'This economy is going down faster than we thought,' " said Standard & Poor's economist David Wyss.

Coupled with a housing market that is also slowing progressively, investors took advantage of the news to take profit on stocks and to move into bonds. Bond traders said expectations are emerging that the Fed, which left interest rates untouched after its policy-making meeting this week, may change course and cut rates as early as the first quarter of 2007.

The latest economic data "points to an economy that is really slowing down, meaning that the Fed may cut rates sooner rather than later," said Rick Klingman, head of Treasury trading at ABN Amro in New York. He said bond investors, "are showing no hesitation in buying now." Yields on most Treasury bills, notes and bonds are well below the current federal-funds rate of 5.25%.

In major market action:

Stocks fell. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.59 billion shares, as 1,374 stocks advanced and 1,944 fell.

Oil prices rose. Futures, which had briefly slipped below $60 a barrel on Wednesday, rose 85 cents, or 1.4%, to $61.59 on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Bond prices gained. The 10-year note rose 23/32, or $7.19 for every $1,000 invested, to yield 4.644%. The 30-year bond rose 1 1/32 to yield 4.780%.

DOJ_NMG_0067499

The dollar weakened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 116.31 yen from 117.45 yen. The euro rose to $1.2792 from $1.2687.

Write to Michael Hudson at michael.hudson@wsj.com1 and Serena Ng at serena.ng@wsj.com2

Signs Of Slowing Economy Slam Stocks (USAT/BLOOM)

USA Today, September 22, 2006

Stocks fell Thursday, sending the Dow Jones industrial average to its biggest loss in six weeks, as an unexpected decline in a gauge of Philadelphia-area manufacturing suggested economic growth is weakening.

Stocks retreated in afternoon trading after the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia's index shrank for the first time in three years. Earlier, the Conference Board's index of leading indicators showed that an economic slump may extend into next year (story, 1B).

The Dow retreated 79.96 points to 11,533.23, the worst decline since Aug. 9. The Standard & Poor's 500 slid 7.15 points to 1318.03. The Nasdaq composite index slid 15.14 points to 2237.75.

Stocks were within striking distance of setting new highs before the reversal. The Dow now is about 190 points away from a record following oil's decline to $60 a barrel and the Fed's decision Wednesday to leave borrowing costs unchanged for a second month after 17 consecutive increases.

“Investors are beginning to say, ‘Holy cow, this is really a slowdown,' ” says Barry Ritholtz, chief investment officer of Ritholtz Capital Partners in New York, which manages about $100 million. “That's bad for earnings growth and stocks.”

While the Fed didn't clarify whether it will continue to refrain from raising rates after pausing Wednesday, signs the economy is slowing may leave it little choice. The Philadelphia Fed's general economic index declined to minus 0.4 from August's 18.5, which was the highest in 16 months. Readings below zero signal contraction.

“Investors are growing more concerned about the economy than the Fed,” Francois Trahan, strategist at Bear, Stearns, wrote in a note released Wednesday.

Americans Remain Sour On Situation In Iraq (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

President Bush's job-approval numbers have rebounded a bit since he made a series of speeches making the case for a strong U.S. role in Iraq. But a new poll from Harris Interactive shows that Americans remain very sour on the war itself and the U.S.'s chances of success -- and remain uncertain over the whether the U.S. was right to go to war in the first place.

Harris found 61% of those polled aren't confident that U.S. policies in Iraq will be successful, vs. 20% who are confident of success. Republicans respondents showed the most confidence in the Iraq effort, with 45% seeing success, compared with 14% of independents and just 6% of Democrats.

Meanwhile, Mr. Bush's job rating on his handling of Iraq runs two-to-one negative overall. But at 64% negative to 32% positive, Mr. Bush has recovered from his ratings in May, when 68% were in the negative column vs. 29% in the positive column. In this series, Mr. Bush's positive rating peaked in April 2003 at 67%.

Harris found 44% believe it was "the wrong thing" to take military action against Iraq, vs. 39% who believe it was the "right thing" to do. However, 17% aren't sure whether it was right or wrong. That compares with 47% in the "wrong" column and 38% in the "right" column and 15% "not sure" in the May Harris survey.

The nationwide survey 2,747 adults was conducted online by Harris Interactive between Sept. 7 and Sept. 13.

Subtle Shift (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Freshman Democratic Rep. Melissa Bean of Illinois is facing the Republican Party machine in her re-election bid. Vice President Dick Cheney and House Speaker Dennis Hastert have headlined money-raising events for her opponent. The National Republican Congressional Committee has budgeted $1.5 million to attack her.

But Ms. Bean has won an unexpected ally with clout to counter the Republican heavyweights: the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. Usually a stalwart of Republicans, the chamber has run about $700,000 in advertisements defending the Democrat and plans to help get out the pro-business vote for her in the fall.

Ms. Bean is among more than a dozen Democrats in key races across the country that the chamber is backing this year. Half of them also have benefited from the chamber's first-ever television ads for Democrats. Partly, the organization is rewarding these Democrats for votes in favor of free trade and other issues it holds dear. It also is sensing possible Republican defeats in congressional elections on Nov. 7, and is hedging its bets by spreading some of the organization's wealth to the other side of the aisle.

DOJ_NMG_0067500

The chamber's move mirrors a subtle but significant shift across the business community, which has begun anticipating that the Republican majorities in Congress could shrink, if not collapse. Washington lobbying firms are balancing their Republican rosters with Democratic hires, and some companies are injecting more bipartisanship in their campaign giving.

According to campaign disclosure reports through June, half of the 10 biggest Republican givers in 2004 are sending a bigger portion of their dollars to Democrats than in past campaigns. In that period, Wal-Mart Stores Inc., of Bentonville, Ark., gave 68% of its donations to Republicans this year, down from 78% over the entire 2004 election cycle. Republican candidates received 64% of the donations from Memphis, Tenn., delivery concern FedEx Corp., compared with 70% over the whole election period two years ago.

The changes also point to an emerging rift between the Republican Party's business and social-conservative constituencies, as their interests clash over some hot-button issues. In Missouri, for example, some Republican businessmen are donating to Democrat Claire McCaskill in her challenge to incumbent Republican Sen. Jim Talent, largely because Mr. Talent opposes embryonic stem-cell research.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce is the strongest single business voice in Washington, representing thousands of trade associations and three million large and small businesses. It is the top spender on lobbying in Washington and is expected to spend $40 million on state and federal races this year. Employing an army of 36 full-time lobbyists, the chamber often takes the lead on major political issues close to the business community's heart. Its legal arm supports campaigns against elected judges perceived as unfriendly to business interests.

The chamber has backed Democrats before. But this year it is endorsing 14, up from nine in 2002, and is aiding several Democrats especially targeted by Republicans. Besides running TV ads for Democrats for the first time, the chamber chose not to attack Democrats in its ads for Republicans. That is in stark contrast to some slash-and-burn chamber-produced spots in 2004, which helped defeat Tom Daschle, then the Democratic Senate Majority Leader, in South Dakota and restore the Senate to Republican control.

The vast majority of the chamber's election efforts are still helping Republicans. But it has pushed $1.8 million of its $10 million television budget to Democrats. The move comes even though the current Congress is viewed as one of the most pro-business in decades. Tax cuts, energy legislation, trade bills and pension reform -- all longstanding priorities for much of the corporate community -- all have become law under its watch.

"Moving our agenda forward is not just about now and Nov. 7. It's about moving our agenda forward in the 110th Congress," says Bill Miller, a 43-year-old former Republican congressional aide who became director of the chamber's political program in 2002.

The chamber's decision is significant because the Republicans are struggling to maintain their grip on power. Democrats need just a handful of seats to win majorities in both houses of Congress. Illinois Republican Chairman Andy McKenna met with Mr. Miller this year to try to convince him not to back Ms. Bean. "It's hard to imagine that supporting her supports their overall agenda," he says. "It seems they've compromised themselves." North Carolina Sen. Elizabeth Dole, who heads the Republican Senate re-election committee, deadpans: "I'd rather they spend the money on Republicans."

Gerald L. Shaheen, the chamber's board chairman and a group president at Caterpillar Inc., of Peoria, Ill., acknowledges the chamber has faced pressure to stay the Republican course. But, he says, "We have to advocate for the business agenda. We'll take help wherever we can get it."

The Democrats that Mr. Miller decided to support either have a business background or are incumbents who have shown a willingness to break from their party leaders to back chamber priorities. Texas Rep. Chet Edwards became one of them, even though the chamber worked to defeat him two years ago. Mr. Edwards invited Mr. Miller to coffee on Capitol Hill in an effort to win him over.

In the past two years, Mr. Edwards had voted for overhauling bankruptcy rules, the White House's energy bill and legislation making it easier for small businesses to buy health insurance -- all chamber priorities. Meanwhile, his new Republican opponent, political newcomer Van Taylor, didn't have the strong pro-business record of Mr. Edwards's 2004 challenger. This summer the eight-term Congressman wound up with his first chamber endorsement. "I'm thrilled," Mr. Edwards says. "It raises a real credibility problem when a challenger is trying to call me a liberal Democrat."

In Nebraska, the chamber was one of the first national organizations to endorse freshman Democratic Sen. Ben Nelson, a leading champion of small-business health-insurance relief. That hurt Republicans' hopes of recruiting a formidable challenger in the strongly Republican state. "We have no credibility if we don't stick to what we believe and support the people who show up on tough votes," says chamber President Tom Donohue. "I've heard a lot of complaining from some of my friends out there, but some of these guys have better voting records than some Republicans."

DOJ_NMG_0067501

In some cases, the chamber is supporting business-friendly Democrats or Republicans against rivals in their own party, especially in districts where primaries usually decide who will win the general election.

At a recent chamber meeting, Peter Lawson, the group's director of congressional and public affairs, was surprised to learn Mr. Miller planned to weigh into Hawaii's Democratic primary for Senate, which is tomorrow. Mr. Miller is backing challenger Rep. Ed Case against Sen. Daniel Akaka -- the incumbent Democrat, and Mr. Lawson's next-door neighbor. "Look, this really isn't a good idea," Mr. Lawson recalls saying.

Mr. Case had backed small-business health insurance, limiting class-action lawsuits and making the bankruptcy code friendlier to creditors. Mr. Akaka, like most Democrats, voted against those measures. Mr. Lawson, resigned to the decision, broke the news to Mr. Akaka personally when, while walking his dog, he bumped into the senator. He ended up writing Mr. Akaka a personal $250 check for his campaign.

In March, the chamber backed Texas Democratic Rep. Henry Cuellar, a supporter of free trade, in his primary victory over former Democratic Rep. Ciro Rodriguez, who was supported by MoveOn.org, a liberal online group. Mr. Miller tried to keep the chamber's profile low, sticking to a voter-turnout effort in the belief that a television ad war between the chamber and MoveOn would hurt his candidate with Democratic primary voters. Mr. Rodriguez thinks the chamber's effort helped Mr. Cuellar prevail. "They raised a good bit of money for him," he said.

The chamber's heightened interest in Democrats has created some challenges. To produce its first Democratic TV ads, the chamber had to hire a Democratic specialist, Mullen & Co. Erick Mullen, the company's founder, calls the chamber's increased bipartisanship "sound business practice."

At the chamber's headquarters across the street from the White House, Mr. Miller last month gathered aides to hammer out what topics they would highlight in the new TV ads. For each of four issues -- energy, a prescription-drug plan for seniors, small-business health insurance and limiting medical malpractice lawsuits -- Mr. Miller would match the issue to a Democratic candidate.

They decided to create a more-customized ad for Sen. Joe Lieberman, who was defeated in the Democratic primary last month and is running as an Independent. Sen. Lieberman supported the energy bill, a vote his opponent argues shows he is too close to President Bush. Matt Haller, who manages the chamber's political team, suggested a special ad in which members of the Connecticut chamber tout Mr. Lieberman's independence.

Carol Wallace, a Republican and chief executive officer of Cooper Atkins Corp., a small Middlefield, Conn., business that makes cooking thermometers, appeared in the ad. Businesses "are looking for a more-centrist and consensus and collaborative Congress to be able to move things forward," she said in an interview.

In some cases the chamber's more bipartisan posture has come as a relief to local and state chamber officials and business leaders. Robert Batt, executive vice president of Nebraska Furniture Mart, stood beside Mr. Miller when he swept into the state to endorse Sen. Nelson. A registered Independent, Mr. Batt said partisan attacks "don't play well here. We think of it more as the person."

In Illinois, business supporters of Ms. Bean, the freshman House Democrat targeted by the Republican leadership, have felt heat. Bill Little, a chamber board member and chief executive officer of Quam-Nichols Co., an industrial audio maker in Chicago, says his personal backing of her has "required explanation a couple of times" among his Republican friends.

For Republicans in Washington, defeating Ms. Bean represents an opportunity to recapture a seat held by their party for 70 years. The founder of a high-technology consulting firm, Ms. Bean two years ago knocked off 18-term incumbent Republican Rep. Phil Crane in the suburban Chicago seat. Then last summer, she joined only 15 other Democrats to vote in favor of the Central American Free Trade Act.

Labor unions protested outside her office. The Northeastern Illinois Federation of Labor Council promptly canceled its plan to award her a "Person of the Year" honor. Bill Scheurer, a Democrat, will run as an Independent in November, which could split the Democratic vote. Buoyed by that prospect, House leaders have requested Republican congressmen to give $1,000 to $5,000 to former investment banker David Sweeney, the socially conservative Republican challenger.

Early last month, Melanie Bassett of the chamber's Chicago office stood among 100 local business leaders in Schaumburg, Ill., to endorse Ms. Bean for her 73% voting record on chamber priorities. Mr. Miller launched two rounds of TV commercials. Ms. Bean believes the business backing makes it harder for a Republican to attack her. As for the chamber's hefty spending on ads for her in the expensive Chicago market, she says, "That doesn't hurt at all."

Democrat Optimistic In Washington (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0067502

BELLEVUE, Wash. -- Washington's 8th Congressional District is emblematic of this year's battle for Congress, with Democrats working their hardest to link Republicans in power to President Bush.

Darcy Burner says her chances of ousting freshman Rep. Dave Reichert -- and giving the Democrats a seat in their bid to recapture the House -- are good because state residents are weary of the president.

"George Bush has taken this country in the wrong direction, and Congress has an obligation to stand up to him and fight for the people of this district," Mrs. Burner said.

Mr. Reichert is one of the Republican centrists in Congress and reminds voters at every opportunity that he is not afraid to be an independent voice for their needs.

"He has bucked the party and leadership many times, which is no small feat for a freshman," said Carol Beaudu, Mr. Reichert's campaign spokeswoman.

For example, he voted to overturn Mr. Bush's veto of a bill authorizing embryonic-stem-cell research and has opposed drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska.

Mr. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois and many other top Republicans have come to the state to campaign for Mr. Reichert, making him an easy target for Democrats who call him "rubber-stamp Reichert."

When White House strategist Karl Rove visited on behalf of Mr. Reichert last Friday, Mrs. Burner received more than $50,000 in an online counter-fundraiser.

Sen. Maria Cantwell, a Washington Democrat facing her own re-election campaign, hosted the online drive, calling the race one of the country's most "hotly contested."

"There's a major political upset in the making here in Washington state, one that could tilt the balance of power in Congress to the Democrats," Miss Cantwell told supporters.

"They know they can't afford to lose this seat, and they are pulling out all the stops: George Bush has been here, Dick Cheney has been here, and now it's Karl Rove's turn."

Mrs. Burner isn't shy about tying Mr. Reichert to the president, and said she was not surprised to see the race generate national attention.

"We've been working hard to make it that," she said. "About nine times out of every 10, when the president tells him to do something, he gets in line and says, 'Yes, sir.'"

Mrs. Burner, 35, is a former Microsoft executive and mother to a toddler. She was raised in a Republican military family and is married to a veteran who served in Iraq. She has never run for political office.

She said Republicans have lost the ideals for which they once stood, such as fiscal responsibility.

Mr. Reichert, 56, a former sheriff who was in the Air Force Reserve, says on his Web site that he is a man of integrity who "transcends partisanship."

Mr. Reichert garnered 52 percent of the vote when he won the open seat in 2004. His strengths are his independence and his role as chairman of the Homeland Security subcommittee on emergency preparedness, science and technology, Miss Beaudu said.

He authored the 21st Century Emergency Communications Act, which passed earlier this year by a vote of 414-2.

"The biggest issue is our security and our preparedness, and that's what's the congressman is campaigning on," she said, noting that the state is one of the closest to North Korea. "People know him and trust him."

Miss Beaudu cited an August poll showing Mr. Reichert winning by a large margin, while the Burner campaign references a poll from two weeks ago showing the Democrat with a three-point lead over the incumbent.

Each candidate has raised more than $1 million in the race, which has made the "battleground" lists used by both parties, but only Mrs. Burner is running television ads so far.

Black Republicans Run Racially Tinged Ad (AP)

By Kristen Wyatt

AP, September 22, 2006

A national black Republican group is running a radio advertisement accusing Democrats of starting the Ku Klux Klan and saying the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. was a Republican, a claim challenged by civil-rights researchers.

Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, the black Republican nominee for Maryland's open Senate seat, disavowed the ad Thursday as "insulting to Marylanders". He said his campaign asked the Washington-based National Black Republican Association to stop running it.

At an event in Baltimore, Steele said, "I don't know exactly what the intent of the ad was" but that "it's not helpful to the public discourse."

The ad does not mention Steele or his Democratic opponent, Rep. Ben Cardin.

DOJ_NMG_0067503

The association's president, Frances Rice, did not return calls for comment. The group, founded a year ago, promotes the GOP to black voters.

It was not immediately clear which radio stations were airing the 60-second ad or how long it had been running. The group's Web site announced the ad's release in a statement dated two weeks ago. The Washington Post reported Thursday that the ad was running on Baltimore stations.

The spot begins with one woman telling another, "Dr. King was a real man. You know he was a Republican."

Steve Klein, a senior researcher with the Atlanta-based King Center, said Thursday that King never endorsed candidates from either party.

"I think it's highly inaccurate to say he was a Republican because there's really no evidence," Klein said.

A King biographer, Taylor Branch, also said Thursday that King was nonpartisan.

In the ad, the woman goes on to say, "Democrats passed those black codes and Jim Crow laws. Democrats started the Ku Klux Klan." Her companion replies, "The Klan? White hoods and sheets?"

The KKK, never a political party, was a racist group of white men that started in the South after the Civil War, when Republicans were almost unheard of in former Confederate states. The mainstream Democratic Party never endorsed the Klan nor claimed to have founded it.

The first woman also says, "Democrats fought all civil rights legislation from the 1860s to the 1960s. Democrats released those vicious dogs and fire hoses on blacks."

The ad asserts that "Democrats want to keep us poor while voting only Democrat" and, "Democrats want us to accept same-sex marriages, teen abortions without a parent's consent and suing the Boy Scouts for saying 'God' in their pledge."

About the GOP, the ad says: "Republicans freed us from slavery and put our right to vote in the Constitution."

The group running the ads describes itself on its Web site as "a resource for the black community on Republican ideals." It does not say how many members it has.

Race is a prominent theme in the Maryland race for the seat held by retiring Democrat Paul Sarbanes. Steele, the first black candidate elected statewide in Maryland, faces a white Democrat in a heavily Democratic state with the highest percentage of black residents — 29 percent — of any state outside the South.

Black Democrats Pledge Backing To Steele (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Prominent black Democrats yesterday bucked their party to support Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele -- the Republican nominee in Maryland's U.S. Senate race.

"Like so many people who have come out today, I'm sick and tired of being taken for granted by the Democratic Party," said William H. "Billy" Murphy Jr., a Baltimore civil rights lawyer who hosted the "Steele Democrats" event at the Eubie Blake National Jazz Institute and Cultural Center.

"I'm sick and tired of being relied upon for support but not respected as a leader," Mr. Murphy said. "It pains me that I would stand here ... today in rejection of my party's refusal to embrace us in its leadership. But I am happy to be doing that for Michael Steele."

A surprise for Mr. Steele came from the son of Kweisi Mfume, a past president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People who lost last week's Democratic primary to U.S. Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin.

Michael Mfume, a producer of the horror film "Ax 'Em" and an active supporter of his father's campaign, told reporters at the Eubie Blake center that he did not speak for his father.

"There is a saying by Billie Holiday. It goes: 'A mother may have. A poppa may have. But God bless a child that has its own,'" he said.

A spokeswoman for Kweisi Mfume said that he did not know about his son's plans to support Mr. Steele, who is the first black elected to statewide office in Maryland.

Kweisi Mfume, who voiced support for Mr. Cardin in his concession speech but has not actively campaigned for him, has said the Democratic "bosses" shunned his campaign in favor of Mr. Cardin's.

"This is nothing new," said Baltimore lawyer A. Dwight Pettit, a black Democrat at the Steele event.

He said that state party leaders rejected his run for Baltimore state's attorney in 1978 and his nomination for U.S. attorney by President Carter in 1976 in support of white candidates.

"We are on a national stage right now in Maryland to show that if the Republican Party reaches out to African-American communities, they are not foreclosed on immediately," he said. "The question is: What has the Democratic Party done for the African-American community?"

Mr. Steele said he wanted his campaign to bridge Maryland's racial and political divide.

"I decided I wanted this campaign to be about something positive and uplifting: empowerment, opportunity, ownership," he said. "That has not changed and that will not change."

The "Steele Democrats" event followed a rally Tuesday for Mr. Cardin in Baltimore, where both candidates are vying for Mfume supporters.

Mr. Cardin's event featured endorsements from elected black Democratic officials, many of whom backed Mr. Mfume in the primary.

Mr. Cardin, who is white, defeated Mr. Mfume 43.7 percent to 40.4 percent statewide.

But Mr. Cardin lost by tens of thousands of votes in Baltimore and Prince George's County, two of the state's most populated and heavily Democratic jurisdictions -- both more than 65 percent black.

Mr. Steele's potential to break the Democratic lock on black votes has made Maryland's Senate race one of the country's most closely watched campaigns and one of the most fiercely fought between the national parties.

Racial politics took center stage again yesterday, when Mr. Steele called on the Washington-based National Black Republican Association to pull a radio ad airing in Maryland that says Democrats started the Ku Klux Klan and says that Martin Luther King was a Republican, which some historians contest.

"It is creating a ripple of discontent, and that is not what I stand for," Mr. Steele said.

Cardin, Steele Issue Challenges For Debates (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin yesterday criticized his Republican rival Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele for ducking debates in the U.S. Senate race in Maryland.

But Mr. Steele and his campaign said Mr. Cardin is "playing games," and that his campaign manager won't return phone calls to set up a debate.

Yesterday morning, Mr. Cardin stood next to a table with two name cards on it, placed there by his staff, as he spoke to about 30 seniors at a retirement community in Catonsville. One card bore Mr. Cardin's name. The other Mr. Steele's.

"Where is Michael Steele? I wish he was here," Mr. Cardin, a Democrat, told his audience, which included some of the 2,000 residents at the Charlestown Retirement Community who watched on closed-circuit television.

Steele spokesman Doug Heye said that Ken Morley, Mr. Cardin's campaign manager, refuses to return a call from Mr. Steele's campaign manager, Michael Leavitt.

"We would like to have debates and start scheduling them. Unfortunately, Ben Cardin continues to play games," said Mr. Heye.

Mr. Cardin called that "an excuse."

The Cardin campaign has issued public challenges to Mr. Steele, the first black person elected to statewide office in Maryland, to debate Mr. Cardin at one of the 10-term congressman's previously scheduled campaign stops.

"The voters should have an opportunity to hear us in an unrehearsed, live setting, where voters can ask you questions, and you have to respond to those questions," Mr. Cardin said in an interview in Catonsville.

Mr. Cardin this week called for two debates a week until Election Day, which is Nov. 7.

So far, the two candidates are expected to meet Oct. 29 for a debate on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Mr. Leavitt called Mr. Morley about specifics for more debates, but Mr. Morley refused to respond, Mr. Heye said.

In a letter to Mr. Leavitt, Mr. Morley said, "With less than 50 days until the election, there is no time for a drawn out discussion process. Let's debate."

The letter, which was sent via e-mail at 4:16 p.m. Wednesday, challenged Mr. Steele to meet Mr. Cardin at the retirement community at 9 a.m. yesterday.

"If we wanted to do that too we could schedule a debate for when the House of Representatives has votes. But we're not doing that," Mr. Heye said.

Mr. Cardin said that his campaign has "been in constant contact with [the Steele campaign] to do whatever is reasonable in a debate forum."

But Mr. Cardin's spokesman, Oren Shur, refused to say whether campaign manager Mr. Morley had received a call from Mr. Leavitt or whether he had returned a call.

Mr. Shur said he is the contact person for scheduling debates and that he called the Steele campaign yesterday. Late in the day, Mr. Heye returned the call and invited the Cardin campaign to attend a meeting today, which he said would be attended by Steele staffers and representatives for Kevin Zeese, the Green Party candidate.

DOJ_NMG_0067505

Mr. Shur would not say whether Cardin representatives plan to attend the meeting.

Mr. Heye said the Cardin campaign's actions were simply trying to distract voters.

"They are doing whatever they can to distract from the fact that their campaign is clearly stumbling from their internal scandal, and from the fact that after outspending [Kweisi] Mfume 10-to-1, they limped to the nomination," he said.

Mr. Heye was referring to Mr. Cardin's victory last week in the Democratic primary, in which Mr. Cardin defeated Mr. Mfume, the former president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Mr. Cardin spent $2.9 million on television ads to Mr. Mfume's $300,000 but defeated Mr. Mfume by less than 3 percent.

The "scandal" to which Mr. Heye was referring was an online Web log written by a Cardin staffer that included racist and anti-Semitic comments.

The staffer, whom Mr. Cardin has refused to identify, was fired after The Washington Times first reported on the blog Sept. 15.

Top Republican Aids Lieberman Fundraiser (AP)

By Andrew Miga

AP, September 22, 2006

A prominent Republican who chairs I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's legal defense fund co-hosted a fundraiser Wednesday for Sen. Joe Lieberman, who is running for re-election as an independent after losing the Democratic primary.

Mel Sembler, a former Republican National Committee finance committee chairman, helped organize a reception that raised about a "couple hundred thousand dollars" for Lieberman, who was in attendance. Sembler said the event at his firm's office in St. Petersburg, Fla., drew a mix of Republican, Democratic and independent donors.

"He's a man of principle," Sembler, a former ambassador to Italy and Australia, said of Lieberman in a telephone interview with The Associated Press on Thursday. "Everybody crossed party lines, that's what was interesting ... He's an excellent candidate. We're happy to support him."

Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, was indicted last year on charges that he lied to FBI agents and a federal grand jury about how he learned CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity and when he subsequently told reporters.

Sembler, who is board chairman of the Sembler Company, a real estate and shopping center development company, said he has worked hard to raise money for Libby's legal defense fund.

"It's amazing to go to all this hard work when a crime never got committed," said Sembler, who also described himself as "dear friends" with Cheney.

The Libby defense fund's steering committee includes a few Democrats and several Republicans; Sembler is its chairman.

Sembler said the three-term Connecticut senator was supportive of him in 1989 when his nomination to be ambassador to Australia stalled in the Senate.

Sembler said he was bothered by what he termed distortions of Lieberman's record during the August primary, which upset him. That, coupled with Republican nominee Alan Schlesinger's low name recognition, persuaded him to back Lieberman financially in the general election.

Democrat Ned Lamont, an anti-war challenger, stunned Lieberman, the party's 2000 vice presidential nominee, in the Aug. 8 primary. Lieberman then embarked on an independent bid to hold his Senate seat.

Lieberman has stressed that he's reaching across the aisle for Republican votes. He's also reaching for GOP wallets.

Republican New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg plans to host a Nov. 1 fundraiser for Lieberman with former Democratic Mayor Ed Koch.

Bruce Bialosky, a longtime Republican fundraiser in California, said he's getting a strong response as he helps organize an Oct. 10 fundraiser in Los Angeles for Lieberman that also will be a bipartisan affair.

"It should be a smashing success," Bialosky said. "There are a lot of people across the country who are Republicans who are raising money for Joe."

Lieberman will need Republican and independent votes to prevail in November. One of his television ads shows him erasing a line between the words "Democrat" and "Republican" on a chalkboard.

Volatile Mix: Campaigning And Religions (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 21 — In one of the more awkward moments surrounding the disclosure of his Jewish heritage this week, Senator George Allen, Republican of Virginia, volunteered that his background had hardly inspired him to start keeping kosher.

DOJ_NMG_0067506

"I still had a ham sandwich for lunch," Mr. Allen told The Richmond Times-Dispatch, referring to rules against eating pork, "and my mother made great pork chops."

If Mr. Allen did not fully grasp the sensitivities at first, he did find himself in a growing group of political figures who have discovered their Jewish roots late in life.

The responses to his situation, which included bad ethnic humor and serious debates about denial and anti-Semitism, focused attention on the power of religious, ethnic and racial identities in politics, forces that may not have the power they once did. But those forces remain sufficiently alive that Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, a Mormon, will almost certainly face questions about his religion if he runs for the Republican presidential nomination.

Nowadays, political operatives say, what matters is not so much Mr. Allen's bloodlines but his handling of the news that his mother was born Jewish, a fact that both say she told him last month.

"People are always curious about the backgrounds and the attitudes that people bring into a race, and especially someone who has been touted as a potential presidential nominee," said Wesley K. Clark, a retired general and former Democratic presidential contender who learned at age 23 that his father was Jewish.

What may ultimately distinguish Mr. Allen from politicians like Madeleine K. Albright and Senator John Kerry, who both learned the full extent of their Jewish histories on the public stage, is the manner in which his narrative has unfolded. It is occupying a place in a campaign that has already left him on the defensive over racial sensitivity and his efforts to incorporate his newly discovered background into a political identity as a Christian conservative.

After initially sidestepping questions about his Jewish roots, Mr. Allen played them down and then had his campaign accuse his Democratic rival of anti-Semitism. Only on Wednesday did his mother confirm that she had hidden the family history from her son for decades.

Mr. Allen went on the offensive, declaring himself a champion for all minorities. "Now, it's personal," he said Thursday in an interview on CNN.

The development came on the heels of his "macaca" comment, a phrase he used to describe an Indian-American aide to his opponent that has become shorthand for the race and ethnicity problems that have plagued Mr. Allen's campaign for weeks.

Even some of his friends say that handled differently the news of his background could have developed into a sympathetic storyline.

Candidates like Mr. Kerry and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton handled similar developments deftly enough to appeal to the Jewish community without, in the view of their supporters, appearing exploitative or abandoning the Christian traditions in which they were raised.

In Mrs. Clinton's Senate race in 2000, The Jewish Daily Forward reported that Mrs. Clinton's step-grandfather was Jewish.

For any Democrat in a similar spot, of course, the landscape is much less complicated. The Democratic Party has long been the predominant home for most religious and ethnic minorities, including Jews.

The situation is more complex for Mr. Allen.

William Kristol, editor of The Weekly Standard, a conservative publication, said the incident especially "struck a nerve with Jewish Republicans."

"It's simply the way he handled it," Mr. Kristol said.

But in a southern state that was once a slave state, where white voters are predominant and cultural and political conservatives are a majority, Mr. Allen has seemed to struggle to find the right words to address his newfound identity.

After initially responding defensively to a television news reporter who asked him directly on Monday about his Jewish ancestry and saying it was important not to make "aspersions about people because of their religious beliefs," Mr. Allen later said his objection was to a preceding question, about whether his mother had taught him the word "macaca."

By midweek, the campaign accused its Democratic opponent, James Webb, of using "anti-Jewish ploys." Mr. Allen's campaign issued statements saying that, among other things, Mr. Webb had approved a flier in his Senate primary that had anti-Semitic overtones, an accusation that Mr. Webb has denied.

On CNN, Mr. Allen spoke forcefully about combating discrimination, saying he had recommitted to fight for tolerance.

He also said his mother, after releasing him from a promise to keep the family secret, had started to find out who her real friends were. \

Democrats have, of course, taken delight in watching Mr. Allen confront another difficult episode.

A spokesman for Mr. Kerry said that the news "would be nothing more than a piece of trivia if it wasn't clear that George Allen is so uncomfortable with himself" and that the "Watergate principle" applied, with the cover-up worse than the news.

In an interview published on Thursday in The Washington Post, Mr. Allen's mother, whose unmarried name was Henriette Lumbroso, said she had kept the news from her son until a discussion after a report in The Forward about her family and its experience in Tunisia. She said her father had been imprisoned during the Nazi occupation of Tunis.

DOJ_NMG_0067507

On CNN, Mr. Allen recounted his mother's saying: "I didn't want to tell you. Do you love me? You won't love me as much." Mr. Allen said he responded, "I love you even more."

Kerry Urges Democrats To Fight Back (AP)

By Will Lester

AP, September 22, 2006

The Swift Boat Veterans for Truth group was Sen. John Kerry's albatross in 2004. Now, the Democrat is warning his party about suffering the same fate in a fundraising letter.

In 2004, the Swift Boat group, backed by Texas businessman Bob Perry, made unsubstantiated allegations about Kerry's Vietnam War heroism. The presidential nominee's slow and uncertain response is blamed for helping doom his White House bid.

This year, Perry has donated $5 million to the Economic Freedom Fund, a newly created California group, that is running ads, sending out mailings and using automated phone calls to criticize Democratic candidates in Georgia, West Virginia, Iowa and Indiana.

Kerry urges Democrats to fight back in a letter seeking funds for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

"Their first attack ads against Democratic House candidates are already on the air. They hope they've caught you sleeping. We have to respond quickly and in force," Kerry writes in an e-mail sent to tens of thousands of Democrats.

Kerry was widely criticized for his slow response to the Swift Boat attacks.

"You get knocked down and you can either get mad or you can get tougher," said Kerry spokesman David Wade. "Our battle cry is 'never again.'"

Since losing the White House in 2004, Kerry has raised more than $10 million for almost 200 candidates at the local, state and federal level, aides say. He is mentioned as a potential candidate in 2008.

Clear-Cut Race Shifting Into Texas-Size Free-for-All (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

HOUSTON, Sept. 21 — Finally, in the race for governor of Texas, things are getting unclear. And all the more riveting.

Will President Bush's home state stay in the Republican column, where it has been since Mr. Bush won in an upset in 1994? Or will it fall to a Democrat or independent — even a cigar-toting country music satirist touting his political virginity and running on the slogan, "How hard could it be?"

Just a few months ago, the race appeared to be a fairly conventional if well-financed match between Gov. Rick Perry, a Republican, and the state comptroller, Carole Keeton Strayhorn, a former Republican running as an independent.

In the last few weeks, though, two other candidates have gained enough traction to make it a much wider race: the humorist Kinky Friedman and Chris Bell, a former Democratic congressman. A fifth candidate, James Werner, a Libertarian, could make the difference if the Nov. 7 election becomes a squeaker.

"It's gotten a lot murkier over the last couple of months," said Cal Jillson, a professor of political science at Southern Methodist University in Dallas and a leading authority on Texas politics.

Mired in low popularity ratings but with rivals dividing the opposition and strong backing from evangelicals, Governor Perry is still favored to win his quest to become the longest-serving chief executive in Texas history using a strategy of "running out the clock," Dr. Jillson said. Nonetheless, he cautioned that "the history of Texas is full of zany, crazy races and this could be one."

Voter disaffection is running high, fueled by anger over a long school-financing crisis, illegal immigration, a new business tax, rising crime, toll roads and the governor's plans for a vast foreign-built superhighway network that farmers and ranchers say would gobble up great swaths of Texas.

Mr. Perry, often accused of aloofness, has become the target not only of the left but also of the conservative right, blamed for rising state expenditures that both sides say have failed to remedy pressing state problems.

It is an environment in which the opposition has clearly thrived, and several statewide polls — though they use questionable and often unreliable methods — has driven a sense that the race has widened. None of the polls show Governor Perry getting much more than a third of the vote. The three other major candidates tend to fall in differing orders, depending on the poll, but each ranks in double-digit percentages in the various polls.

"This will be won by anyone getting 38 to 40 percent of the vote," Dr. Jillson said. With even 2 percent of the vote, Mr. Werner could pull enough from another candidate to make a difference, becoming the Ralph Nader of Texas, 2006.

"I would be pleased if I could cost any of my opponents the election," Mr. Werner said.

With the race in flux, the airwaves are full of television commercials; early ones showed Mr. Bell as a giant straddling the Alamo and Mr. Friedman at his animal rescue ranch in Kerrville comparing himself to the Good Shepherd.

DOJ_NMG_0067508

In recent days, the cash-starved and long-invisible Mr. Bell has been buoyed by the unexpected opening of checkbooks, as some big donors have reconsidered their judgment that he could not beat Mr. Perry. One new benefactor was Frederick M. Baron of Dallas, a wealthy asbestos lawyer and former president of the Association of Trial Lawyers of America, who spent several hours recently closeted with Mr. Bell, calling Democrats for donations. "I'm now convinced he could win," Mr. Baron said.

Mr. Friedman's campaign raked in $60,000 at a Houston steakhouse fund-raiser Sept. 5 led by the socialite Carolyn Farb and featuring the guitarist Billy F. Gibbons of the Texas band ZZ Top and Dick DeGuerin, the lead lawyer defending Tom DeLay against criminal campaign finance charges. Mr. Friedman will win, Mr. DeGuerin predicted, "and then he's going to make me attorney general."

Next week, Mr. Friedman plans to begin touring Texas college campuses with his political idol, Jesse Ventura, the wrestler and former Minnesota governor who waged the kind of independent campaign Mr. Friedman is emulating, to the point of hiring Mr. Ventura's former campaign manager, Dean Barkley. They hope to take advantage of the growing discontent among Texas voters.

"The peasants are angry," Mr. Barkley said. "They're sharpening their pitchforks."

But Mr. Friedman himself narrowly escaped an impaling two weeks ago after dismissing Hurricane Katrina evacuees still in Houston as "crack heads and thugs." The remark prompted Mr. Bell to suggest that "Kinky is taking sensitivity training from Mel Gibson."

This week, the freewheeling Mr. Friedman was confronted with a year-old interview in which he said of sexual predators, "Throw them in prison and throw away the key, and make them listen to a Negro talking to himself." His staff explained the remark as a line from one of Mr. Friedman's mystery novels and said he was often politically incorrect but never racist. On Thursday, bloggers seized on a 1980 comedy skit by Mr. Friedman in which he used a slur against blacks, prompting expressions of outrage by his rivals — another sign, his campaign said, of their desperation over his gains.

Mr. Friedman, 61, a humor columnist and longtime mainstay of a Western troupe called Kinky Friedman and the Texas Jewboys, has also suggested dividing the border, putting a Mexican general in charge of each segment and subtracting money from a large bank account every time an illegal immigrant crossed over.

For much of the summer, the race was widely seen as a struggle between Governor Perry and Ms. Strayhorn, both former Democrats. Ms. Strayhorn, 67, the mother of two former officials in the Bush administration — Scott McClellan, the White House spokesman, and Mark B. McClellan, the F.D.A. director and Medicare commissioner — was the first woman to be mayor of Austin, from 1977 to 1983. She switched to the Republican Party in 1986, before an unsuccessful race for Congress.

Mr. Perry, 56, a former Texas House member who switched to the Republican Party in 1989, was lieutenant governor in December 2000 when George W. Bush vacated the Statehouse, elevating Mr. Perry to governor. He won the post on his own in 2002. The two-term limit means no Texas governor has served more than 8 years; but if Mr. Perry wins in November and finishes out his term, he will have served 10.

With the race picking up, Mr. Perry, whose campaign turned away a reporter's request to accompany him on the hustings, spent several recent days visiting public schools to deliver checks for teacher merit bonuses, up to $2,800, and give children blue plastic bracelets stamped "Reach your goal — graduate." A recent survey by Education Week ranked Texas below average in high school graduation rates.

"We can't pay you enough, but we try," Mr. Perry told Monica Ferguson, a fourth-grade teacher at Oleson Elementary school in north Houston last week.

Ms. Strayhorn, who gave up any hope of challenging the governor in the Republican primary, has also been promising higher teacher pay, which has earned her endorsements from teacher unions. Education has been ignored in the state for too long, she has said on the stump, and students and teachers have seen no benefit from record state spending.

Mr. Bell, a former Houston councilman who filed an early ethics complaint against Mr. DeLay, the former House Republican leader, drew cheers at a recent Democratic forum by dismissing Mr. Perry and Ms. Strayhorn as "two sleeves of the same empty suit" and professing a lack of concern over their television campaigns. "Their problem is not that people don't know them," he said, "it's that they do."

At his Sept. 5 fund-raiser in Houston, Mr. Friedman, wearing his trademark black cowboy hat and clutching his ever-present unlit cigar, said he sensed victory.

"I can tell by the people who think we can't win," he said.

He thanked his donors — "it's been a financial pleasure" — and demanded refreshment: "The governor needs a drink!" he bellowed. "May I have a drink of Jameson's, please?"

Kinky Friedman Defends 1980 Racial Slur (AP)

By Kelley Shannon

DOJ_NMG_0067509

AP, September 22, 2006

Comedian and independent gubernatorial candidate Kinky Friedman on Thursday defended his use of a racial slur during a performance at Houston nightclub 26 years ago after an audio clip of the standup routine was posted on the Internet.

Friedman, 61, said he has tried to expose and lampoon racism, and was making fun of bigots when he used the n-word twice in a joke.

"They're attacking me for something that Richard Pryor did, that Lenny Bruce did, which is to have the freedom to poke fun at anybody that you want. The whole show is satirizing racism," Friedman said at a fundraiser in New York.

But State Rep. Garnet Coleman, former chairman of the Texas Legislative Black Caucus, said it was difficult to find the humor in his joke after his remarks about Katrina evacuees in Houston in which he referred to them as "crackheads and thugs."

Coleman said nobody would have scrutinized his 1980 joke before the comments about Katrina evacuees, most of whom are black.

"It makes it more relevant because people then look to see, is this part of your character," Coleman said. He said Friedman "needs to change his tune or get out of the race."

A staffer for Coleman posted the audio on the left-leaning political Web site Burnt Orange Report. Phillip Martin said he did the posting in his off time after getting it from an old fan of Friedman's.

Other Friedman comments criticized recently include a television interview from a year ago in which he said sexual predators should be thrown in prison "and make them listen to a Negro talking to himself," Friedman said. He also called "Negro" a "charming word."

Friedman's campaign has said the CNBC interview in which he made the "Negro" remark was a reference to a book he wrote in the 1980s.

Gov. Rick Perry, a Republican seeking re-election, Democratic candidate Chris Bell and independent candidate Carole Keeton Strayhorn said Friedman's language was unacceptable.

LETTERS (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

As Harvard Bows Out, Others Should Step In

Arthur C. Brooks's Sept. 14 editorial-page commentary "Early Admissions" has got it exactly right that Harvard's early-admissions reversal need not, and indeed ought not, discourage top-tier public universities from more aggressively marketing it. Public universities such as my own, the University of Michigan, now have an unparalleled opportunity to attract the best students from both the lowest and highest socio-economic tiers.

Our best in-state students most in need of an opportunity to attend college can, through early admissions, continue to have security about their academic future. And our best out-of-state students who are assured, but not guaranteed, access to an elite private institution can now better weigh the uncertainty of a private education against the certainty of a public one. Given the excess demand for admission to private universities, it is a wonder that all public universities don't ramp up early admissions in the wake of Harvard's decision.

Derek Collins
Department of Classical Studies
University of Michigan
Ann Arbor, Mich.

(The author is an associate professor of Greek and Latin, and serves on the College of LS&A's Advisory Board to the Office of Undergraduate Admissions at the University of Michigan.)

The reason "minorities and low-income applicants" do not "show up in the early admittance pool" is because the schools' financial aid decisions are made in April/May, not because minorities and low-income applicants do not have the motivation to "show up," as Mr. Brooks outrageously suggests.

My "low-income" three children applied to 10 schools each (talk about motivation!) and ended up going to the schools that provided them with the most financial aid and were the best fit for their academic credentials. But they didn't find out until May of the following year because it is not until that time that schools release their financial aid decisions. To suggest that low-income and minorities exhibit "suboptimal personal behaviors" is an expression of ignorance of how the other half lives.

Associate Professor
Master's Couple and Family Counseling
Counselor Education Department
Northeastern Illinois University
Lincolnshire, Ill.

DOJ_NMG_0067510

The early admission system may seem logical for students who are "positive" of their college decision; however I disagree with Arthur Brooks. To students, parents and college counselors, the early decision process appears flawless as it often allows them a better chance at gaining admission to their college of choice, typically one on their so-called "stretch" list. This process does not necessarily allocate students to the college that will suit them best.

As a white, private-school student in the Northeast, I like most of my fellow classmates had aspirations of attending only the most elite colleges. My hopes were dashed when I was rejected by all but my "safety school." Though I could not see it at the time, my admission to Hobart College was the single best thing that had happened to me in my life. There I was able to participate in sports, clubs and organizations that I would never had the opportunity to join had I gained admission to a school where I was accepted early under more favorable acceptance parameters.

Ryan C. Wilson
Boston

Unions Support Politicians Who Care About Workers

In your Sept. 19 editorial "Fun Union Facts" you continue your crusade against unions by picking and choosing facts so carefully that your page needs a "reader beware" sign.

Unions pool their resources through the AFL-CIO so working people's voices can be heard in the political and legislative process and to support one another in organizing; these are big budget items. At a time when median household income is sinking, 45 million Americans don't have health care and poverty is rising, we would be neglecting our duties if we didn't do everything possible to elect working-family-friendly candidates and pass laws that will improve workers' lives.

What the LM-2s [newly expanded disclosure reports for unions' budgets] label "representational activities" is not just for collective bargaining; it includes organizing, research and education, international work, training and more. And as an umbrella organization of unions, the AFL-CIO doesn't bargain any contracts at all; our member unions do.

Unions are now reporting more information than any other type of organization in the nation -- more than business, more than churches, more than non-profits. The AFL-CIO's LM-2 forms alone were 863 pages, and we're one of 5,000 national and local labor organizations required to turn in these forms.

John J. Sweeney
President
AFL-CIO
Washington

An Insufferable Smear Of Our Staff Officers

The Sept. 19 Letter to the Editor defending an academic physician who failed to disclose his financial ties ("Needless Furor Harms Outstanding Psychiatrist") is naïve and misguided. Particularly offensive is the allegation that staff members of the American College of Neuropsychopharmacology were responsible for the nondisclosure "due to a regrettable oversight at the level of administrative publication." To the contrary, the ACNP policy on disclosure explicitly requires that information on financial conflict of interest be included in the acknowledgements section of the manuscript at the time of submission. As lead author, Dr. Charles Nemeroff was required to conform to that policy. As editor in chief of the journal, he can't claim ignorance of the policy that he was being paid to enforce. To now have his supporters issue such a smear on ACNP's administration of the journal is insufferable. The responsibility was Dr. Nemeroff's and his alone.

Department of Psychiatry and Biobehavioral Sciences
University of California at Los Angeles
Chief, Psychiatry and Mental Health
Veterans Affairs Greater Los Angeles Healthcare System
Los Angeles
(Drs. Carroll and Rubin are Fellows of the American College of Neuropsychopharmacology.)

Tons of Animal Manure Are Public Health Threat

Marc Siegel nailed it ("Eat Your Spinach," editorial page, Sept. 18): E. coli is an intestinal bug and plants don't have intestines. Diseases that make their way to the human body via produce most likely came from contamination with farm animal fecal material.

In a single year in this country, our industrialized animal agriculture's intensive confinement system produces more than a billion tons of manure -- as heavy as 10,000 Nimitz-class aircraft carriers. Billions of farm animals are overcrowded in stressful, unsanitary sheds, pens, cages and stalls; no wonder we are increasingly plagued with infectious food-borne diseases. Animal factories are a public health threat. We shouldn't have to cook the crap out of our food.

Innovator Devises Way Around Electoral College (NYT)

By Rick Lyman

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

LOS ALTOS HILLS, Calif., Sept. 21 — In his early 20's, John R. Koza and fellow graduate students invented a brutally complicated board game based on the Electoral College that became a brief cult hit and recently fetched $100 for an antique version on eBay.

By his 30's, Dr. Koza was a co-inventor of the scratch-off lottery ticket and found it one of the few sure ways to find fortune with the lottery.

Now, a 63-year-old eminence among computer scientists who teaches genetic programming at Stanford, Dr. Koza has decided to top off things with an end run on the Constitution. He has concocted a plan for states to skirt the Electoral College system legally to insure the election of whichever presidential candidate receives the most votes nationwide.

"When people complain that it's an end run," Dr. Koza said, "I just tell them, 'Hey, an end run is a legal play in football.' "

The first fruit of his effort, a bill approved by the California legislature that would allocate the state's 55 electoral votes to the winner of the national popular vote, sits on Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's desk. The governor has to decide by Sept. 30 whether to sign it, a decision that may well determine whether Dr. Koza's scheme takes flight or becomes another relic in the history of efforts to kill the Electoral College.

"It would be a major development if California enacts this thing," said Tim Storey, an analyst for the National Conference of State Legislatures. "It will definitely transform it from a smoldering thing into a fire."

There have been many efforts over the decades to kill the Electoral College, the little-known and widely misunderstood body that actually elects the president based on the individual states that a candidate wins. Most recently, former Representative John B. Anderson of Illinois and former Senator Birch Bayh of Indiana spearheaded a drive, Fair Vote, for a constitutional amendment to abolish the Electoral College.

The brainstorm behind Dr. Koza's effort, led by a seven-month-old group, National Popular Vote, was to abandon that approach and focus on creating interstate compacts. Those are contracts that bind states over issues like nuclear waste and port authorities.

Dr. Koza's compact, if approved by enough legislatures, would commit a state's electors to vote for the candidate who wins the most national votes, even if the candidate loses in that state.

Robert Hardaway, a professor of law at the University of Denver who wrote "The Electoral College and the Constitution: The Case for Preserving Federalism" (1994), has counted 704 efforts to change or abolish the Electoral College. Most, he said, were ill advised, including this one.

"It's legal, but it would be a terrible idea," Professor Hardaway said. "Look at the trauma the country went through having a recount in Florida. Suppose what would happen, in the face of a close national election, if we had to have a recount in every little hamlet."

Dr. Koza, whose dissertation at the University of Michigan was titled "On Inducing a Nontrivial, Parsimonious Grammar for a Given Sample of Sentences," said the idea came to him in early 2004, although he and Barry Fadem did not go public with it until February. Working with state lotteries as chief executive of Scientific Games in Atlanta, he had learned how interstate compacts work. Multistate lotteries like Powerball are based on such compacts. What, he wondered, if a similar agreement bound states together to thwart the Electoral College?

"The bottom line is that the system has outlived its usefulness," said Assemblyman Thomas J. Umberg, the Anaheim Democrat who sponsored the bill here. "It's past time that Americans should elect their president by direct vote of the people."

Mr. Umberg and his staff met some of Mr. Schwarzenegger's top staff members on Wednesday and came away encouraged about the prospects of the legislation. Although they received no commitment, it was clear that the governor, a Republican, was seriously considering the question and had not made up his mind about it, Mr. Umberg said.

"It's anybody's guess which way he'll go," Assemblyman Chuck DeVore, an Irvine Republican who opposes the bill, said. "He's not your normal partisan politician."

National Popular Vote bills were proposed in six legislatures this year. California's was the only one to pass it, though the Colorado Senate voted for a version. The group has found sponsors for bills in 22 states next year.

"And we fully expect that by Jan. 1 we will be able to say that we have sponsors in all 50 states," said Mr. Fadem, an East Bay lawyer who specializes in referendums and initiatives and is president of National Popular Vote.

The goal is to create a snowball effect. The measures may be unlikely to pass in time for the 2008 presidential race, Mr. Fadem said, but the idea could find enough traction as an issue for candidates to address.

As attractive as it is to guarantee the White House to the winner of the national vote, Dr. Koza said, he has other goals in mind.

DOJ_NMG_0067512

"More important,'' he said, "is changing the way presidential campaigns are conducted in this country. Now, the candidates spend almost all of their time in a handful of battleground states like Ohio and Florida and ignore the rest of the country. This would force candidates to campaign nationally for every vote."

Mr. Storey said he remained skeptical that the idea would pass in enough legislatures to take effect. Almost certainly, he said, the states that are usually highly contested will oppose it, fearing the loss of attention and campaign spending. Also, Mr. Storey said, the battle might become partisan, as it did in California, where just one Republican legislator ended up supporting the bill.

Mr. DeVore said, "I just took a look at who was behind the movement, and they were left-wing partisans."

Dr. Koza acknowledged that he had been a Democratic elector, twice, and his living room is festooned with photographs of him beside former Vice President Al. Gore and former President Bill Clinton.

He insisted, however, that the movement was fundamentally nonpartisan, and he pointed to the many Republicans who had agreed to co-sponsor bills on his plan. In New York, five lawmakers, all Republican, sponsored the bill this year.

Jerry F. Hough, a professor of political science at Duke, said that he was "an enthusiastic supporter of a popular vote for president," but that he had problems with Dr. Koza's plan. Professor Hough said he would like runoff provisions, for instance.

He also agreed conservatives could see the effort as a liberal stealth move to regain lost power, comparing it to the Republicans' successful effort, after Franklin D. Roosevelt won four terms, to limit presidents to two.

"The two-term limit was clearly in the face of F.D.R.," Professor Hough said. "And I would say this is clearly in the face of Al Gore's loss in 2000."

States Spin Their Spare Stuff Into Gold (USAT)

By Ben Jones

USA Today, September 22, 2006

MADISON, Wis. — State governments are putting more of their surplus goods on sale rather than in the dump. That's giving bargain hunters the opportunity to pick up everything from computers and desks to a car crusher and a statue of Smokey Bear.

South Dakota unloaded the car crusher for $95,000 on the Internet, according to Rick Voorhes, the state's surplus property manager. Alabama got about $30 for the "life-size" Smokey Bear statue, says Shane Bailey, director of that state's surplus property agency.

The officials in charge of selling such items say tighter state budgets and a desire to reduce the amount of stuff deposited into landfills have bolstered their sales efforts.

"There has been a big push for it," says Dick Graves, president of the National Association of State Agencies for Surplus Property and director of federal and state surplus for Indiana.

"You need more money everywhere," Graves says. "There is wealth sitting here with some of this stuff."

At least 11 states, including Georgia, Arkansas, South Dakota, Washington and South Carolina, are using online auctions to sell surplus goods, according to a survey by the National Association of State Chief Administrators.

Tim Sell, who manages Wisconsin's sales, says state governments have long had surplus property on their hands. What has changed is how it's dealt with.

"In the past, normally good old boys were in the (surplus) department, and nobody cared as long as it disappeared," Sell says. "Now people's taxes are going up, and people want more accountability on these things. (People say) 'Where's my stuff going, and how's it being handled?' "

South Dakota also holds a series of public auctions each year, and several hundred people attend. Total sales come to about $1.5 million annually. "There is a lot of stuff (we sell) that should go to a landfill, but one man's junk is another man's treasure," Voorhes says.

In Kansas, state spokesman Gavin Young says it all goes on sale. "You can get everything from an in-and-out tray from the top of a desk all the way up to a dump truck. … There is a little bit of everything," he said.

Gayleen Wyant, surplus property manager for Wyoming, says the only thing her state throws away is "absolute trash." She says she has sold everything from used tire rims to an old wringer washing machine. "I am the queen of sales," she says. "Guys tell me, 'It won't sell,' and I turn around and sell it."

New Hampshire's surplus items include big things such as police cruisers as well as the hundreds of pocketknives and small tools seized by airport security. The seized airport items alone bring in $26,000 a year.

"It's not big money, but it helps pay the bills," says Robert Stowell, who runs that state's surplus program.

DOJ_NMG_0067513

Wisconsin operates a sales warehouse in Madison that unloads property from state agencies and Wisconsin's state university system. It's filled with used computers starting at less than $100 and battered dorm furniture. Regular shoppers can find the unexpected.

Jenny White of Madison regularly combs the aisles for craft supplies.

Once, she says, she ran into a gynecological exam table. She didn't buy it. “That was probably the weirdest … thing I've seen,” White says. “But with some of the stuff, I don't have any idea what I am looking at.”

Sell, who runs the warehouse, says he has “seen everything from rat guillotines to human skulls to things from the governor's mansion. Everything.”

Past surplus sales also have featured doors and windows that were replaced during a Wisconsin Capitol renovation and gear that game wardens seized from illegal fishermen.

Sell says the sales have helped the state keep hundreds of tons of junk out of landfills. They also bring in $1.4 million annually, more than four times the amount the states collected a decade ago. “There has been a dramatic increase,” Sell says.

The Super-Rich Get Richer: Forbes 400 Are All Billionaires (WP)

By Frank Ahrens

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

It's not news that Bill Gates is the richest person in America, according to Forbes magazine's annual list of the nation's 400 richest people, released yesterday. He has been for 13 years. Barring a second Stone Age in which computers are good only for hurling at other cavemen, Gates will always be rich.

The news is: On this list, $999 million is chump change.

For the first time, all 400 Gotbucks on the Forbes tally are billionaires, from Gates (worth $53 billion) down to the bottom, Los Angeles semiconductor magnate Sehat Sutardja ($1 billion).

It's not just the accumulated wealth that draws attention to the list; it's the eye-popping numbers that show the speed with which wealth is gained -- and lost -- at the dawn of this millennium. For instance, according to Forbes:

Â· Casino mogul Sheldon Adelson (No. 3, $20.5 billion) has made $1 million per hour over the past two years.

Â· Google Inc. founders Sergey Brin (No. 12, $14.1 billion) and Larry Page (No. 13, $14 billion) have each made $13 million per day over the past two years.

Â· Martha Stewart dropped off the list after losing nearly $400 million over the past year.

Forbes has been publishing the much-ballyhooed list -- which relies on research and estimates and rounds net worth to the nearest $100 million -- since 1982. The inaugural list contained only 13 billionaires. Even after the technology crash at the beginning of the century, a three-year war and a jumpy economy, the wealth accumulation among the richest Americans continues unabated and has risen to historic proportions, even if measured by an arbitrarily arrived-at number (400, the number of swells who could fit into the Victorian New York ballroom of Caroline Astor).

"It is a really big deal that it's all billionaires," said Forbes associate editor Matthew Miller, who edited the list and led the team that spent a year compiling it. "It shows economic growth and, as this magazine is a fan of capitalism, it shows progress."

The list of D.C. billionaires is topped by Danaher Corp. founder Mitchell P. Rales (No. 107, $2.6 billion), followed by his brother, Steven M. Rales (No. 117, $2.5 billion), new Washington Nationals owner and real estate mogul Theodore N. Lerner (No. 242, $1.5 billion), and Black Entertainment Television founder Robert L. Johnson (No. 374, $1 billion). McLean candy czar Forrest E. Mars Jr. is Virginia's top billionaire (No. 21, $10.5 billion), while Richard E. Marriott is Maryland's wealthiest man (No. 197, $1.8 billion).

The enormous sums spur the natural question: Is it good, bad or neither that wealth is accumulating so fast that numbers begin to lose their meaning? (Requisite illustration: A stack of 1 billion $1 bills would reach a height of 80 miles.)

On the one hand, the fortunes have spawned a new age of philanthropy, by which private individuals can try to effect change with the power and reach of a government but without the bureaucratic shackles that often thwart aid efforts.

Bill and Melinda Gates, for instance, created a foundation with assets of $30 billion that focuses much of its effort on improving health for the world's poor. Warren E. Buffett (No. 2, $46 billion), a director of The Washington Post Co. along with Melinda Gates, said in June that he would give away much of his fortune to charity, most of it to the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation. The gestures recall the large-scale largesse of 19th-century capitalists named Vanderbilt and Rockefeller.

Yet not everyone finds the billionaire boom beneficial.

"I think it's very bad," said Dean Baker, a macroeconomist at the Center for Economic and Policy Research in Washington. "If the U.S. had experienced really extraordinary growth, then maybe that would be the reason" for all the billionaires. Baker pointed out that U.S. economic growth in the past 25 years -- the period that hatched this crop of billionaires -- is actually slower than in the preceding quarter-century, which produced only 13 billionaires.

DOJ_NMG_0067514

"If these people pull away so much wealth," he said, "that means everyone else has less."

The growth in the number of billionaires has been significantly aided by cuts in U.S. tax rates that allow the wealthy to keep more of their money, said Harvard University economics professor Larry Katz. Today's marginal tax rate for the richest Americans is 35 percent, down from more than 60 percent 25 years ago.

"We could do a lot more with the tax system and with policies . . . to help out those who are less fortunate," Katz said. On the other hand, "not every dollar that goes to a rich person is taken away from someone else."

Katz is of mixed mind about the billionaire boom.

"At one level, it leads to the possibility of great philanthropy," he said. "On the other level, it is a great concentration of wealth and power that can subvert other people's interests."

One-third of the Forbes 400 is concentrated in two places: California, which has 89 billionaires, and New York City, with 44.

The billionaire-free states are West Virginia, Vermont, Alaska, Maine, Delaware, Mississippi, Iowa, New Mexico, Kentucky and North Dakota. (South Dakota has one.) Even Wyoming, the least populous state, has a billionaire -- Christy Walton (No. 7, $15.6 billion), one of eight Wal-Mart family members on the list, four of whom are in the top 10.

In Embracing Islam, Ex-Catholic Seeks To Strengthen Cultural Ties (WP)

By Caryle Murphy

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

Chris Moore was an aspiring rock musician with earrings and a shaved head when he walked into a Northern Virginia mosque a dozen years ago and began asking questions about Islam.

A month later, the Christian-raised son of a U.S. Navy man became a Muslim. His conversion initiated a spiritual odyssey that took him to several Muslim countries, including Saudi Arabia, where he adopted and then rejected the ultraconservative Wahhabi approach to Islam.

Moore's faith journey ultimately brought the Annandale resident home, and today he is pursing a master's degree at St. John's College in Annapolis, a university noted for its demanding curriculum based on reading classic works of Western civilization.

Like many other young Muslims in the United States, Moore is seeking to fashion an Islamic identity that flourishes in American society and influences it for the better. He feels a responsibility, he said, to contribute to a more harmonious relationship between Islam and the West -- a task that is on his mind as he observes this year's Islamic holy month of Ramadan, a period of daytime fasting and spiritual introspection that starts at sundown today.

"I'll be doing a lot of reflecting on how I can make a difference in the state of affairs of Muslims -- in the West, specifically," said Moore, 31, who attends the Mustafa Center in Annandale.

Fluent in Arabic, Moore said he hopes to foster understanding between Muslims and non-Muslims by translating some of the "beautiful, deep wisdom that I've found in Arabic literature. . . . There's a lot in the Islamic tradition that people in this country . . . would love."

But first, he wants to better understand his own culture, which is why St. John's was a logical choice. "What better way to understand the West," he said, "than by going directly to the foundational texts and books and works that helped create that civilization?"

Ramadan, believed to be the period when God revealed the first verses of the Koran to the prophet Muhammad, is the most important month of the Islamic religious calendar. During this time, which is dedicated to spiritual growth, Muslims must refrain from eating, drinking and having sexual relations between dawn and sunset. It is also customary for Muslims to spend part of the days during Ramadan studying the Koran.

The daily fast is broken with an evening meal called the iftar , after which many Muslims attend special nightly prayers, known as taraweeh , at their mosques. Ramadan evenings are often festive, with visits among relatives and friends. The month ends with one of Islam's major holidays, Eid al-Fitr.

The arc of Moore's personal journey from a very conservative to a more moderate expression of his faith echoes the spiritual path of many Muslim American converts. For Moore, the story began in 1994, a year after graduating from Annandale High School.

An only child, he became close friends with Aaron Sellars, another young aspiring musician. The two also shared a yearning for spiritual fulfillment, which led them to Dar al Hijra Islamic Center in Falls Church. They walked in one day and began asking one of the members about Islam. Sellars converted that day; Moore, raised Catholic, did so shortly afterward.

He took to his new faith with an intensity typical of converts. He adopted the Arabic name Khalil, which means intimate friend, and gave up his beloved music, because a Saudi spiritual adviser convinced him that it was a sinful waste of time.

DOJ_NMG_0067515

Moore also enrolled in the Saudi-run Institute of Islamic and Arabic Sciences in Fairfax to learn Arabic, because he wanted to read Islam's scriptures in their original language.

Sellars, 35, who works as an audiovisual artist at the California-based Zaytuna Institute, an Islamic educational center, said he was not surprised that his longtime friend threw himself into studying Arabic after his conversion, since that was his approach to everything.

"All of a sudden, there's all these Post-It notes of Arabic all over the wall [of his bedroom]," Sellars recalled. "It was pretty amazing for me to see that quality of doing everything right transferred to his approach to Islamic studies."

Sellars said that Moore displayed the principles of Ramadan even as he moved to accept Islam. "Ramadan is about stopping, cutting off certain aspects of your normal life to think about that which is higher and that which is deep within yourself," Sellars said.

As Moore began to seriously consider converting, "there were certain aspects of his life that he put aside, people who had negative influences . . . who were just about partying, getting high, getting drunk," Sellars said. "The core principle of Ramadan, of doing without and looking within, he was already manifesting some of those qualities . . . in his journey for the truth."

When the Fairfax institute offered Moore a scholarship to study in Medina, Saudi Arabia, he grabbed it -- because to live in the town that Muhammad called home for several years is "the dream of every Muslim," Moore said.

He arrived in Medina in 1996. "When I first got there, I was pretty much in awe. I truly, honestly believed . . . that the only scholars on the face of the Earth that had anything to truly say about Islam were . . . Saudi-related in some way," he said. Theirs, he thought, was "the true Islam."

But in his third year of studies, he started having doubts about the Wahhabi version of Islam taught at Medina. He saw "inconsistencies" in some of his professors' teachings, he said, and was perplexed by the way they selectively chose scriptural stories to back up their ideas but left out others that contradicted them.

Determined to explore Islam on his own, Moore began reading respected ancient Muslim scholars whose views were contrary to the Wahhabi outlook. He also listened to a taped lecture by Hamza Yusuf, the founder of the Zaytuna Institute and a leading figure in the American Muslim community.

"Sparks started to go off, like maybe [his Saudi professors were] pulling the wool over my eyes," Moore recalled thinking. "Maybe there is another version of Islamic history and another version of Islam."

When he started pulling away from the Wahhabi approach, some of his fellow students, including American and British colleagues, called Moore an unbeliever and an "innovator" -- a sin in Wahhabi thought.

In 1999, he decided to study Islam elsewhere and traveled to Mauritania, Morocco, Yemen and Egypt. He worked at an Islamic educational center in Abu Dhabi for a while. During his travels, he returned in the summer to study English and religious studies at George Mason University, where obtained a bachelor's degree in 2001.

To develop "a truly Muslim identity within the American context," Moore said, Muslims in the United States need to combine what is best from their Islamic traditions and their American culture.

Moore, who no longer shuns music, is looking forward to the rigors of Ramadan. Although his current reading assignments from St. John's include "King Lear" and "The Canterbury Tales," he said he will strive to complete the traditional Ramadan practice of reading the Koran, a book of more than 6,000 verses, "from cover to cover" over the next 30 days.

He also, of course, will be fasting from dawn to sunset, a sacrifice that the Koran teaches is prescribed for Muslims "in order that you should become God-conscious," Moore said.

"Ramadan is a very personal affair," he added, noting that no one but God knows if you are truly fasting or sneaking a bite to eat. "Everyone can see that you're praying," he said. "But fasting -- how can you tell?"

Emotional Wounds Require Focus, Too (USAT)

By James Key

USA Today, September 22, 2006

A few years ago, I experienced a very painful divorce. If it weren't for my faith and support of family and friends, I would still be an emotional wreck.

The past few years, I've tried to help military couples avoid some of the pitfalls I experienced during my marriage. But military couples, unlike their civilian counterparts, face added stresses. Constant military moves are tough enough, but when you add long-term and multiple deployments to the mix, even the strongest marriages can be tested.

Last April, when my Army unit was redeployed from Baghdad, military officials thought that the number of combat brigades in Iraq might be reduced later in the year. But President Bush's decision to increase the number of U.S. troops in war-torn Baghdad seems to have dashed any hopes for large, immediate withdrawals of American forces this year.

DOJ_NMG_0067516

While our servicemen and women will continue to serve with distinction, these military uncertainties and separations can have an emotional impact on families. According to the U.S. Army, 6% of married officers and 3.5% of enlisted soldier got divorces in 2004. It is important to point out that the Army's overall divorce rate for 2000, before the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, was 2.2%.

To help ease the divorce problem, the Army has improved existing programs and introduced new ones:

·A two-day program followed by a retreat that helps couples develop better communication skills.

·A marriage education program that focuses specifically on issues that affect Reserve and National Guard couples.

·A family support group system that provides practical and emotional support for spouses of deployed soldiers.

·A program that includes briefings for soldiers on how their absence might affect their family relationships and how they can deal with changes that might have occurred during their deployment.

While daily U.S. troop deaths and political skirmishes over the direction of the Iraq war capture most of the headlines, it is incumbent upon our political leaders to remain cognizant of the emotional wounds soldiers could also be suffering in their marriages.

In the meantime, military chaplains, family-support groups and mental-health counselors will fill the gap to assist the spouses and children who have been left behind.

Spreading democracy in Iraq or any other hot spot must not come at the expense of military marriages. Helping our troops maintain healthy families is a human imperative that none of us can afford to ignore.

Capt. James Key, chaplain, is a brigade unit ministry trainer at Fort Irwin in California.

Insurance Horror Stories (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

"When Steve and Leslie Shaeffer's daughter, Selah, was diagnosed at age 4 with a potentially fatal tumor in her jaw, they figured their health insurance would cover the bulk of her treatment costs." But "shortly after Selah's medical bills hit $20,000, Blue Cross stopped covering them and eventually canceled her coverage retroactively."

So begins a recent report in The Los Angeles Times titled "Sick but Insured? Think Again," which offers a series of similar horror stories, and suggests that these stories represent a growing trend: more and more health insurers are finding ways to yank your insurance when you get sick.

This trend helps explain something that has been puzzling me: why is the health insurance industry growing rapidly, even as it covers fewer Americans?

Between 2000 and 2005, the number of Americans with private health insurance coverage fell by 1 percent. But over the same period, employment at health insurance companies rose a remarkable 32 percent. What are all those extra employees doing?

Now we know at least part of the answer: they're working harder than ever at identifying people who really need medical care, and ensuring that they don't get it. In the past, they mainly concentrated on screening out applicants likely to get sick. Now, it seems, they're also devoting a lot of effort to finding pretexts for revoking insurance after they've already granted it. They typically do this by claiming that they weren't notified about some pre-existing condition, even if the insured wasn't aware of that condition when he or she bought the policy.

Welcome to the ugly world of American health care economics.

Health care is poised to become America's largest industry. Employment in manufacturing, which once dominated the economy, has fallen 18 percent since 2000, to 14.2 million. Meanwhile, employment in the private health services industry has risen 16 percent, to 12.6 million. Another 1.3 million people are employed at government hospitals. So we're quickly approaching the point at which more Americans will be employed delivering health care than are employed producing manufactured goods.

Yet even as health care becomes the core of the American economy, our system of paying for health care remains sick, and is getting sicker.

Because everyone faces some risk of incurring huge medical costs, only the superrich can afford to be without health insurance. Yet private insurers try to refuse coverage to those most likely to need it, and deny payment whenever they can get away with it.

The point isn't that they're evil or greedy (although you do wonder how the people who cut off the Schaeffers can look themselves in the mirror). The fact is that cruelty and injustice are the inevitable result of the current rules of the game. Blue Shield of California is a nonprofit insurance provider, yet as a spokesman put it, if his organization doesn't follow the for-profit practice of selectively covering only the healthiest people, "we will end up with all the high-risk people."

DOJ_NMG_0067517

Now, before you panic about the state of your own coverage, you should know that the horror stories in The Los Angeles Times article all involve individual insurance; if your coverage comes via your employer, you're reasonably secure against sudden cancellation.

But employment-based insurance is in rapid decline, as employers balk at the cost and more and more companies adopt Wal-Mart-style minimal-benefit policies. That's why many people are turning to individual insurance — only to find out, in some cases, that they didn't get what they thought they paid for.

And here's the thing: it's all unnecessary.

Every other wealthy nation manages to provide almost all its citizens with guaranteed health insurance, while spending less on health care than we do. And there's no mystery why: we're paying the price for pointless, destructive reliance on private insurers. Medicare, which is a universal health insurance program for older Americans, spends less than 2 cents of every dollar on administrative costs, leaving 98 cents to pay for medical care. By contrast, private insurance companies spend only around 80 cents of each dollar in premiums on medical care; much of the remaining 20 cents is spent denying insurance to those who need it.

If we had a universal system — Medicare for everyone — there would be no more horror stories like those reported by The Los Angeles Times. And we'd almost certainly spend less on health care than we do now.

Cars As Global Warming's Causes (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

THE CHARITABLE SPIN ON Bill Lockyer's lawsuit against major auto manufacturers is that it's a politically inspired, headline-grabbing stunt by a state attorney general running for state treasurer. The alternative — that he might actually believe this suit has legal merit — may be more frightening.

Lockyer's suit against the Big Six auto companies alleges that because vehicle exhaust contributes to global warming, the companies should be held financially liable for everything from wildfires to a bad ski season.

The suit is the latest salvo fired in the struggle between the state and the auto industry, which has separately sued the state over its attempts to curb global warming. But California shouldn't be in the business of filing meritless suits to gain leverage in other cases.

For Lockyer, this is hardly a first. He joined several other states two years ago to file an almost identical lawsuit over the emission of greenhouse gases by power companies. That suit was rejected by the courts; the states are appealing. The judge zeroed in neatly on the problem at hand: Fighting global warming is a complex regulatory job that belongs to the legislative and executive branches. Once laws are in place, companies that break those laws should be made to pay. But holding law-abiding companies liable for the government's past failures is another matter.

It's true that Congress and the Bush administration have irresponsibly shirked their responsibility on this matter, and a separate, legitimate lawsuit before the U.S. Supreme Court brought by California and several other states is seeking to force the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency to regulate carbon dioxide emissions. The federal government's lack of action was also a major factor in the Legislature's recent passage of AB 32, which sets the stage for reducing greenhouse gases 25% by 2020. These responses to federal inaction are appropriate; frivolous, extortion-style lawsuits against car makers are not. Lockyer's new lawsuit against auto makers is akin to suing fishermen for depleting the ocean, even when they stick scrupulously to fishing quotas.

Lockyer contends that vehicle emissions — even legal emissions — are an illegal public nuisance partly responsible for a lower snowpack, wildfires and a host of other ills, current and potential. But liability here is a dicey thing to prove. Studies link warming to worsening Western drought, but that says little about any individual fire. If an arsonist sets a match to dry brush, who is at fault, the criminal or the Camry?

Global warming is, well, global. If the ocean level rises or trees die in the forest, how much of the responsibility belongs to a car sold in the U.S. and how much to the dirty Chinese coal plant or deforestation in South America? Presumably, the driver of a Hummer is more liable than the driver of an electric vehicle — as long as the battery isn't recharged using energy produced by a polluting power plant.

Lockyer is right about the threat posed by climate change and our society's responsibility to stem the trend. But in this case, he has mounted a silly legal battle that trivializes a serious problem.

Mr. Ehrlich's Paper Chase (WP)

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

PROBLEMS IN voting on Maryland's primary day presented Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) with a choice: show the leadership expected of the state's top executive or succumb to the political motives of a candidate running for reelection.

DOJ_NMG_0067518

Unfortunately, it is Mr. Ehrlich the candidate who emerged with proposals certain to confuse the public and undermine confidence in voting for the Nov. 7 general election.

Mr. Ehrlich says he doesn't trust the state's electronic voting system, and so he wants to junk it. First he suggested paper ballots; when more level-headed officials pointed out there was no way, even if desired, to make that switch by Nov. 7, he proposed having everyone cast absentee ballots. Coming from someone who vetoed a bill that would expand the use of absentee ballots, the suggestion would be laughable if it were not so infuriating.

Mr. Ehrlich's imagined connection between the problems experienced on primary day and the integrity of voting machines is simply wrong. Most of the problems on Sept. 12 resulted from human error: officials forgetting to deliver cards to operate machines, judges not showing up, workers failing to remove memory cards. The one big equipment problem had to do with the electronic poll books (used by poll workers to check voters off as they come in) and not, as Mr. Ehrlich might have you believe, with the machines voters use to cast their ballots.

In fact, not only did the touch-screen voting machines work largely without incident across the state in the recent primary, but this was not the first time they have been employed. In the 2002 election, when Mr. Ehrlich became governor, four counties -- including the state's largest, Montgomery -- used these units. In the 2004 presidential election, every locality except Baltimore City used them. So why is this an issue now?

Aides to Mr. Ehrlich explain that in recent years new information about the vulnerability of electronic voting to fraud has become available and that the governor is responding to those worries. We, too, have argued for a paper trail for machine voting, but this is hardly the time for dramatic reform. Democrats counter that Mr. Ehrlich wants to help his reelection by suppressing voter turnout in a largely Democratic state.

We have no way of knowing Mr. Ehrlich's intent, but we do believe that his words and actions are creating a sense of confusion that could discourage voting. Instead of setting up hypothetical problems and appealing to people's fears, Mr. Ehrlich should focus on identifying and fixing actual problems.

Iran Open To A Break In Nuclear Program (WP)

By Colum Lynch, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

But Ahmadinejad Demands 'Fair, Just' Conditions for Talks

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 22 -- Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Thursday that his government is prepared to consider suspending its controversial uranium-enrichment program if Western governments meet unspecified conditions.

The Iranian leader did not spell out Tehran's demands. But his remarks indicated that he is prepared to move ahead with preliminary discussions with European powers aimed at heading off a confrontation with the West.

"Our position on suspension is very clear," he told reporters at U.N. headquarters, where he is attending the United Nations' annual meeting of world leaders. "We have said that under fair conditions and just conditions, we will negotiate about it -- under fair and just conditions, I repeat."

The statement comes two days after the United States and five other key powers authorized the European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, to continue sessions with Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani. The two negotiators have been seeking to set the terms of formal talks on Iran's nuclear program that would place the United States and Iran at the same negotiating table.

The Iranian leader denied U.S. claims that he is pursuing a covert nuclear weapons program, saying that Iran's spiritual leader has issued a decree prohibiting such a development. He said Iran is simply exercising its rights, under the 1970 Non-Proliferation Treaty, to develop nuclear power to meet the country's growing energy needs.

"The bottom line is, we do not need a bomb," he said.

The United States, Britain, France, Germany, China and Russia have urged Iran to provide verifiable assurances that its nuclear program is peaceful. They pledged in June to offer Iran a broad range of commercial and political rewards in exchange for subjecting its nuclear program to greater international scrutiny.

The Security Council subsequently passed a resolution demanding that Iran suspend its enrichment of uranium and reprocessing of nuclear fuel by the end of August or face sanctions. Iran ignored the demand.

But U.S. efforts to impose sanctions stalled in the face of opposition from Russia, China and France. The Europeans, meanwhile, agreed to resume talks with Iran to break the impasse.

Ahmadinejad said the latest round of talks is "moving on the right track, unless . . . hopefully, others will not disrupt the work in small ways, perhaps. We think that it is a constructive path to take."

But he also accused the West of reneging on previous agreements to support Iran's efforts to develop a nuclear power program. He said Tehran is now seeking assurances that the United States and its European partners will provide enforceable guarantees that they will abide by any agreements they ultimately make in formal negotiations. "We need to know who the parties to the negotiations are, and what the prerogatives and the responsibilities of each are, and what guarantees there are on enforcement measures," Ahmadinejad said.

DOJ_NMG_0067519

Iran Won't Be Forced Into Talks Over Nuclear Plans, Leader Says (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

UNITED NATIONS -- Iran's president continued to dodge questions about his country's nuclear ambitions, saying Tehran is willing to negotiate over -- and maybe even suspend -- its uranium-enrichment program, but not under pressure and only under "fair conditions."

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's remarks during a rambling news conference added further uncertainty to a challenge that has stymied the U.S., Europe, Russia and China all summer: how to nudge Iran into talks over the future of its nuclear program, or punish it if it refuses to go along.

Once again Iran appears to have offered just enough encouragement to keep the threat of sanctions at bay, but not enough to make it clear when or if actual talks might begin.

For now, the decision is to give Iran more time. After resolving in July to give Iran until Aug. 31 to stop its enrichment work, the U.S., France, Britain, Russia, China and Germany have set a new deadline of sometime in early October, though without clear agreement on a fixed date.

Meanwhile, European Union officials say that EU foreign-policy chief Javier Solana is prepared to travel anywhere in the world to sit down with his Iranian counterpart, Ali Larijani, to discuss conditions for these talks. Mr. Larijani declined to come to New York this week for talks with Mr. Solana.

U.S. officials say the patience of Washington and other key capitals will wear out within a few weeks. It is unclear what will happen once the patience runs out.

British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett underscored that lack of clear consequence when she told reporters Wednesday that "if things just drag on as they have been, then as I say, there are concerns and constraints about how long that can continue."

Signs are emerging, however, that some countries in Europe may be willing to allow Iran to keep at least some enrichment activity, a move that the U.S. has opposed in the past.

After meeting yesterday with Mr. Ahmadinejad, Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi said in a statement that "Ahmadinejad insisted on Iran's right to go ahead in research in the nuclear field, and I insisted on the need for a complete halt in the military aspect of the research," indicating that the EU is prepared to allow Iran to continue on strictly scientific research.

In remarks to reporters, Mr. Ahmadinejad also warned that any pressure could derail recent talks between Europe and Iran over commencing more-formal negotiations. "Hopefully others will not disrupt the work -- in small ways perhaps," he said, apparently alluding to U.S. threats to move ahead on U.N. sanctions.

The Iranian leader said his nation was ready for talks "under fair conditions and just conditions." Above all, he said he wanted there to be "guarantees of enforcement" for whatever might be agreed on.

He insisted again that his country had no aims to make a nuclear weapon and urged the U.S. to give up its nuclear arsenal. He also laughed at all the talk of uranium enrichment. "It would seem that this enrichment word has become the lingua franca of our day," he said, arguing that the U.S. wants to stop this work largely to impede Iran's scientific development.

The U.S. and its partners suspect that Iran is pursuing the technology involved in enriching uranium in order to make a nuclear bomb. They want Iran to set that work aside and agree to supply any future nuclear plants with fuel acquired from outside sources such as Russia.

Iranian President In Spotlight (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel

McClatchy Newspapers, September 22, 2006

UNITED NATIONS - Grinning and giving brisk little salutes, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad denied Thursday that Iran wants a nuclear bomb and said it might discuss suspending uranium enrichment if the conditions are fair.

During an hour-long press conference here, Ahmadinejad declined to repeat his threat that Israel should be "wiped off the map." But he railed against Zionists and suggested that several thousand mainly Jewish protesters who demonstrated against his presence in New York City might have been paid to attend. He also called for a referendum on the future of the land that constitutes Israel and the Palestinian areas.

DOJ_NMG_0067520

Smiling from the start, Ahmadinejad quoted the Quran and apologized to New York's residents for the inconvenience his and other leaders' motorcades caused during the annual U.N. General Assembly.

At one point, he called America "a great nation."

With his face on the cover of Time magazine and his every word and movement followed by hordes of journalists, this has clearly been Ahmadinejad's week.

His combination of breezy confidence and sometimes slippery answers underscored the challenge President Bush faces in trying to halt Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program.

Ahmadinejad was just one of the world leaders who denounced Bush's foreign policies from the rostrum in the General Assembly hall this week.

But Iran poses a special challenge. It has vast oil and gas deposits, possesses an advanced nuclear research program, supports terrorist groups such as Hezbollah and can threaten U.S. troops across its borders in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The United States, European nations, Russia and China this week set another deadline - the first week of October - for Iran to respond on whether it will stop enriching uranium, which, if made pure enough, could fuel an atomic bomb.

A previous deadline, Aug. 31, came and went. But with Iran dangling the possibility of talks, Bush had little choice but to submit to other nations' desire to give diplomacy every last chance, U.S. officials said privately.

"We're in extra innings," Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, the State Department's point man on Iran, said this week.

But Ahmadinejad didn't seem to be in any hurry to deliver the final pitch.

Asked repeatedly whether Iran would suspend uranium enrichment, he complained: "I don't see why so many people are so sensitive about this `enrichment' word.

"We have said under fair conditions and just conditions, we will negotiate about it," he said.

At another point, he said flatly: "The bottom line is, we do not need a bomb, unlike what others think."

A senior U.S. official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said there appeared to be growing divisions within the Iranian government about whether to accept a European-U.S. offer. In turn for the enrichment freeze, Iran would get talks on a package of economic and security incentives. The United States has promised to join the talks for the first time.

But if Ahmadinejad's performance here was any indication, even if Tehran agrees to join negotiations, the talks could be frustrating, torturous and maybe unfruitful.

The Iranian leader spent 15 minutes answering the first question at the press conference.

Asked what guarantees he could provide that Iran didn't seek Israel's destruction or a nuclear bomb, the Iranian leader boomeranged the question back at the United States. He embarked on a lengthy review of how Washington has sought to strangle Iran's Islamic revolution since its 1979 birth.

"Today, the pretext happens to be the nuclear issue," he said.

As for proof that Iran isn't interested in nuclear weapons, he said: "I am at a loss to understand what else we need to do to provide guarantees."

Ahmadinejad, 49, was little known outside of Iran when he was elected president last year. He quickly shocked much of the world by questioning whether the Holocaust took place and calling for Israel's destruction.

But while some early commentators portrayed him as an amateur who might not stay in power long, he's proved so far to be a shrewd politician.

Several thousand supporters of Israel rallied Wednesday to protest his presence and call for the release of two Israeli reserve soldiers kidnapped in mid-July by Iranian-backed Hezbollah.

Ahmadinejad pondered out loud whether "some of these people were paid."

He insisted he wasn't "anti-Jew." As for the question of a future country for the Palestinians, he said, "It's wrong to think this is a problem with me, with Ahmadinejad as a humble person. No, it is a global problem."

He was asked three times whether Iran would halt arms shipments to Hezbollah, which the U.N. Security Council called for to cement the cease-fire in Lebanon. He never gave a clear answer.

Iran Leader Uses U.N. To Improve Image (AP)

By Scheherezade Faramarzi

AP, September 22, 2006

Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad seems to be enjoying the spotlight at this year's U.N. General Assembly, easing his way into the international arena and trying to improve his image amid the controversy over his nuclear program and remarks about Israel and the Holocaust.

When an Israeli reporter challenged him into answering a question at a news conference Thursday, Ahmadinejad at first stalled, whispered in Farsi to an adviser to skip the reporter, but then reluctantly gave his response.

DOJ_NMG_0067521

He showed no such courtesy to an Israeli reporter during a news briefing here last year, his first appearance at the annual ministerial meetings after he was elected in June 2005.

On Thursday, he explained that when he called for the destruction of Israel and dismissed the Holocaust as a myth, his issue was not with the Jewish people but with Zionists, "who are not Jews."

"We love everyone in the world — Jews, Christians, Muslims, non-Muslims, non-Jews, non-Christians," he said, adding "we are against ugly acts."

"Everyone is respected. But I repeat, we are against aggression, occupation, killings. ... We declare this in a loud voice," he said.

But Yaniv Halily, a reporter with Israel's Yediot Ahronot was not impressed.

"He's trying to portray an image of a nice guy after all the things he said about Israel. Now he knows everyone thinks he's a bad guy," said Halily.

"He may sound nicer on the surface, but on the inside he's the same," said Kamran Dadkhah, an economics professor at Northeastern University in Boston.

Ahmadinejad was vague when asked if Iran would stop arming Hezbollah and comply with a U.N. Security Council resolution to disarm the Lebanese guerrilla group, which fought a 34-day war with Israel this summer. He said Iran gives only spiritual and cultural support to the Shiite Muslim group.

"We support ... peace and permanent stability in Lebanon, and we will fall short of no measure in promoting this goal. Whether it's in the cultural or spiritual support that we can render or whether it is the role that we can play in the international arena, we will do our best. And this is the fundamental principle of our foreign policy, and it does not preclude Lebanon," he said.

At the news conference, Ahmadinejad also expressed love and affection for the American people, just as President Bush reached out to the Iranian people in his General Assembly speech on Tuesday. Ahmadinejad said he wished he had more time here to spend with them in person.

"The people of the United States are highly respected by us," he said. "Many people in the United States believe in God and believe in justice." He thanked the New York City police and security forces for protecting him during his stay here and apologized to New Yorkers for traffic disruptions from the arrival of world leaders to attend the U.N. General Assembly session.

He reserved his harsh words for the U.S. government, which is pushing to impose diplomatic and economic sanctions against Iran if it does not suspend uranium enrichment.

"It's not the nuclear bomb that the American government is worried about, for there are countries in our region that are armed with a nuclear bomb and are incidentally supported by the U.S. government. Now, how is this?" said Ahmadinejad.

Using a Persian expression to demonstrate U.S. double-standard, the Iranian leader said:

"In Iran, we say there are two skies over a roof, or two kinds of wind running over the same ceiling. It doesn't seem plausible.

"We say if fuel cycle for peaceful purposes is something good, then it should be good for everyone. If it's a bad thing, it's bad for everyone," he said.

Ahmadinejad said the United States' objection to Iran's nuclear program — which he claims is for peacefully purposes only — was essentially aimed at aborting his country's progress. And he said if the world stops treating his country as a subordinate, then things might be different.

"If they recognize that we too, as a nation, have rights ... the concerns too will be removed," he said.

He said his country was ready to negotiate a suspension of uranium enrichment.

"We have said that under fair conditions and just conditions, we will negotiate about it," he said.

But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Iran must suspend its uranium enrichment and reprocessing before any full-fledged negotiations.

"Iran has been told by the international community ... that they should suspend and if they suspend the negotiations can begin. It's as simple as that. I don't think we need any further conditionality," she told reporters after a Security Council meeting on Mideast peace.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov was guardedly optimistic.

"The chance is there, and the chance is not too slim. But for this chance to be realized in practical terms we need efforts on both sides, and we need good will," he told The Associated Press in an interview.

He also said he hoped a meeting between Iran's top nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani and European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana would take place soon. But he rejected the idea of imposing a new deadline after the Iranians missed the Aug. 31 U.N.-imposed deadline to stop enriching uranium, which can be used in producing nuclear energy or weapons.

"I think that artificial timeframes do not work," he said. "The quality of the agreement is much more important, and especially in this particular case there is no objective reason for any ultra-rush if you wish."

DOJ_NMG_0067522

Although the Iranian president seemed to tone down his rhetoric about Israel, he did not retract his earlier remarks. He said he was even puzzled by the controversy.

"It seems to me that I face this question wherever I go," he said. "And I have always been ready to answer."

Iran's Leader Skirts Issue Of Disbanding Hezbollah (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 21 — Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the Iranian president, refused to say Thursday whether he would comply with a Security Council demand for the disarmament and disbanding of Hezbollah, the Tehran-backed guerrilla group that fought a 34-day war with Israel.

"I'd like to say that Lebanon's affairs are its own affairs, and we don't want to interfere," he said, when asked about the resolution that ended the combat in Lebanon last month.

He was also evasive about whether Iran would comply with the resolution's call for an arms embargo to keep Hezbollah from rearming.

He said that the United Nations Charter gave people the right to defend themselves and that "we give spiritual support to all those who want to uphold their rights."

Mr. Ahmadinejad spoke at a wide-ranging news conference in a packed United Nations conference hall in which he also reiterated Iran's denial that it was pursuing a nuclear weapon and chastised Western countries for trying to curb Iran's right to pursue nuclear energy. "Iran considers the nuclear issue a political one," he said. "They're not concerned about the bomb, they want to stop the development of our country."

Asked about his threat to wipe Israel off the map, he argued that his criticism of Israel had been misinterpreted as a rejection of Jews. "These Zionists are not Jews," he said. "This is the biggest deception we have faced. They are a power group, a power party. We oppose any group that seeks raw power."

He said Iran "loves everyone around the world, Jews, Christians, Muslims." But, returning to Israel, he said, "We announce and declare loudly that you will be condemned by the rest of the world if you displace people from their homes."

His attitude was less belligerent than it had been in his speech to the General Assembly on Tuesday evening. He was dressed in what has become his signature light gray jacket over open-necked pink shirt. He smiled frequently, alluding to universal desires for love, justice, peace and happiness, and even apologizing to New Yorkers whom he had seen out his car window having to wait for his motorcade to pass before they could cross the street.

As in his General Assembly address, he depicted Iran as a growing country impatient with the current United Nations order that, he said, gave undeserved authority to the nations that won World War II and limited respect to the countries like Iran that had arisen since.

"When you look at the Security Council, we see that some members of the Council are in fact party to many conflicts around the world," he said. Even though these countries created the problems, he said, under current arrangements "they nevertheless sit in judgment of world affairs."

Bill Clinton: U.S. Should Talk To Iran (AP)

AP, September 22, 2006

Former President Clinton said Thursday the U.S. should try talking to Iran about its nuclear weapons ambitions without imposing a lot of conditions.

"If you think you might have trouble with somebody, and God forbid if you think it could lead to a military confrontation, then there needs to be the maximum amount of contact beforehand," Clinton said in an interview with NBC's "Today" show.

The Bush administration has refused to hold direct talks with Iran until it agrees to suspend enrichment of uranium, which the U.S. fears will be used to build nuclear weapons.

"The United States should not be afraid to talk to anyone. They should not be reluctant and shouldn't have too many conditions," said Clinton, who said his own offer to meet with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's predecessor had been rebuffed.

The U.S. and allies have offered Iran a package of incentives in return for its agreement to stop uranium enrichment. But Iran has given no definitive response and missed an Aug. 31 U.N. Security Council deadline to halt uranium enrichment, which Iran says is for generating electricity.

Iran and the United States have had no direct diplomatic relations since 1979. That's when Iranian students stormed the U.S. Embassy in Tehran and held its occupants hostage for 444 days to protest Washington's refusal to hand over the toppled shah, Mohammad Reza Pahlavi.

DOJ_NMG_0067523

President Bush and Ahmadinejad used separate appearances at the U.N. General Assembly in New York this week to spar over Tehran's nuclear program, but they avoided any personal contact.

In May, Ahmadinejad sent a letter seeking a debate with Bush, but it was laced with old grievances against America and included a long list of Iranian demands.

Clinton said although he would like to see more negotiation with Iran, Bush's reluctance to personally meet with Ahmadinejad was understandable.

"I think we should have some contacts with them," Clinton said. "I'm not sure the president is the place to start."

In an interview broadcast Thursday on National Public Radio, Clinton said, " ... I still believe that, based on all my Iranian friends in America, what they say is that the vast majority of Iranian citizens want to have good relationships with the United States and the West and do not want to be at odds."

"But they all believe basically that if any other country has a right to nuclear power, they do too, so we have to work through that and I, I hope we can do it in a peaceful way," he said.

US Cautions Europe On Iran Investment (CSM)

By Mark Rice-oxley

The Christian Science Monitor, September 22, 2006

American attempts to persuade Europe to think again about financial involvement in Iran may be starting to bear fruit, according to European banking officials. Whether such "back-door sanctions" will work is far less apparent, experts say.

Troubled by a lack of speedy progress in the UN toward imposing economic sanctions on Iran over its suspect nuclear program, the US has stepped up efforts this month to persuade allies to shun Iran's financial system, claiming that Iran may tap banks to illicitly finance terror operations or the purchase of materials for nuclear weapons.

Already, the US has blacklisted the Iranian Bank Saderat. And last week, Stuart Levey, undersecretary of the Treasury for terrorism and financial intelligence, hopped through Britain, France, Switzerland, Italy, and Germany to urge Europeans to be wary in Iran, a message underscored by Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson at the recent G-7 meeting in Singapore.

"We wanted to provide our counterparts and financial leaders with information about how Iran uses and abuses the financial system in support of terrorism and proliferation, and wanted to hear of the risk they were hearing," says Molly Millerwise, a spokeswoman for Mr. Levey, adding that he found a receptive audience in Europe.

Europe has long taken a softer line toward Iran than the US, and has essayed a soft-power approach to its nuclear program, persisting with negotiations. Its companies, particularly German and French, rack up billions of euros' worth of exports each year, with a considerable presence in the oil, automotive, retail, and telecommunication sectors.

And while the EU is spearheading a delicate mission in southern Lebanon that might aggravate relations with Hizbullah and its Iranian backers, experts say the experience is unlikely to change its geopolitical strategy in the region.

"Europe will do what is in its own interest," says Hossein Askari, an Iran expert at George Washington University. "In the long run, Europe is going to have to import gas, and apart from Russia, the most competitive gas will come from Iran," Professor Askari adds.

Yet some European bankers are growing wary of the risk of doing business in Iran. Two of Europe's largest banks have recently decided to ramp down decisively their involvement in Iran. UBS canceled business with individuals, companies, and banks in the country earlier this year; Credit Suisse is conducting a "controlled withdrawal" by refusing new business.

Both banks are firm that they took their decisions independently, though UBS, fined by Congress two years ago for its dealings with Iran and other blacklisted countries, says it pays close attention to the US. "Of course banks listen to what the US says, because for most banks the US is an important partner," says Serge Steiner, a spokesman. "Most European banks wouldn't react like this - the US says something and they implement it. But that doesn't mean we don't listen. "

Although bankers say they are governed by business calculations, not US political pressure, the two may not be unconnected. Growing qualms about Iran's nuclear program and financial support for Hizbullah mean there are greater risks for firms doing business there. As Georg Soentgerath of Credit Suisse says: "It was our decision, made in the light of the increase in political, financial, and reputational risk."

Levey says this is what the US is trying to get at. Recently, he noted that even financial institutions not formally bound to follow US law closely observe US financial measures directed at individuals, key regime members, front companies, financial institutions, and corrupt charities.

"Keeping a few customers that we have identified as terrorists or proliferators is not worth the risk of facing public scrutiny or a regulatory action that may impact on their ability to do business with the United States or the responsible international financial community," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0067524

But however many Europeans the US manages to enlist to its "coalition of the shilling," it may not be enough. Iranian leaders have begun moving assets away from European banks to alternative repositories in the Gulf, experts note.

Ali Ansari, with London's Chatham House think tank, argues that the only way to make financial sanctions bite "is if you have much greater international coordination, including with other countries in the Middle East and Asia."

"The Americans talk about economic and financial sanctions a lot because they don't have much at stake" in Iran, he adds. "EU countries are more anxious not to lose that business. And the Iranians are saying, 'You are more scared than we are because of our oil. We guarantee you will lose more than we will lose.' "

Experts say international sanctions have never really had the desired impact. "They have almost never been very successful in getting governments to change behavior," says Geoffrey Underhill, of Amsterdam University. South Africa was an exception, he says, as it was a partial democracy with a business community sensitive to outside pressure. But in Iran, "you are talking about an authoritarian regime that is very good at diverting the effects of sanctions so that the regime doesn't pay."

"If the Europeans are not convinced, any sanctions are going to be less effective," he adds.

"If you can get the whole world against Iran, then you have a chance," says Professor Askari. But persuading even allies like Germany and Japan, with formidable investments in Iran, will be tough. Then, there is the wider Muslim world, through which Iran is thought to be funneling its petrobillions. "I don't think you'll get a Muslim coalition. Everyone knows this, so they'll be reluctant to join sanctions they know are going to be ineffective."

U.N. Charades (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Hugo Chávez and Mahmoud Ahmadinejad put on quite a show at the United Nations this week, and it's tempting to dismiss it all as mere bombast. Except that their assertiveness can't be separated from the more important U.N. story this week, which is its continuing failure to come to grips with Iran's open defiance of the Security Council's demand that it suspend uranium enrichment.

At issue is whether the U.N. can have any role in enforcing collective security -- and the mystery is why the very nations that say the U.N. must do so are doing the most to undermine it. Consider the behavior of Russia, France and China -- all veto-wielding members of the Security Council -- in squaring up to the Iranian threat.

In July, the Council adopted Resolution 1696, which noted "with serious concern that . . . Iran has not taken the steps required of it by the [International Atomic Energy Agency] Board of Governors." The Council went on to express "its intention . . . to adopt appropriate measures under Article 41 of Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations to persuade Iran to comply with this resolution. . . ." Article 41 refers to all legally binding measures short of war -- sanctions, that is -- to bring states into compliance with U.N. resolutions. The Resolution said Iran must cease enriching uranium by August 31, a deadline Tehran has openly flouted.

So, serious consequences? Not quite. Chinese Middle East envoy Sun Bigan has rejected sanctions on Iran as "detrimental not only to the region but also to ourselves" -- the latter a reference to China's oil imports from Iran, up 56% from last year. Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov -- who is selling Iran a $700 million air-defense system -- also says sanctions won't work. That sentiment was echoed earlier this week by France's Jacques Chirac, whom the Bush Administration has claimed is a stalwart ally in stopping Iran. "I am never favorable to sanctions," said the French President, adding that, if they are unavoidable, they should be "moderate and adapted."

In other words, it has taken less than a month for the deadline set by Resolution 1696 to prove to be absolutely meaningless, something Mr. Ahmadinejad predicted in April. Why then would the Permanent Five risk their credibility as an institution by setting a deadline in the first place? Why threaten sanctions if they have no intention of imposing them?

The answer may be that U.N. diplomacy has come to serve as a deterrent not against Iran but against any American effort to do anything about Iran's rush to acquire the bomb. Iran's nuclear programs are accelerating under this diplomatic cover, as its inauguration of a heavy-water nuclear plant late last month shows. Heavy-water reactors are the kind that throw off more weapons-usable fuel. The Iranian newspaper Siyasat-e Ruz underlined that event as evidence of the "worthlessness of this American resolution."

Meanwhile, the "cowboy" American President looks increasingly like the one who's been lassoed by the U.N., not vice versa. In 2003, the U.S. agreed to downplay clear evidence that Iran was cheating on its nuclear nonproliferation treaty commitments in order to give European diplomacy a chance. The U.S. continued to do so even after it became clear that the Iranians continued to cheat well into 2004.

Later that year, the Administration went along with another European negotiation, which collapsed after six months. Earlier this year, President Bush agreed in principle to negotiate directly with Tehran, provided it suspend enrichment. He has also repeatedly underlined the point, most recently in this week's speech to the General Assembly, that the U.S. does not oppose Iran's bid to develop civilian nuclear power sources.

DOJ_NMG_0067525

Throughout all this, the Administration has consistently deferred, both in timing and tactics, to Europe, Russia, the IAEA, and now the Security Council. Its single insistence is that the international community demonstrate good faith in its ostensible commitment to prevent Iran from developing a nuclear weapon. But that good faith has been conspicuously absent, raising the question about who is really serious about giving the U.N. a chance to show its "relevance."

The conclusion is hard to resist that the U.N. effort is really about persuading America that it can "live with" an Iranian bomb, just as it lives with a Pakistani bomb, because the costs of economic sanctions or military strikes are supposedly prohibitive. But a glimpse of what the world will look like if Iran succeeds was provided on Tuesday by Gamal Mubarak, the son of Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak. Cairo's heir apparent floated a proposal for Egypt to develop its own nuclear programs, clearly a signal that the largest Sunni Arab country will go nuclear itself to prevent Shiite Iran from dominating the region. And where Egypt goes, Saudi Arabia and Turkey cannot be far behind. Is the international system really prepared to live with five, maybe six, nuclear powers in the Middle East?

The media portrayed this week's U.N. speeches as a soap opera showdown between Mr. Bush and his adversaries. But in the matter of Iran's nuclear ambitions, it is not only the Middle East that is at risk, but the U.N., which is why Messrs. Chávez and Ahmadinejad felt so free to mock its evident failures.

Anti-Americanism Is Providing A Glue (LAT)

By Paul Richter, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

The rhetoric from the leaders of Iran, Sudan and Venezuela at the U.N. shared a theme of outrage at the U.S., despite their differences.

WASHINGTON — The outpouring of anti-American rhetoric at the United Nations this week is demonstrating how anger at the United States is uniting the developing world in a way not seen since the 1980s, U.S. officials and analysts say.

Leaders such as Venezuela's Hugo Chavez, Sudan's Omar Hassan Ahmed Bashir and Iran's Mahmoud Ahmadinejad are divided by background and political philosophies, but they spoke as one at the General Assembly regarding perceived U.S. bullying and misdeeds.

Chavez denounced the "imperialist empire," Ahmadinejad railed against U.S. officials' pretensions to be the "rulers of the world," and Bashir complained about powerful intruders trampling his country's sovereignty.

"There's a new sense of the oppressed versus the oppressor," said a senior U.S. official, who asked to remain unnamed. "What they have in common is their hatred of the U.S., and it's created this solidarity across Third World lines."

That solidarity hasn't been seen in the developing world since leftist liberation movements faded after the collapse of the Soviet Union, he said.

The fallout from the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq and other Bush administration policies may be particularly visible in the new bonds between many Muslim nations and populist regimes of South America, an alliance that some call the "axis of the south."

Chavez has become a hero among Muslims, flattered with huge posters in Beirut and given lavish coverage in the news media from Morocco to Pakistan.

Anti-Americanism was the overarching theme last week in Havana at a 118-nation summit of the Non-Aligned Movement, whose headliners included Ahmadinejad, Chavez and Bolivian President Evo Morales. The leaders embodied a burgeoning spirit of defiance toward "the worldwide dictatorship by the United States," declared Cuban Vice President Carlos Lage Davila.

There is little doubt of the deepening unpopularity of the United States, even among longtime allies. Though the U.S. government has doubled its spending on public diplomacy, a poll this year by the Pew Charitable Trusts showed wide dissatisfaction with a central pillar of U.S. foreign policy, the "war against terrorism."

When people in largely Muslim nations were asked whether they approved of "U.S.-led efforts to fight terrorism," 82% in Egypt said no, as did 74% in Jordan, 77% in Turkey and 50% in Pakistan. The results in some European countries were similar. In Spain, 76% of those surveyed said they did not approve; in France, it was 57%.

U.S. officials say they don't believe the growing Third World solidarity constitutes a strategic threat.

Though Chavez visits Iran and Syria, and talks about defense ties, oil sales and economic deals with these countries, North Korea and others, administration officials take the view that the Venezuelan's declarations are mostly posturing to create an impression at home that he has stature as a world leader.

The administration acknowledges that such contacts reinforce anti-Americanism and add to the already sobering public diplomacy challenge. "It creates this impression that everybody is rising up against the Americans, and that's a problem," said the senior U.S. official.

DOJ_NMG_0067526

Some outsiders say these new bonds are more than an image problem.

Chavez, for example, has won substantial support from Latin American governments for his bid to win a nonpermanent seat on the U.N. Security Council, even as the Bush administration has campaigned to have the seat go to the friendlier Guatemala. If Venezuela wins, the United States, in addition to facing a barrage of rhetoric, will have a harder time collecting the votes it needs on the council.

This Third World solidarity also has made it easier for Bashir to block a U.N. peacekeeping deployment in the Darfur region of his country, said Lee Feinstein of the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington.

Bashir "has succeeded in interfering with the U.N. deployment by depicting this as an old-fashioned 'us versus the United States,' " said Feinstein, a senior State Department official during the Clinton administration. "The American ability to credibly rally the international community on behalf of the vulnerable in Darfur has been eroded by this unpopularity."

Feinstein said that in drawing together these parts of the world, U.S. unpopularity "has created real diplomatic problems for the country, many of them second-order, but also some big ones."

The State Department has sought to not overreact to the efforts of Chavez and others to forge such alliances, but domestic pressure has been building from conservatives for U.S. diplomats to do more about the situation.

Prominent Republican lawmakers regularly ask State Department officials what more diplomacy can do about Chavez's efforts to build power alliances. And it is clear that this week's outpouring of anger in New York has spread alarm in some quarters and will bring more pressure for the administration to react.

"The Non-Aligned Movement threw down the gauntlet to U.S. global power this week," said Nile Gardiner, a foreign policy analyst at the conservative Heritage Foundation in Washington. "This is a huge public diplomacy challenge, but also a strategic threat." He said Chavez's words were "the strongest attack from any foreign leader on U.S. soil in decades."

Still, analysts and U.S. officials point out that though the shared anti-Americanism of these countries is striking, so too are their differences.

Although advocates of this "axis of the south" describe it as similar to the leftist liberation movements of 20 years ago and earlier, Arab leaders and Africans do not generally share their leftist leanings. And Chavez has yet to win the leadership role in Latin America he craves.

Feinstein said that even though the withering denunciations by Chavez and Ahmadinejad drew applause this week, overall, members of the United Nations were much more united behind American-style views of democracy and economics than they had ever been.

"Opposition has hardened into anti-Americanism and shifted government policy in many places around the world, but the U.N.'s membership is much more in sync with traditional U.S. foreign policy goals and ideals than at any time since the U.N.'s founding," he said. "The tragedy is, the Bush administration hasn't been able to take advantage of that fact."

Chavez To Double Energy Subsidies To Needy In U.S. (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

NEW YORK — A day after he called President Bush "the devil" from the podium at the United Nations, Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez stood at the altar of a Harlem church and presented himself as an angel, offering 100 million gallons of subsidized heating oil to needy Americans.

"It makes us feel good to give," he said to a crowd of mostly Harlem residents and Latin American immigrants waving Venezuelan flags and chanting his name.

The move more than doubles the 40 million gallons of heating oil Chavez donated to eight northeastern states last year after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita devastated refineries and caused the price of oil to soar. This winter, the program should reach about 1.2 million people in nine additional states, he said.

Chavez, speaking at the Mount Olivet Baptist Church, acknowledged that it might seem odd for a developing country to send charity to one of the world's wealthiest nations.

"Some Venezuelans criticize me…. Some say I should be in the barrios of Caracas," he said. "Apparently I am giving away all over the world what belongs to Venezuela."

But the public relations value of tweaking his nemesis, President Bush? Priceless.

"We are afraid we won't be able to heat our building this winter, and someone told me about this guy," said Arthur Rena McDowell, a florist. "Somebody has got to make it better. It should start with our president, but it is starting with the president of Venezuela."

Harlem is the latest place where Venezuelan oil has created warm feelings toward the outspoken leftist leader. Venezuela already exports 1.5 million barrels a day to the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0067527

It is able to use its oil wealth to bolster ties and influence in other countries in the region, especially to gain their favor. That could prove useful in the current U.N. contest between Venezuela and Guatemala to represent Latin America in the Security Council for the next two years. Washington, suspecting that Chavez would use the U.N. bully pulpit to rally opposition to U.S. interests, has been lobbying for Guatemala.

Chavez boasted of "walking around the world" to build ties and barter oil, describing what he got in exchange: pregnant cows from Bolivia, medical equipment from Argentina and 20,000 doctors from Cuba.

In Harlem, he received not only a warm welcome but the symbolic echo of Cuban President Fidel Castro's visits to the same neighborhood in 1960 and 1965, signaling that he is taking on Castro's mantle of anti-Americanism as the aging Cuban leader's health falters.

Wearing his signature red shirt, Chavez spoke for more than an hour at the altar next to a screen flashing the logo of Citgo, a Venezuelan-owned oil company based in Houston. Citgo is partnering with Citizens Energy Corp., a program run by former Rep. Joseph P. Kennedy II, which sells and distributes discounted home heating oil to low-income families.

Kennedy did not attend the event Thursday.

Chavez, encouraged by a rousing response after he made another reference to Bush as the devil, played to the crowd, calling the president "an alcoholic and a sick man," and imitating what he called Bush's cowboy swagger.

Chavez repeated threats to suspend oil exports to the United States, its biggest customer, if the U.S. government tried to oust him from power.

"One day, the people of the United States will choose a president with whom we can talk," he said. "You don't know how much I would like to have as a friend the president of the United States."

Chávez Courts U.S. Poor, Offers To Expand Heating Oil Program (MH)

By Pablo Bachelet

The Miami Herald, September 22, 2006

NEW YORK - Chávez offers more

low-cost oil to poor

Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez convened New York's underprivileged in Harlem on Thursday to tout a discounted oil program, a day after he triggered an uproar with his speech attacking President Bush at the United Nations.

The leftist populist leader visited Harlem to announce an expansion of his discounted heating oil program for U.S. poor and elderly. More than 450,000 households will be offered 100 million gallons of heating oil at a 40 percent discount, Chávez told a cheering crowd. Last year, 40 million gallons were offered to states, mostly in the Northeast.

Chávez said the program would benefit residents in 17 states, including Massachusetts, New York, Virginia and Indiana. Native Americans throughout the country will also benefit, Chávez said.

Inside the neo-roman styled Mount Olivet Baptist Church, a large screen flashed the logo of CITGO Petroleum, which is controlled by the Venezuelan government. Activists in red T-shirts with the words "Democracy in Revolution" emblazoned in front handed out Venezuelan flags and Chávez presidential campaign posters promising ``seven more years, for now."

Outside, a small group of protesters denounced Chávez as the "new pet" of Cuban leader Fidel Castro.

This was Chávez's second visit to a low-income area of New York. Last year, Chávez visited the Bronx, in what was an echo of Castro's visit there decades before. In 1960, Castro spoke at the U.N. and stayed in Harlem.

But if Chavez's visit last year passed largely unnoticed, Mount Olivet was teeming with U.S. media on Thursday, prepped by Chávez's now infamous U.N. reference to Bush as ``the devil."

In his speech, Chávez said he received death threats but said his destiny was ``in God's hands."

"Some say I am a tyrant," he said, ``but what we are doing in Venezuela is transferring power to the people."

Chávez had few allies after his U.N. speech. House Democratic leader Rep. Nancy Pelosi, one of Bush's sharpest critics, called the Venezuelan leader ``an everyday thug."

The Democrat who represents Harlem, Rep. Charles Rangel, told journalists, ``You don't come into my country, you don't come into my congressional district, and you don't condemn my president."

Chávez did not moderate his tone, although the first hour of his 90-minute address meandered from praise for genetically modified Argentine cows to the "genocide" wrought by European descendants on indigenous groups and the contributions of Cuban doctors to Venezuela's health system.

Then he lashed out at Bush again, calling him an alcoholic. "It pains me to say it," he said, ``but it is the truth."

Bush says he stopped drinking in 1986.

There was plenty of praise for Chávez at the Harlem event. Actor Danny Glover introduced Chávez as ``a very visionary man."

DOJ_NMG_0067528

Ian Erlich, a youthful co-chairman of the Alaska Inter-Tribal Council, which struck a cheap oil deal with CITGO, says his tribe -- located in the Aleutian Ranges above the Arctic Circle -- pays up to $7 for a gallon of oil.

"Where are the oil executives from Alaska? Where are the politicians?" he asked.

Some people, such as Barbara Heard, did not come for politics. She will retire from her postal job in February and will depend more on her two-unit building she rents out for income. She was wondering if the CITGO program will reduce the $5,000 heating bill she paid last winter.

The Bush administration has called the CITGO program a positive gesture by a U.S. corporation, although State Department spokesman Eric Watnik pointed out that the U.S. government handed out "hundreds of millions of dollars to a much larger group of Americans" through federal programs.

CITGO CEO Félix Rodríguez told the Harlem gathering that the company was not acting out of political motivation. It was a sincere gesture of help and "a small grain of sand" that he hoped would motivate other oil companies to do the same.

Many who attended the event came driven by their opposition to Bush. Eliseo Colón, a cook, said Chávez was trying to help the poor in a way ``Bush isn't trying to do."

Arvetta Taylor, who came with a large group from the Harlem Addicts Rehabilitation Center, said she wished the United States had a president like Chávez. "I love sharing," she said of the heating oil programs.

Among the protesters outside stood Anabel Vidal, a Venezuelan consultant on vacation in New York.

"He has forgotten the poor of my country," she said, adding that Chávez thrives on stirring up controversies.

She shrugged off taunts by Chávez supporters, who called her a "thief" and ``elitist."

"Everything I have, I have earned by working for it," she said. Chávez faces a unified opposition in the December elections, but polls show him well ahead.

Why The Firebrands Get Heard (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

My but the lesser nations are getting uppity.

I do love that word, uppity. Once upon a time, it was used to describe a black person who didn't know his place. The word came back to me this week as I heard all that impertinent oratory at the United Nations, most of it aimed at the United States in general and George W. Bush in particular.

Did Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez actually call Bush the devil? And then ostentatiously cross himself? And then complain that the podium, where Bush had spoken a day earlier, still smelled of sulfur? That's exactly what he did.

And as Chavez continued his monologue, calling Bush a "world dictator" who "looks at your color, and he says, 'Oh, there's an extremist,' " his audience of world leaders laughed and applauded. Clearly, Chavez had ignored the flashing yellow lights and crashed straight through the guardrails of diplomatic propriety. Clearly, this was no way to speak about the president of the United States. But Chavez, who hosts his own weekly talk show back home in Caracas, had his audience in the palm of his hand.

Afterward, U.N. Ambassador John Bolton did what the diplomatic playbook said he had to do and refused to dignify Chavez's tirade with a response. But while his words were measured, it was hard to look at the anger in his eyes and not think of Yosemite Sam wishing he could blow that varmint to smithereens.

Chavez was so arch in manner and so extreme in his personal attacks on Bush that it's tempting to write him off as crazy, although I tend to think he's crazy like a fox. Can anyone name the last president of Venezuela, or remember when a speech by any president of Venezuela made such news? Still, Chavez may have gone so far that he hurt his chances of securing a temporary seat on the U.N. Security Council, where he would be harder to ignore.

But the uppity leader who spoke Tuesday evening, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran, is another story. Like Chavez (his new best friend), Ahmadinejad controls a sizable fraction of the world's oil supply. Unlike Chavez, he has advanced nuclear technology and almost surely is working to build nuclear weapons. And also unlike Chavez -- perhaps because he is on the verge of having a very big stick -- he speaks softly, at least in the tone of his voice.

Ahmadinejad's was actually the more uppity speech, because what he seeks is nothing less than to remake the world.

"The prevailing order of contemporary global interaction is such that certain powers equate themselves with the international community and consider their decisions superseding that of over 180 countries," he said. "They consider themselves the masters and rulers of the entire world and other nations as only second-class in the world order. . . . Is it appropriate to expect this generation to submit to the decisions and arrangements established over half a century ago?"

That's pretty clear. Ahmadinejad, a Holocaust denier who presides over one of the world's most repressive and misogynistic regimes, is determined to rearrange the furniture. Since the Soviet bloc collapsed, the West -- led by the United States -- has pretty much had its way. Ahmadinejad is determined to create an alternative focus of power and influence, and he has the faith of the fanatical true believer in his ability to succeed.

DOJ_NMG_0067529

Really, this should be no contest. Given a choice between a manifestly imperfect but open and dynamic society such as ours and a retrograde theocracy such as Iran, where free thought is stifled and repressive laws have the imprimatur of unimpeachable holy writ, who would freely choose the latter?

Yet Ahmadinejad is being listened to, and not only because of Iran's oil. When I travel outside the country, I'm struck by the decline in America's moral standing in the world. The Iraq war is the main reason, but not the only one. For all its talk about public diplomacy and spreading the U.S. gospel throughout the world, the Bush administration does an appallingly lousy job of it. Even our government's genuine good deeds -- vastly increased funding to fight AIDS in Africa, for example, which has saved countless lives -- go largely unrecognized.

Our policy of not even talking to governments we don't like has proved counterproductive -- pushing Syria closer to Iran, for example, and needlessly prolonging the Israel-Hezbollah war, to no one's benefit except perhaps Ahmadinejad's. Our arrogance has turned us into the neighborhood bully and made our adversaries look like more sympathetic figures than they really are.

We have to do better. Hugo Chavez shouldn't be received as the new Dave Chappelle.

Rangel Rebukes Chavez On Bush (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

NEW YORK -- Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez took his Bush-bashing to Harlem yesterday and earned a stiff rebuke from the New York district's congressman, Rep. Charles B. Rangel, who is no fan of President Bush.

"You don't come into my country, you don't come into my congressional district and criticize my president," Mr. Rangel, a Democrat, told stunned reporters on Capitol Hill.

Mr. Rangel, who is one of Mr. Bush's harshest critics, said no foreign official should assume that "Americans do not feel offended when you offend our chief of state."

At Harlem's Mount Olivet Baptist Church yesterday, Mr. Chavez referred to the insults that he delivered at the United Nations' General Assembly a day earlier.

"They told me that I should be careful after I called [Mr. Bush] the devil -- and I think he is the devil -- because he might kill me" Mr. Chavez told an overflow crowd.

He also called Mr. Bush "an alcoholic and a very sick man."

In his remarks to the annual U.N. General Assembly debate Wednesday, the Venezuelan president first called Mr. Bush the devil and said "it still smells of sulfur" at the podium, where Mr. Bush had spoken a day earlier.

Mr. Chavez repeated his devil remarks for reporters later Wednesday and also called Mr. Bush "the genocide president."

He spoke at the Harlem church yesterday for nearly two hours, in which he mocked Mr. Bush by mimicking a cowboy's gun-slinging stance.

Mr. Chavez's performance in New York this week also offended several prominent Democrats on Capitol Hill, including House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California.

"Hugo Chavez fancies himself a modern-day Simon Bolivar, but all he is an everyday thug," Mrs. Pelosi said.

She added that Mr. Chavez had "demeaned himself, and he demeaned Venezuela."

Rep. Chaka Fattah, Pennsylvania Democrat, said, "His personal attacks and ridicule directed at the president of the United States are unacceptable."

Sen. Tom Harkin, Iowa Democrat, defended Mr. Chavez in an interview with Radio Iowa.

Though the remarks were "incendiary," Mr. Harkin said, "I can understand the frustration, and the anger of certain people around the world because of George Bush's policies."

Bush administration officials have refused to be drawn into a name-calling exchange with Mr. Chavez.

"I think it's not becoming for a head of state," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, when asked about Mr. Chavez's speech at the General Assembly.

Mr. Chavez went to Harlem yesterday to announce a doubling of the amount of discounted heating oil that his country will distribute to poor Americans this winter.

He said that Citgo, the U.S. arm of Venezuela's state-owned oil monopoly, will distribute 100 million gallons to people in 18 states.

The program began last year to aid Hurricane Katrina victims.

The Venezuelan president repeated his threats to halt oil sales to the United States if Washington attacked Venezuela or Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0067530

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, asked about Mr. Chavez's support at a press conference yesterday, spoke in only general terms.

"We do not seek to represent a threat to any country," Mr. Ahmadinejad told reporters.

The Iranian president recently visited Venezuela and joined Mr. Chavez at the Non-Aligned Movement summit last week in Havana.

At his press conference yesterday, Mr. Ahmadinejad repeated that Iran's nuclear program is for peaceful purposes.

"I don't see why so many people are so sensitive about this 'enrichment' word," he said. "We have said under fair conditions and just conditions, we will negotiate about it."

Iran is in the early stages of making enriched uranium, which can be used for atomic bombs or nuclear power plants.

Shocked! By Chavez (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Hugo Chávez isn't used to criticism from Congressional Democrats, some of whom have actually welcomed his blatant attempts to buy U.S. political influence with cut-price Venezuelan oil. So it must have shocked the South American strongman when two prominent Democrats took public offense at his anti-American tirade before the U.N. General Assembly this week.

"Hugo Chávez fancies himself a modern day Simon Bolivar but he is an everyday thug," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, referring to the 19th-century fighter against Spanish colonial rule. Meanwhile, New York Representative Charlie Rangel blasted Mr. Chávez for coming into "my Congressional district" and condemning "my President" -- words we've rarely heard any Democrat use in reference to George W. Bush.

The Venezuelan dictator provoked this burst of bipartisanship by repeatedly referring to President Bush as "the devil." More broadly, his speech amounted to a justification of terrorism against the U.S., and in fact he is one of the world's most outspoken defenders of such terrorist state sponsors as Iran. However, none of this is a revelation to anyone who's watched Mr. Chávez in action in recent years.

Ms. Pelosi's and Mr. Rangel's remarks were politically shrewd if nothing else. Even smarter would be for the two of them to follow up by having a word with their Massachusetts delegation. Only last November, Congressmen William Delahunt and Ed Markey spoke of their "debt" to Venezuela after arranging to buy 12 million gallons of Venezuelan home heating oil at a 40% discount for the Bay State. Mr. Delahunt has called the dictator his "excellent friend," and yesterday the Boston Globe quoted him as blaming the dictator's outburst on "what low esteem the United States is held, not just in the Islamic world, but all over."

After Mr. Chávez's U.N. performance, you can bet Democratic leaders don't want another sweetheart oil deal this November.

No Hugo Award For Security Council (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

VENEZUELAN PRESIDENT Hugo Chavez took his stand-up act to New York on Wednesday and just killed 'em, waking up a sleepy General Assembly crowd with zinging one-liners likening President Bush to the devil. It was the crowning stop in a comedy world tour that has been busting up audiences from Iran to China, fitting for a man running against a comedian in Venezuela's upcoming presidential election.

Chavez's anti-American tirades may be a hit in much of the developing world, but few sane people will be laughing if he achieves his appallingly realistic goal of winning a rotating seat on the U.N. Security Council.

Venezuela is seeking a two-year slot on the 15-member council. Such seats are awarded on a regional basis; the other Latin American candidate, Guatemala, is heavily backed by the United States. Chavez over the last several months has made beating Guatemala his major foreign policy goal, traveling the world (mostly to drum up support from staunch U.S. foes such as Iran and Syria) and signing oil deals to buy votes. It seems to have paid off; Venezuela is believed to have the majority of the General Assembly on its side, though it will need a two-thirds vote to prevail.

Having Venezuela on the Security Council wouldn't recast the U.N. in Chavez's image, nor would it seriously impede the democratic world. Rotating members don't have the veto power of permanent Security Council fixtures Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States. But it would provide an international forum for Chavez's diatribes, one that he plans to take advantage of personally, and he could delay important initiatives like curbing Iran's nuclear ambitions or deploying U.N. troops in Darfur.

Chavez has been generous in spreading his oil wealth to his neighbors, and tweaking Uncle Sam is a cheap way to win political support in Latin America. But Wednesday's performance should make more moderate heads of state, such as Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva, wonder if they really want to be represented in a critical international body by the clown prince of Caracas. And a nuclear-armed Iran or North Korea is not in the interest of anybody.

DOJ_NMG_0067531

If Latin America doesn't have a consensus choice for the U.N. seat by Oct. 16, it will come down to a secret ballot by the General Assembly. In case of deadlock, which seems probable, a third country may well emerge as the winner. Uruguay and the Dominican Republic are considered the two most likely candidates, and either would be better than Venezuela. Chavez might seem like a laugh riot today, but after two years of gridlock and shenanigans on the Security Council, the joke would wear pretty thin.

In Chávez's Crosshairs (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Fidel Castro is not far from death. That's one conclusion to draw from his failure to get out of bed for the summit of the non-aligned nations held in Havana last week.

The other telling sign that the long-winded tyrant is not coming back, despite Cuban claims that he is on the mend, was Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez's performance at the United Nations on Wednesday. Clearly the revolutionary baton has been passed to the kook from Caracas, Castro's wealthiest and keenest protégé.

After this week, Americans are likely to be focused on the nexus between Venezuela and Iran, whose president rivaled Mr. Chávez as the scariest speaker at the General Assembly. Yet there is an equally pressing threat from Venezuela right in the U.S. backyard. The battleground is Bolivia, which Mr. Chávez badly wants to control so he can seize that country's natural-gas reserves and become the sole energy supplier in the Southern Cone. In doing so, he hopes to seriously damage the Brazilian economy and crush Brazil's geopolitical ambitions as the leader in South America. In its place he wants to plant the flag of Venezuelan hegemony. If he gets away with it, Argentine and Chilean sovereignty would also be diminished and continental stability lost.

To avoid this grim outcome and preserve Bolivian democracy, the U.S. could start by studying Mr. Chávez's path to power, which included help, both passive and active, from Washington.

Theatrics aside, the Venezuelan's verbal assault this week against the U.S. was hardly a news flash. Mr. Chávez has been spouting this stuff for eight years while Venezuelan democrats have been begging the world to take note of it. Democratic Congressman William Delahunt, former Republican Congressman Jack Kemp and the Washington law firm of Patton Boggs all worked to give Mr. Chávez an image makeover in the U.S. so that Venezuelan cries for help might be ignored even as the aspiring dictator was consolidating power.

It seems to have worked too. Let's not forget what happened when Venezuelans tried to remove Mr. Chávez in a 2004 recall referendum. The European Union refused to act as an observer, citing lack of transparency. But that didn't stop Jimmy Carter or the Organization of American States, both of which went along to "observe" a vote cloaked in state secrets. When OAS mission director Fernando Jaramillo cried foul at the many government pre-referendum pranks and Mr. Chávez complained about him, OAS chief César Gaviria yanked Mr. Jaramillo from the country just ahead of the vote.

Exit polls showed that the Venezuelan president was badly beaten in the contest but the chavista-stacked electoral council declared him the winner. Mr. Chávez refused to allow independent auditing of voting machine software or a count of paper ballots against machine tallies. Mr. Carter together with U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for the Western Hemisphere Roger Noriega and the OAS, rushed to endorse the vote despite the lack of transparency and many testimonies to state-sponsored intimidation and dirty tricks. In the heat of the battle, the National Endowment for Democracy cruelly threatened the country's most important independent electoral watchdog that if it didn't accept Mr. Chávez's victory, NED would pull its support.

Mr. Chávez now boasts that he was democratically elected and foments hatred against his neighbors, including the U.S. Wednesday's Castro-esque message claimed that the "non-aligned" movement intent on going nuclear has only pure motives, while the U.S. president is the devil.

Still Hugo knows that rhetorical bullying from the U.N. pulpit can take him only so far. Both Mexico and Peru rejected Chávez proxies this year in presidential elections. While he might still get a foothold in Nicaragua if Daniel Ortega wins there in November, what he really wants to do is knock Brazil down a few notches. And there is no better way to do that than to hit its energy supply. This explains the blitz the chavistas are now putting on in Bolivia to make that country a (hydro) carbon copy of Venezuela.

Mr. Morales rose to executive power by first using violence to bring down two constitutional presidents and then forcing a new election, which he won. He dreams of an indigenous, collectivist Bolivian economy under the thumb of an authoritarian government. Never mind that most native Bolivians are highly entrepreneurial.

His power is boosted by his support for Bolivian coca growers against U.S.-mandated eradication efforts. He is also being coached by Mr. Chávez. He has nationalized investments in the natural-gas industry and he ruled that agricultural land be redistributed to peasants. He has purged the military of its highest ranking professionals and he has arrested or threatened to arrest some 150 of his political opponents. Bolivia is now blanketed with Cuban doctors and teachers. Cuban security detail protect the president while Venezuelan energy advisers are said to be setting policy in the natural-gas sector.

DOJ_NMG_0067532

Yet there is serious resistance in the eastern states and some admission from La Paz that the country is too poor to cut itself off from the world. Last week Mr. Morales had to fire his energy minister after Brazil threatened to exit the country when the minister announced the seizure of two more Brazilian owned refineries.

Such acquiescence toward Brazil has to be frustrating Mr. Chávez and any chance to defeat those in his way now lies with the rewriting of the Bolivian constitution. But there is a problem there too. Mr. Morales's party has just over 50% of the constitutional assembly seats. That means that in order to steamroll the opposition the government must force a change in the approval requirement to a simple majority from a two-thirds vote, which is now the law.

Seven of the nine state governors have objected to this but Evo's side is again threatening violence. Bolivia could use some help from the international community. One thing the U.S. could do to weaken Evo is end insistence on coca eradication, which while failing to reduce drug use has alienated peasants. What is clear is that doing nothing while Mr. Chávez seizes power on the continent is not an option.

Five Palestinians Killed In Gaza; Rockets Fired Into Israel (WP)

By Scott Wilson, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

JERUSALEM, Sept. 21 -- Israeli forces killed at least five Palestinians on Thursday in the Gaza Strip, while gunmen there fired rockets into Israel during the day.

The spate of violence ended a few weeks of relative calm between Palestinian gunmen and Israeli forces that began after Israeli tanks and troops withdrew from a volatile area east of Gaza City early this month. Israel's military has maintained intensive operations in Gaza since June 25, when Palestinian gunmen captured an Israeli soldier in a cross-border raid.

A conflict between rival Palestinian factions has sharpened at the same time, and rocket fire into Israel appears to be on the rise again. The Israeli military said four rockets landed in southern Israel over the course of the day, hitting a college classroom and rupturing a water pipe in the city of Sderot. No injuries were reported.

The Palestinians were killed in two separate incidents at far ends of the strip.

Early Thursday, Israeli army and border police units surrounded a house in Rafah, the largest city in southern Gaza, during what military officials described as an arrest operation.

The Israeli military said Palestinian gunmen inside the house attacked the Israeli forces with rifle fire and grenades. The soldiers directed small-arms and tank fire at the house, military officials said. Later, soldiers also fired on a man outside the house who military officials said was armed.

Palestinian health officials reported that a 35-year-old mother was killed by a tank round in the Rafah fighting and that a man was killed by gunfire.

Later in the day, three Palestinians who witnesses said were tending goats near the Jabalya refugee camp in northern Gaza were killed by Israeli fire. Israeli military officials confirmed that artillery fire had been directed at three men, whom Palestinian witnesses described as teenagers. Israeli military officials said the men were handling launchers used to fire rockets earlier in the day at Sderot.

Palestinian gunmen flee quickly after firing the crude, erratic rockets, often hiding in the labyrinths of Gaza's crowded residential neighborhoods. Many Palestinians have been killed by Israeli fire after wandering into those staging areas soon after a rocket is launched.

An Israeli army spokeswoman said Thursday, "If the launcher was left on the ground, then these people were victims of those who left it there."

With N. Korea Talks Stalled, U.S. Tries New Approach (WP)

By Glenn Kessler, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 21 -- With North Korea refusing to return to the six-nation disarmament talks, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Thursday convened a meeting of a new group of nations that will focus on Northeast Asian security concerns. Diplomats have dubbed the group "Five Plus Five" to refer to the 10 countries involved, but North Korea declined an invitation and China and Russia did not send representatives.

"It turned out to be the Six Minus One Plus Two Plus Three Minus Two," quipped Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, the administration's point man on North Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0067533

Few issues have proven as vexing as the impasse over North Korea's nuclear ambitions. In some ways, the gathering is the diplomatic equivalent of throwing spaghetti against the wall -- an effort to try something just to see what sticks.

"We had the three-party talks, the four-party and the six-party, and now the 10-party," said Kongdan Oh, an expert on the North Korean nuclear program at the Institute for Defense Analyses in Alexandria. "As the number of parties has gone up, the speed of the failure has gone faster."

A year ago this week, in what was hailed as a breakthrough, Hill and diplomats from North Korea, China, Russia, South Korea and Japan agreed to guidelines for negotiating the dismantling of North Korea's weapons programs in exchange for economic and political incentives. But the negotiations never got started in earnest.

Four days before the agreement was reached, the Treasury Department had designated Macao's Banco Delta Asia as acting as a front for North Korean counterfeiting operations. The Treasury action had wide repercussions, leading many banks around the world to curtail dealings with North Korea. North Korea declared that the action amounted to "financial sanctions," and refused to return to the six-party talks.

North Korea further rattled nerves with a ballistic missile test in July.

Now, with little prospect of restarting the six-party talks, the United States has decided to try to broaden the circle, bringing in nations such as New Zealand, Canada and Indonesia. The first meeting of the larger group was held on the sidelines of a July gathering of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN), after the missile test. Thursday's meeting, at New York's Waldorf-Astoria hotel, was the second, and Hill said a third is planned for Hanoi in November, when heads of state gather for an annual Asia-Pacific summit.

"In Northeast Asia, we need a stronger dialogue on security issues," Hill said. "It's not to change the six-party talks. It's not to have an immediate sort of actionable outcome or something. It's simply to have information exchange."

But there is a broader subtext to the gathering. The Bush administration wants China to do more to bring North Korea back to the table, and Hill pointedly noted that several ministers present said China should do more.

Moreover, as a result of the U.N. Security Council resolution passed after the North Korea missile test, the United States has prepared a new package of sanctions. But the administration wants a number of other countries to sanction North Korea first, before it announces its own sanctions, so it will not look like the heavy.

At Thursday's meeting, representatives of Japan and Australia described the sanctions their governments recently imposed on Pyongyang, and Rice urged other countries to follow suit.

Finally, some of Rice's aides, such as counselor Philip D. Zelikow, have long been interested in reshaping the security framework of Northeast Asia. The region has no organization similar to NATO or ASEAN, in part because relations between China, Japan and South Korea are so tense. So when crises occur, diplomatic initiatives must be cobbled together from scratch. Some experts believe the new effort is an attempt to provide the building blocks for such an entity.

"I'm not going to make predictions at this point whether this is the protoplasm of a new OSCE," Hill said, referring to the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, a regional group that some see as a model for Northeast Asia. "I just at this point can't speculate that far ahead."

Russia, China Stay Away From N. Korea Session (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

NEW YORK -- China and Russia, key nations in six-party talks on North Korea's nuclear weapons, skipped an expanded session yesterday, in which countries from the Philippines to Canada sought to address Pyongyang's refusal to negotiate.

The session, hosted by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, was an attempt to involve Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Indonesia and the Philippines in an expanded forum on regional security.

"Several participants commented that they thought China should be doing more" to bring North Korea back to the six-party talks, said Christopher R. Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs.

Officials from other countries at the meeting, who asked not to be identified, confirmed that many of those present expressed disappointment with Beijing.

They also said that the Chinese had made a conscious decision not to attend, questioning Mr. Hill's suggestion that the reason had to do with scheduling.

Mr. Hill played down the absence of both China and Russia, saying that their foreign ministers had met with Miss Rice several times this week and "we kind of know where they are on these issues."

The six-party talks consist of the United States, Japan, China, North and South Korea and Russia. A year ago, all parties signed a joint statement that they are committed to the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula.

DOJ_NMG_0067534

Since then, Pyongyang has boycotted the process, blaming Washington for imposing financial sanctions aimed at stopping suspected money-laundering and North Korean counterfeiting of U.S. $100 bills.

Briefing reporters at yesterday's meeting on the sidelines of the U.N. General Assembly session in New York, Mr. Hill said that all participants made it clear that the meeting was not a substitute for the six-party talks.

"We are not in any way trying to change that," Mr. Hill said. "It's simply an informal forum whose purpose is to discuss the security situation in Northeast Asia and to support the six-party process."

Still, he said, the expanded format is designed to make it clear that Pyongyang's refusal to negotiate does not preclude other international venues from discussing the nuclear issue.

"The effect of it will be to show North Korea that there is a broader concern in the broader region about its nuclear programs," Mr Hill said.

"It also, I think, demonstrates clearly to North Korea the fact that, while they may boycott the six-party process, they are not going to veto multilateral discussions in Northeast Asia."

Mr. Hill, who returned from a trip to the region last week, said that several ministers yesterday "expressed concern" about a possible North Korean nuclear test and "emphasized the need to dissuade the North Koreans by all means possible."

North Korea claims it has produced atomic bombs, but it has never conducted a nuclear test.

Earlier this week, Japan and Australia imposed financial sanctions on North Korea because of its ballistic missile program. Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Qin Gang criticized the move Tuesday.

"The Chinese government has always advocated that this issue should be resolved by dialogue, and we are opposed to sanctions," he said. "All parties concerned should focus on how to resume the talks as soon as possible and avoid any actions that may further complicate the situation."

North Korea Avoids Meeting Of 8 Nations (AP)

AP, September 22, 2006

North Korea stayed away from a gathering of diplomats from the United States and seven other nations Thursday that focused on the specter of a nuclear North Korea.

"They don't like to talk to people," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said following the gathering on the sidelines of the annual United Nations opening session.

China and Russia also skipped the meeting, although they are members of the international coalition that reached a breakthrough disarmament bargain with Pyongyang a year ago. That agreement has never taken effect and North Korea is boycotting further talks in protest of what it calls unfair U.S. financial sanctions.

Hill called the North Korean complaint a pretext for ignoring its responsibilities to give up nuclear weapons ambitions under the 2005 agreement. He said the original coalition of the United States, China, Japan, Russia and South Korea remains ready to resume negotiations with the North.

Thursday's meeting involved foreign ministers from Australia, Indonesia, New Zealand, Canada and the Philippines, in addition to the United States, Japan and South Korea.

Hill said several participants criticized China for failing to do enough to bring North Korea back to talks, but he said the United States was not among them. China is the North's closest ally and has served as an intermediary.

North Korea seeks to normalize its relations with the U.S. but also says its nuclear program is a deterrent to fend off a possible U.S. invasion.

U.S. Sets Conditions For N. Korea Visit (AP)

AP, September 22, 2006

The main U.S. nuclear envoy could visit Pyongyang if North Korea ends its boycott of international nuclear talks, the U.S. ambassador to South Korea said in an interview Thursday.

"I think that possibility has never been excluded," Ambassador Alexander Vershbow told Yonhap news agency in remarks that were confirmed by the U.S. Embassy.

The North has in the past invited the U.S. envoy, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, who expressed willingness to make such a trip last year after the communist nation agreed at the arms talks to abandon its nuclear program in exchange for security guarantees and aid.

The North immediately threw cold water on the deal and demanded a nuclear reactor for power generation — and the trip was put off.

"Unfortunately it was impossible because North Koreans were unwilling to even suspend their production of plutonium in the Yongbyon reactor," Vershbow said, referring to the North's main nuclear facility. "So the opportunity was missed."

DOJ_NMG_0067535

Vershbow also said that Hill "is prepared to enter into bilateral talks in a constructive spirit if North Korea is committed to return to the six-party talks," according to the embassy.

North Korea has stayed away from the six-nation nuclear talks — which include China, Japan, Russia, South Korea and the U.S. — since last year in anger over U.S. financial restrictions against the North for its alleged complicity in counterfeiting and money laundering.

Japan and Australia earlier this week enacted similar restrictions on a group of North Korean firms allegedly involved in suspect transactions.

Vershbow said Thursday that the United States didn't have any immediate plans for more sanctions of its own on the North.

"We are still considering what additional steps may be necessary. On our own part, we are proceeding in a deliberate manner. We are not rushing to any decisions," he said. "There is still time for North Korea to pull back from the brink. I hope they do."

North Korea has insisted it won't return to the talks unless the U.S. drops its sanctions. Pyongyang claims to have nuclear weapons and further stoked regional tension in July by test-firing a series of missiles over international objections, drawing condemnation from the U.N. Security Council.

Despite Plea, Indonesia Executes 3 Christians (NYT)

By Raymond Bonner

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

JAKARTA, Friday, Sept. 22 — In the early morning hours on Friday, an Indonesian firing squad executed three Christian men who had been convicted in connection with the violence that has wracked the province of Central Sulawesi. The government ignored a last-minute appeal from the European Union to declare a moratorium on the death penalty.

No evidence directly linked any of the condemned to killings, but two were found to be ringleaders of a Christian militia that killed 200 Muslims in 2000, and the third to have instructed Christians in the use of arrows, according to trial observers.

The European Union appeal did not specifically mention the case of the Christians. Its plea was aimed at halting all executions, including those of three Bali bombers who are on death row for their role in the attacks on nightclubs in 2002, which killed 202 people, European diplomats said.

“The European Union, along with many other like-minded countries, opposes the use of the death penalty in all circumstances,” the Finnish ambassador, Markko Niinioga, representing the presidency of the European Union, said in a letter that was delivered Wednesday to the Indonesian president, Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono. “The E.U. finds this punishment cruel and inhuman.”

The letter was read to The New York Times by a European diplomat, who did so on the condition of anonymity because the letter had not been released publicly. An aide to Mr. Yudhoyono confirmed that it had been received. Mr. Yudhoyono is considered a leading contender for the Nobel Peace Prize because of his work in bringing about an end to the separatist war in the western province of Aceh, and European diplomats said that this could hurt his chances, given the strong anti-death penalty sentiments among European governments.

About 80 men are on Indonesia’s death row, all but a handful convicted of murder or drug trafficking, according to a human rights group here, the Committee for the Disappeared and Victims of Violence.

In its letter to Mr. Yudhoyono, the European Union wrote, “Besides respecting the value of human life,” a moratorium would “in our opinion strengthen the international position and prestige of Indonesia.”

The three men executed Friday morning in the town of Palu were Fabianus Tibo, 60, Marinus Riwu, 48, and Dominggus da Silva, 42. They were convicted in connection with killings in the Central Sulawesi town of Poso in May 2000, including more than 70 men, women and children who had sought refuge in a school.

At their trial in 2001, no witnesses testified seeing any of them kill anyone, Dave McRae, a specialist in the Poso conflict at the Australian National University, wrote in The Jakarta Post on Wednesday. Even if they were leaders, “Their death sentence is excessive,” Mr. McRae wrote. More than 150 men have been tried in connection with the Poso violence, but the longest sentence, except for these three men, has been 15 years, Mr. McRae wrote.

The executions of the three men had become entangled with the case of the Bali bombers. In this overwhelmingly Muslim country, the government considers that the risk of political protests would be too great if it executed the Bali bombers and not the Christians.

“We’re going to execute the Bali bombers,” said a senior government official, who was willing to discuss the government’s plans and its response to the European Union appeal only on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak for attribution. The Bali bombers were scheduled to have been executed last month, but the executions were postponed.

DOJ_NMG_0067536

They will not happen for at least a month, until after Ramadan, which begins Sunday. Many Indonesian political analysts and foreign diplomats doubt that the men will be executed.

Three Christians Executed In Fatal Attack On Muslims (WT/AP)

By Irwan Firdaus

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

PALU, Indonesia -- Three Christian militants were executed by firing squad early today for leading attacks on Muslims six years ago that left 70 persons dead, a police official and local news media said.

The men were taken before the firing squad at 12:15 a.m., said a senior police officer, who asked not to be identified because he wasn't authorized to speak to the media. Metro TV and SCTV had similar reports, but did not identify their sources.

The case against them has heightened tensions in the world's most populous Muslim nation and raised questions about the role religion played in punishing those behind the violence that swept Sulawesi province from 1998 to 2002, killing more than 1,000 people of both religions.

Only a small number of Muslims were convicted in the violence, all for 15 years in prison or less.

In carrying out the death sentence, Indonesia ignored an appeal last month by Pope Benedict XVI to spare the men. A Vatican spokesman, the Rev. Federico Lombardi, told the Italian news agency ANSA that news of the execution "was very sad and painful."

Fabianus Tibo, 60, Marinus Riwu, 48, and Dominggus da Silva, 42, were found guilty of leading a Christian militia that launched a series of attacks in May 2000 -- including a machete and gun assault on an Islamic school where dozens of men were seeking shelter.

Security forces braced for sectarian violence, with thousands of police blocking roads leading to the prison where the inmates had been held.

"I understand they have been killed," said Roy Rening, their attorney, adding that he was still awaiting confirmation from the prosecutor's office.

Jeremy Sewall, a policy analyst for the Silver Spring, Md.-based International Christian Concern (ICC), told The Washington Times that the three men were denied the opportunity to attend Mass before they died.

"The Indonesian government is sacrificing true justice to provide judicial 'balance' by executing these three Christians to appease Muslims who are upset that three Islamic terrorists are also set to be executed for their part in the Bali bombings," he said. "This is not justice. This is deception, coverup, and appeasement."

The ICC, which investigated the violence in Indonesia, said that entire Christian villages were attacked with government munitions and burned down using Indonesian government fuel trucks. Christian adults and children were beheaded.

Human rights workers say the men's 2001 trial was a sham, and that while it was possible the men took part in some of the violence, they almost certainly were not the masterminds.

The executed men told relatives and a priest during final prayers at their jail yesterday that they were innocent but ready to die.

The condemned men had said they hoped investigations into the clashes would continue, noting that they had provided authorities with the names of 16 Christians who they said instigated some of the worst bloodshed.

The government said its investigation is complete.

"My father told me he was not afraid to die, he is not afraid to face his destiny," said Tibo's son, Robert. "But he wants the real killers to be caught."

Thousands of Christians rallied peacefully in at least seven towns yesterday. Muslim protesters also have taken to the streets in recent weeks, demanding the men be killed following two last-minute stays, the most recent just more than a month ago.

Fearing violence timed to the executions, Indonesia deployed more than 2,000 police and soldiers in Palu, some guarding churches that dot the city.

Security was also stepped up on the island of Flores, where the three men were born, said Lt. Col. Endang Syafrudin, the island's police chief.

Was Thai Coup Pre-Emptive? (WSJ)

By James Hookway

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Impending Military Reshuffle Could Have Strengthened Thaksin

DOJ_NMG_0067537

When Thailand's military high command decided to overthrow Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra in a coup, they were up against a tight deadline: a fast-approaching military shuffle that could have promoted Mr. Thaksin's supporters into key posts and strengthened the billionaire businessman's grip on power.

After months of sparring between Mr. Thaksin and political opponents had pushed Thailand into a leadership crisis, the premier was preparing a strike to regain the upper hand, people familiar with the situation say. Mr. Thaksin planned to replace Thailand's senior commanders -- including the coup's leader, Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin, the army's commander in chief -- with new generals friendly to his government before a parliamentary election then scheduled for October. Mr. Thaksin's Thai Rak Thai party, which came to power in 2001, was expected to win that vote handily.

The pending shuffle at least partially drove the army's decision to stage this week's coup, people familiar with the events say. The coup, while peaceful, and popular among many Thais alienated by Mr. Thaksin's strong-willed rule during his five years in power, has prompted criticism abroad as a setback to Thailand's efforts to nurture and sustain a democratic political system.

The coup, which the military says has been endorsed by Thailand's influential King Bhumibol Adulyadej, has left 59-year-old Gen. Sondhi and other military leaders with the task of restoring a credible government in one of Southeast Asia's linchpin economies and a key ally of the U.S.

Paving the Way to Power

Thailand's new military rulers have promised to put a civilian government in place within two weeks and hold new elections by October 2007. They have also cracked down on political activities and curtailed some civil liberties. A small group of demonstrators was detained Wednesday for protesting the army's declaration of martial law, and the military has detained four cabinet members of Mr. Thaksin's government.

"During the transition period, every country does this in order for the situation to return to normalcy quickly," said a spokesman for the ruling military council. He didn't say why the men -- who include Deputy Prime Minister Chitchai Wannasathit -- were arrested.

The military government has banned gatherings of more than five people, and prohibited political meetings and the establishment of new political parties. It also said it is taking over the functions of Thailand's legislative branch.

The military also has introduced restrictions on Thailand's once free-wheeling media.

At the same time, the coupmakers appear to be preparing to move more directly against Mr. Thaksin, who was in the U.S. at the time of the coup and is now in London. In a step widely seen as a bid to build a criminal case against the ousted premier and help justify the coup, the military council has empowered Thailand's top graft investigator, Auditor-General Jaruvan Maintaka, to investigate allegations of corruption in Mr. Thaksin's government. It isn't clear whether Mr. Thaksin, who said Thursday he was "resting" in the United Kingdom, intends to return to Thailand.

The military hasn't said whom it will recruit to head an interim civilian government. People familiar with the negotiations say front-runners include central-bank governor Pridiyathorn Devakula, a respected banker who stood up to Mr. Thaksin on financial-policy issues and clamped down on lending at state-owned Krung Thai Bank that in 2004 was beginning to undermine the bank's financial stability.

Another possible candidate is Palakorn Suwanarath, a former deputy permanent secretary at Thailand's interior ministry who now serves as one of a panel of advisers to King Bhumibol.

Unless a credible stop-gap leader is picked soon and political and civil restrictions are eased, the generally warm popular welcome accorded the coup in Bangkok could begin to fade into criticism, political analysts suggest.

"Judging from past experience, people here will put up with military government, but only if its agenda and a timetable for return to democratic rule is clear," says Thitinan Pongsudhirak, a political-science professor at Bangkok's Chulalongkorn University.

Meanwhile, Thailand's financial markets reflected the hopeful view that the military will fulfill its commitment to gradually restore democracy. After falling more than 4% in the first hour of trading since Tuesday's coup, the Bangkok stock exchange's key index recovered to close 1.4% lower on Thursday, down 9.99 points at 692.57.

The conflict between Mr. Thaksin and his conservative military opponents had been building for months, if not years, as the brash telecommunications tycoon-turned-politician tightened his hold on government institutions after coming to power in 2001 and winning re-election in 2005.

A former police officer who trained with the army cadets as a young man, Mr. Thaksin promoted many of his former classmates above more senior officers after he became prime minister. At one point he elevated his cousin, Gen. Chaiyasit Shinawatra, to the job of army commander -- the post that Gen. Sondhi now holds.

Conflicts between powerful military and civilian leaders over promotions are a recurring feature of politics in Thailand, an economically vibrant country of 65 million people.

DOJ_NMG_0067538

Mr. Thaksin's efforts to place his supporters and classmates in positions of power led to back-biting and resentment in the armed forces. The tensions crystallized into two distinct factions: Mr. Thaksin's supporters -- including business backers and rural politicians -- and an older, more conservative group of military officers and bureaucrats who align themselves closely with Thailand's royal family and King Bhumibol's chief adviser, Prem Tinsulanonda, a retired general and former prime minister.

Mr. Thaksin also appointed his supporters to key positions in Thailand's judiciary and election commission as well as the military. Despite thinly veiled warnings from King Bhumibol that he was becoming too arrogant, Mr. Thaksin continued to expand his authority, filing libel suits against his critics and buying a television network that had been critical of his policies.

The prime minister also was skilled at finding loopholes in laws and regulations and using them to his advantage, swelling the ranks of his party and, despite enjoying a parliamentary majority, frequently opting to rule by executive decree instead, making himself the center of power in the country.

Many military officers grew increasingly uneasy about Mr. Thaksin's expanding influence, particularly when he began promoting his own supporters within the armed forces.

A Rift Deepens

Signs of a rift between Mr. Thaksin and his supporters and the palace and the military became apparent late last year when, in an exercise of a seldom-used royal power, Gen. Sondhi was appointed to the top post after Gen. Prem and another royal adviser vetoed Mr. Thaksin's choice for the job.

The tensions grew acute in January, after Mr. Thaksin's family sold its controlling stake in Shin Corp. to a group of investors led by Singapore's state investment company Temasek Holdings Pte. Ltd. for $1.9 billion, in a deal that was constructed in such a way that the seller paid no taxes on the proceeds. Although the transaction illustrated Mr. Thaksin's business acumen, it also revealed his occasional inability to read the political pulse in Bangkok, even as he remained popular in rural Thailand. Within weeks, tens of thousands of people were regularly demonstrating for his resignation.

To ease the pressure, Mr. Thaksin called a snap election, which the opposition parties boycotted and the Thai courts later voided.

In June, Mr. Thaksin complained in a speech that a "charismatic figure" was trying to force him from office -- a reference many Thais considered to be directed at either King Bhumibol or his close adviser, Gen. Prem.

With many Thais now taking to the streets to demand that Mr. Thaksin be charged for insulting the monarchy under Thailand's strict lèse-majesté laws, Gen. Sondhi and his supporters started to limit Mr. Thaksin's authority within the military. His first step to rein in Mr. Thaksin was an apparent warning shot, military analysts say. Gen. Sondhi in July transferred 129 midlevel commanders with strong ties to Mr. Thaksin's supporters to remote outposts or desk jobs. That cut the chain of command between generals sympathetic to Mr. Thaksin and the rank and file, military analysts say.

People familiar with the tensions in the military say Mr. Thaksin was preparing to retaliate by ensuring that a close ally, such as Gen. Pornchai Kranlert, succeed Gen. Sondhi as the army chief in an annual military shuffle scheduled for October. He also intended to appoint other key supporters to be responsible for security in and around Bangkok.

Mr. Thaksin and his advisers couldn't immediately be reached for comment.

Military analysts say that if Gen. Sondhi didn't act when he did, he might have found himself promoted to the mostly ceremonial job of supreme commander of the armed forces.

Had the plan proceeded, Mr. Thaksin would have been well placed to reclaim full power after a parliamentary election initially scheduled for Oct. 15 without the threat of a hostile military high command to stop him.

On Sept. 17, Gen. Sondhi and several other top generals decided to proceed with a coup to remove Mr. Thaksin from office, Gen. Sondhi said Wednesday at his first news conference as Thailand's interim leader.

Once the decision to remove Mr. Thaksin was made, Gen. Sondhi's earlier maneuver to transfer the 129 middle-ranking officers loyal to Mr. Thaksin was pivotal. Military analysts say that without commanders in the field, there was no way the prime minister could have predicted he would soon be deposed.

Thai Junta Imposes Curbs On News Media (NYT)

By Thomas Fuller, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

BANGKOK, Sept. 21 — The first signs of trouble for Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra emerged on Tuesday when he called an early-morning teleconference with the country's top army general.

The general, Sonthi Boonyaratglin, did not show up.

"Sonthi was absent," said Rongpol Charoenphan, the cabinet secretary. "He asked his aide to inform everyone at the meeting that he was busy in the south."

DOJ_NMG_0067539

Actually, General Sonthi, the chief of the army, was organizing a coup that he would begin 14 hours later, sending tanks into the streets and — with a televised announcement — rescinding the Constitution and dissolving Parliament.

On Thursday, General Sonthi sought to strengthen the grip of his junta, banning political gatherings and "activities" and summoning Thai media executives to army headquarters to warn them against publishing "expressions of public opinion" — possibly a reference to opinion polls but perhaps also including commentaries. The junta also summoned Mr. Thaksin's closest political allies.

Mr. Thaksin was in New York when the army took over. On Thursday, he issued a statement from London, saying that he would take a "well-deserved rest" and that he hoped for national reconciliation.

"We won't just stay in London,'' Pansak Vinyaratn, Mr. Thaksin's chief policy adviser, said by telephone from there. "We will probably go to Europe to have a rest."

Many questions remain about how the military will carry out its stated intention to return democracy to Thailand, which before a political crisis erupted in January was a sort of beacon of democracy for its neighbors.

But a more immediate question is what will happen to Mr. Thaksin and his fortune of more than $2 billion. The Thai news media speculated on Thursday that to appear more legitimate, the junta might open investigations against Mr. Thaksin. Showing financial malfeasance could justify the coup in the eyes of disapproving foreign governments.

The junta retained the country's auditor general, Jaruvan Maintaka, who had sparred with Mr. Thaksin, and increased her power to investigate government corruption.

Mr. Thaksin, one of Thailand's richest men, made his fortune in the technology business, initially by selling IBM computers to the police force.

He cashed out of his business empire in January, selling his conglomerate, consisting of telecommunications, airlines and satellite businesses, to an investment company owned by the Singapore government. The sale netted $1.9 billion for his family, an amount so large that the Thai baht appreciated against the dollar as the money was being brought into the country.

In a briefing on Wednesday, the leaders of the junta told reporters that there were no plans to freeze Mr. Thaksin's assets but that investigations were possible.

"It depends on the information we have at hand," Kowit Wattana, the country's national police chief, said at the briefing. "At present, he already has many lawsuits, so we might look into them again and see what to do."

If Mr. Thaksin's money is still in Thailand, he may find it difficult to transfer it out. The Central Bank limits personal remittances to $1 million a year per person, unless special permission has been granted for more. If the money is for investment purposes, however, an individual is allowed to wire $10 million without the permission of the Central Bank.

Vichit Supinij, a former governor of the Central Bank and a former adviser to the Thaksin government, said he believed that Mr. Thaksin's fortune was still in the country. "The money is probably still in the banks at the moment," Mr. Vichit said.

But Klanarong Chantik, the former director of the National Countercorruption Commission, said it would also be difficult to investigate Mr. Thaksin's finances.

"The current situation isn't normal," Mr. Klanarong said. "All the laws were revoked, and the committee of the National Countercorruption Commission no longer exists."

"The problem is everything now depends on the council's interpretation of the law," he said, referring to the name the junta has chosen for itself, the Administrative Reform Council.

"Right now, the council is the law," he said.

Thai Coup Leaders Tighten Controls (AP)

By Alisa Tang, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 22, 2006

Thailand's new military rulers tightened their grip Thursday, restricting political activities, assuming legislative powers and detaining some allies of the deposed prime minister.

In announcements broadcast on all television stations, the military said it was banning all meetings by political parties and the creation of new parties. It said it was taking over the duties and responsibilities of parliament, which was dissolved when the coup leaders threw out the 1997 constitution.

The Thai ruling council has also imposed media restrictions, including stationing soldiers at television and radio stations, and ordering the information ministry to stop the distribution of information "deemed harmful" to its agenda.

The moves seemed likely to increase criticism from Western nations and human rights groups, which described Tuesday night's ouster of an elected but unpopular civilian government as a setback to democracy.

DOJ_NMG_0067540

In a region where democracies are fragile in the best of times, the coup has also unleashed worries about nearby nations where political unrest is common. Political analysts said images of tanks rolling through Bangkok's streets sent an unfortunate message, but that the chances of a spillover effect appeared remote.

"At a time when many countries are struggling to consolidate their democracy, this is a bad example," and raises questions about stability in the region, said political analyst Dewi Fortuna Anwar of the Indonesian Institute of Sciences.

There was no challenge to the Thai military's authority from the ousted prime minister, Thaksin Shinawatra, who issued his first statement since the coup. The billionaire tycoon said from London that he planned to take a "deserved rest" from politics, and hoped to carry out "possible charitable work for Thailand."

The coup group empowered an auditor to investigate government corruption, which could lead to the confiscation of Thaksin's wealth. Analysts said that proving Thaksin's alleged corruption was necessary to legitimize the coup.

Pasuk Phongpaichit, one of Thailand's most respected political economists, alleged that corruption was "blatant" under the Thaksin government but said a coup was not the best way to handle it.

"A democratic country must have a constitution and adhere to the rule of law," she said. "If the prime minister has done something wrong, he must be tried and he should be judged."

Although Thaksin handily won three general elections, opponents accused him of emasculating democratic institutions, including packing the state Election Commission with cronies and stifling media that were once among Asia's freest.

Bottleneck traffic returned to the streets and Thais went back to work Thursday, with many in Bangkok describing the military takeover the most "friendly" coup this country has seen.

Aside from some soldiers on street corners and tanks at strategic points in and around the city, Thursday was like any other day in the congested Thai capital. Commuters crammed the subways, vendors lined shopping streets hawking handicrafts and grilled kebabs, shops were open and tourists were out.

"It feels like a normal day. Nothing is different," said Nuttawee Chotsawat, 25, who works at a 7-11 store in the downtown business district. "There's nothing to be scared of."

Many Thais appeared relieved at the resolution of political tensions festering since the beginning of the year, when street demonstrations demanding Thaksin step down started growing in size and vehemence. Thailand has had no working legislature and only a caretaker government since February, when Thaksin dissolved Parliament to hold new elections in an effort to reaffirm his mandate.

The coup leader, army commander Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin, has said he would serve as de facto prime minister for two weeks and then the ruling military council will choose a civilian to replace him. A constitution is to be drawn up and elections held in one year's time.

Many Thais view the new regime as a good chance to resolve a Muslim insurgency in the south that has killed more than 1,700 people.

An exiled Muslim rebel leader on Thursday welcomed Thaksin's overthrow by Sondhi, a 59-year-old Muslim in a predominantly Buddhist country.

Thaksin, who used an iron-fisted policy in trying to suppress the insurgency, was widely detested in southern Thailand and many moderate Muslims said the conflict could never be resolved while he was in power.

Sondhi is the "only one who knows the real problems" of the Muslim-dominated south, said Lukman B. Lima, a leader of one of several groups fighting for a separate Islamic state in southern Thailand, and currently in exile in Sweden. Lukman was responding to e-mailed questions from The Associated Press.

Sondhi had proposed several weeks ago opening talks with the separatists, but Thaksin's government vehemently opposed such a move.

Meanwhile, a spokesman for the new military leadership — which Thursday released the official English translation of its name, the Council for Democratic Reform under Constitutional Monarchy — confirmed that four of Thaksin's close associates were being kept in custody.

Office Minister Newin Chidchob and Environment Minister Yongyut Tiyapairat turned themselves in Thursday, while Deputy Prime Minister Chitchai Wannasathit and Thaksin's top aide, Prommin Lertsuridej, were detained earlier.

"During the transition period, every country does this in order for the situation to return to normalcy quickly," said Lt. Gen. Palanggoon Klaharn, a spokesman for the military rulers.

Military Rulers Limit Politicians And Press (WT/AP)

By Alisa Tang

The Washington Times, September 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0067541

BANGKOK -- Thailand's new military rulers tightened their grip yesterday, restricting political activities, assuming legislative powers and detaining some allies of the deposed prime minister.

In announcements broadcast on all television stations, the military said it was banning all meetings by political parties and the creation of new parties. It said it was taking over the duties and responsibilities of parliament, which was dissolved when the coup leaders threw out the 1997 constitution.

At the United Nations in New York, a senior U.S. official said the coup marked a setback for democracy in the Southeast Asian nation.

"We consider this military move to be a step backward for Thai democracy, a very sad development for Thai democracy," said Christopher R. Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs.

"We are also reviewing our assistance to Thailand," Mr. Hill said.

The Thai ruling council also has imposed restrictions on press and broadcast outlets. It has stationed soldiers at television and radio stations and ordered the information ministry to stop the distribution of information "deemed harmful" to its agenda.

In a region where democracies are fragile in the best of times, the coup also has unleashed worries about nearby nations where political unrest is common.

Political analysts said images of tanks rolling through Bangkok's streets sent an unfortunate message, but that the chances of a spillover effect appeared remote.

"At a time when many countries are struggling to consolidate their democracy, this is a bad example," and raises questions about stability in the region, said political analyst Dewi Fortuna Anwar of the Indonesian Institute of Sciences.

The ousted prime minister, Thaksin Shinawatra, issued his first statement since the coup and did not challenge the Thai military's authority.

The billionaire tycoon said from London that he planned to take a "deserved rest" from politics, and hoped to carry out "possible charitable work for Thailand."

The coup group empowered an auditor to investigate government corruption, which could lead to the confiscation of Mr. Thaksin's wealth. Analysts said that proving Thaksin's purported corruption was necessary to legitimize the coup.

Pasuk Phongpaichit, one of Thailand's most respected political economists, said corruption was "blatant" under the Thaksin government but that a coup was not the best way to handle it.

"A democratic country must have a constitution and adhere to the rule of law," she said. "If the prime minister has done something wrong, he must be tried and he should be judged."

· Nicholas Kralev contributed to this report from New York.

From King Down, Thais Accept Coup (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman And Ratchada Chitrada

USA Today, September 22, 2006

AYUDHAYA, Thailand — Poj Ketsuma knows he can't compete with tanks and machine guns or even with elite opinion in Bangkok, 50 miles south of here.

Poj, 41, was left feeling powerless by the bloodless military coup that on Tuesday overthrew the elected government of Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra. “I cannot fight with the mighty people,” Poj said. “I feel angry about the coup, but what can I do?

Last year, it was different. Poj and millions of other rural Thais surged to the polls 19 months ago to re-elect Thaksin's party, Thais Love Thais, in a landslide. They saw Thaksin as a can-do leader who cared about Thailand's poor. He offered them cheap medical care and provided low-interest loans to support their farms and businesses. Poj took out a $420 government loan to buy a motorbike three years ago; he has been running a taxi service ever since.

The ballot box verdict was overturned Tuesday night by men in military uniform, backed by urban elites who considered Thaksin high-handed and corrupt. Thaksin's rural supporters have remained mostly silent in the face of a coup that has been endorsed by Thailand's revered king. Many, in fact, appear to support the military takeover, if only because it ended a standoff between Thaksin and his opponents that had paralyzed the government all year.

“It's justifiable,” said factory worker Sangla Namthai, 48, over lunch at a roadside noodle shop in Ayudhaya, an ancient Thai capital in farm country north of Bangkok where Thaksin is popular. Sangla is a Thaksin supporter who grew tired of political gridlock. The coup, she said, is “reasonable and necessary to clean up the mess.”

A survey of 2,019 people for the Bangkok Post newspaper, published Thursday, found support for the coup ran higher outside the capital (86.4% approval) than inside (81.6%). Those findings were odd because Bangkok has been the center of anti-Thaksin sentiment and rural Thailand has been his stronghold. Neil Englehart, a political scientist at Ohio's Bowling Green State University who has studied Thai democracy extensively, offered a possible explanation: Rural Thais traditionally support the military. Also, predominantly Muslim parts of southern Thailand oppose Thaksin because of his strong-arm tactics in dealing with a low-grade Islamic insurgency there.

DOJ_NMG_0067542

Thaksin, who was at the United Nations General Assembly in New York when the army moved against him, appeared resigned to his political fate. “I left Thailand as the prime minister, and now I am a jobless man,” he told reporters on a flight to London from New York. “Never mind. I can still keep in touch with my family.”

Thailand is being run by a six-man junta of military and police officials called the Council for Democratic Reform Under a Constitutional Monarchy. The coup organizer and army chief, Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin, 59, promised to turn power over to a technocratic prime minister in two weeks, rewrite the constitution and hold elections around October 2007.

Thai media call the takeover the “Yellow Ribbon Coup.” Soldiers have been wearing patches of yellow cloth on their uniforms, a symbol of King Bhumibol Adulyadej. The king, who is close to coup organizer Sondhi, told Thais on Wednesday to follow orders from the council.

On Thursday, the military assumed the duties of the parliament, which was dissolved when the government was ousted. It banned meetings of existing political parties and the establishment of new ones. It also has limited public meetings and ordered Thai media not to reprint or broadcast political messages submitted from the public through cellphone text messages. Thaksin's family owns Thailand's biggest cellphone company.

The army has placed tanks and Humvees on a highway on the northern outskirts of Bangkok, their guns pointed toward traffic coming from Thaksin strongholds in the rural north. No one has challenged the military's authority, said army Pvt. Puriwat Manutjam, 22.

Thaksin's political opponents have accused him of undermining democratic institutions by, for instance, stacking the election commission with cronies and intimidating the traditionally independent media. The junta detained four top members of Thaksin's administration Thursday. “Democracy is more than ballot boxes,” said Thitinan Pongsudhiarak, a political scientist at Bangkok's Chulalongkorn University.

“We will keep an eye on the (military) council,” vowed Suriyasai Katasila, coordinator of the People's Alliance for Democracy, a coalition that had sought Thaksin's resignation. “We want to make sure they are careful with the power they have.”

No one, he said, wants to see a repeat of the military coup in 1991 that led to bloody street clashes before democracy was restored.

In Ayudhaya, insurance salesman Nipon Klaipradit, 45, worried that the damage has been done. “Thaksin's own army betrayed him,” he said. “If they can do it this time, they can do it again.”

In Somalia, A Boot Camp For Islam (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders

The Los Angeles Times, September 22, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia — Beginning as a teenager, militiaman Abduallahi Mohammed Nur rarely ventured into the Mogadishu streets without an AK-47, which he often used to harass civilians and extort money at checkpoints.

But the 27-year-old hasn't held his weapon since June, when it was pointed at invading fighters with the Islamic Courts Union. The militia, now known as the Conservative Council of Islamic Courts, drove away the warlord he worked for and confiscated his gun.

Now Nur calls himself a reformed man. Under the watchful eye of Islamist commanders, Nur says he prays five times a day, studies the Koran and is learning to defend Somalia against foreign threats.

"Most of all," he said, "they are teaching me how to be good to other people."

Nur is one of about 3,000 former warlord militiamen sent to Islamist-run "rehabilitation camps" on the outskirts of the nation's capital. It's an ambitious resocialization program designed to wean the young fighters off drugs, instill religious values and, eventually, reverse loyalties so they can be integrated into the Muslim fundamentalist forces.

"It's a difficult job," said Mohammed Ibrahim Bilal, chairman of one of the new Islamic courts in Mogadishu. "We want to welcome them back. But they have been living with violence for 16 years."

In Washington, there is concern that increasingly Islamist Somalia could end up with a Taliban-style government and serve as a terrorist training area.

Amid allegations that Islamists are using military advisors from Pakistan and Afghanistan to train soldiers, officials recently began permitting journalists to visit the camps. But they denied access to weapons stockpiles and insisted on selecting the militiamen to be interviewed, and carefully monitored what they said.

About 12 miles north of the capital is the largest of the camps, called Hilwayne, which was a national army base before the collapse of Mohamed Siad Barre's regime in 1991. After that, rival warlords carved up the Horn of Africa country and largely held sway until an alliance of local religious courts seized control of Mogadishu in June.

DOJ_NMG_0067543

The Islamist forces that took the barren compound have cleared the trash, built tin barracks and a makeshift mosque, and use the facility to stockpile weapons and retrain about 700 defeated militiamen.

On a recent afternoon, the mood was largely casual and relaxed, with former fighters milling around in the shade. Security and the atmosphere appeared more reminiscent of that of a drug rehab facility or a tough-love teen reform school rather than a Soviet- or Cambodian-style reeducation camp.

Guarded by a few armed Islamist soldiers, the men start their day with prayers at 4:30 a.m. Attendance is voluntary, camp leaders say, but they take note of those who don't show up. Smoking cigarettes or chewing khat leaves, a stimulant, are banned, a challenge considering most fighters were addicted to khat.

The rest of the day is filled with military exercises, religious lectures and self-defense classes, though the fighters don't practice with real weapons.

"Our goal is to upgrade their morals," said Abudulkhadir Yusuf Osman, a frequent guest lecturer at the camp and an Islamic studies professor at a Mogadishu university.

This week, during a lecture to several hundred former militiamen under the shade of a thorny tree, Osman preached that the young men could be rich in morals even if their pockets were empty. He also urged the fighters to think about their "next life," and promised paradise to those who lived a life of piety.

Religion permeates the program. Guards kneel and pray with rifles slung over their shoulders. Trainees chant Islamic verse to keep time while marching in unison across dusty plains.

"Allahu akbar! Allahu akbar," the men shouted during a recent military exercise. The phrase, which means "God is great," is a foundation of Islamic prayer.

Islamist leaders, however, insisted that religious indoctrination was not their goal.

"We are rehabilitating their behavior, not their religion," said Sheik Mukhtar Robow Ali, the deputy security chief for the courts. "Most of them were already religious, but they weren't using their faith. Religion doesn't permit you to oppress other people, and that's what these people were doing."

Camp leaders say participation is voluntary and the men are free to leave. But they acknowledge that the camps provide a good opportunity to keep an eye on the former enemy fighters.

After Islamists chased out nearly a dozen warlords who had carved up control of Mogadishu, fighters left behind were given the option of handing in their weapons and returning home, or moving to the camps to be retrained.

In the face of pressure to prove they are "reformed," about half of the fighters agreed to go to the camps. Most were young, unemployed men who had been acting as mercenaries. Few had any education or job training that would enable them to find work.

During a recent pep talk to the former militiamen, most of them 18 to 30 years old, Robow Ali promised that the Islamic courts would take care of their needs.

"The youth are the cornerstone of every country in the world," he said. "You are the youth of Somalia, and we urge you to join us."

To sweeten the deal, the Islamists promised to continue paying the men's salaries. After some delays, militiamen in the camps received about $100 each last month. Islamists said the money came from taxes at the recently reopened airport and sea port, though critics allege that funding is coming from Middle East countries and Eritrea.

The task of transforming the fighters falls to former Somalian Army Col. Muhyadin Haji Ali, a husky, smiling man who always sports a pair of Ray-Ban sunglasses, even indoors. New recruits arrive every week, he said, including fighters who initially fled the city in fear, and defectors from forces controlled by Somalia's transitional government, based in Baidoa.

To become good Muslim soldiers, Haji Ali said, the former militiamen require heavy training. "The only thing they learned from the warlords was how to kill and loot," he said.

After spending nearly three months at the camp, Nur, a former bodyguard for Mogadishu warlord Muse Sudi Yalahow, said he had been taught to be ashamed of his past actions. He recalled times when he was ordered to shoot or fire mortars at unarmed civilians.

"We couldn't disobey, but I knew what we were doing was wrong," he said. "I knew the warlords were abusing the people. They destroyed the country."

A second former militiaman, also selected by camp leaders to be interviewed, said he defected in July from the transitional government, which is seeking to negotiate a power-sharing arrangement with the Islamic courts. Tensions have been high between the Islamists and the transitional government over which side is best suited to lead Somalia.

"I came here to fight for my religion," said Abdul Aziz Adan Mohammed, 25, a former government soldier based in Baidoa. "I'm here to fight Ethiopia."

Nationalism and anti-Ethiopian rhetoric are common themes of the retraining program.

DOJ_NMG_0067544

A long-standing rivalry has been reignited by Ethiopia's support and influence over Somalia's fragile transitional government in Baidoa.

Islamists in Mogadishu say that if Ethiopian troops enter Somalia, either at the invitation of the Baidoa administration or as part of an international peacekeeping force, they will invade Ethiopia.

"Do you want Ethiopia in your country?" Robow Ali shouted at the fighters during his pep talk.

"No!" the men screamed back.

"Will you defend your country and your religion?"

"Yes!"

"Will you die for your country?"

"Yes!"

Islamist leaders said the rehabilitation program was already a success. But they said none of the former militia fighters had graduated from the program or been integrated into their forces.

"We haven't given them their guns back," Robow Ali said. "Their spirits are good, and I would trust them now with my own children. Our fight was never with them. It was between us and the warlords. Just as they have trusted us by giving us their weapons, we will trust them."

When will the Islamists feel confident enough to rearm the men?

"I don't know," Robow Ali said. "We'll see."

Paulson To Press Hu On Flexible Currency (FT)

By Krishna Guha

Financial Times, September 22, 2006

Hank Paulson, the US Treasury secretary, will urge Hu Jintao, China's president, to allow the renminbi to appreciate more rapidly when the two meet on Friday in Beijing.

Mr Paulson will tell both Mr Hu and Wen Jiabao, the prime minister, that greater currency flexibility is in China's national interest and would remove one of the main obstacles to a strategic relationship with the US.

He will say he wants the US and China to work together on a wide range of issues through the US-China strategic economic dialogue announced on Wednesday.

But he will tell them that pressing short-term problems, including the currency, need to be dealt with if this dialogue is to fulfil its potential.

In an interview conducted on Thursday in the Jin dynasty gardens of the Diaoyutai state guest house, Mr Paulson said he would compliment Mr Hu on reforms under way and "encourage him to move forward even more quickly".

He would also thank Mr Hu for putting his authority behind the new dialogue, which the US believes will help it produce results. The former Goldman Sachs chairman said that while the dialogue would have a "bilateral focus" it would invariably touch on "global issues", including global economic imbalances.

"When you talk about global imbalances, China and the US are two big players," he said.

Asked what other nations should make of such plans, Mr Paulson said: "The rest of the world should welcome this . . . it is in no one's interest for there to be a big economic problem between the US and China."

The new mechanism would allow the US to discuss with China how and when it implemented promised reforms to rebalance its economy, including moving towards a more flexible currency. "The Chinese have already agreed to all the principles," he said. "The differences are over timing and implementation." Mr Paulson said he was too busy with the final phase of his meetings with China's top leadership to track reports of how the dialogue was being received in the US.

He would contact senior congressmen on his return to explain why the dialogue with China was in the US national interest. "Members of Congress are my clients," he said. "I need to engage with key people up there."

He said that the night before he left for Beijing he had spoken to senators Chuck Schumer and Lindsey Graham, authors of a bill threatening punitive sanctions on China's imports if it failed to revalue its currency.

Answering questions at Beijing's Tsinghua University, he called for patience while the dialogue with China got going, saying "anything worthwhile in life" was achieved over a long period.

Treasury Secretary Banks On His Long Relationship With China (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, September 22, 2006

BEIJING — As an investment banker, Henry Paulson has been coming here for more than 15 years to make deals with the Chinese. This week, in his first visit as Treasury secretary, he made another one.

DOJ_NMG_0067545

But unlike the lucrative commercial agreements Paulson negotiated as chief executive of Goldman Sachs, the value of his latest deal is uncertain.

Paulson says China's agreement to participate in a new "Strategic Economic Dialogue" will place the "most important economic relationship in the world" on a solid long-term footing. Critics on Capitol Hill and among manufacturers say it's only the most recent in a long line of fruitless talks. They want a crackdown on what they say are Beijing's unfair trade practices, including a currency policy that effectively subsidizes Chinese exports, and widespread piracy of American software and movies.

As Paulson prepares today to return to Washington after a four-day visit, the combination of stubborn commercial disputes and an increasingly protectionist Congress shadow his bid for a radically different Sino-American commercial relationship.

"I'm not discounting the challenge, not discounting it at all. … China is still in transition to a market-driven economy, but they're so big and powerful economically, they are a global economic leader, and I think they gotta move faster," Paulson told USA TODAY in an interview Thursday. "They've got things they need to do. I'm going to need to persuade them to move faster."

He's already demonstrated unusual speed in winning President Bush's approval to launch the new set of talks. One key: Paulson lined up backing from top White House aides and Cabinet colleagues before approaching the president this summer, says White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten, another former Goldman Sachs executive.

"This was his brainchild," says Bolten. "He has the full confidence of the president, and other Cabinet members know that. The president is sufficiently interested in it that I think Hank (Paulson) will be able to attract the kind of time and attention he's envisioned. … This will turn out to be a substantial initiative."

The 60-year-old Treasury secretary brings an impressive track record to the task of reorienting U.S.-China economic ties. On his watch, Goldman Sachs led several major initial public offerings of state-owned Chinese companies. In 2000, it helped underwrite the IPO of PetroChina, then the largest Chinese share offering. Two years ago, it became the first foreign firm to win approval to establish a joint venture investment bank.

Paulson says he succeeded in China by cultivating relationships with Chinese decision-makers and by making roughly 70 visits since 1990. Providing advice for a Tsinghua University business school and performing conservation work in Yunnan province helped convinced the Chinese that he was interested in more than just their money.

Some say Paulson's China savvy might improve the effectiveness of American economic diplomacy toward a country that is both the USA's fastest-growing export market and the object of mounting resentment.

"One thing about successful investment bankers: They usually have a very good idea what's real and what's not, and who can write checks and who can't," says Bill Overholt, head of the Rand Center for Asia Pacific Policy in Santa Monica, Calif.

However, Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., a frequent critic of the Bush administration's China trade policies, says Paulson needs to deliver more than additional talk with the Chinese. "Everyone knows the Chinese are flouting the rules," he says. "We need action."

In his public statements this week, Paulson took care to couple any criticism of Chinese policy shortcomings with demonstrations of respect for China and its accomplishments. That deft balancing act is more than mere courtesy. The Chinese, still nursing grievances from their treatment by foreigners in the past century and a half, are hypersensitive about being accorded what they see as due deference.

Public hammering of Beijing in recent years, especially over its policy of intervening in currency markets to keep the value of the yuan stable, has paid few dividends. The United States has urged China to allow the market to set the yuan's value, and last year, China abandoned the policy of keeping its currency fixed against the dollar. But the government has allowed only a roughly 4% appreciation from the yuan's original level, a sliver of what U.S. exporters say is fair.

Whether more tangible gains will follow from the new Sino-U.S. talks won't be clear for months. Paulson, who has deliberately discouraged expectations of immediate benefits, worries that Chinese and American timetables may be out of sync.

"We may be hearing what they say they're going to do, and we're thinking a year and they're thinking 10 to 20 years. Who knows? It's all about pace and timing," he said.

Paulson's more nuanced tactics, whether meeting a provincial leader in the southern city of Hangzhou or appearing before business students at Tsinghua University, won him plaudits this week.

"The new secretary of the Treasury has quite a good reputation in China. … His statements about China are quite positive," said Shi Yinhong, a professor of international relations at People's University in Beijing.

Today, Paulson is scheduled to see both Chinese President Hu Jintao and Premier Wen Jiabao.

Still, the new Treasury secretary is a capital markets specialist with significant experience in China, not a genuine China expert. Before going to work in the Nixon White House, then Goldman Sachs, he graduated from Dartmouth with a bachelor's degree in English and earned an MBA from Harvard.

DOJ_NMG_0067546

The Bush administration's new point man on China also does not speak Mandarin. Paulson says his lack of language skills hasn't been a handicap, as many Chinese officials speak English, and “with a good interpreter, you (can) develop a very good relationship.”

Beijing Mayor Wang Qishan and central bank chief Zhou Xiaochuan are among his closer contacts.

The Treasury chief's plain-spoken conversations with Chinese officials are littered with football references befitting a former Dartmouth College offensive lineman. After meeting Zhejiang Party Secretary Xi Jinping on Wednesday, Paulson pronounced him “the kind of guy who knows how to get things over the goal line.” Of feisty Vice Premier Wu Yi, he said: “She comes to play every day.”

Apart from his numerous trips here on Goldman's executive jet, Paulson says the greatest influences upon his knowledge of China were conversations with Lee Kuan Yew, the former prime minister of Singapore, conservative Hong Kong billionaire Li Ka-Shing and Goldman's Chinese-born employees, some of whom survived the tumultuous Cultural Revolution of the 1960s. “If you're traveling with them and have any intellectual curiosity, you can learn a lot,” he said.

Earlier, speaking at a forum for Tsinghua business students, he recalled his first visit to China in 1990. Driving in from Beijing airport, his taxi weaved between horse-drawn wagons and fleets of pedaling bicyclists.

Today, a multilane highway clogged with Audis and Buicks has supplanted the road Paulson traveled. A subway line is under construction alongside it in preparation for the 2008 Olympic Games. Hefting a hand-held microphone and pacing like a talk show host, Paulson told the students he had concluded early on that economic reforms were more than a passing fad because of a comment by then-president Jiang Zemin. Speaking in English, Jiang told Paulson: “I'm going to have to learn more about U.S. accounting. … Assets equals liabilities plus equities!”

In the interview with USA TODAY, Paulson refused to discuss prospects for China to develop a more democratic political system, beyond repeating the conventional wisdom that an open economy eventually will produce more open politics. That has seemed less assured under Hu, who has jailed reporters, tightened Internet censorship and chilled academic discussion during his three years at China's helm.

On Capitol Hill, China is often portrayed as a trade cheat, manipulating its currency to make its exports irresistibly inexpensive, blatantly copying American software and movies and delaying the opening of its markets to U.S. goods.

Paulson intends to pursue those issues with Chinese officials, but he rejects the view of China as a chronically unfair trade partner. “I always found that at the level I worked, when you had a deal, you had a deal,” he said in an interview. “I found the Chinese very honorable in terms of standing by commitments and respecting a commitment from others.”

It's unclear whether Paulson, who seemed sure-footed this week in China, will be equally adept navigating the complex political terrain back home. After seven years as a CEO, Paulson tolerates skeptical questioning with difficulty and can sometimes appear impatient with political realities.

Asked at a U.S. Embassy news conference whether lawmakers would buy his plan to refocus trade complaints with China into the new long-term dialogue, he replied brusquely: “I don't think I have a need to sell this thing to Congress.”

Likewise, in the interview Paulson demonstrated a deep sympathy for the Chinese and an understanding of the difficult transition the country is navigating from an economy based on central planning to one driven by the market. But beyond calling for thinking “creatively” about ways to help Americans who lose their jobs as trade barriers fall, Paulson, in his short tenure at Treasury, has offered nothing to ease U.S. public anxiety about globalization's costs.

His well-founded insistence upon taking a long-term approach to relations with China also is complicated by this inescapable fact: The Bush administration leaves office in 28 months.

Hungarian Leader Defends Comments: 'I Did Not Lie' (WP)

By Craig Whitlock, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

Protests Calling for His Ouster Stretch Into 4th Day

BUDAPEST, Sept. 21 -- With protesters massed outside the gates of the stately Hungarian parliament for a fourth straight day, Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany sat in his wood-paneled office inside and tried to explain why he had admitted on tape that his party had done a "boneheaded" job of running the country and that he had lied to voters to win reelection.

Looking weary and with his legs crossed, Gyurcsany said he was merely exaggerating for dramatic effect when he told a private meeting of party loyalists in May that "we lied in the morning, the night and the evening" to the public.

"It's important to emphasize that I did not lie," he said in an interview. "It's like you are arguing with your girlfriend, after four years of living together, saying to her, 'My darling, don't you understand? Our life is nothing! We screwed up our life!' It doesn't mean your four years were nothing. It doesn't mean that you don't like her. It means that you would like to change and improve your relations."

DOJ_NMG_0067547

Gyurcsany repeated that he would not resign despite the sometimes violent protests that have rattled Budapest since local news outlets on Sunday broadcast excerpts of a leaked tape recording of his comments, made to a closed meeting of Socialist supporters shortly after he won reelection in April.

Demonstrators have been encouraged by opposition leaders who smell a chance to topple the government. Protests on Monday and Tuesday nights deteriorated into riots that caused hundreds of injuries, the worst political violence in Hungary since Soviet troops brutally ended an uprising against a Communist government in 1956.

According to a transcript of his remarks, Gyurcsany used raw language to confess that he and his party had done a miserable job of governing and had covered up the seriousness of Hungary's economic problems so they could stay in power.

"I almost died while I had to pretend for one and a half years as if we were governing," he is heard saying on the tape. "We screwed it up. Not a bit, but a lot. No other country in Europe has done something as boneheaded as we have."

On Thursday, Gyurcsany did not apologize for his statements, nor did he express any embarrassment or regret. Instead, he said a close reading of his words shows that he is one of the few Hungarian politicians to admit the country's finances are a wreck and to try to do something about it.

"It just shows one thing: This guy would like to change, and he's the first to admit it," he said in the interview. "You cannot say that there's been anyone else in the Hungarian elite in the last 60 years who was brave enough to pass reform."

For now, there are few signs that the political pressure building against Gyurcsany, 45, a communist bureaucrat turned millionaire, will end anytime soon.

Police used tear gas again early Thursday to disperse demonstrators after about 15,000 people turned out overnight to call on Gyurcsany to quit. The level of violence, however, was far less than the riots of the previous two days.

The main opposition party, the Hungarian Civic Union, said it would cancel a major rally it had scheduled for Saturday, after government officials said they had received bomb threats and could not ensure security for the event.

Although Gyurcsany and his ruling Socialist Party won another four-year term in April, municipal elections are scheduled for Oct. 1, and opposition groups said they expected that protests against the prime minister would continue at least until then.

"He's been lying for years and there's no guarantee that he will not lie in the future," said Andras Kelemen, a member of parliament for the Civic Union. "He admitted that he is not fit to be prime minister. And his ministers are not fit for their jobs either. Of course he should resign."

The Civic Union, known as Fidesz, has called for the creation of a new government consisting of independent economic experts. Its leader, Viktor Orban, said the prime minister "should be brought to court" for allegedly falsifying government financial data.

Hungary is struggling to solve deep-seated economic problems that have grown worse since it joined the European Union in 2004. Its budget deficit is projected to reach 10 percent of gross domestic product this year, the highest level in Europe. The fiscal straits have delayed for years Hungary's bid to adopt the euro as its currency, further weakening its prospects in global markets.

During this year's national campaign, Gyurcsany and his party -- as well as their main opposition rivals -- promised to slash taxes and spend more on social programs. But soon after winning reelection, the prime minister began pushing through a series of tax increases and spending cuts, charging Hungarians more to go to the doctor, attend college and receive other benefits.

Istvan Stumpf, a political analyst and former government minister who served with the Civic Union opposition, said it's possible that the prime minister could face a revolt from within if the Socialists feel it would be necessary to sacrifice him for the good of the party.

"It will be tough for him to keep his job" if the Civic Union and other opposition parties win the Oct. 1 local elections in a landslide, Stumpf said. "There's a general dissatisfaction with the performance of the prime minister and his inner circle."

But Gyurcsany said he was undaunted and would not waver on his plan for further spending cuts. He noted that he had predicted months ago in his tape-recorded speech that people would take to the streets when they realized he would break his campaign promises.

"There will be conflicts, I can tell you folks," he said in May, according to a transcript of his remarks. "Yes, there will be demonstrations, no doubt about it. One can demonstrate in front of the parliament. Sooner or later, they would get bored and leave for home."

Blood Money Murdered Regulator In Russia Made Plenty Of Enemies (WSJ)

By Guy Chazan

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Targeting Illegal Cash Flows, Andrei Kozlov Became The Bane of Shady Bankers Corruption Fight May Suffer

DOJ_NMG_0067548

MOSCOW -- In the spring of 2004, Russia's central bank began a crackdown on money laundering by yanking the license of a Moscow bank it suspected of a slew of financial crimes. But when a team of regulators tried to take control of its headquarters, the bank's dark-suited security force wouldn't let them in.

More resistance followed. Protests by depositors blocked one of Moscow's busiest thoroughfares, paralyzing traffic. The target of their wrath was Andrei Kozlov, Russia's top banking regulator. To make their point, two protesters dropped their trousers to reveal the word "Kozlov" written on their backsides.

It was the first skirmish in a high-stakes crusade to clamp down on Russia's murky and criminalized banking system, a project that lay at the heart of President Vladimir Putin's ambition to modernize Russia's economy. Mr. Kozlov, a 41-year-old career central banker, spearheaded the campaign.

Last week, his ambitions were cut short by an assassin's bullet. Mr. Kozlov was shot outside a Moscow sports stadium after playing soccer with fellow bankers. He later died of his wounds.

Mr. Kozlov was one of the most senior Russian officials to be murdered since the end of communist rule, and his death stunned the country's elite. Contract-style killings of businessmen were commonplace in the early 1990s, when capitalism was in its infancy here, but most thought they had become a thing of the past.

The attack exposed the fragility of Mr. Putin's claims to have ushered in a new era of stability. It also showed that despite the gradual removal of political challenges to Kremlin power, crime and corruption still menace the authority of the state. Indeed, Mr. Putin himself admitted this month that the lack of progress against corruption was one of the major failures of his presidency.

Though investigators say they have few leads in the Kozlov murder, Mr. Putin already has drawn his own conclusions. In a hastily called meeting of top officials last Friday, he said it showed Russian banking was riddled with crime. Banks continue to be used to channel billions of rubles in cash payments used for tax evasion, "huge bribes," terrorism and the "narcomafia," he said.

Mr. Kozlov was leading a crackdown on money laundering, where criminals use complex financial transactions to conceal the source of illegally obtained money. Yet he wasn't concerned just with the dirty money being pumped into the system, but also with the cash that was being pumped out and used for criminal purposes.

In the West, most business payments are made by bank transfer, and cash withdrawals of even a few thousand dollars can raise eyebrows. In Russia, cash is king. Companies -- both criminal and outwardly legitimate -- often use it to pay salaries, and so avoid onerous payroll taxes; to grease the palms of corrupt bureaucrats; and to buy real estate.

To get their hands on that money, businesses must navigate strict rules barring banks from dispensing large amounts of cash. Luckily for them there are dozens of small, fly-by-night banks ready to use legal loopholes -- and a panoply of complex financial scams -- to get around the rules. For the banks, which charge fees of as much as 5% for customers to withdraw cash, it is a lucrative business.

To measure the scale of the problem, take Arat, a tiny bank registered in a village near the Mongolian border whose license was withdrawn by Mr. Kozlov in August 2005. Regulators said the bank, which had just $320,000 in assets, had dispensed $1.34 billion in cash in June and July of last year alone. Owners of the bank, which was liquidated last October, couldn't be reached for comment.

Untraceable cash oils the wheels of corruption and tax evasion in Russia. It is the lifeblood of a system that links government, business and organized crime in a web of graft and financial impropriety. Russian officials, policemen and bankers believe it was Mr. Kozlov's attack on this system that cost him his life.

Many thought Mr. Kozlov's campaign was futile -- that black cash is such a feature of life in Russia that the economy can't function without it. "He said he knew that," said Richard Hainsworth, head of a local credit-rating company, RusRating, and a friend of Mr. Kozlov. "But he wanted to force the issue out of the banking system and into the political arena."

Mr. Kozlov's was a lonely struggle. After pulling a bank's license, his department would regularly pass on evidence of its illegal cash schemes and money laundering to prosecutors and police. In most cases, the evidence was ignored. That could change: Among the measures Mr. Putin ordered Friday was the creation of a task force to handle crime in the banking system. For the first time, the panel will include police and prosecutors, in addition to regulators -- suggesting a much tougher stance on dodgy banks.

Yesterday, Gennady Melikyan, a deputy chairman of the Central Bank of Russia, was named Mr. Kozlov's successor as Russia's top regulator. A Soviet-trained economist, Mr. Melikyan previously was in charge of on-site inspections of Russia's banks.

When Mr. Kozlov joined the central bank in 2002, Russia's financial-services industry was a mess. For a decade, international agencies such as the World Bank had been urging an overhaul. The economy, they said, would remain weak without healthy, well-run banks capable of channeling private savings into investment in industry, rather than just spiriting cash offshore.

DOJ_NMG_0067549

Amid the political and economic chaos of the Boris Yeltsin years, little was done. Banking still was recovering from Russia's 1998 financial meltdown, when some of the country's biggest institutions collapsed under a heap of debt.

Of the nearly 2,000 banks that were left, many did little more than launder the proceeds of organized crime, according to World Bank experts. Others were just the treasury departments for post-communist tycoons unwilling or unable to service the wider economy. State-owned OAO Sberbank dominated the landscape, with the lion's share of retail deposits. Most others were tiny and undercapitalized, with inflated balance sheets and murky ownership structures.

A veteran central banker who had switched to a private-sector bank after the 1998 crash, Mr. Kozlov was brought in by Sergei Ignatiev, a respected economist whom Mr. Putin appointed head of the central bank in March 2002 with a mandate to clean up the system. "Andrei had the president's full support," says Arkady Dvorkovich, Mr. Putin's economic adviser. Mr. Putin had come to power in 2000 promising to rebuild Russia's economy, and financial services were to be a key part of the revival.

'Dirty Attacks'

From the start, Mr. Kozlov was aware he could earn enemies, both inside and outside the central bank. "I'm being watched very closely right now," he said in an interview in June 2002 with The Wall Street Journal. Seven "dirty attacks" had appeared in the local press, he said, accusing him of taking bribes. "They are weighing every word I say," he added.

Western bankers regularly took visiting top executives to drop by his office in the central bank. "It was always a pleasure to introduce people to him, because he was so clearly someone who symbolized the progress that Russia is making," said Mark Robinson, head of Citibank Inc.'s Russian operations.

Though trained in the Soviet system, Mr. Kozlov, married with three children, was more Western-oriented than most Russian officials. A keen soccer player, he studied international economic relations at one of the Soviet Union's most prestigious colleges, the Moscow Finance Institute. Some of his classmates went on to become Russia's richest businessmen and most powerful bankers.

In 2001 he was made Moscow head of the Financial Services Volunteer Corps, a U.S.-government-funded not-for-profit group set up by the first President Bush in 1990 to aid banking overhauls in transition economies. While there he consulted with U.S. Treasury officials in Moscow and drafted a comprehensive plan for a banking overhaul. Those ideas formed the core of his agenda when he joined the central bank a year later. They also shaped his liberal position on allowing foreign banks to compete on largely the same terms as Russian ones. That philosophy didn't win him many friends in the Russian banking industry, but it has helped turn Russia into a key target for foreign giants such as Citibank.

Installed as Russia's top regulator, Mr. Kozlov set to work restoring confidence in the country's banks by pushing through a deposit-insurance law. The measure, which had languished in Parliament for years, would compensate depositors if their bank crashed.

To be admitted into the program and earn the right to work with retail customers, banks had to provide much more information to the authorities than before. They were forced to disclose who their real owners were and to present a detailed business plan, and those that qualified were subject to rigorous monitoring.

Tense Time

It was a tense time. Mr. Kozlov headed the committee that decided who qualified, and he used the process to weed out Russia's dodgiest banks. The law gave him wide discretion. In the end, 343 of 1,270 applicants failed to make the grade. That provoked fury in the market. Articles in the Russian press claimed banks had to pay bribes of $150,000 to be allowed into the program.

Mr. Kozlov brushed off the criticism. Anatoly Aksakov, a member of the Russian Parliament's banking committee, saw him late one evening after a day spent screening banks for the new system. "He was walking past the Bolshoi Theater, on his way from the central bank, and I asked him: 'How come you don't have a bodyguard?' " Mr. Aksakov said. "He just laughed and said, 'Why should I? I'm a law-abiding citizen.' "

In 2004, Mr. Kozlov embarked on the next stage of his crusade -- a crackdown on criminal banks. In May, he hastily summoned reporters to the central bank's elegant 19th-century headquarters to announce he had yanked the license of Sodbiznesbank, a midsize institution based in Moscow. It was a historic moment: the first time the authorities had used a newly adopted antimoney-laundering law to close down a bank. He had the Kremlin's full support, according to Mr. Dvorkovich.

Regulators accused Sodbiznesbank of a host of financial irregularities. They said it had knowingly handled ransom money during an infamous kidnapping, and in 2003 had dispensed more than $1 billion in cash -- about 9% of all such transactions in the banking system for that year. The bank, Mr. Kozlov told journalists, combined "dubious operations with an active campaign to attract depositors."

Sodbiznesbank fought back. Its chairman, Roman Petrov, called Mr. Kozlov's move "utterly arbitrary" and challenged it in court. For two weeks, security guards barred central bank-appointed administrators from entering the premises. They ultimately needed a police escort to break in.

DOJ_NMG_0067550

Meanwhile, Sodbiznesbank's management mobilized hundreds of customers to protest outside the bank. They blocked off one of Moscow's busiest streets, accusing Mr. Kozlov of trying to steal their savings. A vicious attack was launched in the Russian media against the banker.

A finance official hinted that other banks might soon have their licenses pulled. Panicked, banks stopped lending to each other, provoking a liquidity squeeze. Anxious customers lined up at cash machines to withdraw their savings, and some banks ran out of money. One big institution, Guta Bank, was forced to close its doors after a run by depositors and eventually was taken over by one of Russia's big state banks.

Mr. Kozlov claimed the banking crisis had been deliberately engineered to discredit the government. Many in the banking sector demanded he resign. Mr. Ignatiev and the Kremlin stood by him. "It was clear the trouble was due to fundamental problems in the banking system," Mr. Dvorkovich said. "There was no point blaming one individual."

Investigators continued to probe Sodbiznesbank. They alleged that in the months before Mr. Kozlov pulled its license, management had stripped out billions of rubles of assets and falsified the bank's accounts to cover up the holes. Last year, prosecutors opened a criminal case into "premeditated bankruptcy," though no individuals have been charged.

The Sodbiznesbank scandal had a grisly coda in October last year when Alexander Slesarev, a businessman widely thought to be the bank's true owner, was slain. Gunmen armed with a Kalashnikov rifle drew level with his speeding Mercedes outside Moscow and riddled it with bullets, killing the businessman, his wife and elder daughter.

Mr. Kozlov's campaign against outfits like Sodbiznesbank left him highly vulnerable. Finance Minister Alexei Kudrin said the banker had "frequently encroached on the interests of unscrupulous financiers" and criminal groups. With his department closing about two banks a month, Mr. Kozlov had no shortage of enemies. Colleagues say he received numerous death threats.

"He could have been killed by the commercial organizations that were trying to launder their money through the banks, not necessarily by the banks themselves," said Viktor Gerashchenko, a former head of the central bank.

Despite the dangers, Mr. Kozlov persevered. He stopped Russian banks from using financial scams to inflate their balance sheets. And he increased capital requirements, prompting a wave of mergers and consolidation.

Some of his other plans, if implemented, would have earned him yet more enemies. "The last thing Andrei said to me before he died was that his next major project was to find ways to reform the central bank itself," said Mr. Hainsworth of RusRating. There was plenty of scope: Bankers say corruption is rife in some of the central bank's regional branches, that it requires huge bribes to get routine things done such as registering an increase in capital. With his death, those plans may well be shelved.

A central bank official declined to comment on allegations of corruption. He said Mr. Kozlov had never publicly discussed plans to clean up the central bank and he couldn't comment on the banker's private conversations.

Last Saturday, thousands of mourners turned out for Mr. Kozlov's funeral. It was a roll call of Russia's great and good: Ministers, central bankers, diplomats and business tycoons lined up to pay their respects. Huge wreathes and bouquets of red roses were piled up against the open casket.

Speaker after speaker eulogized the banker and slammed the government for failing to protect him. "The state has shown itself incapable of defending those that stand up for its interests," said Andrei Kazmin, head of Sberbank.

--Jeanne Whalen and Gregory L. White contributed to this article.

Net Gains (NYT)

By Jessie Stone

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

Kyabirwa, Uganda

TO many of us in the malaria-control business, it came as no great surprise last week when the World Health Organization recommended wider use of DDT in Africa to combat the mosquitoes that cause the disease, which kills more than a million people a year, most of them children in Africa.

The W.H.O.'s endorsement of DDT for spraying inside houses has the support of Congress and the Bush administration. With the W.H.O.'s encouragement, several African nations have approved DDT for use in indoor residual spraying (that is, spraying the walls of huts to kill the mosquitoes that wait there until dark). Uganda's Ministry of Health and National Malaria Control Program, for example, have embraced this approach. Newspaper articles across Africa have assured readers that DDT has gotten a bad rap and is, in fact, safe for use.

But people have short memories. Doesn't anyone remember the American bald eagle? DDT brought it to the brink of extinction. In part because of that, the use of DDT was banned in 1972. (The Department of Health and Human Services, the International Agency for Research on Cancer and the Environmental Protection Agency have all listed DDT and its breakdown products, DDE and DDD, as possible carcinogens.) DDT is a persistent organic compound and can remain in the environment long after its initial use, entering the food chain and accumulating in fatty tissue. Even when the United States instituted spraying in 2000 to kill the mosquitoes that carry West Nile virus, it didn't use DDT.

DOJ_NMG_0067551

Although DDT helped eliminate malarial mosquitoes in South Africa, the case was unique — that type of malaria was directly related to the length and intensity of the rainy season, when malarial mosquitoes are active — and we still don't know the broader impact of its use there. In the African countries where the burden of malaria is greatest, the disease is endemic. Uganda, where it rains throughout the year, could not be more different from South Africa in terms of malaria, and it is a mistake to apply the same formula here. The use of DDT for indoor residual spraying will not produce the same results and will almost certainly have dire consequences.

And spraying is costly. This year in Kabale, in southwestern Uganda, 100,000 huts were sprayed as part of an indoor spraying project. A permethrin derivative, not DDT, was used and the spraying was controlled and safe. The cost was close to $2 million.

Uganda has a population of 28 million, with 7 people on average to a hut. Any comprehensive, nationwide spraying effort would have to reach some four million huts, costing more than $80 million, and that's only for the first of several rounds of spraying. With Uganda's resources already overburdened, it makes little sense to embrace an approach that is exceedingly costly from fiscal, human and environmental standpoints.

In Uganda, where I run a malaria education, prevention and treatment program, the most effective weapon against the disease is basic education about how people contract it and how they can protect themselves.

For instance, insecticide-treated bed nets can reduce the incidence of malaria by at least 50 percent and perhaps as much as 90 percent. Combination-drug therapy along with targeted non-DDT spraying inside huts will also be effective in controlling malaria.

DDT is not the magic bullet that will eradicate malaria. We need to refocus resources and attention on something most Africans do not have: basic malaria education, and prevention with insecticide-treated bed nets. A mosquito net costs $6.50 and can last up to five years. An average of three people can sleep under it, and the only harmful effect we have heard about, after having distributed 11,000 nets in the Kamuli, Jinja and Kayung districts over the last two years, is people being hot at night.

We do not have to reinvent the wheel here. We just have to help educate people — even those with the best intentions.

Anyone, Anything, Anywhere (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

Montevideo, Uruguay

The New Yorker once ran a cartoon by Peter Steiner of two dogs, with one sitting at a computer keyboard saying to the other, "On the Internet, nobody knows you're a dog."

Nobody also knows you're Uruguay.

A tiny country of three million people, wedged between Brazil and Argentina, Uruguay has come from nowhere to partner with India's biggest technology company, Tata Consultancy Services, to create in just four years one of the largest outsourcing operations in Latin America.

Yes, when Tata's Indian employees in Mumbai are asleep, its 650 Uruguayan engineers and programmers now pick up the work and help run the computers and backroom operations for the likes of American Express, Procter & Gamble and some major U.S. banks — all from Montevideo.

How did this happen? One of the most interesting features of this era of globalization is how any entrepreneur — with the right imagination, Internet bandwidth and a small amount of capital — can assemble a global company by matching workers and customers from anywhere to do anything for anyone. Maybe the most important rule in today's increasingly flat world is this: Whatever can be done, will be done — because so many people now have access to the tools of innovation and connectivity. The only question is: Will it be done by you or to you?

Gabriel Rozman decided it was going to be done by him. A retired partner from Ernst & Young who was raised in Uruguay, he hatched the idea of partnering with Tata to make Montevideo a global outsourcing hub. He did not have a single client or employee when he approached Tata. He had just two things: a gut instinct that Uruguay's quality education system had produced plenty of good, low-cost engineers and a gut desire to do something good for Uruguay — the country that gave his Hungarian parents sanctuary from Hitler.

Four years later, TCS Iberoamerica can't hire workers fast enough. When I visited its head office, people were working on computers in hallways and stairwells. (Mr. Rozman also oversees 1,300 employees in Brazil and 1,200 in Chile.) It turns out that many multinationals like the idea of spreading out their risks and not having all their outsourcing done from India — especially after one big U.S. bank nearly had to shut down last year when a flood in Mumbai paralyzed its India data center the same day a hurricane paralyzed its Florida operation. And there is no risk of nuclear war with Pakistan here.

DOJ_NMG_0067552

"When I first approached this big U.S. bank to outsource some of its services to Montevideo, instead of India," recalled Mr. Rozman, "the guy I was speaking with said, 'I don't even know where Montevideo is.' So I said to him, 'That's the point!' "

Another factor, added Mr. Rozman, was that multinationals that were depending on Indian firms alone to run their backrooms 24 hours a day were getting the third team for eight hours, since the best Indian engineers didn't want to work the late-night shift — the heart of America's day. By creating an outsourcing center in Montevideo, Tata could offer its clients its best Indian engineers during India's day (America's night) and its best Uruguayan engineers during America's day (India's night).

Most employees here are Uruguayans, but there are also lots of Indians sent over by Tata. It produces both a culture shock — Montevideo doesn't even have an Indian restaurant — and a cultural cacophony.

The firm runs on strict Tata principles, as if it were in Mumbai, so to see Uruguayans pretending to be Indians serving Americans is quite a scene. Said Rosina Marmion, 27, an Uruguayan manager, "Our customers expect us to behave like Indians — to react the same way."

Also, Latin culture, unlike Indian, is very nonhierarchical. "The Indians were not used to someone who says 'no,' " explained Ricardo Zengin, 34, a systems analyst. But eventually, "they understand that you are not saying it to challenge their authority but because you think it can be done better another way. ... In Latin culture, everything involves a discussion."

Uruguayans tell a joke about themselves that goes: If you get diagnosed with a terminal illness, move to Uruguay immediately because everything happens 20 years later here.

In outsourcing, though, Uruguay has leapt ahead of its neighbors by being the first to understand what could be done — that in today's world having an Indian company led by a Hungarian-Uruguayan servicing American banks with Montevidean engineers managed by Indian technologists who have learned to eat Uruguayan veggie is just the new normal.

Hosni Mubarak Should Call Benedict XVI (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, September 22, 2006

Who says the world lacks leaders? After again expressing his "respect" for Islam, Pope Benedict XVI at his weekly Vatican audience two days ago moved one of his knights forward on the global chessboard of Islamic politics.

Amid amped-up security in St. Peter's Square, the pope said: "I trust that after the initial reaction, my words at the University of Regensburg can constitute an impulse and encouragement toward positive, even self-critical dialogue both among religions and between modern reason and Christian faith."

Setting aside the impeccable understatement of "the initial reaction" -- churches torched world-wide -- it is close to thrilling in a world of persistent confusion about the intentions of contemporary Islam to see the pope step forward, not back, and speak without apology on behalf of "modern reason."

It is being widely said, mainly among his expectable Western critics, that the quotation from Manuel II Paleologus was a "mistake." Really? I'd say Benedict is right about where he hoped to be after Regensburg: The whole world saying that a serious conversation between the pope and Islam is necessary. My guess is Benedict would clear his calendar if the Muslim Arab leadership said it is ready to talk. And the talk won't be about who meant what in the 14th century. It will be about the here and now.

The pope has a Muslim problem alright. It is the hammering that Christian communities have been taking for years and are getting now in Islamic countries all over the world, but especially in the Middle East.

Across the region (with some exceptions), non-Islamic minorities -- which by and large means Christian minorities -- are being driven out through physical abuse, legal discrimination, murder and the destruction or confiscation of homes, businesses and churches. Call it religious cleansing. It is a political strategy that would eventually give Iran, Iraq, Egypt and the Holy Lands of Palestine a cultural homogeneity that has never existed in human history, before or after Christ.

Chairing a congressional hearing on this subject in July, GOP Rep. Chris Smith of New Jersey described the problem in historic terms that are acutely immediate to Benedict XVI: "There are dozens of Christian groups with rich histories, ranging from the ancient Syriac and Syro-Chaldean churches which still speak the (Aramaic) language of Jesus Christ, and Coptic churches in Egypt who preserve the language of the pharaohs. . . . There are followers of John the Baptist in Iraq and Iran. The Zoroastrians of Iran go back perhaps 3,000 years. It was under their power and influence that the great king of Persia, Cyrus, ended the Babylonian captivity of the children of Israel." Fundamentalist Islam is pressuring all of these. Many simply leave.

Iran's population has doubled since the revolution of 1979, but its Christian population has fallen to 100,000 from 300,000. The war in Iraq (Mesopotamia was evangelized by St. Thomas) has accelerated the emigration of Chaldo-Assyrian Christians, but non-Muslims were leaving even before the U.S. invasion. In 2000, the U.N. estimated that Iraq was Europe's second source of refugees, after Yugoslavia.

DOJ_NMG_0067553

The oppression of Egypt's Coptic Christians, who are 10% of the population, is brutal. During Easter Week this April, knife-wielding Muslims in Alexandria attacked worshipers at several Coptic churches. Afterward, Copts shouted: "Hosni Mubarak, where are you?" Good question. Typically, local Egyptian officials prevent the Copts from rebuilding their churches. In August, a Coptic woman named Hala Helmy Botros started a blog to draw attention to such incidents. She was shut down and her father beaten: "This is a present from your daughter." In the holy land, the Christian populations of Bethlehem, Nazareth and Jerusalem have emigrated under duress in past decades. The U.S. State Department says the Palestinian government has colluded to extort property there from Christian landowners.

The exodus (and falling birth rates) of Christians in the Middle East is a well-documented, much-analyzed phenomenon extending back into the last century. After Vatican II, Pope Paul VI created the Secretariat for the Non-Christian Religions to address these matters. In a dramatic attempt to heighten awareness, Pope John Paul II made a historic pilgrimage to Syria in 2001 and held some 60 meetings with Muslims. Observably little sustainable progress has resulted. If anything, Islamic fundamentalists have ramped up their anti-minority aggression and spread it -- to Sudan, Somalia, Nigeria, Indonesia and Pakistan (where members of the Ahmadi Muslim minority have been gunned down as apostates).

And so Pope Benedict has decided it is time to act, no matter that it may hurt the sensibilities of Islamic believers or Western elites ever alert to the delicacies of language. In this Benedict deserves the world's political support. The Middle East is being purged of a historically enriching diversity that will surely kill its ability to thrive. What will remain is a homogenous, self-proclaimed threat to the rest of the world. As Nina Shea of the Center for Religious Freedom argues, the pathologies and methods directed against unprotected minorities will be used next against other Muslims and governments. It is no exaggeration to suggest that the maltreatment of these local Christians is rightly seen as a proxy for the world.

The world's standard political institutions have proven unable to address this problem. The U.N. is compromised and hapless. The U.S. is distrusted, Europe is supine, China is cynical. There would be no better venue for seeking a way out than the Vatican.

The Vatican doesn't want oil. Hegemony is long gone from its vocabulary. The Vatican's only brief is a modus vivendi, a global reality Islam must eventually acknowledge. The governments of Egypt, Iraq and Saudi Arabia should open the dialogue Benedict XVI is seeking. In March, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak met with Benedict at the Vatican. He would be the obvious choice to take the lead. More than these Arab governments realize, their future could use the support of the pope's famous divisions.

Tolerance: A Two-Way Street (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, September 22, 2006

Religious fanatics, regardless of what name they give their jealous god, invariably have one thing in common: no sense of humor. Particularly about themselves. It's hard to imagine Torquemada taking a joke well.

Today's Islamists seem to have not even a sense of irony. They fail to see the richness of the following sequence. The pope makes a reference to a 14th-century Byzantine emperor's remark about Islam imposing itself by the sword, and to protest this linking of Islam and violence:

· In the West Bank and Gaza, Muslims attack seven churches.

· In London, the ever-dependable radical Anjem Choudary tells demonstrators at Westminster Cathedral that the pope is now condemned to death.

· In Mogadishu, Somali religious leader Abubukar Hassan Malin calls on Muslims to "hunt down" the pope. The pope not being quite at hand, they do the next best thing: shoot dead, execution-style, an Italian nun who worked in a children's hospital.

"How dare you say Islam is a violent religion? I'll kill you for it" is not exactly the best way to go about refuting the charge. But of course, refuting is not the point here. The point is intimidation.

First Salman Rushdie. Then the false Newsweek report about Koran-flushing at Guantanamo Bay. Then the Danish cartoons. And now a line from a scholarly disquisition on rationalism and faith given in German at a German university by the pope.

And the intimidation succeeds: politicians bowing and scraping to the mob over the cartoons; Saturday's craven New York Times editorial telling the pope to apologize; the plague of self-censorship about anything remotely controversial about Islam -- this in a culture in which a half-naked pop star blithely stages a mock crucifixion as the highlight of her latest concert tour.

In today's world, religious sensitivity is a one-way street. The rules of the road are enforced by Islamic mobs and abjectly followed by Western media, politicians and religious leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0067554

The fact is that all three monotheistic religions have in their long histories wielded the sword. The Book of Joshua is knee-deep in blood. The real Hanukkah story, so absurdly twinned (by calendric accident) with the Christian festival of peace, is about a savage insurgency and civil war.

Christianity more than matched that lurid history with the Crusades, an ecumenical blood bath that began with the slaughter of Jews in the Rhineland, a kind of preseason warm-up to the featured massacres to come against the Muslims, with the sacking of the capital of Byzantium (the Fourth Crusade) thrown in for good measure.

And Islam, of course, spread with great speed from Arabia across the Mediterranean and into Europe. It was not all benign persuasion. After all, what were Islamic armies doing at Poitiers in 732 and the gates of Vienna in 1683? Tourism?

However, the inconvenient truth is that after centuries of religious wars, Christendom long ago gave it up. It is a simple and undeniable fact that the violent purveyors of monotheistic religion today are self-proclaimed warriors for Islam who shout "God is great" as they slit the throats of infidels -- such as those of the flight crews on Sept. 11, 2001 -- and are then celebrated as heroes and martyrs.

Just one month ago, two journalists were kidnapped in Gaza and were released only after their forced conversion to Islam. Where were the protests in the Islamic world at that act -- rather than the charge -- of forced conversion?

Where is the protest over the constant stream of vilification of Christianity and Judaism issuing from the official newspapers, mosques and religious authorities of Arab nations? When Sheik 'Atiyyah Saqr issues a fatwa declaring Jews "apes and pigs"? When Sheik Abd al-Aziz Fawzan al-Fawzan, professor of Islamic law, says on Saudi TV that "someone who denies Allah, worships Christ, son of Mary, and claims that God is one-third of a trinity. . . . Don't you hate the faith of such a polytheist?"

Where are the demonstrations, where are the parliamentary resolutions, where are the demands for retraction when the Mufti Sheik Ali Gum'a incites readers of al-Ahram, the Egyptian government daily, against "the true and hideous face of the blood-suckers . . . who prepare [Passover] matzos from human blood"?

The pope gives offense and the Mujaheddin al-Shura Council in Iraq declares that it "will break up the cross, spill the liquor and impose the 'jizya' [head] tax; then the only thing acceptable is conversion or the sword." This to protest the accusation that Islam might be spread by the sword.

As I said. No sense of irony.

Finished But Not Gone (NYT)

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

For nearly a decade, a confident, sure-footed Tony Blair dominated British politics. He not only pushed his own Labor Party into the 21st century, but spurred the opposition Conservatives to revitalize themselves as well. Their new leader, David Cameron, strikingly resembles the early Tony Blair — nimble, persuasive, telegenic and popular.

But those words no longer describe the prime minister himself. His luster has faded, a victim of too many years in the spotlight and too many egregious misrepresentations over Iraq. His hold over the electorate, the Labor Party and even his own cabinet colleagues is slipping fast. It is time for Mr. Blair to move on, preferably before the end of this year.

And it is time for his presumed successor, Gordon Brown, to recognize that the job he has wanted so badly for so long is not merely a reward for tight-lipped endurance. Mr. Brown needs to start talking about the domestic and foreign policies he would work for if the Labor Party chose him as the next prime minister. But so long as Mr. Blair talks about staying on for almost another year, Mr. Brown, as a serving cabinet member, is constrained from doing so. That is reason enough for Mr. Blair, already a lame duck, to speed his departure.

In recent weeks, with Mr. Blair maneuvering to extend his tenure and Mr. Brown to shorten it, tensions between the two men have flared into the open. Labor politicians have grouped themselves into Blairite and Brownite camps. Until the succession is completed, Labor members of Parliament will be reluctant to go out on a limb for controversial reforms.

That is bad for Britain, bad for Mr. Blair's legacy and bad for Mr. Brown's political inheritance. It would be far better to silence the rivalry and begin the succession.

DOJ_NMG_0067555

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, September 25, 2006 7:58 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Saturday, September 23, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060923.pdf; agnb060923.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Bush And Musharraf Tout Benefits Of Cooperation In War Against Terrorism 3
Deal On Detainees Seen As Having Contradictions 5
Clinton Defends His Efforts To Capture Bin Laden 7
DOJ Appeals Challenge To NSA Terrorist Surveillance Program 7
Judge Denies Bond For Terror Plot Suspect In Georgia 7
Pennsylvania Man Pleads Guilty To Offering To Make Bomb For Al Qaeda 7
One Charge Against Accused Hamas Fundraiser Dropped 7
Both Parties Accused Of Politicizing The War On Terror 8

Homeland Response:

National CyberSecurity Chief Resigns 8
Hoekstra Raises Concerns Over Threat Of Terrorist Attacks From Europeans 8
DHS Spending More Money On Airport Security Technologies 8
Schwarzenegger Vetoes Shipping Container Fee 8
Capitol Police Were Warned About Security Vulnerabilities 8
BWI Evacuated After Gun Found In Luggage 9
NYT Claims Broad Definition Of "Material Support" Victimizes Refugees 9
Pataki Urged To Forge Compromise On WTC Memorial Names 9
FEMA Said To Have Provided Katrina Victims "Low-Ball" Repair Estimates 9

War News:

US Says More Iraqi Troops Needed In Baghdad 10
War Death Toll Now Equals 9/11's 10
Iraqi President Warns Of Spreading Violence 11
Detainees Wound Up Dead In Special Forces' Hands 11
UN Report Catalogues Human Rights Wrongs In Iraq 11
AP CEO Demands Trial For Bilal Hussein 12
Corp Of Engineers "Faked Budget Entries." 12
Judge Throws Out Halliburton Suit 12
WSJournal Examines Afghan Progress 5 Years Later 12
Rumsfeld Favors New Command For Africa 13
VHA Reports Tenfold Increase In Reports Of Stress, Other Mental Disorders 13
Reservists Are Stunned By NYC Request For Military Pay 13

DOJ:

Taylor Tapped As Interim US Attorney For DC 13

Corporate Scandals:

Hewlett-Packard Chairman Resigns Amid Widening Leak Probe Scandal 13
US Drops Charge Against Former NYSE Trader 14
Victims Of Enron Fraud Given Chance To Speak At Fastow Sentencing 14

Criminal Law:

Libby Plans To Testify In His Own Defense 15
Rodriguez Sentenced To Death For Sjodin Murder 15
Virginia Man Sentenced To 40 Years For 1994 Slaying 15
Wisconsin Official Sentenced To 18 Months In Prison For Contract Fraud 16
FBI Conducting Wide-Ranging Corruption Probe In Oakland 16
Citing FBI Backlog, DC Seeks $94 Million To Build Crime Lab 16
WPost Promotes Shield Law For Journalists 16

Civil Rights:

Texas Voting Fraud Law Faces Legal Challenge 17
California Golf Club Sued For Gender Bias 17
SSA, EEOC Caution DHS Regarding Citizenship Verification Rules 17

Antitrust:

FCC Expected To Place Conditions On AT&T BellSouth Deal 18

Concerns Raised About Proposed Smithfield-Premium Deal 18
Friction Over Wright Amendment Continues 19
Clear Competition Rules Urged 19
NYTimes Opposes Pork Producers' Merger 19

Environment:

Interior Offers To Allow Further Review Of Alaska Oil Leases 19
Florida Concedes Federal Oversight Of Everglades Cleanup 20
Sen. Durbin Says E. Coli Outbreak Could Have Been Prevented 20

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Tabman Temporarily Reassigned Over Clash With Samit 21
Judge Sets Bail Terms For Two Boston Police Officers 21
Alleged Drug Cartel Figures Near Plea Deals 21
Report Faults FDA's Process For Approving New Drugs 22
Indiana Man Arrested For Bomb-Making Ingredients, But FBI Rules Out Terrorism 23

Immigration:

Michigan Man Faces Deportation After Lying About WWII Actions 23

Tax:

IRS Investigating 2004 Activities Of Left-Wing Church 23

Congress-Administration:

"Reading First" Audit Finds Mismanagement, Conflicts Of Interest 23
Commerce Department Has Lost More Than 1000 Computers In The Last Five Years 24
McClellan Defends Paying Private Insurers For Fee-For-Service Plans 25
Treasury Reportedly Now "Flexible" Regarding GSE's Holdings 25
FAA Contracting Mismanaging Funds Loosing Millions 25
NYTimes Claims Splitting Ninth Circuit Would Cost $100 Million 25

Other News:

Stock Market Down On Concerns Economy Slowing 25
Target Matches Wal-Mart's Discount On Generic Prescription Drugs 26
Boeing Plant May Get Reprieve 26
California Democrats Concerned By Angelides' Lack Of Momentum 26
Patrick Has 21-Point Lead In Democrats' Massachusetts Gubernatorial Primary 26
Poll Shows Pawlenty And Hatch Tied At 42 27
Rendell Well Ahead Of Swan Despite Unfulfilled Campaign Pledges 27
Taylor And Perdue Offer Dueling Tax Cut Proposals 27
Kean Dismisses Allegations He's Distancing Himself From Bush 27
Webb Campaigning Throughout Rural Virginia This Weekend 27
Today's Hawaii Democratic Senate Primary Pits Akaka Against Case 28
Pennsylvania Green Party Senate Candidate Fails To Qualify For Ballot 28
Wynn Maintains Lead Over Primary Opponent 28
Northrup Uses Challenger's Own Columns To Attack Him 29
Firm Bearing Shuler's Name Pays Delinquent Tax Bill 29
White House Touts Bump In Bush Poll Numbers 29
Clinton Global Initiative Seen As Staging Ground For 2008 Democratic Presidential Candidates 29
Dobson Speaks At Event Meant To Energize GOP Base 29
Poll Shows Parties Splitting Rural Vote 30
Armey Claims GOP Risks Losing "Pocketbook Conservatives." 30
Dean Says Democrats Need To Do A Better Job Mobilizing Black Voters 31
Chavez Defends Attacks, Calls For Bush To Resign 31
Diplomats Meet To Consider Possible Sanctions For Iran 32
Top Pacific US Commander Says North Korea's Threat To South Is Declining 33
Rice Renews Call For UN Peacekeepers In Darfur 34
Gulf Between Jewish, Arab Israelis Widened Due To Lebanon War 34
Hezbollah Leader Holds Rally 34
Hamas Won't Agree To Government Recognizing Israel 35
Pope To Meet With Muslim Envoys 36
Paulson Ends China Trip With Dialogue, But No Progress 36
USN Holds Drill With Chinese Navy 37
Britain Seeks To Trade Anti-Dumping Support For EU Maximum Working Hour Opt-Out 37
Sen Clinton Draws Crowds At Husband's Conference On Global Challenges 37
EU Expected To Grant Membership To Romania, Bulgaria . 37
Last US Soldiers Leave Bosnia 38
US "Sharply Criticizes" Russia's Revocation Of Energy Project Permit 38
Panamanians Expected To Okay Canal Expansion 38
India Expected To Face Shortage Of Quality Engineers 38

DOJ_NMG_0067558

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush And Musharraf Tout Benefits Of Cooperation In War Against Terrorism. President Bush and Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf sought to present a united front and stressed the benefits of their cooperation in the war on terrorism. Their meeting received significant coverage in all the major US news media, including four stories covering over eight minutes on the network news. The TV news programs focused on the problems that recent allegations former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage threatened Pakistan after the 9/11 attacks posed for the US relationship with Pakistan.

ABC World News (9/22, story 3, 2:25, Raddatz) reported, "In public today, President Bush and Pakistan's President Musharraf today presented a united front in efforts to track down terrorists." President Bush: "We're on the hunt together." President Pervez Musharraf: "We're on the hunt together." Raddatz: "But privately, White House officials have been skeptical about Musharraf's commitment, given the truce he recently signed with tribal leaders near the afghan border. Afghanistan, which has seen a sharp increase in Taliban and al Qaeda operatives. But today, Musharraf insisted that's not the case." President Pervez Musharraf: "This treaty is not to deal with the Taliban. It is actually to fight the Taliban." Raddatz: "President said today." President Bush: "I believe him."

CBS Evening News (9/22, story 2, 1:45, Couric, 7.66M) said the allegations of a threat to Pakistan "made for a very bizarre day at the White House." CBS (Axelrod): "It had to be awkward for President Bush, asked about the stone age threat while standing right next to president Musharraf." Axelrod concluded that "no matter how this relationship got started, a senior White House official says tonight that Mr. Bush has total trust in Mr. Musharraf as a partner in the hunt for Osama bin Laden."

NBC Nightly News (9/22, story 6, 2:35, Williams) said "what started off as a perfectly predictable controlled event quickly became anything but. First the rare admission by President Bush who said he had been caught off guard and then the bizarre statement by the President of Pakistan as to why he couldn't answer a reporter's question." NBC (O'Donnell) added, "The President on defense after an explosive charge by his Pakistani guest that claimed the US threatened attack if Pakistan did not agree to cooperate." O'Donnell concluded, "Whatever influence was used on Pakistan after 9/11, its relationship with the US remains complicated. Their help still needed in the hunt for Osama bin Laden."

Major papers also covered the story, highlighting the Administration's concerns about the relationship with Pakistan. The Washington Post (9/23, A2, Abramowitz, De Young, 748K) reports, "President Bush yesterday launched a new round of personal diplomacy aimed at patching up the tense relations between Pakistan and Afghanistan, where a resurgent Taliban insurgency is posing new challenges for an administration already struggling to pacify Iraq." After meeting with Afghan president Karzai Tuesday, "in a twist from Bush's normal practice, the three leaders are then planning to dine together at the White House on Wednesday." Outside experts see "the meetings as part of heightened administration concern over rising violence in Afghanistan." According to White House aides, "a chunk of yesterday's hour-long meeting was devoted to Musharraf explaining to Bush the recent pact he reached with Islamic militants in Pakistan's border region," and Bush said he was satisfied" with Musharraf's assurances.

In contrast, the New York Times (9/23, A6, Sanger, 1.21M) reports that according to administration officials "Bush and his national security aides were clearly skeptical" of Musharfaf's reasoning on the pact with tribal leaders, although "Bush appeared to take General Musharraf's assurances at face value." The fear "that General Musharraf, whose political hold over sections of his own country is tenuous at best, is only episodically engaged in the battle against Al Qaeda and the Taliban" has become "an increasingly contentious issue between Afghanistan and Pakistan." The two leaders "stepped around the question of whether American forces or intelligence agencies had the right to go into Pakistan to hunt down" bin Laden. "Bush fudged the issue by saying, 'We're on the hunt together.'"

Describing Bush on the defensive the Los Angeles Times (9/23, Richter, 918K) reports, "President Bush, struggling with turbulence in the important U.S.-Pakistani relationship, eased back Friday from his vow to order U.S. troops to invade Pakistan, if necessary, to track down Osama bin Laden."

DOJ_NMG_0067559

Time Magazine (9/23, Waller) in a web exclusive says "Bush and Musharraf finally got back on the same talking points Friday" telling "reporters they were still joined at the hip when it comes to fighting al-Qaeda and the Taliban. And, as his military commanders prefer, Bush danced around the question of whether he'd ask Musharraf's permission to send U.S. troops into Pakistan to grab bin Laden, insisting that both leaders are still 'on the hunt together.' Musharraf insisted the agreement he struck with the tribal leaders is not a deal with the Taliban. 'This deal is against the Taliban,' he claimed. And Bush said: 'I believe him.'" And "Bush…was delighted the two of them were back on their talking points. 'Good job,' he told Musharraf as they walked away from the press conference. But the tensions in the relationship remain. And the top U.S. commander in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. Karl W. Eikenberry, said Thursday he plans no immediate cuts in the 20,000 American troops battling a growing Taliban threat. Nor will Friday's spin control reverse the worsening war there."

The Financial Times (9/23, Daniel) leads that Musharraf "transformed a White House news conference into a book promotion when he refused to answer a question about his claim," saying he was "honour-bound" to the publisher not to talk about the book. "This prompted George W. Bush, US president, to interject: 'In other words, buy the book is what he's saying.'" While Bush "strongly defended the actions of Gen Musharraf after 9/11," it "underlined continued tensions in the US-Pakistan relationship strengthened by revived concerns about whether the US could strike at Osama bin Laden, al-Qaeda leader, in Pakistani territory and doubts about the peace agreement Gen Musharraf has struck with tribal leaders on the border of Afghanistan." The AFP (9/23, Knox) leads that Bush and Musharraf "celebrated their close cooperation in the war on terrorism but did not deny that it began with a US threat to bomb Pakistan 'back to the Stone Age.'"

The Washington Times (9/23, Curl, 88K) notes, "Pakistan's point man on the truce told The Washington Times Thursday that it is part of a broader strategy to keep terrorists out and will not undermine the fight against Islamic extremists." Gov. Ali Muhammad Jan Aurakzai of North West Frontier Province said, "It's not just a peace agreement. It is a larger strategy with a military arm, a political arm and a reconstruction arm."

The AP (9/23, Riechmann) reports that after his meeting with Bush Musharraf "later told students at The George Washington University that Pakistan 'joined the war not so much for the world but for ourselves.'" He "acknowledged that 'we are moving slowly' in reforming the Islamic madrassas, or extremist schools, in his country. But he said they accounted for only 5 percent of the country's schools."

McClatchy Newspapers (9/23, Hutcheson, Landay) reports, "Musharraf, who's facing tribal rebellions and growing disenchantment in his officer corps and among Pakistanis over his close cooperation with the United States, can't afford to reverse the policy, said U.S. intelligence officials." Meanwhile, "Bush said Musharraf renewed his commitment to hold 'free and fair' elections next year."

Armitage Denies Allegations Pakistan Was Threatened With Attack. Leading its broadcast the CBS Evening News (9/22, lead story, 1:30, Couric, 7.66M) reported "Bush responded to the allegations saying it's the first he has heard about it." Musharraf: "It was a threat, certainly, and I took it that the United States, after having whatever happened to the world trade center would be -- a wounded country, a wounded super power, and they're willing to do anything to counter and to punish the perpetrators. Now, if we stand in the way of that, we are going to suffer." CBS (Kroft): "A few days later, Musharraf said he received the list of seven demands from the United States, including giving US military unrestricted access to its airspace, its military bases and its seaports. After deciding that Pakistan could not survive with the US as an adversary, he worked out a compromise."

ABC World News (9/22, story 3, 2:25, Raddatz) reported that "most of the attention was on Musharraf's claim that shortly after 9/11, his intelligence chief was told by then-Deputy Secretary of State, Richard Armitage, that Pakistan would face air strikes if Musharraf did not join the war on terror." Armitage has denied the allegation and "the state department spokesman who does not have a book contract, as far as I know, backed up what Mr. Armitage said. He said there were no threats said. Although Mr. Armitage was very firm with the Pakistanis." The Los Angeles Times (9/23, Hennessy-Fiske, 918K) and McClatchy Newspapers (9/23, Landay) report similar details.

CNN (9/23) on its web site reports that in an interview Armitage said, "Never did I threaten to use military force. … I was not authorized to." He "acknowledged he was part of a group who met with Pakistan's intelligence chief to convey strong U.S. determination. He said the message was that 'we absolutely need their help if we were going to prosecute the Taliban and al Qaeda in Afghanistan. … We wanted to make sure they understood both the opportunities and the downside, but there was no threat."

DOJ_NMG_0067560

Some Question Bush Reliance On Musharraf To Provide Moderating Influence. The Washington Times (9/23, Dinan, Behn, 88K) reports that while some question Musharraf's intentions "for Mr. Bush, Gen. Musharraf is one of the Muslim leaders he is trying to promote as a moderate fighting extreme elements, along with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, Afghan President Hamid Karzai and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas." The Times notes, "Bush has taken some grief for his support of Gen. Musharraf. He told the United Nations this week that the world should no longer trade away support for freedom and democracy in the hopes of getting stability." But "that is exactly what some critics -- including democracy advocates in Pakistan -- say Mr. Bush is doing with Gen. Musharraf."

Similarly, Maureen Dowd in her column in the New York Times (9/23, 1.21M) writes that Pakistani president Pervez Musharraf "is a smooth operator, a military dictator cruising around the capital with his elegant wife and enormous security contingent, talking about how much he likes democracy, which he won't yet allow." Musharraf "may have more respect for checks and balances than Dick Cheney, but that's not saying much." Dowd question's Bush's faith in Musharraf cooperation "'on the hunt' for Osama and the Taliban at the same time he's setting up a safe haven for them -- and getting huffy at the idea that American forces have the right to go into Pakistan to track Osama." Dowd quotes British historian Niall Ferguson saying "the real problem is the Axis of Allies — Saudi Arabia, Pakistan and Britain. … The terrorists are funded in Saudi Arabia, they're trained in Pakistan, and they organize their plots quite easily in London." Dowd states, "The Paks, as W. and Vice like to call them, are at the heart of the Faustian deal the Bush administration has made. The justification for invading Iraq was that they couldn't allow a dictator who might be harboring terrorists to stay in power. But their great ally in the war on terror is General Musharraf, a dictator who appears to be harboring terrorists, including the one we want most."

Deal On Detainees Seen As Having Contradictions. The New York Times (9/23, Liptak, 1.21M) reports with skepticism on the pitfalls it perceives in the White House-Congressional deal: "The compromise reached on Thursday between Congressional Republicans and the White House on the interrogations and trials of terrorism suspects is, legal experts said yesterday, a series of interlocking paradoxes. It would impose new legal standards that it forbids the courts to enforce. It would guarantee terrorist masterminds charged with war crimes an array of procedural protections. But it would bar hundreds of minor figures and people who say they are innocent bystanders from access to the courts to challenge their potentially lifelong detentions." The agreement's complex language "was a subject of debate, posturing and, perhaps, some wishful thinking."

Critics Fear Deal Does Not Prevent Torture. McClatchy Newspapers (9/23, Talev, Gordon) reports with similar pessimism, "Several Democrats and civil rights advocates charged Friday that a Republican compromise over the treatment of terrorism suspects leaves the door open for torture and abuse, while stripping captives of a basic right to a court appeal." Expressing objections or concern are the president of the Center for Constitutional Rights, Caroline Fredrickson of the ACLU, and Rep. Jane Harman (ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee). McClatchy pointedly notes, "The legislation also limits detainees from appealing in federal court to challenge their detentions - a right that dates to the Magna Carta in the year 1215."

WPost Analysis Notes Critics' Misgivings. In an analysis piece for the Washington Post (9/23, 748K), reporter R. Jeffrey Smith writes, "Many human rights groups and legal experts who parsed the bill yesterday said the White House had achieved most of its objectives in negotiations with dissident GOP senators, including John McCain (Ariz.), Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) and John W. Warner (Va.). They said the bill's provisions would violate detainees' legitimate rights, conflict with Supreme Court decisions, and come back to haunt Washington when Americans in foreign custody are subjected to the same harsh interrogations and military trials." Several critics are quoted, including Marine Col. Dwight Sullivan of DOD's Office of Military Commissions, who said that it "replaces the old broken" system banned by the Supreme Court with a "new broken commission system."

Democrats Could Be Stymied. The Washington Post (9/23, A6, Babington, Weisman, 748K) reports in a an article positively headlined "GOP Upbeat On Terror-Trial Bill," "House GOP leaders signaled yesterday that they are satisfied with the main elements of a bill on military trials negotiated Thursday by dissident Republican senators and White House officials, and they predicted that Congress will pass the measure before adjourning next week." The House action "all but settles an intraparty squabble and puts congressional Democrats in a difficult spot six weeks before elections in which they hope to wrest many House and Senate seats from the GOP. ... to oppose the compromise, which Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) has embraced, would subject them to charges of being soft on terrorism, several analysts said."

DOJ_NMG_0067561

The New York Times (9/23, Zernike, Stolberg, 1.21M) also reports on the apparent unity enjoyed by Republicans after a week of tumult, saying, "Republicans on Friday put aside their differences, setting the House and Senate on a path to approve a compromise struck with the White House before lawmakers break to campaign for the midterm elections. ... After weeks of embarrassing division on a signature issue, Republicans resumed their campaign to portray themselves as the party of strength on national security, with Mr. McConnell practically daring Democrats to get in the way."

Bill Gives Bush Leeway. The AP (9/23, Flaherty) reports, "The resulting legislation, if passed next week by Congress as Republicans hope, would revive the CIA's terrorist interrogation program because it would reduce the risk that agency workers could be found guilty of war crimes. The deal also could open the door to aggressive techniques that test the bounds of international standards of prisoner treatment." Legal experts agree "in the end it will be up to the president to determine when most interrogation methods go too far. The bill bans detainees from protesting their detention and treatment in court."

Military Defense Lawyers Blast Bill. The Los Angeles Times (9/23, Simon, Barnes, 918K) reports, "Military defense lawyers assailed compromise legislation for interrogating and prosecuting terrorism suspects, contending Friday that proposed rules would prevent them from learning whether evidence used against their clients was obtained through coercion or torture." Rights groups also expressed concern that the compromise gave the president "too much latitude." The Times calls the tribunal and surveillance authorization bills "centerpieces of the security-focused agenda the GOP wants to highlight before the November election."

Army Outsources Interrogator Training. The Washington Post (9/23, Pincus, 748K) reports, "Since the Iraq war began, the U.S. Army has quadrupled the number of soldiers it trains each year to be detainee interrogators, according to Army officials involved in the program. Next year, 1,200 interrogators are set to be trained at the Army Intelligence Center at Fort Huachuca, Ariz., up from about 300 in 2003." The Post adds, "The Army is gearing up for the effort by hiring private companies to handle the training. ... Turning to outside contractors to teach interrogation reflects another trend of the Rumsfeld Pentagon: outsourcing programs to private companies that often are filled with retired military men and women who did similar work when they were in the service." The Army has estimated "the annual cost for an outside instructor at $100,000 ... That is at least $20,000 above the average of what someone in the service would receive."

Newsweek Explores How The Terror Deal Was Reached. Newsweek (9/23, Hosenball, 3.12M) in a web exclusive reports, "Three renegade Republican senators may be the biggest winners in Thursday's deal between the White House and Capitol Hill over the treatment of high-level terror detainees." The White House, after a pause, gave in because "it was clear that the GOP renegades' position was supported by at least 51 senators. By the same token, an important element in the compromise, the sources say, was the recognition by Graham, McCain and Warner all along that neither they nor a majority of their Senate colleagues really wanted to put the CIA interrogation program completely out of business.."

European Faults US Official For Geneva Remarks. The New York Times (9/23, Bernard, 1.21M) reports, "The European counterterrorism chief, Gijs de Vries, criticized a Bush administration official who suggested that the Geneva Conventions should not be considered sacrosanct, and that the legal framework for the treatment of terrorists should be amended." John Bellinger III (State Department counsel) made his comments in a Financial Times interview on Thursday. De Vries said, "The opinion of Europe's ministers is that respecting the rules, not bending them, is essential to our credibility and hence to our effectiveness in the fight against terrorism." Bellinger has responded that he was "not suggesting that the old rules should be discarded or that they should not be followed."

Boston Globe Criticizes Compromise. The Boston Globe (9/23, 425K) editorializes, "The senators have now agreed to a compromise that leaves the [Geneva] conventions on life support at best. ... After delaying legal action against hundreds of detainees for almost five years, the administration should work with Congress to devise interrogation and trial rules that civilized peoples expect.."

DOJ_NMG_0067562

Dallas Morning News Looks Positively on Bill. The Dallas Morning News (9/23, 500K) editorializes, "All in all, the compromise kept alive the tradition of openness in our democracy that we would like others to emulate. The House now needs to get on board."

NYTimes Letter To Editor Denounces Terror Bill. In the New York Times (9/23, 1.21M), a letter by Lawrence J. Fox (an expert on "lawyers' ethical obligations" retained by Gitmo detainees' attorneys) calls "pathetic" the willingness of Sens. Graham, Warner, and McCain to tolerate "a bill that will strip detainees of habeas rights." Fox asks, "Can you imagine the outcry if an American citizen were simply captured and imprisoned in a country that announced that there would be no review of the American's status because that country's nationals would not receive review if they were imprisoned in America?"

